Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Truth—A Gem.

There is a gem of priceless worth,
  And gold can never buy it,
And should you search around the earth,
  I think you'll not deny it.
There's naught beneath the silent stars
That roll on high their glittering cars,
There's naught in age, there's naught in youth,
That's worth the gem which men call Truth.

Giv me that gem of priceless worth,
  I'll clasp it to my breast;
Where'er I rest in all the earth,
  Bold Truth shall be my guest.
Though problems meet my anxious gaze
High as the heaven's furthest blaze,
And deep as earth's volcanic center,
Still reason is a faithful mentor.

Dark night of faith, farewell forever!
  In freedom's sun I'll bask;
Thy galling chains I'll now dissever—
  Oh, what a glorious task!
In truth's fair realm I'll rear my home,
Beneath the shade of reason's dome;
Philosophy! 'tis thine to tell
Of every creed's dogmatic knell.

JOHN A. METTE.

The Wrestling Match.

[Heston's picture of "The Wrestling Match" so pleased Mr. Sleaker that he thinks a description of the following from his favorite poem, Homer's "Iliad," will be appreciated by TRUTH SEEKER readers.—ELMINA.]

A third bold game Achilles next demands,
And calls the wrestlers to the level sands;
A massy tripod for the victor lies,
Of twice six oxen its reputed price;
And next, the loser's spirits to restore,
A female captiv, valued but at four.
Scarce did the chief the vigorous strife propose,
When tower-like Ajax and Ulysses rose.
Amid the ring each nervous rival stands,
Embracing rigid with implicit hands;
Close locked above, their heads and arms are mixed
Below, their planted feet, at distance fixed.

Now to the grasp each manly body bends,
The humid sweat from every pore descends.
Their bones resound to blows; sides, shoulders, thighs,
Swell to each gripe, and bloody tumors rise.
Nor could Ulysses, for his art renowned,
O'erturn the strength of Ajax on the ground.
Nor could the strength of Ajax overthrow
The watchful caution of his artful foe.
While the long strife e'en tired the lookers on,

. . . . . .

And grappling close they tumble side by side;
Defiled with honorable dust they roll,
Still breathing strife, and unsubdued of soul;
Again they rage, again to combat rise,
When great Achilles thus divides the prize.

Book Notice.

"THE IRRELIGION OF THE FUTURE."

A very brilliant and powerful book, with this title, has just been published by a young Frenchman, who wrote before reaching twenty-one one of the best essays ever printed on Epicurus and his French followers; for instance, Helvetius, Holbach, and Volney. M. Guyau shows that religion, even in the attenuated forms which it has assumed in the hands of Emerson, Matthew Arnold, and Herbert Spencer, is rapidly losing its hold on thought. Under every legitimate definition, it involves contradictions which must ultimately prove fatal. Among the finest chapters are that asserting the capacity of women to become as enlightened as men, whenever they become equally familiar with the great facts of practical outdoor life, and that advising the father to teach his children all the truth he can, and not suffer their passions to be inflamed and their reason to be dwarfed by a so-called religious education. As neither of these books has yet been translated, though that on Epicurianism was published in 1878, I add the titles in the original French, "L'Irreligion de L'Avenir" and "La Morale d'Epicure." They may be had for 7½ francs each of Felix Alcan, 108 Boulevard Saint-Germain, Paris, or for $2.75 each of Steiger & Co., 25 Park Place, New York.

It will be noticed that these books cost much less in Europe than here, and so do foreign books generally. One was lately recommended in THE TRUTH SEEKER with the remark that it costs $1 here, but only 60 cents in London. Part of this difference is due to our duty of 25 per cent on imported books. This is simply a tax on knowledge, and it is one which presses with peculiar severity upon us who want to get the freshest and highest fruits of thought. If M. Guyau had taken the orthodox view of Epicurus, we could find his book in the original on the shelves of every public library, and in a good translation on the counters of all the large book stores. It is not to be found in the best public libraries in New England, and cannot be procured except in a foreign tongue, and after a month's delay, besides the obstacle interposed by the tariff. The latter injures us in still another way. Our main hope is in the spread of science. This depends on the rapidity with which new discoveries can be reported across the ocean. No scientific man here can afford to rest ignorant of what his brethren are finding out in London, Paris, and Berlin. But if he wants to buy their books and pamphlets as fast as published, he has to pay 25 per cent extra on account of a tariff which, in this case, protects nothing more plainly than ignorance.

Some of the best books of this sort never get reprinted, and even if they all did ultimately, the world cannot afford to wait for it. The loss from delay, as well as the increase of expense involved in boxing books and freight, are such serious considerations with the activ professional man that he usually gets his books as fast as published by mail, and pays the duty rather than wait long enough to get a box of them through the custom-house, free of duty, on the ground that they are to be used professionally. Even that slight chance of relief is of no meaning for us who want the best books, not as tools of our trade, but as weapons for waging the great war.

As what I hav said about the tariff before has been misunderstood, I wish to add that I am by no means in favor of abolishing all duties on imports. I know of no better way to raise a revenue, with the exception of the internal taxes on whisky, beer, and tobacco. All I want, besides having foreign books come in free, is to see such reductions as will not only make food and clothes cheaper for the poor, but will enable our manufacturer to buy his raw materials at lower prices than at present, so that he may enjoy full possession of what my facetious friend, Mr. Denslow, calls "our country's right to make what it pleases."

F. M. HOLLAND.

Obituary.

Died, near Osage Mission, Kansas, Sept. 30th, Nelson Van Dyke, aged 76 years.

The deceased was for many years a strong Materialist, and was what might, with propriety, be called a true Liberal. To the last he contended that every person had the right to express his honest convictions, and almost the last words he used were in condemnation of the action of the courts of Illinois in the Anarchists' trial. For the last twenty-five years of his life he was totally blind, still he kept track of the movements of Liberalism, and nothing delighted him more than to hav THE TRUTH SEEKER read to him. He was a patron of the above-mentioned paper from the first year of its existence until he passed away. He was also a subscriber to the D. M. Bennett defense fund. Although for a long time he had been on the verge of the grave, his belief never changed. He regarded the sun as his father and the earth as his mother, and death to him was but the decree of nature, and not the fiat of a ghostly being. He passed away peacefully.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

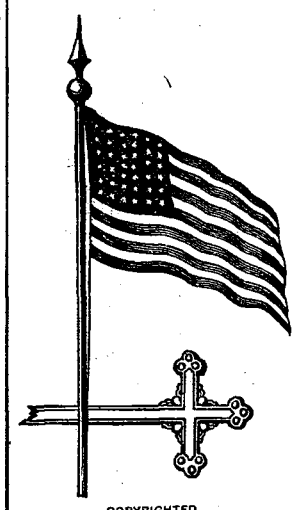
REASON IS THE LAMP OF THE MIND.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.



THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

THE book printers of this city are on strike for a raise of 6 cents per 1,000 ems, and the enforcement of Union rules in all book offices. The strike extended to THE TRUTH SEEKER office, but was nipped in the bud by granting the raise.

THOMAS C. MANNING, United States minister to Mexico, died at New York, October 11th, aged fifty-six.

THE Freemasons of Missouri hav decided to expel all members who are engaged in the liquor business.

"MISS MULOCK," the English novelist, is dead at the age of sixty years. Her real name was Dinah Maria Mulock Craik.

MISS ROSE ELIZABETH CLEVELAND, the president's sister, is instructor in a young ladies' boarding school in this city.

THE Rev. Thomas K. Beecher, of Elmira, has accepted the New York Greenbackers' nomination for secretary of state.

MICHAEL DAVITT, the Irish agitator, has been to America and gone away without making any speeches or revealing the object of his visit.

HERMAN TUEBER has been convicted of inciting a riot at Union Hill, N. J., on the occasion of a meeting of the Anarchists. There was no riot and no assault, except that made by the police, who captured the hall hired and paid for by the Anarchists, and refused to allow them to enter it.

THE yacht Thistle has sailed for Scotland.

THE throat trouble of the crown prince of Germany is reported alarmingly worse.

THE Rev. Dr. Pentecost ran for mayor in Newark, N. J., on the United Labor ticket. He received 1,861 votes out of 25,594.

THE Northern Ohio Insane Asylum, at Cleveland, was visited by fire on the 12th. Six of the patients lost their lives, and many were injured.

A MAN named Stain has just been arrested in Boston charged with robbing the Dexter (Me.) bank and murdering Cashier Barron nine years ago.

DAMAGING testimony against the moral character of the Rev. Mr. Millen, of Brooklyn, is being given before the tribunal which has his case in hand.

IN Baltimore, Md., October 11th, Robert Ridgely, colored, went to church in sound health, knelt at the altar to receive communion, and immediately fell dead.

MISS ANNA JOHNSON, librarian of the Workingmen's Free Library on Clinton Place, attempted to register as a voter on the 11th. The inspectors refused to receive her name.

CAPTAIN BLACK and Moses Salomon, counsel for the Chicago Anarchists, are in New York consulting with Gen. Roger A. Pryor about the petition for a writ of error in the case of their clients.

A TERRIBLE railroad accident, near Kouts, Ind., October 11th, caused the death of twenty persons, and as many more were injured. Two trains collided, and the cars were set on fire by the stoves and lamps.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN made some wild speeches in Chicago last week on the Anarchist question, and his arrest was ordered by the mayor. Train left the city to escape going to jail. His audiences were greatly excited by his harangs.

CAPTAIN WALLER, of Camden, N. J., went into the study of the Rev. Mr. Tidball the other day, and struck him in the face. The clergyman did not return the blow, although he professed belief in his ability to thrash his assailant. Waller's grievance was that Tidball had neglected Mrs. Waller, which is not the usual complaint in such matters.

JOSEPH'S VARIEGATED COAT.

Odds and Ends.

IT is after a man has attained a ripe old age that he begins to fall off.

A GEORGIA debating society discussed the question: "Did Zeke Slade's tobacco barn burn up or down?" It was decided that it did.

Do not marry for riches, my son; but remember that the husband of an heiress is seldom obliged to get up at 5 o'clock in the morning and build the fire.

VISITING cards this winter are to be very plain, we're told. But those with pictures and spots on them will continue to be found useful at evening parties.

THE Englishman who said there were no ruins in this country could never hav met an American citizen returning home after a torchlight procession in the midst of an exciting election.

MRS. O'HARRITY: "Now put in another quart." Grocer (putting in second quart): "Why didn't you ask for a half-gallon at first and hav done with it?" Mrs. O'Harrity: "Och, bless yez sowl! One quart is for meself and t'other is for Mrs. Casey."

MISSIONARY (to newly converted savage): "How is it now about eating your fellow-men? It is four weeks now since you slaughtered your father. Hav you grown better?" Savage: "Yes, teacher; since then I hav only eaten a couple of distant relativs."

AUTUMN.

Now the sportsman goes forth with his gun,
In search of a day's royal fun;
But returns home anon
With his powder all gone,
And his fingers less numerous by one.

HER father: "Young man, I do not object to your calling occasionally on my daughter, but you mustn't stay so late. It was 12 o'clock last night before you got away." Young man: "'Got away' is very good, sir. I either had to stay or get my coat torn."

"I AM going to quit," said a Clifton housemaid this morning to her mistress. "What's the matter?" "I won't liv in a house where I am prayed against. Every morning the boss has prayer and he says, 'O Lord, who hatest nothing but the housemaid!'" "Why, Bridget, he said, 'O Lord, who hatest nothing thou hast made!'"

LITTLE Georgie, after his mother had prepared him for bed, while still in her lap used to say his evening prayer. One night he said, "I don't want to say my prayers in this way," and getting out of his mother's lap he knelt down before her, and placing his open hands together, repeated his prayer. When his father heard of this, he was much interested. He always felt that this was the proper attitude in prayer in the family and in the closet. As nothing had been said to Georgie on the subject, he thought it was evidence of a sort of natural religion. "Georgie," said his father, "do you suppose God likes to hav you say your prayers this way better than the way you used to?" "Oh, I don't suppose God cares anything about it. I was thinking of the kangaroo." He had lately been to the menagerie and seen that animal sitting on its haunches with its forefeet placed together somewhat as he placed his hands in saying his prayers.

A FORTUNE-TELLER can hit a woman's case nine times out of ten. "You've had sickness and trouble. You'll hav some property fall to you. You do not hav full confidence in your husband. Beware! He is deceiving you! You hav a very gentle nature. Everybody loves you. You hav had trouble with a relativ. It was not your fault. Beware of a blue-eyed woman with a mole on her left cheek. She will make you trouble. Good-bye—$1—call again."

YOUNG Mr. Whitechoker, the new minister, was making an evening call and had occasion to consult the Bible. "It is in my room," said Miss Clara; "I will bring it." "It is a source of sincere joy to me," Mr. Whitechoker remarked on Miss Clara's return, "when I learn that a young lady of the congregation finds pleasure and consolation in consulting the pages of the Good Book." Miss Clara blushed with pleasure and wondered if she had taken the autumn leaves all out.

CHARLEY (to his sister's beau): "Say, Mr. Griggsby, pa bought a big dog this afternoon, and he's chained up behind the house, and he's going to be let loose at 10 o'clock." Griggsby: "Indeed, Charley!" Charley: "Yes, and he bought a shotgun and had copper toes put on his boots to-day, and he says if you don't leave by 10 he's going to take the law into his own hands. Now I want to talk business. What'll it be worth to you to hav me poison the dog, take the shot out of the gun, hide the boots, and set the clock back an hour? I'm ready to open negotiations."

A LOVELY TRADE-MARK.

I met her on the crowded street,
I gazed upon her face;
'Twas wondrous fair, 'twas quite replete
With beauty and with grace.

Bold Cupid shot a flaming dart
From his unerring bow;
It pierced the center of my heart—
Who could resist the blow?

I hastened to her beauteous side,
I urged my passion great.
Her eyes superb she opened wide,
My soul to penetrate.

Then held she up unto my sight
Her hand, a shapely thing;
And there I saw, in wild affright,
A plain gold wedding ring.

"This is my husband's trade-mark, sir,"
She blithely said to me;
"And he doth very much prefer Infringements not to see."

"O happy man!" did I repeat,
As she passed from my view;
"Could I but find a girl as sweet,
I'd own a trade-mark, too."

Gems of Thought.

THE sin which is execrated and visited so severely upon the head of the female is equally as bad in one sex as in the other, and it is very wrong, very unjust, to crush the girl to the earth and abandon her to the fate of an outcast, while the male is just as respectable as ever and is left free to repeat his conquests as often as opportunity may serve.—D. M. Bennett.

A ROMANTIC girl of seventeen and an easy-going young officer of just twenty-one can hardly be expected to understand what is needed for solid happiness or the best development of their own natures, and married at that age, the chances were that they would grow apart as they older, and that when they came to be real men and women, they would find themselvs thinking differently on every subject under heaven. And without mental sympathy, where is the true joy of home?—Mrs. Linton.

BUT whoso hath the world's goods and beholdeth his brother in need, and shutteth up his compassion from him, how doth the love of God abide in him? My little children, let us not love in word, neither with the tongue, but in deed and truth.—1 John iii, 17, 18 (R. V.).

AND it came to pass, that on one of these days, as Jesus taught the people in the temple, and preached the gospel, the chief priests and the scribes came upon him, with the elders, and spake unto him, saying, Tell us, by what authority doest thou these things? or who is he that gave thee this authority? And he answered and said unto them, I will also ask you one thing; and answer me: The baptism of John, was it from heaven or of men? And they reasoned with themselvs, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; he will say, Why then believed ye him not? But and if we say, Of men; all the people will stone us; for they be persuaded that John was a prophet. And they answered, That they could not tell whence he was. And Jesus said unto them, Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things.—Luke xx, 2-8. [NOTE.—The chief priests were evidently caught in a trap; but their question was a most reasonable one, and deserved a more explicit and straightforward answer. The answer displays a certain amount of cleverness, but it is altogether devoid of dignity and moral weight. At least, I think so. —C.]

ALAS, for the main body of clerical proselytizers if the personal love of their female disciples were accounted to them for sin! and good-bye to the influence of the priesthood if it might deal only with the intellect of man and not trade on the heart of woman! that heart with all its strength and weakness, its hopes, its fears, its passions, its desires on which they build their stronghold and found their empire. That would indeed be the lamp without the oil, the thorns laid beneath the pot and no fire at hand to make them burn.—Under Which Lord? by E. Lynn Linton.

OF these are they that creep into houses and take captiv silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts, ever learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth. And like as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also withstand the truth; men corrupted in mind, reprobate concerning the faith. But they shall proceed no further; for their folly shall be evident unto all men, as theirs also came to be.—2 Timothy iii, 6-9 (R. V.).

ONE GOOD LIFE.

A sunbeam piercing the forbidden shade
Of some drear prison cell has often brought Quiet to troubled spirits, and has made
Dark, morbid brooding change to peaceful thought.

So one good life will prove a guiding light,
To brighten paths weak mortals oft find drear—
A beacon in the narrow way of right
To lure the fallen to a higher sphere.

—The American.

HE who believes in a future life, and at the same time believes that making this life good is the way, and the only way, to make that life happy—such a man cannot fail to find his faith his grandest inspiration and his strongest support. Knowing that "whatsoever a man sows that shall he also reap," he will naturally and necessarily seek to plant "good seed." But if, as has been true in the case of most religions, he believes he can escape the natural results of his actions if he trusts in a God who promises to save him on some other grounds than those of conduct and character; then his faith in another life may not affect his moral life at all, or it may affect it for the worse. And if, as has been too often true, the being he thinks of as controling his destiny be an immoral one, then of course his faith will lead directly to immorality.—M. J. Savage.

THE discoveries which in one age are confined to the studious and enlightened few, become in the next the established creed of the learned, and in the third form part of the elementary principles of education.—Dugald Stewart.

THE Baptist Examiner thinks that the influence of Scotch Presbyterianism and of Boston Unitarianism was seen when on a Sunday the crew of the Thistle went to church, and the crew of the Volunteer worked their beautiful yacht down the bay and back. But the Volunteer got there all the same.

HENRY GEORGE, Land Theorist, and Sergius E. Schevitch, Socialist, debated their differences before an audience of three thousand people in this city last Sunday evening. It is the popular verdict that Mr. Schevitch used stronger arguments against the single land tax than Mr. George was able to bring to its support; also that Mr. Schevitch's arraignment of Mr. George was more powerful than his defense of his own doctrin of Socialism.

THE body of a man who died in Omaha was sent to Akron, O., for burial. On the case inclosing the coffin was tacked an itemized bill for $110, which was to be collected before the body was delivered to the friends of the deceased man. Among the items was a bill of $2 due a priest for saying masses for the repose of the dead man's soul.

SEVEN cases, involving the constitutionality of prohibitory laws, are before the United States Supreme Court. The Prohibitionists are in great fear that the decisions in these cases should be like that of Judge Brewer, of Kansas, who held that, under the Fourteenth amendment, the property or business of a citizen cannot be destroyed without compensation.

"FOROE is no Remedy," in English words, headed an article on the Irish question in the Citizens' Gazette of Hamburg. The police caused the suppression of the paper. They said the article indirectly incited the Socialists to violence. The Union Hill, N. J., Anarchist Tueber was convicted of shouting "Ruhe!" when the police broke up a meeting. The word is German for "Peace."

AT the session of the synod of New Jersey at Asbury Park, Oct. 18th, the report of the committee on sectarian influence in public institutions was read by the Rev. Dr. J. G. Symmes. It declared that one-half of the pupils in the State Reform School at Jamesburg were compelled to attend mass and the services of the Catholic church, and were not permitted to attend any other religious services, thus making a form of service compulsory. The report declared that the only correct motto for the state must be, Equality for all, special privileges for none.

THE Rev. Melvin Jamieson, D.D., writing from Burmah, says that the nativs hav a curious notion of the rite of baptism. One very general belief is that converts are held under water until they say that they can see Gaudama no longer. Another idea is that the candidates are held under water with forked sticks. These notions principally prevail were Baptist missionaries are stationed.

AT the laying of the corner-stone of the Roman Catholic parochial school at Middletown, Conn., the Rev. Henry Hennerney, of Pawtucket, R. I., the selected preacher for the occasion, denounced the American system of public schools as heartless, headless, and godless. He called the common schools the schools of immorality in which divorces originate, and said the system is managed by corrupt politicians. The bishop of the diocese and about twenty priests were on the platform.

A MOST peculiar and hideous decoration in the shape of a necklace, probably the only one of the kind in the world, has recently been added to the curiosities in the National Museum at Washington. It consists of a cunningly wrought band of bead-work, dependent from which are eight shriveled human fingers, with tips stained a dull ochre color. The necklace was the property of a Sioux medicin man, and it is understood that each finger was cut from the hand of a different victim.

THE German barber, whose idiomatic eccentricities find expression in the Sun, has been visiting the Anarchists. The opinion he formed after an extensiv experience is eminently sensible. A CORRESPONDENT of the Liverpool Daily Post tells of this incident that he saw himself, and therefore knows to be true: "Two good, kind Christian clergymen, with hearts overflowing with zeal in their work as agents for the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, were seen to track two poor, scantily-clad Jews, who were wending their way to the synagog on the Day of Atonement. Having reached the old people, these worthy gentlemen, with burning eloquence, begged these two lost sheep to turn from the wickedness of Judaism, to abjure their ancient faith, and allow themselvs to be turned into brand-new Christians. Somehow or other, these poor Jews did not see any particular reason for changing their religion at a moment's notice, and in a respectfu manner stated their objection to making change. Not to be daunted, however, the respectable tooting agents for the society tried inducements in the shape of a monetary bribe; but this also proved a failure, and the clergymen lost a chance for the insertion of a paragraph in their annual report, which, had they been successful, might hav been tersely worded, 'Two Jewish souls saved at the ridiculously low price of eighteen pence apiece.'" The correspondent avers that the Jewish conversions are all made in this way, and suggests that the subscribers to the funds of the society giv their money instead to the miserably underpaid curates of the established church.

Eleventh Annual Congress.

SATURDAY MORNING SESSION, OCTOBER 15TH.

Bright and early that beautiful October morn, the officers and delegates of the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union greeted each other with manifestations of delight in the elegant rooms of the Chicago society, 116 Fifth avenue.

Our western metropolis is no stranger to Liberal gatherings, but this was the red-letter day of Liberalism, for seven states sent their sturdiest warriors on superstition to assist in stemming ecclesiastical Anarchism from wiping away the foundations of a republic—based on reason—and defeat the attempt to foist on us the dominion of the scepter and surplice.

President Courtlandt Palmer received a hearty round of applause as he ascended the crimson-carpeted rostrum, and in his easy, unaffected, yet dignified manner, delivered a felicitous and hearty greeting to the delegates, and then outlined the work which the Congress was convened to carry forward.

The following committees were then appointed:

On Credentials: E. A. Stevens, Wm. Redfield, Wimibold Boemer.

On Nominations: Mrs. M. A. Freeman, F. M. Gustin, Harry Hoover, Stafford Bolton, Prof. Chas. Orchardson.

On Resolutions: S. P. Putnam, Otto Wettstein, Miss Voltairine de Cleyre, Dr. J. W. Moorman, S. W. Devenbaugh.

On Public Work: John Steves, A. M. Freeman, Geo. Collins, W. L. Willis, Ithamar Eddy.

Secretary Putnam's annual report was then read.

REPORT OF SECRETARY.

The work, in detail, of the secretary for the past year has been published from week to week in the Investigator and TRUTH SEEKER, and therefore is known to the Liberals of the country, and only the general results need be stated at this time. The secretary has delivered about three hundred lectures in New York, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Colorado, Arizona, California, Oregon, Washington territory, Idaho, and Utah. He has addressed about sixty thousand people, traveled twenty thousand miles, sold nearly two thousand dollars' worth of Freethought literature, amounting to several thousand books and pamphlets; he has organized twenty-five Secular Unions and Liberal associations, and throughout the entire field of labor a remarkable and most encouraging interest has been manifested. It has been a prosperous year, and the outlook at present is more hopeful than ever before. The work, of course, has been pioneer, and many of the results cannot be put into statistics. It has created agitation, thought, and wide discussion of the principles of our movement, and this has been the purpose in view, for before there can be organization there must be life. There must be the material produced by which a structure can be reared. No one can deny that public interest has been aroused, even if the fruits are not all that is desirable. As there is some misapprehension in regard to the methods and aims of the Secular Union, it is best, perhaps, to hav them fully explained, and without doubt there will be agreement in adopting measures for future advance. It is absolutely necessary, primarily, to arouse interest in the Freethought movement. People must be made to understand what it is; to realize that it is a part of the life of the world. There is profound ignorance in regard to Secularism. In many communities the name Freethought is not spoken; our books and papers are unknown. The only possibly way to awaken these communities is by personal presence. The Liberal platform must be occupied, and the living voice heard. This must go before all organization and systematic labor. One must not wait for orders, but go in and do the best he can. He must reach the miscellaneous crowd. Cultivated and well-informed and thoroughly interested Liberals are by no means numerous. We cannot carry on our work simply through them. The indifferent, the ignorant, must be captured and made a part of the advancing army. This necessitates field-work. This is of first and radical importance, and therefore the secretary has put the emphasis upon this, and made pioneer and lecturing effort the main and almost only effort of the Union; and other effort of more systematic character has been neglected simply because the situation demanded such a course. There must be impulse or there can be no advance. For the last two years the energies of the secretary hav been mainly devoted to attracting the attention of the people of this country to the work of Secular reform. One might as well undertake to reap a harvest without plowing or planting as to organize when there is no desire among the people for liberty and justice. System is a good thing, but first of all there must be the live raw material, or the system only holds a corpse.

With the creation of interest there must be the dissemination of knowledge. Our movement is a process of education. It is not mere excitement. It is of the head as well as of the heart. The lecture system, therefore, has been supplemented by the distribution and sale of Freethought literature. This literature to the extent of thousands of volumes would not hav gone forth into the widely scattered communities except by the lecture system. By the impulse of the lecture audiences hav gained a desire to understand the significance of this mighty change, which threatens the overthrow of every religion of the world and is potent in every land. The interest without the knowledge is of slight value, but the knowledge makes the interest a gathering power. This has been the method of the secretary, and he has endeavored in every possible way to scatter abroad the instrumentalities of knowledge and education—books, pamphlets, and Freethought papers.

Organization comes last, not first. It is the third step for the attainment of our purpose—interest, knowledge, organization—this is the process. Of course, there is the reflex movement. Organization makes interest and spreads knowledge, but fundamentally organization is a living thing only when it is the expressing of interest and knowledge. It is not always profitable to organize. To do so retards the cause. It is best to let things be free and easy in some places. To force the issue prevents the accumulation of power. To bide our time and let life gather in silent ways is the most available method at times. Organization must come, but come because life is present.

This is the outline of the method of the Union and the aims of the secretary. Every suggestion in regard to organization is accepted, but it is possible to organize a thing to death. To do nothing but organize is folly. To make a movement a machine is to finally place it in rusty inaction. Organize, but organize life, intelligence, power, interest, enthusiasm, knowledge. Organization is not a miracle-worker; you can't make something out of nothing. An organized ghost is still a nonentity. Somebody says that if you want hare-soup, first of all catch your hare. So they say, organize. But, first of all, hav the Liberals; hav the Liberalism; hav a deep and broad interest in the community; hav ideas prevalent; hav agitation, discussion. Make life, and then organize. Organization does not create life in the world of thought, and to rely on organization simply is to meet only disappointment. The power of Freethought cannot be found, and cannot be expressed unless we recognize this threefold method of advancement and growth. To begin at the wrong end and organize in order to make life will giv only au empty form. How easy it is to organize on paper, to say what we will do, and to imagin what others will do. It is like a mock battle. There may be much noise, but no genuin victory.

It is easy to stand off and criticise and declare that this or that is the best course. It is easy to find fault. But the best way to criticise, as Michael Angelo says, is by creation; go to work, plunge into the wilderness, make life, and then organize.

There is no question that the method pursued by the Union is the right method. It is the successful method. Results prove it. There never was a time when so many men and women hav had a living interest in our cause as to-day, and this is because the secretary has traveled from sea to sea, and addressed sixty thousand different people, and met the Liberals of the land face to face in actual work, and because from week to week he has informed the Liberals of the East and West of the progress of his year's campaign, and introduced thousands of friends to each other in the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Investigator.

Now, it is not maintained that this work is all. It is the beginning, the starting-point. It is simply creating life in order that organization and grander work may come. In this respect apparently there has been misapprehension. It has been thought by some that the secretary was in favor only of field service; that he traveled from point to point merely for temporary effect, and not for permanent result. But it will be seen that the method of the secretary includes everything that has ever been urged in favor of organization. He has simply refused to put the cart before the horse—organization before life. He has labored for the last two years of his service to arouse people, to awake attention, to reach and interest the world in the Demands of Liberalism. In the mean time he has organized many strong and successful societies.

Hitherto, for lack of means, the secretary has performed double duty. He has been engaged in field service, and also attended to the affairs of the home office. The work has now increased to such magnitude that there must be a division of labor. The life of the organization demands larger service. There must be somebody always at headquarters, for official correspondence and communication with all parts of the country, who can watch the movements of the enemy while others are in the midst of the battle, who can keep posted in regard to legislativ action and distribute Freethought ammunition. We want one who can giv information and receive information from all the Liberal societies of the land. Knowledge is power, and this knowledge will be of immense advantage. The pressure of present duties, constant calls to lecture every month, and every day of the year, forbids the present secretary to engage in this work at headquarters, and therefore he resigns the office of secretary, which has been to him an honor and a privilege. Choosing the platform, he must leave to other hands the labor of more efficient combination.

A man of energy, of enthusiasm, of executiv ability, of literary power, of unselfish devotion—a truly representativ man—should be the secretary of the Union. I know of no one who has labored more faithfully for the cause; given more time, money, and unpaid service; been more successful in undertakings for the establishment and promulgation of the Nine Demands, than the president of the Chicago Union, E. A. Stevens; and I name him for a position which I know he will ably fill, and there is no doubt that in his hands life and organization will go together, and there will be no machine, but a living body.

In the absence of the treasurer the chairman of the Finance Committee read a report which, though dealing little with receipts and disbursements, offered some practical suggestions as to methods of increasing interest in secular work. Intending to issue that as a circular for campaign purposes, I refrain from loading your columns with it now.

By resolution, all annual members were made voters and full participants in the proceedings of the Eleventh Annual Congress.

Pending reports of committees, Congress adjourned till afternoon session in Madison street theater.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The theater decorations occupied the attention of the audience prior to the continuation of the program. The stage was "set" for a parlor scene, with an archway looking out on a lawn. On either side the arch were copper colored shields with inscriptions in black and gold lettering. On one:

Keep the church and state forever separate.—U. S. Grant.

On the other:

The divorce between church and state ought to be so absolute that no church property anywhere, in any state, or in the nation should be exempt from equal taxation.—Jas. A. Garfield.

Depending from the center of the drop-curtain was a third:

Hanging from the archway was a silken banner—the Stars and Stripes—under whose folds hung a large gilded cross, signifying, "Our Flag above the Cross."

In front of the speakers' stand was a framed copy of the Nine Demands. Across the gallery stretched our motto, "Universal Mental Liberty." Hanging from either side of the balcony was:

Secularism has no mummeries, no priests, no superstitions, no persecutions.—R. G. Ingersoll.

After listening to a classic piano solo from Miss Voltairine de Cleyre, President Courtlandt Palmer delivered his most admirable opening address.

PRESIDENT PALMER'S ADDRESS.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION:

It is with considerable diffidence that I find myself to-day occupying the place of him who for two years past has acted as president of this association—of him the power of whose eloquence has charmed us by its magic and its music—of him whom I am glad and proud to call my friend, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll. But though I be not the orator that he is, still I would solicit your patience while I address to you these, my parting words, as president of your Union, to which high office you did me the honor to elect me as the successor of the great reformer to whom I hav alluded; for, although I hav been urged to accept a renomination, I feel that my duties with regard to other Liberal work will forbid my acceptance of the compliment. As we look back over the history of the National Liberal League, now merged into the American Secular Union, as we think of it in its annual conventions, I feel that we may truthfully say of ourselvs, Well done, good and faithful association. Certain it is that no one can charge us with interested motivs. We hav suffered much from misunderstanding and misrepresentation on the part of the general public. The thorny crop of prejudice is for the most part the harvest which those who sow the seeds of progress must expect to reap. But we can take this consolation to ourselvs, that we stand essentially for the American idea. America herself was conceived in agony and brought forth in struggle, and why should we, in our humbler way, expect anything better? I repeat, we may take this consolation to ourselvs, that we are Americans of the Americans. The United States stands for that which we champion. Both the cause of our smaller Secular Union and the cause of our greater national Union are embraced in the one word, Secularization. It is interesting to observe with how little straining and twisting we can adapt the words of the United States Constitution to express our own aims and objects. Take, for instance, the preamble, the words of which are, or should be, familiar to all, to wit: "To form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselvs and our posterity." It seems to me undeniable that should our ideals and aspirations be effected, every one of the objects expressed by these clauses would tend more fully to their realization. But further, our Constitution affirms "that the United States shall guarantee to every state a republican form of government." Now, what is a republican form of government? Again let our Constitution answer in its own words. A republican form of government, in one respect at least, is indicated in this, "that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," all of which is only another way of saying that the United States maintains the position which we maintain, and which it is our object to fully realize, namely, the complete separation of church and state.

Ours, therefore, is at once the fight of secularization and of constitutionalism. In pursuance of this object, we hav sought to remove the last remnants of this union of church and state, on the basis of justice to all and privilege to none, on the basis that a secular injury to one citizen is an injury to every citizen. We hav therefore insisted upon it that the Bible shall be eliminated as a work of divine revelation from our public schools. It is manifestly unjust in a republic that a Protestant Bible should be inflicted upon a Catholic child, or that the New Testament should be forced upon the Jewish child, who has been taught to believe only in the Old; or that both Testaments should be imposed upon the offspring of a Freethinker who believes in the inspiration of neither. In the same manner we hav insisted upon it that the exemption of our churches from taxation was a palpable wrong, since to the extent that each church avails itself of that exemption, to that extent must the tax be made up by imposition upon other citizens, which places Protestants in the position of at least partially supporting a Catholic church, Catholics a Protestant church, Jews a Methodist church, and so on, through the whole list of the denominations. On the same method of reasoning, we demand that Sunday shall be man's day and not the Lord's day; that judicial oaths shall be abolished, and that simple affirmations on the basis of manhood and character, under the pains and penalties of perjury, shall take their place, and that chaplains shall be withdrawn from our legislatures, since it is evident that no chaplain can at once put up a prayer representing at once in the same breath a Theist and an Atheist, both of whom hav an equal right to their honest thought and to a representation in our national assemblages, if they can secure it by ballot. And so I might go on recapitulating what we are so familiar with, as the Nine Demands of Liberalism, which constitute the platform of the American Secular Union, but I hav cited enough by way of illustration.

I cannot, however, refrain, in passing, from alluding on our basis of justice to all, and privilege to none, on our basis of the complete separation of Church and State, to the greatest fight that we hav fought—namely, our contest against Presbyterianism in the Post-Office. Under its shriek of obscenity this religious clique did succeed in carrying through Congress a law forbidding the transmission of indecent and immoral literature, so called, through the United States mails. That some good was thereby accomplished cannot be denied, but the price was too great. It was paying too dear for the whistle, and we may take to ourselvs the credit of being the only organization in the United States which had the courage to maintain this position. For we asserted that even the narrow ideas of Presbyterianism on the subject of decency and morality in connection with the mails, could only be accomplished at the price of a questionable system of espionage and decoy, that it could only be accomplished at the price of the actual infringement of our Constitution, which givs to Congress simply the power "to establish post-offices and post roads," and not to regulate the morality of the mails. We maintained that the provision was, after all, practically void, since even if the mails were controled, venders of vice had a thousand facilities beyond. We maintained, in truth, that more immorality was produced than removed by the provision, since morality in its essence can only exist under liberty, that is, morality can only exist through the building up of character, and character must wither under all arbitrary compulsion. All of our demands, it seems to me, may be summed up in our eighth one, which calls for the inculcation of a secular morality. Secular morality means the secularization of character; it means that human motivs shall become paramount in human affairs; it means a higher devotion and self-sacrifice; it means a kinder heart to impel us, a keener head to direct us, and a defter hand to carry out the behests of head and heart.

Now, I would say right here that it appears to me that, without retreating in the least from our position, we might, by a more wisely-directed policy, secure the coöperation of thousands of liberal Christians throughout our land, because it must be evident, from a review of what I hav said. that our mission is based simply upon the American idea of Fair Play, and all honest men and women should be glad to assist in such a cause on the simple plea of justice and humanity. As I look at the Protestant church in America, it seems to me it does not need much prophetic vision to foresee that it is speedily destined to undergo a great disintegration or division. The more orthodox sections will be likely to fall into the arms of Roman Catholicism, while the more liberal Protestants must, under the drift of our age, infallibly tend to ally themselvs with the newer Protestantism of the nineteenth century. I would ask your earnest consideration of this suggestion.

But I see it is as Freethinkers that we are called together in this Congress. If this be necessarily so—if it be only as Freethinkers that we are to prosecute this work—then I would, in this my parting address, endeavor to impress upon you my view of the terrific responsibilities under which you labor. Let us consider well what we are doing, what is the import under our Freethought crusade of the separation of church and state. It is this, my friends, that we are driving the old church, as far as in us lies, more and more into the background; we are aiming blows at the old religion; we are undermining the old motivs and destroying the old consolations—the old consolations which presented a father in the skies ready to sympathize with and succor his children on earth, to whom he has sent his only son to die, in order to deliver them from the pains of hell hereafter and redeem them forever in the skies. Whether false or true, these convictions hav been, and still are, the solace of multitudes of minds.

But, again, the removal of landmarks is tantamount to a revolution, not only as to the yonder in heaven, but as to the here on earth. Our agitation signifies, "This world for the people of this world." In its logic it means the results of labor for the laborers. It means "the passing of power from the classes to the masses."

This double responsibility imposes inferentially upon us the duty of at once providing a substitute for the old faith, and of striving to see to it that the coming earth revolution may be one of peace, and not one of violence. Voltaire wittily said, "If I remove a cancer, why should you ask me to put anything into the place of it?" But I feel that it was more the wit than the humanitarian who thus spoke. In the words of a later French philosopher, "If we destroy we must replace." We, therefore, practically make ourselvs responsible for a new religion. And, in truth, a new faith has dawned upon the earth; a faith, indeed, into which we hav been baptized by the angel of time—the faith of Thomas Paine, of Voltaire, of Victor Hugo, of Darwin, of Herbert Spencer, of Draper, of Goethe, of Shelley, of Comte; the faith of Wakeman and of Ingersoll; the faith, in a word, of Humanity; the faith that comes in, as real knowledge takes the place of guess knowledge, and altruistic motivs take the place of selfish ones. It behooves us, then, as Freethinkers that we supply to civilization a new God, a new Christ, a new atonement, and a new heaven. The old Jehovah, indeed, is sinking unto death, but in that unnamable, unknowable power underlying and permeating all things—a power we can only know as our minds interpret its laws—in that power I feel that we may find, as Goethe says, "the all-upholder, the all-enfolder," whose "everlasting arms are beneath us," and in which, in a nobler and truer sense than ever before, we liv, and move, and hav our being. A new Christ has come to us in the shape of that organic unity upon earth, in its vast continuity and solidarity—humanity, whose daily effort and struggle, whose nightly death and matin resurrection, bring to each and every one, if he will but accept it, a new atonement, making us at one with all this vast cosmic order which surrounds us, and making us at one in a regenerate human brotherhood. Thus again a new heaven is provided. The heaven of better things to be upon this earth, when man shall be free from superstition, and shall rest alone under the reign of reason. The heaven which is now realizable through the imagination, and which may be made to exist within the hearts and souls of every one of us.

When this consolation "devoutly to be wished" shall hav been realized, then, as I dream of the good time coming, we shall see, not a separation, but a union of church and state. True, a theological church must be kept separate from the secular state, as far as the poles asunder, for the one is based at the bottom on absolute despotism, the other on democracy, but in the millennium we are speaking of. I say there will be a union of church and state—that is, of a secular church with a secular state. True again, that even these in their way must be kept separate, as theory must be kept forever separate from practice. The office of the spiritual power in those days will be to advise, to educate, to consecrate; that of the temporal power to provide, to govern, to execute; but like two horses in one span, they will pull together harmoniously, to draw onward the car of progress and civilization. Our methods toward these great ends must be the simple ones of persistent, untiring education and agitation to be brought to bear finally upon the ballot. When this shall be accomplished the world will belong to us. I then may say, slightly paraphrasing the words of Tennyson:

Let knowledge grow from more to more,
But more of reverence in us dwell,
That church and state according well
May make one music as before,
But vaster.

One word more and I am done. I began these imperfect remarks with a tribute to our retiring president, and I end them with a tribute to our incoming president, Mr. Samuel P. Putnam. A graduate from the theological ranks himself, he understands the spirit of the orthodox believers sufficiently at once to oppose them in their errors, and welcome them as they show signs of Liberal tendencies. I hav long known him, studied with him, and I feel sure that as he has been in the past a working secretary of the League, so he will be in the future its working president. He has thoroughly earned the honor to which you hav now raised him. A poet in his imagination, he is in his judgment and action a man of affairs. I am sure that he possesses every qualification to lead the Union on toward a higher and grander success than ever. I wish both him and the Union well.

Judge C. B. Waite (author of "History of the Christian Religion," "Suffrage a Right of Citizenship," etc.) was introduced, and interested his hearers with his reminiscences of personal acquaintance with the brilliant Norwegian Björnsterne, with the venerable Hugo, with Professor Volkmar, Dr. Samuel Davidson, and other Liberals and prominent Freethinkers during his three years' sojourn in Europe. Judge Waite argued from his personal experience and intercourse with the leading minds of Europe that the days of dogmatic theology would soon be numbered with the past, and that Liberalism was making advances everywhere.

Harry Hoover, the veteran warrior of the Pittsburgh League, was next on the program, and he had chosen for his topic "The Sunday Laws." [It is the intention of the Union to issue this address as a part of its campaign literature; so help us, friends, with funds.]

Samuel P. Putnam delivered his address on "Dangers Ahead;" and the Inter-Ocean (the daily organ of Chicago piety) painfully admits his remarks "were brimful of points and logic from the standpoint of Liberalism, and were frequently and loudly applauded."

"Poverty," Mr. Putnam said, "was the curse of humanity and the supreme problem of the day, but neither Christians nor Christianity had ever proposed a remedy. Religion had its origin in the heart, not in the intellect. It was a stream of sentiment. The Church representing feeling and the State representing force, were sought to be united with prejudice and bigotry in full control. The National Reform Association, aided by the Women's Christian Temperance Union and the Prohibitionists, were striving to put God in the Constitution and stifle the rights of man in society. But Liberalism was gaining ground even among church-goers and preachers—the onward march of intelligence was irrepressible—and if Liberals would take concert of action this church and state movement, which has grown so powerful, might yet be averted."

Putnam is a sort of platform pile-driver, sending powerful and unerring blows at Christian shams and superstitions, and his address was plentifully punctuated with applause. At its conclusion the audience were invited to become members, and many accepted the invitation.

EVENING SESSION.

A large audience greeted Herr Julius Vohlteich, ex-member of the German Parliament, who delivered a glowing address in his own language on the right of free speech, the liberty of thought, and the work the Secular Union had inaugurated. As the two principal Turner societies in Chicago had materially assisted financially toward the expense of the Congress, and issued special circulars inviting their members to participate, this address was highly gratifying to them.

At this point Pres. Courtlandt Palmer announced the receipt of a telegram of interest to all. He read:

NEW YORK, Oct. 15, 1887.

COURTLANDT PALMER, Dear Sir: I regret that it is impossible for me to be with you. All I can do is to send my regards, my congratulations, and my benedictions.

R. G. INGERSOLL.

This was received with deafening applause which took some seconds to subdue.

The following letters were also read:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Oct. 4, 1887.

DEAR MR. PUTNAM: I cannot be with you in Chicago; the distance is too great, and my work here too exacting. But my interest in the gradual and evolutionary secularization of all human institutions is greater than ever. Nothing more is to be expected from the theologies which hav amazed and tormented mankind so long. Let us hav a pure and universal Secularity. I trust you will hav a successful meeting in every respect, and meet the thorny questions with tolerant good humor. The work will be slow and difficult always, since it has to deal with human credulity, which believes falsehood with great ease, and receives truth with a difficulty proportioned to its importance. If we only had a stupendous lie to promulgate, what crowds of followers we should hav, and how many boxes of our panacea we should sell! But we hav nothing but truth! Very truly yours,

JAMES PARTON.

REVERE, MASS., Oct. 11, 1887.

DEAR PUTNAM: I shall not be able to accept your kind invitation to be present at the Congress, but I am in full sympathy with every effort to promote the cause of Liberalism, and wish you a large meeting and a successful one.

I regret that more of our public men hav not the courage of their opinions.

The principles of Liberalism should be advocated by men and women in the foremost stations of life; and that this is not done is not because these principles are not worthy such support and advocacy, but because men and women are recreant to their duty.

The peculiar religious customs and practices which are now maintained at the nation's expense are either relics of a previous union of church and state, or the signs of such a union in the future. If the former, they should be abolished at once; if the latter, they should not be tolerated, and must be discontinued. Any recognition of a particular religion, or any toleration of the forms of a particular religion, in a republic where the whole people are the government is a manifest injustice, inasmuch as there exists no agreement upon religious matters.

I regard the Nine Demands of Liberalism as the nine commandments to the American people. All the essential ideas of the American Secular Union are founded upon human rights, and may be formulated into political principles.

Our Union asks for nothing that is unjust to the individual or dangerous to the nation.

We are working to save liberty to the mind of man; and to do this, I believe, we must kill Christianity as an ecclesiastical organization. The country's flag must be above the church's cross! I hold that this free country—this American nation—is worth more to mankind than every religion in the world.

Let every man candidly ask what he is doing for the promulgation of our principles, and candidly answer if he is doing all that he ought to do. Thus far Liberalism has been mostly a crusade of one, a single lance, against a thousand shields. Hereafter let us unite our forces against the enemy, and may victory follow the right.

Yours for political, religious, and industrial freedom,

L. K. WASHBURN.

TO THE OFFICERS, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN OF THE ELEVENTH ANNUAL CONGRESS OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION, Esteemed Friends: It seems strange that in this comparativly enlightened age the only band of thinkers that represent the cause of absolute truth and fact should still be so sadly in the minority, and still be compelled to struggle against the combined opposition of the vast masses comprising the so-called Christiau race. But such is the sad reality.

The church in the past has swayed such vast authority, exhibited such adroit audacity, established such an absolute autocracy, and assumed such an air of infallibility that in course of time the poor victims of this hierarchal conspiracy were entirely at their mercy. The masses crouched subservient at their feet; individual thought was limited, reason banished, and credulity triumphant. The most absurd theories and doctrins were invented and promulgated, then readily accepted by the ignorant masses as truth and fact, until finally, in the course of many generations, these falsehoods were almost universally accepted as final truths. Mysteries and miracles were taken for granted, as self-evident facts, and the few daring to dispute them were denounced as Infidels or madmen, and burnt at the stake.

This whole fabric of fable and assumption is still the giant delusion of the age, without a shadow of proof, probability, possibility, analogy, or necessity in its favor.

The basis of theology is simply and absolutely nothing, but it is supported by the existing priesthood for gain and power. It is beyond reason, logic, and knowledge; beyond nature, time, or space. Theology is an attempt to explain the natural by the supernatural, and by methods of the supernatural. It divests an infinit and eternal system of nature, of inherent powers and potencies to assume harmony and order, and to evolve from matter and force, man, beast, tree, and flower, and invests some giant charlatan, beyond the realms of nature, with supernatural acrobatic powers to create and manipulate all the countless number of bodies sweeping through endless space, and to call into being man, tree, and flower by power of volition. It postulates a beginning for the universe, and a creator for all things, but illogically assumes that this creator never began, and is content to assume that this creator can exist without necessitating another creator to create him. It pretends to see a logical necessity for a creator to create the seen, but complacently rests here, and stubbornly refuses to apply this logical necessity to the unseen. Whatever is seen, real, it insists, necessitates a God, but God, by virtue of his invisibility, is exempt from this law. Therefore, God is God only by virtue of his invisibility, because, should he become a visible reality, by parity of reasoning these same sophists would be compelled to repudiate him, and instantly fly again to realms of nothing and there postulate a new God!

Theology divests everything in nature of potencies to cause or produce anything, but invests an imaginary nothing beyond nature with powers to do everything!

The time is not far distant when the God idea will be exploded and relegated to realms of fable and spooks. Already the better minds within the church hav virtually discarded the original Bible God and are now laboring earnestly to create a new God of their own make. Beecher was, and Swing, Thomas, Savage, all the schools of Unitarians, Spiritualists, etc., are to-day practically Atheists. The God idea originated when the first book of Genesis was written, and this account invests God with the body of a man. Therefore the only true God of the Christian is a man. Deny this man-God and you are an Atheist, because all loftier, later evolved, improved or revised ideas of a God are not of a God at all, but only the vague, unauthoritativ speculations of half-way philosophers, who, having inherited notions of the origiual man-God, and recognizing their absurdity, proceed upon their own responsibility to invent, design, or create a new God, but with precisely as little truth for a foundation as the original God-inventors and without a shadow of a law or authority.

All notions concerning a God are on a par. Sitting Bull's and Professor Swing's are equally absurd, and when analyzed in the crucible of reason all alike explode like an air-bubble. Man's ignorance alone requires a God, because all known effects hav natural causes, and his ignorance of a God is infinitly greater than his iguorance of nature. The universe is a mystery, but it is a reality, grand and supreme. God—no matter whose God—is an infinitly greater mystery, and absolutely beyond knowledge and fact. The grand cosmos, filling all space, needs no proof, but a God exterior, interior, or superior to it is beyond proof.

The time has come when we can reason without fear of death or persecution. Then let us reason fearlessly, thoroughly, and proclaim the results of our honest thoughts boldly to the world. As between the dogatism of the Theist and Atheist there is a vast difference. The burden of proof devolves upon those affirming. Let God prove himself, or let his champions furnish proof consistent with the advanced thought of the present day, then we will all kneel and worship him. But, the Bible relegated to realms of fiction, even by the best minds within the church, what proof remains for a God? None, absolutely none. The sum total of all existence, nature—in grand aggregation or in minutest detail—is not God, but the basis of the grand belief we advocate and represent. Whatever is, exists, and has a being, is not God, but belongs to the great category of facts upon which we base our belief. All outside of this, all outside of all—which is nothing—this alone is the basis for a God.

The unproved and illogical assumptions of the church, therefore, are rankest dogmatism, while the belief we proudly and dogmatically advocate has for a basis all the facts of nature and truth.

God is a natural impossibility, an anomaly and logical absurdity. Professor Swing has faithfully applied all the ingenuity of his colossal intellect to create a God consistent with logic and reason, but, alas! what a sad failure he has made of it. He indignantly repudiates the anthropomorphic God of the Bible, but places his God "here, and there, and everywhere; in the morning star, on Sirius, in the laughter of a child," and in everything beautiful, yet instantly again invests him with personality of the masculin gender, applying personal pronouns like "he," "him," "heavenly father," etc., a man still! He divests him of all attributes of hate, revenge, and tyranny, but invests him with all the tender solicitude of a human father and friend—a human being still, but never God.

An infinit God is an impossibility because nature alone is infinit, and "here, and there, and everywhere," and consequently cannot contain an infinit God.

The assumed attributes of God—love, wisdom, etc.—necessitate personality, because science recognizes them only as existing within living animal organisms. As the retina is needed to produce sight, the eardrum to produce sound, so the brain and nervous system are a necessity to produce intelligence or mind. But this in turn necessitates a physical body, and this of necessity is limited and can never fill an unlimited universe, neither be "here, there, and everywhere" at the same time. Therefore a physical God cannot be a God and all it implies. Now, then, if an infinit God cannot possibly exist in an infinit universe, nor a finite God possibly exist in every portion of it, the church must define a God or stand convicted of fraud and deception.

This not being forthcoming, the God idea vanishes from our beautiful earth, and man alone is the true autocrat of all he surveys, acknowledging all his equal, but none superior. Naturalism is the only fact that remains. This we worship, and for humanity we liv and strive.

Confining ourselvs to facts, to truth, to logic and reason, we are therefore justified, yes, forced, as honest men and women, to renounce the dogmas transmitted to us from ages of barbarism, and henceforth revel in the glories of nature as illumined by the rising sun of science, the burning torch of reason and Freethought. Yours with best wishes for our grand cause,

OTTO WETTSTEIN.

The chief attraction at this session was the lecture announced for Mrs. M. A. Freeman, vice-president of the American Secular Union, who never fails to draw a large audience, and whose subject was "His Satanic Majesty." Mrs. Freeman's treatment of her topic kept her hearers in a merry mood, as they frequently interrupted her pungent humor, biting sarcasm, and clever irony with laughter and applause. It is useless to attempt a synopsis, as every sentence is a Secular sermon, but she concluded with: "They say the devil was chained one thousand years. We havn't missed him, the priests and parsons hav so well represented him. We ask you Freethinkers to help us, in this land of Jefferson, Franklin, and Paine, in elevating the Stars and Stripes above the cross." There is already quite a demand for the publication of that lecture.

MORNING SESSION.

President Palmer opened the Congress, and the Committee on Public Work, in the absence of Committee on Credentials, made the following recommendations:

Your committee recommend this Congress to resolve it to be the duty of the officers of this Union:

First. To institute, or aid in instituting, a practical lecture bureau, either as a state institution or as local divisions of states of the fashion of circuits, to facilitate the lecture service and the sale and distribution of secular Freethought literature.

Second. To advise with and assist the members and officers of the local auxiliary Secular Unions, and the friends of justice in the several states, to maintain the laws thereof against the propagation of sectarian dogma and doctrins, and the celebration of religious sectarian ceremonies in the public schools and the state colleges and universities.

ITHAMAR EDDY, JAS. TUTTLE, W. L. WILLIS, JOHN STEVES, A. M. FREEMAN, GEO. COLLINS, } Com. on Public Work.

After some discussion, the report was accepted.

The Committee on Credentials made the following report, which was adopted:

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, That the American Secular Union invites the cooperation of all who favor the total separation of church and state; its platform is the Nine Demands of Liberalism; its work is to achieve and maintain a purely secular government; all other reforms, however important, are left to special instrumentalities. While members of the Union hav absolute liberty of thought and action in regard to every intellectual, moral, social, and political question, yet differences of opinion among thoughtful men and women upon such questions make it necessary that the Secular Union confine itself to the Nine Demands of Liberalism, which are the axioms of Freethought; and, on this basis, all true American citizens can unite for the triumph of liberty and justice.

Resolved, That the Secular Union sympathizes with all efforts for the amelioration of human toil; for the removal of poverty and the extension of wealth and happiness as the reward of labor; and is in favor of every just method by which the working-people can be advanced; for the working-people are the glory of the republic, and their elevation makes the true civilization of the world.

Resolved, That the Union recognizes the full equality of woman, according to the Declaration of Independence; that she is a citizen, and is entitled to the rights of citizenship; and political subjection in the past has been the result, not of natural justice, but of ecclesiastical legislation.

Resolved, That the Union favors increased facilities for a Secular and especially a manual training in our public schools, affirming that physical health is necessary to intel lectual progress, and that industrial education is as requisit to good citizenship as mental disciplin.

Resolved, That the Union recognizes the value of social life and the cultivation of the spirit of fraternity, and recommends the celebration of all holidays by Liberal associations, and especially suggests that the coming anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, the author-hero of the American Revolution, be made the occasion in every community for festivals of Freethought and the promulgation of the Demands of Liberalism.

Resolved, That for the practical work of the coming year a fund be raised by contributions of friends throughout the country, the first thousand dollars of which fund is to be for the salary of the secretary of the Union for one year from the date of this Congress, and all contributions above this one thousand dollars are to be for incidental expenses, the publication and distribution of Secular literature and legislativ work under the management of the Board of Directors.

Resolved, That in the death of Dr. T. L. Brown and A. T. Lilly, vice-presidents of the Secular Union, the Union laments the loss of generous comrades, noble citizens, stanch advocates of Freedom, and ardent workers for the welfare of humanity.

S. P. PUTNAM, OTTO WETTSTEIN, VOLTAIRINE DE CLEYRE, S. W. DEVENBAUGH, DR. J. W. MOORMAN, } Com. on Resolutions

The resolutions were, after some discussion, unanimously adopted.

Mrs. Freeman presented the report of the Committee on Nominations:

Your committee beg leave to place in nomination the following. For President, Samuel P. Putnam.

Secretary, E. A. Stevens.
Treasurer, Charles Eckhard.
Chairman Executiv Committee, E. B. Foote, Jr.
Chairman Finance Committee, Edgar C. Beall.

Vice-Presidents, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, Courtlandt Palmer, T. B. Wakeman, Charles Watts, John E. Remsburg, Horace Seaver, James Parton, Mattie A. Freeman, Mattie P. Krekel, Dr. J. L. York, Charles B. Reynolds, Prof. Charles Orchardson, L. K. Washburn, W. S. Bell, M. M. Secor, Otto Wettstein, Wm. Redfield, S. W. Devenbaugh, Wm. Algie, Roman Staley, H. P. Mason (Utah), N. D. Godell (Cal.), D. W. Smith (Wash. Ter.), James Wardwell (Idaho), J. W. Black (N. J.), Thomas J. Truss (Col.).

Mrs. Freeman supplemented her report by saying the Committee had unanimously decided on the present incumbent of the presidency, but learned it was his desire to be succeeded by Mr. Putnam, and, in deference to his wishes, they had regretfully accepted his resignation. Mrs. Freeman paid graceful tributes, individually, to the retiring executiv, to their nominee for that post of honor, and to the other candidates. Those who were not present missed a wholesale candy store.

A motion to elect individually by ballot was voted down, and a motion to elect the entire ticket by viva voce vote was carried.

The nominees were then elected unanimously.

The retiring president welcomed in a few well-chosen words his successor to the chair.

On motion a vote of thanks was tendered Mr. Courtlandt Palmer for his sympathy and services, and the secretary was authorized to prepare suitable resolutions expressiv of the gratitude of the Union to the retiring president, which was adopted unanimously by a rising vote amid much applause.

In response Mr. Palmer reviewed in a neat, modest, impromptu speech his early training, his Christian predilections, and his development into radical reforms. Referring to the notoriety he had achieved he said: "Some were born great, some achieved greatness, and some had greatness thrust upon them. I am of the latter category, for none could be more diffident than I." While he would do all he could for the cause of Secularism, his health made it imperativ that he should resign, but he had few regrets on that score, as he knew the organization would hav the boundless energy and undimmed enthusiasm of his noble friend, Samuel P. Putnam.

Mr. Palmer's speech captured the Congress, aroused a glorious enthusiasm, and each earnest Liberal present felt impelled to do his duty, and nobly they responded to the call for financial assistance, round after round of applause greeting the announcement of the sums the delegates pledged on the

With this sort of spontaneous enthusiasm in a simple business meeting, who shall say that Liberals hav lost faith in the only organization which is battling for Freethought and its freest expression?

After adjournment the delegates generally lingered in the hall for social interchanges and congratulations at the conclusion of labors well performed.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Under the leadership of Prof. Chas. Cobbelli, the splendid singing section of the Aurora Turn Verein, numbering twenty-five trained voices, added to the attractions and made the theater resound with mellifluous melody, rendering various songs in such manner as to enrapture the audience.

President Putnam then introduced Miss Voltairine de Cleyre, who gave an excellent address on "Secular Education," giving evidence of culture and capacity, and, as the Daily News remarked, "she bears the stamp of genius." It is scarcely necessary to say that her theme was highly appreciated.

Prof. Chas. Orchardson, who, like Felix Oswald, whom the writer dubs the "great condenser," generally manages to get more points and force in a twenty-four minutes' speech than falls to the lot of ordinary mortals, followed. His points of sarcasm on the "Morality of Christian Teachers" were not well taken by the aforesaid teachers, provided such were present, but they were by the assemblage on this particular occasion.

After more singing, and an encore, E. A. Stevens walked up like a lamb to the slaughter, and gave a lecture on "Secularism vs. God in the State," in which he presented about twenty-four specific indictments against God-in-the-State interference. At the conclusion he took his post at the door to solicit funds to pay expenses of the Congress, in orthodox deacon fashion.

EVENING SESSION.

Miss de Cleyre played an inspiring prelude on the piano as an introduction to Courtlandt Palmer's lecture on the "Aristocracy of Freethought." As a literary production, no commendations of mine can add to its value. It is du premier ordre—a scholarly, erudite criticism on the aristocracy of pretense and an ennobling commendation to the aristocracy of mental and moral worth. To say that it was highly appreciated but faintly conveys the manifestations of approval it received.

In the absence of Dr. Severance, Mrs. Freeman gave another admirable address to the delight of her hearers.

Chas. B. Reynolds was then introduced by President Putnam, who, pointing to the flag "above the cross," said that because the flag was still above the cross our friend Reynolds is with us to-night instead of reclining in one of the jails or penitentiaries of New Jersey. Mr Reynolds was received with tumultuous applause.

After alluding to New Jersey loving kindness, how much they sought after him, and how it was owing to the interposition of our ex-president, Colonel Ingersoll, that he was not occupying one of the great public institutions of that state, Mr. Reynolds gave a rousing rallying-cry for Secularism by taking for his text "Think for Yourselvs." His address was simply inimitable, and "brought down the house," convulsing them with laughter.

The secretary read the list of newly elected officers for the edification of the audience, and each name, from beginning to the end, received a round of applause. The Eleventh Annual Congress thus concluded its labors, and congratulations and leave-takings became the next in order.

E. A. Stevens, Secretary.

News and Notes.

One not acquainted with the elements of Freethought might hav been discouraged at the small number of delegates and members of the American Secular Union present at the first business meeting on Saturday, but having for the last two or three years studied the situation, we were not discouraged, for we knew that this was a representativ assembly; that every man and woman in it was a working force, and were present at our little gathering because they had a deep and earnest interest in the cause, and were ready to do their best for its success. With such an assembly, to make a beginning was half the battle—it was the signal for ultimate victory.

It was an executiv assembly, and the work was well and quickly done. The Chicago Secular Union hav neat and elegant rooms for their meetings, and such bright surroundings are a help to cheerful and profitable labor. A large, dingy hall is oppressiv in its environments. Even if we are pioneers, we like that which reminds of the freshness and magnificence of nature itself, and our Chicago friends hav wisely selected in the heart of the city a beautiful hall for their local gatherings.

The spirit of good-will and enthusiasm prevailed, and it was evident that everybody meant to take hold and do their share to make the Congress a success.

Our meetings for lectures and addresses were held in the Madison-street Theater. In the afternoon of Saturday a fair audience was present. Courtlandt Palmer, president, made the opening address, which was a clear exposition of our aims and an eloquent expression of the spirit of our work. Judge Waite followed with a most interesting discourse on "Freethought in Europe," and the secretary closed with a lecture on "The Dangers Ahead."

In the evening a much larger audience was present, and Mrs. M. A. Freeman gave her new lecture, "His Satanic Majesty," which was, indeed, a very entertaining presentation of the doings and sayings of this wonderful personage. At the same time the lecture was a deep and instructiv unfolding of the demands of justice and liberty. Our German friends were also present, and a ringing address was made in the German language by Herr Julius Vohlteich.

Sunday morning a most important business session was held for the election of officers and the laying out of the work for the coming year. The results will be noted in regular reports. Suffice to say, we hav reached harmonious action, and never was there promis of nobler work and more cordial coöperation of friends. Especially do I rejoice in the election of E. A. Stevens as secretary. I know him as a valiant comrade, an incessant worker, a man of comprehension and insight, and a vigorous writer. His business ability is of the highest order. The confidence of Liberals in his administration was evinced by the fact that in a few minutes the sum of eight hundred dollars was pledged for his support. This, no doubt, will be swelled immediately to one thousand dollars and upwards. Mr. Stevens has consented to assume the burden, the responsibility, and do the work for one thousand dollars, a less sum by hundreds of dollars than what he now receives in commercial pursuits. I know that every generous Liberal in the land will respond at once with his contribution, and make it sure that this sum will be guaranteed. The president, be it understood, will hereafter receive no salary. Like the rest of his comrades he will work his passage, and will sweep the deck or do anything in order that the ship of Liberalism may ride the sea in triumph.

Sunday afternoon there was a large gathering. The Aurora Singing Society gave some excellent music. Miss Voltairine de Cleyre delivered an interesting, bright, and sensible discourse on "Secular Education." Our young friend has a promising future. As an orator and a writer, she combines youthful fire with a cultivated intellect and clear views of life and duty.

Professor Orchardson is well known as an original and interesting speaker. He always goes to the root of the matter. His criticism of Christian morality cut like a surgeon's knife.

Then the new secretary, E. A. Stevens, gave his practical and excellent lecture, "Secularism vs. God in the State." This bristles with facts, arguments, and appeals, and will make one of the best campaign documents of the year.

I am sorry that we missed an address by Harry Hoover, of Pittsburgh, on "The Sunday Laws." However, we shall hav his already prepared material for a Secular Union pamphlet. The subject is of vast importance, and no man can treat it with greater skill and logic than Harry Hoover.

Sunday evening our retiring president, Courtlandt Palmer, gave that noble exposition of the chivalry of Liberalism, "The Aristocracy of Freethought," which was received with frequent and enthusiastic applause, The theater was crowded. Over a thousand people were present. It was a grand and inspiring close to the Congress, which is one of the most important and influential ever held, and will, no doubt, be a notable land-mark in Liberal annals.

We made the most of the time, and had one of Mrs. Freeman's short, sparkling speeches, which always thrill to action. This eloquent exponent of Freethought should be kept constantly in the field, for she is a most entertaining, persuasiv, and thoughtful orator.

C. B. Reynolds, fresh from his field work, made one of his happy addresses, and his audience was thoroughly entertained by his quaint and humorous descriptions of orthodoxy, and vigorous appeals to action.

We hav had a noble gathering. We go home with brighter faith in the work, and the men and women who are to carry it on. I do not think there is a discordant note. Amid all differences there is harmony as to general purpose and plan.

I hav enjoyed exceedingly my sojourn among Chicago friends. Not only the Congress, but the life of this great city, has an exhilarating effect. You are in the midst of a world that is going onward. There is room here to grow. From vast distances the tides of business flow to this magnificent mart. It is a good place for our headquarters and for annual congresses. However, our Pittsburgh friends want us to come there. I hope we shall, for I know that our battalion at that place is always marching on, and will giv a rousing welcome. I do not know but what we can afford to hav two grand mass meetings a year, one in the East and one in the West, such is the interest that is now aroused.

My friend A. D. O'Neil always takes good care of the Secular pilgrim. I sleep every night alongside a vast collection of birds, and so, of course, hav happy flights of the imagination, with these gorgeous colors and glittering wings about me that suggest so much of life and nature.

A baby has been born into the house since I was here, and he is so bright that I think he will make a good Infidel, although he has a Christian mother. He looks wise enough already to scorn the creeds of the churches. He knows more, at least, than any theologian, and I would rather learn of him than of a bishop. He cannot talk, and in that respect he surpasses the orthodox preachers. He looks like his father; he is the exact image of his mother; he is the tyrant we all admire; and as I look into his black and lustrous eyes I hav an inkling as I write these notes that he will some day be president of the American Secular Union. I welcome baby to this world, bright promis of the future, who givs more hope to humanity, more cheer to toil, and more sweetness to life than all the Bibles and the churches, and when he touches manhood's eager prize I know that this world will be more beautiful, more happy, than it is to-day, and so with reverence I take the tiny fingers of the child, radiant prophet of our ever growing humanity.

I am at Alliance Sunday next, and at Farmdale, O., October 29th and 30th.

ONWARD STILL.—GREETING TO L. K. WASHBURNE.

Where the Western gold is brimming
I hav seen the waters bright;
Like those waves our ranks are massing
'Gainst the shadows of the night.
Night may come, but still the billows
Send the starlight on to dawn—
Greet the dawn; and so we greet it.
Heart and hope are not withdrawn.

I hav seen the snowy mountains
Touch the heavens with beaming crest,
Flash the orient fire of morning
To the sunset of the West.
Storms may come, but still those summits
Steady greet the circling sun,
With the same resplendent foreheads
As if the world were just begun.

Thus from every battle's thunder
Fresh with hope our pennons surge,
And we hail the radiant dawnings
On the future's ample verge.
Onward still to highis sublimer
Rolls the conflict wide and vast,
And one gain is but another
Summons of Truth's bugle-blast.

I hav seen the rivers, dashing—
White-maned steeds—along the course,
Furious leap to glorious darkness
Where the rocks impede their force.
Thus our heroes rise and vanish
In life's swift and earnest call,
All forgetting save the doing;
Doing grandest when they fall.

Yes, I see the promis broaden
O'er a thousand leagues of way.
What is mighty Nature saying
But that truth will win the day?
From her breast I feel the pulses
Of the hope that will not fail;
In her rugged grandeur burgeons
Freedom's flower that cannot pale.

From ocean unto ocean
Hearts are brave and hearts are true.
Deep unto deep is flowing,
With the wonders of the new.
Man is marching sunward, onward,
To the East and to the West;
From the error and the darkness,
To the mountain's beaming crest—

To the sea, that singeth ever
Of the things that yet will be—
Knowledge, power, and vast endeavor—
In the reign of Liberty.
Man will triumph, force of nature,
In his beating heart and brain;
Man will triumph—not by worship,
But by toil, for gods are vain.

Comrade, greeting! Greeting, Washburn,
Far along the army's front!
Noble soldier, fortune with thee,
Ever in the battle's brunt!
All the voices of the mountains,
And the voice of all the sea,
Giv my heart no sweeter guerdon
Than the voice you fling to me.

What Mrs. Freeman Says About the Congress.

To all lovers of liberty the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union sends greeting!

Blackened skies, falling rain, and muddy streets had been the prevailing dispensation for some time. Every Saturday and Sunday the inevitable shower had come down, but on the morning of October 15th the sun shone out gloriously; the warmth of summer returned; the city took on its brightest hues, and

CHAPTER XIV.—FRIENDSHIP.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

Philosophers of the utilitarian school have begun to reëstablish the long-forgotten truth that Materialism is the indispensable root of the plant which bears its flowers in spiritual aspirations. The consequence of universal practice is the best test of a dogma, and if all men were to divest themselves of their earthly possessions and devote their lives to the hyperphysical vagaries of the Galilean messiah, there would soon be neither crops to harvest nor bread to eat, and unworldly saints would starve as surely as ungodly sinners. "Ideality" may be the crown of the brain, as the brain is of the body, but the organs of the mind cannot dispense with the aid of the alimentary organs; the pinnacle of the social fabric needs intermediate supports. Education has to secure the welfare of the body before it can successfully cultivate the faculties of the mind; and it is not less certain that a man has to be a good patriot before he can be a worthy cosmopolitan, and a good friend before he can be a good patriot.

In the progress of individual development the instinct of friendship asserts itself at a very early period. Its recollection hallows the memory of the poorest childhood. The shepherd-boys of the upper Alps travel dozens of miles over cliffs and rocks to meet their friends at a salt-spring; on the shores of the Baltic the boys of the lonely fishermen's cabins frequent their trysting-places in spite of wind and weather. Early friendships throw the charm of their poetry even over the dreary prosa of grammar-school life; the fellowship of school-friends forever endears the scenes of their sports and rambles, and for many a poor office-drudge the recollection of such hours "holds all the light that shone on the earth for him." True friendship smoothens the rough path of poverty, while friendlessness, even in the gilded halls of wealth, is almost a synonyme of cheerlessness: says Goethe. "To be alone in paradise would be the height of misery." Friendship will assert itself athwart the barriers of social inequality, and its germs are so deeply rooted in the instincts of primitive nature that, in default of a communion of kindred souls, the bonds of sympathy have often united saints and sinners, nay, even men and brutes. The traditions of Grecian antiquity have preserved the possibly apocryphal legend of a dolphin that became attached to the company of a young fisherman, and after his death left the sea in search of its friend, and thus perished; but the story of Androcles was confirmed by the experience of Chevalier Geoffroy de la Tour, a crusader of the thirteenth century, who was charmed, but finally distressed, by the affection of a pet lion that followed him like his shadow, and at last fell a victim to his attachment by trying to swim after the ship that conveyed his master from Damascus to Genoa. The traveler Busbequius mentions a lynx that set his heart on escorting a camp-follower of a Turkish pasha; and Sir Walter Scott vouches for the touching episode of the Grampian Highlands, where a young hunter met his death by falling from a steep cliff, and was found, months after, half covered by the body of his favorite deerhound, who had followed his friend to the happy hunting-grounds by starving to death at the feet of a corpse.

Ich wüsste mir keine groessre Pein,

Among the ancestors of the Mediterranean nations the betrayal of a friend was deemed an act of almost inconceivable infamy; friends and friends engaged in a pledge of mutual hospitality, which was held sacred even in times of war; and among the natives of the South Sea Islands a similar brotherhood of elective affinities existed in the society of the Aroyi, or oath-friends, who held all property in common, and in times of danger unhesitatingly risked their own lives in defense of their ally's. Professor Letourneau has collected many curious anecdotes of that devotion, which should leave no doubt that altruism in its noblest form can dispense with the hope of post-mortem compensation, and, indeed, with all theological motives whatever.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

Unselfishness is the soul of true friendship, yet it nevertheless remains true that all instincts are founded on the experience of benefits or injuries. During the rough transition period from beasthood to manhood, when our uncivilized ancestors roamed the forests of the foreworld, it must have been an incalculable advantage to the individual hunter or herder to secure the coöperation of a trusty companion, whose watchful eye would double his chance of finding food or avoiding danger, whose stout arm might parry a blow which unaided strength would have failed to avert. As in other circumstances of natural selection, those who most successfully availed themselves of such advantages had a superior chance of survival and consequently of transmitting their disposition to subsequent generations, and the habit of friendship thus became a hereditary instinct.

The social system of civilized life has since devised manifold substitutes for the coöperation of elective affinities, but various unalienable advantages of the primitive plan have been more or less clearly recognized by all nations, especially by the manful and nature-abiding nations of pagan antiquity. The benefits secured by the mutual aid of sympathizing friends are not limited to the guarantee of civil rights, but extend to the realization of individual hopes and the indulgence of personal inclination and predilections, as well as to the higher privileges of a mental communion for which the panders of selfish wealth have as yet devised no equivalent. The power of approbativeness, the main stimulus of ambition, is infinitely intensified by the emulation of noble friendship, which, in the words of an ancient philosopher, "inspires to deeds heroic, and makes labor worth the toils that lead to success." Such friendship inspired the heroism of Theseus and Pyrithous, of Harmodius and Aristogiton, of Nisus and Euryalus, and recorded its experience in proverbs which have few parallels in the languages of the Christianized nations: "Solem e mundo qui amicitiam e vita tollunt"—"They deprive the world of sunshine who deprive life of friendship." "Amicum perdere damnorum est maximum"—"To lose a friend is the greatest of losses." "Amicus magis necessarius quam ignis aut aqua"—"A friend is more needful than fire or water."

In times of tribulation, when the fury of party-strife overrode all other restraints, friendship has more than once proved its saving power by averting otherwise hopeless perils. Diagoras was thus saved from the rage of allied bigots, Demetrius from the dagger of a wily assassin, the elder Cato from the rancor of political rivals. Without the aid of a friend Cicero would never have survived the intrigues of Catiline. Epaminondas made the approval of friends the sole reward of his heroic life, and vanquished the enemies of his country by the enthusiasm of the "sacred legion" of mutually devoted and mutually inspiring friends. Mohammed the Second yielded to the prayer of a humble companion what he refused to the united threats of foreign embassadors, and Simon Bolivar, the liberator of South America, often confessed that he owed his triumphs to the counsel of private friends rather than to the suggestions of his official advisers.

C.—PERVERSION.

The blessing of friendship, "doubling the joys of life and lessening its sorrows," could not fail to be specially obnoxious to the moralists of a creed that seeks to lure its converts from earth to ghostland, and depreciates the natural affections of the human heart. The gloomy antinaturalism of the Galilean prophet has been glossed over by the whitewashing committee of the revised Bible, but is too shockingly evident in the less sophisticated version of the original text to mistake its identity with the moral nihilism of the world-renouncing Buddha. The phil'adelphia, or "brother-love," of the New Testament, is, in fact, merely a "fellowship in Christ"—the spiritual communion and mutual indoctrination of earth-renouncing bigots. With the joys and sorrows of natural friendship their prophet evinces no sympathy whatever. "I am come," says he, "to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, . . . and a man's foes shall be those of his own household." "He who hates not his father and mother, his brothers and sisters, cannot be my disciple." "And the brother shall betray the brother to death, and the father the son."

By that test of moral merit the obligation of natural affection counted as nothing compared with the duty of theological conformity. "Verily, I say unto you, there is no man that has left brethren or sisters or father and mother for my sake and the gospels', but he shall receive a hundredfold," etc. "He that loveth father and mother more than me is not worthy of me." "And another of his disciples said unto him: Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. But Jesus said unto him: Follow me, and let the dead bury their dead." "For if you love them which love you, what reward have ye?"

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

The conversion of Rome, which theologians are fond of representing as the crowning miracle of Christianity, was a natural consequence of its pessimistic tendencies, which could not fail to recommend themselves to the instincts of a decrepit generation. "Worn-out sensualists consoled themselves with the hope of a better hereafter. Cowards pleased themselves with the idea of fulfilling the duty of meek submission to the injustice of the 'powers that be.' Monastic drones denounced the worldliness of industrial enterprises. Physical indolence welcomed the discovery that 'bodily exercise profiteth but little.' Envious impotence insisted on the duty of self-abasement. Transgressors against the health-laws of Nature relied upon the efficacy of the prayer-cure. Stall-fed priests sneered at the lean philosopher who wasted his time upon laborious inquiries, while he might wax fat on faith and the sacrifices of the pious. The demon-dogma was a godsend to the spiritual poverty of the elect. The so-called scholars of the Galilean church, who could not encounter the pagan philosophers on their own ground, found it very convenient to postulate a spook for every unknown phenomenon. . . . Despots before long recognized the mistake of persecuting a creed which inculcated the duty of passive submission to oppressors" (Secret of the East, p. 54).

They also recognized the advantage of a spiritual excuse for the infamy of their ingratitude to the secular benefactors of mankind. Cæsar and Trajan treated the humblest centurion as a friend rather than as a servant. Constantine and Justinian treated the ablest ministers like slaves who can be forced to toil, and turned out to starve after having worn out their strength in the service of the Lord's anointed. Belisarius, after repeatedly saving his master from well-deserved ruin, was sacrificed to the spite of a crowned harlot, and left to beg his bread in the streets of the city which his valor alone had for years protected from the rage of hostile armies. Aetius, who had saved all Europe by stemming the torrent of Hunnish conquest, was treated like a rebellious slave for refusing to betray his brave allies, and the stipulated pay of his veterans was squandered on pimps and clerical parasites. Charles Martel, whose heroism turned the scales against the power of the invading Moriscoes, was openly reviled by the very priests who owed him the preservation of their lives, as well as of their livings; his image was dragged in the mire, his soul consigned to the pit of torment—all for having defrayed the costs of his campaign by tithing prelates as well as laymen. Columbus was loaded with chains by the pious prince whose castles he had filled with the treasures of a new world; the philosopher Vanini was betrayed to death by a Christian spy who had for years enjoyed his confidence and his hospitality. John Huss was surrendered by the imperial priest-slave whose own hand had signed the document of his safe-conduct. The earl of Stafford was sacrificed by the crowned Jesuit who divided his time between prayers for the theological interests of his subjects and plots for the subversion of their political liberties. The dogma of self-denial has not prevented our financial pharisees from amassing fortunes that would dwarf the spoils of a Roman triumphator; but the hospitality of Mæcenas has not survived the religion of Nature. Our philosophers have to study the problems of life in a personal struggle for existence; our poets have to choose between starvation and hypocrisy. Patriots are left to the consoling reflection that virtue is its own reward. The endowers of theological seminaries seem to rely on the mercy of Christ to cancel the odium of their shortcomings in the recognition of secular merit. Keppler, Campanella, and Spinoza perished in penury. Locke and Rousseau, the recognized primates of the intellectual world, were left to languish in exile, admired and neglected by a host of "friends"—Christian friends—in every city of the civilized world. Schubert, Buerger, and Frederick Schiller, the idols of a poetry-loving nation, were left to fight the bitter struggle for existence to an extreme of which all the records of pagan antiquity furnish only a single parallel. Anaxagoras, the founder of a philosophic school counting its disciples by thousands, was left to languish in exile, till the rumor of his extreme distress brought the most illustrious of those disciples to the sick-bed of his neglected teacher. "Do not, do not leave us!" he cried, in an agony of remorse; "we cannot afford to lose the light of our life!"

"O Pericles," said the dying exile, "those who need a lamp should take care to supply it with oil!"

But how many lights of our latter-day lives have thus been extinguished before their time! Not one of the plethoric British aristocrats who spiced their leisure with the sweets of poetry ever dreamed of relieving the cruel distress of Robert Burns, or of cutting the knot of the financial embroglio that strangled out the life of Sir Walter Scott.

E.—REFORM.

Time is the test of truth; and the fallacies of the "Brotherhood in Christ" plan have been abundantly demonstrated by their consequences. Instead of being a bond of union, the doctrine of renunciation has been found to be a root of discord and rancor, and in times of need the fellowship of its converts has proved a most rotten staff. Even the wretches who betrayed their friends to the spies of the Holy Inquisition had no difficulty in palliating the infamy of their conduct with the sanction of scriptural precepts. For centuries the appeals of martyrs to the cause of freedom and Freethought have been answered with the advice of Christian submission to the "powers that be," and our modern pharisees rarely fail to reprove the "worldliness" of a poor neighbor's lament for the loss of his earthly possessions.

The founder of "Positivism," the Religion of Humanity, proposes to dedicate the days of the year to the leaders of progress, and inscribe our places of worship with the names of discoverers, reformers, and philosophers rather than of bigots and world-despising saints. And for the sake of those who would not wish to repeat the mistake of sacrificing the present to the past, the builders of those sanctuaries should add a temple of Friendship. From the adoration of self-torturing fanatics, from the worship of sorrow and the love of enemies, mankind will at last revert to the ancestral plan of elective affinities, and the dread of preferring natural to theological duties will not much longer prevent our fellow-men from recognizing their obligations to their earthly benefactors.

Religion and Its Origin.

CONCLUDED.

But the objection to all of this comes up in the following terms: "Many are, and hav been, interested in religion, are earnest in its advocacy, and are doing all that they can to promote its interest, and at the same time they are intellectual, moral, wise, and good." I am willing and ready to concede all of this. Many who hav this disease do not hav it fatally. See Canon Fremantle, in Popular Science Monthly for June, 1887. The late Henry Ward Beecher and many hundreds of the most able men in the theological ranks are examples. In this class this disease is hardly noticeable; they, having come in contact with the world, hav learned to love this world, and the things that are therein, and this is a reasonable antidote for this disease. We would not know that they were religious, or had religion at all, if some one did not thus inform us. And then, again, this class of men are largely identified with the moral and intellectual development of the people, so much so that they hav no time to cultivate the religious disease. In life and act they are quite free from this disease. Then there is another fact which justifies these statements, and that is, in this class of men there is such a clear manifestation of culture, science, and morality, that religion is hardly discernible in them. So true is this that the really religious will not concede that these are religious at all. These men are not what they were once. When they first caught the disease and became religious advocates, the drift of all of their endeavors was toward giving expression to this disorder; but with an advance in knowledge, especially of the scientific form, they become largely redeemed out of this early disease. Let this suffice as an answer to the objection made. One word more as to Mr. Spencer. He is of the opinion that religion is a necessary fact in our nature, and not merely incidental thereto. He says: "Thus the universality of religious ideas, their independent evolution among different primitiv races, and their great vitality unite in showing that their source must be deep-seated instead of superficial. In other words, we are obliged to admit that if not supernaturally derived, as the majority contend, they must be derived out of human experience, slowly accumulated and organized." Mr. Spencer allows us to think that the religious sentiments are founded in the emotions, and are normal like all other faculties. Yet he says, "We may be sure that religions, though even none of them be actually true, are yet all adumbrations of truth." Whatever we are is doubtless the work of evolution. The ever-changing environment has made us what we are, but it does not follow that all of the experiences of life are necessary to our manhood. Many experiences hav come to us in the genesis of evolution that are harmful, and hence in no way useful or beneficial. And though these experiences hav been organized, it does not follow by any means that they contain essential "absolute virtues," and are entitled to special recognition, and that we are under obligation to make of them what does not belong to them, because we find them among our organized experiences.

Many of the experiences which come to our race in the slow process of evolution would be greatly to our benefit if they could be eliminated, and the wisest legislativ acts in the world's civilization are those which point to that end. Diseases hav been organized through experience, and hav been transmitted greatly to the disadvantage of many millions who are living. "They contain a soul of truth or an adumbration of truth," yet this would hardly entitle them to the eminent position of the "correlativ of science." I confess that in the experiences of life religion has been organized in the same way that other diseases hav been. But I am not prepared to admit that it is worthy of the dignity sought to be placed upon it by Mr. Spencer. Mr. Spencer sees the history of religion as I see it, and there is no more beauty in it for him than there is for me. And I regret the attempt which Mr. Spencer makes to rescue it from the merited disgrace into which it has fallen. I cannot see, nor do I find, any good reason to treat it otherwise than as I hav done. I can apologize for the conduct of its devotees on the ground that it is, as we hav defined it, a mental disease. But if it is not; if its history is what it is on account of rational forethought, then its history must consign its devotees to the deepest damnation possible to human thought. The more charitable view which we hav suggested inspires the more considerate with a large hope for the future of our race. We are not at a loss even now to see the basis of this hope. We cannot contemplate the attitude of the movements of to-day without seeing that there is great promis in the outlook. The more thoughtful in the religious world are only religious in name; they hav been so far redeemed from this disease that there is but little left to indicate its presence. This kind of redemption is spreading rapidly, and a gospel founded upon needs is in the near future destined to make itself felt in our modern civilization—a gospel not founded upon sin and depravity, devil and hell, nor upon a God entering into redemptiv relation to man through incarnation, but upon a cosmopolitan civilization; not founded upon what one believes or disbelieves, but upon humanity—humanity in all things—and a certificate of character will be found in the fact that he is a brother man and sister woman. The promis of such a state is not altogether a fiction.

We see in the inventiv genius of man, and in the ability to organize the result of that inventiv genius, the ability as well to manage or run that organization. All of these movements tend to bring the race into closer and closer relations, and thereby develop a brotherhood founded upon charity, sympathy, kindness, and unity. In the operation of this new gospel we will find the departure of the old malady which has cursed the world so long, and denied to the race the possibility of a brotherhood on account of creeds, gods, Bibles, and Christs—all differing, one from the other. This new gospel will work out the old insane heredity which was the gift of the lower structural forms, in them harmless, but in the human form it became the cause of the world's greatest trouble. The most difficult, damaging inheritance to get rid of, it makes its possessors partially insane, and these are hard to convince. It will be greatly facilitated when other remunerativ employment will be found for the doctors of religion, so that their bread-and-butter will not depend upon treating and nursing this malady so that it may be kept eternally on the chronic list. Many of these men are eminently qualified to become educators as soon as the inducement which a competency holds out is guaranteed. In the presence of such an inducement they will be only too ready to disrobe and leave their sick to recover for want of being doctored. I doubt not that there are many who would be glad to find a chance, that would still contain a promis of support, to throw off sacerdotalism and all that it implies for the sake of that freedom which would come to them, in which they could recognize their own convictions, and which would not endanger their financial and social standing.

The dispensation which science is now giving to the world points toward man's redemption from religion; toward his salvation out of religion. With what surprising rapidity the world is growing out of this disease. It is true, and likely will be true for some time to come, that the competition among creeds will tend to show an increase in religious statistics, but the observer will readily discover that this reported increase is only fictitious; and it is equally evident to the observer that there are millions now who are not religious who were a few years ago, and they, too, are among the best people upon this globe. How few of the more thoughtful, even among the youth of the civilized world, are at all religious? Only now and then one, and very likely these few hav the liver complaint. It is more than evident that this gospel of no religion is on the increase, as it contains splendid victories for the race without the sacrifice of blood. Hence, in consequence of these things, the brightest sky that ever looked down upon expectancy is that of to-day. It is filled with thrilling hopes which hav long been waiting on bended knee, with uplifted eyes shining through the mist of tears, for the coming of this day. In it we see a splendid promis, pointing toward a motherhood whose babes will need no redemption from the curse of sin. They will be born heirs of a cosmopolitan citizenship who will never need to be born again, instead of a babyhood with the mark and curse of Cain upon it. No bloody vestments nor slaughter of innocent incarnations that the wrath of offended divinities might be stayed; no revengeful gods, seated upon silent, desert thrones, to whom fulsome adulation is more than innocence and virtue's whitest robe unsanctified in the blood of atonement. It is humanity redeemed from the curse of religion. It is humanity that asks not for pardon, and scorns the price which heaven places upon self-respect; virtue, which a crown cannot purchase, nor a hell frighten. No good offered at the expense of innocence.

J. H. BURNHAM.

Arbitration of Differences Better than War.

When the high-cockalorums who had charge of the Constitutional Centennial at Philadelphia find time to edit the volume, we shall probably hav a perfect record of all the vainglorious sentences uttered on that memorable occasion. Meanwhile here are two paragraphs from one speech worth preserving. They were spoken by General Sheridan in response to the toast, The Army:

"The regular army of the United States is a mere fiction. The real army is all able-bodied citizens capable of bearing arms. Mobilized it would amount to four or five millions of good soldiers. Now, then, if all the shipping of Europe was allowed to come over here, carrying men and materials of war, and the navy under Admiral Luce was to let them come over without interfering with them in any way, they could not carry men and war material enough to make one campaign. So that the army of the United States in that sense is about the largest army in the world.

"I am rather on the side of Senator Ingalls in what he said to-night. He wants to make a continental republic of this country. But there is one thing that you should appreciate, and that is that the improvement in guns and in the material of war, in dynamite and other explosivs, and in breech-loading guns, is rapidly bringing us to a period when war will be eliminated from history—when we can no longer stand up and fight each other, and when we will hav to resort to something else. Now, what will that something else be? It will be arbitration. I mean what I say when I express the belief that those who may liv until the next centennial, will find that arbitration will rule the whole world."

Every true man and woman will hope that General Sheridan is as good a prophet as he is a soldier.

Our London Letter.

The International Freethought Congress held in London last month gave general satisfaction to those engaged therein, according to the report. European Freethought societies were very well represented; Australia by one delegate, and America not all.

The question "Whether teaching should be indifferent or directly hostil to religious dogma" gave rise to considerable discussion, and on a vote being taken, twenty-eight were in favor of indifference, four supported hostility, and several declined registering their opinions. Such a result must be disappointing to many earnest Freethinkers, who will regard this as a retrograde step, believing, as they do, that the only manner in which headway can be made is by opposing theology to the full extent of their power, using whatever means may be at hand for that purpose. The taunts of the theological party that Liberalism is only destructiv, and not constructiv, appear to hav affected some of the Freethinkers to such an extent that they seem anxious to show the reverse is the case, though why they should trouble about what is said, or wish to gain the good opinion of the religionists, is not evident at first sight. Theology and Freethought must necessarily be antagonistic, and no quarter should be given or taken. It is the duty of those who believe theology is false and injurious to mankind to do their utmost to destroy it, while those who hold it to be true and beneficial should giv it all the support in their power; half measures are useless, and worse than useless. It is pleaded that in every country the majority is favorably disposed toward supernaturalism, and therefore it is not politic to run counter to the feelings of such majority, but it takes a vast amount of moral suasion and soft words to convince anyone he is wrong in speculativ matters. The most popular preachers are those who use the most forcible language, and express their views without any great regard for the susceptibilities of others, and the same holds good with public teachers generally, both in politics and religion. The man who strikes hardest and quickest is better appreciated by both friends and foes than he who is willing to grant concessions to the enemy detrimental to his own party. As a Freethought editor has well pointed out, science and philosophy are very good in their way, but all philosophers and scientists are not Freethinkers; many of them may be, but there are scores of well-known names who cling tenaciously to the superstitions drilled into them during childhood. Unless children, while under tuition, are withdrawn altogether from theological influence, or, when this is not possible, shown the absurdity of dogmatic speculation, they are quite as likely to grow up as fully imbued with the grossest superstition as those who hav never received any but "religious" education. Perhaps the next Freethought Congress may see their way to reverse the verdict passed this year.

I do not for one moment doubt the good faith of those who are willing to make concessions, and it may be in their eyes expedient, but I certainly think such a position does more honor to their hearts than their heads. It may be all very well for the Nonconformists to tell the church congress now sitting at Wolverhampton how much indebted they feel to the state clergy, and what brotherly love they bear toward them; there may be some degree of truth when different sects of the same religion talk like that, and it is possible they might eventually amalgamate without much injury to their differences of creed; but there can never be any such feeling existing between theology and Freethought. Whenever the two come together, except in opposition, the latter will suffer.

The teachings of history cannot be ignored with safety, and the present comparativ freedom from religious persecution is only owing to the power Freethought has attained. If that power is recklessly thrown away, persecution, as of old, will speedily appear to the front. The caged beast of prey loses nothing of his instinctiv fondness for live game.

TWO THINGS WANTED.

First. We want some money from every friend who owes on his subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The balance in the bank from which to draw to satisfy the paper manufacturers and the printer is very small, and we must increase it, or run in debt. There are many hundreds of dollars owing us by subscribers, and we desire to kindly but firmly call their attention to the matter. We need the money, and it is not right for them to keep it from us. We would also respectfully suggest to those whose subscriptions expire during the present month that now is the time to renew. We would call attention, too, to our club rates. Get a new subscriber, and so get your own paper cheaper.

Second. We once more ask our friends to send us the names of all the Infidels of their acquaintance who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER. The intention is to send them sample copies of the paper with the hope that they may subscribe.

Burlesquing the Bible.

There is a story of a Spanish cutthroat who had killed his own father and mother and asked the court "not to be hard on a poor lonely orphan." With a very similar logic our Christian apologists appeal from satire to good taste and the duty of forbearance. After doing their utmost to make religion hateful, loathsome, and ridiculous, they bemoan the impiety of the Freethinker who ventures to ridicule the absurdities of their caricature.

Freethinkers hav to avenge the outrages of sixteen centuries, and in their turn might appeal to that rule of combat which grants the injured party the privilege of choosing his weapons, if the real motiv of our fastidious adversaries were not evidently the hope of diverting attention from the main issues of the controversy. Like tricksy attorneys, they try to evade an undesired discussion by criticising the good breeding of a damaging witness. When Juvenal parodied the votaries of oriental superstitions, the priests of Isis were too busy steering victims to their house of assignation to answer his charges, and could only call attention to the verbal vulgarities of the satirist. Our Jesuits hav systematically sacrificed the welfare of mankind to the interests of their juggler-guild, and for centuries turned this earth into a hell of tyranny, wretchedness, and superstition; they still are using all their influence to retard the progress of mankind, and are not ashamed to wring their tithes from the misery of consumptiv factory-children; but they hav no time to discuss such trifles. They prefer to call attention to the depraved artistic taste of Mr. Watson Heston.

Yet the time may be near when his fastidious critics will be disposed to consider the penalty of burlesque a very cheap mode of atonement. In France the enemies of progress turned up their noses at the squibs of Voltaire till they had to smell the powder-smoke of the Mousquetards. They stopped their ears at the whistling of satirical ditties till they had to listen to the whistling of cannon-balls. Our esthetic pharisees try to ignore the signs of the times by averting their pious looks from the caricatures at the street corners; but their eyes will be opened if they should discover the handwriting of doom on their own temple-walls. ## The American Secular Union.

The Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, just closed, is the most encouraging convention of that body ever held. It was not so large as the Cleveland congress, nor so vigorous in a certain fashion as the Syracuse assemblage, nor so influential upon the general public as the New York gathering last year, but it was better in many ways than any of these, and givs promis of germinating a larger life and work for Liberalism. This result is due to a settled policy of plan and action, systematically thought and carried out.

In 1884, when the Congress met at Cassadaga Lake, the National Liberal League was, to use a vulgar but expressiv term, played out. The quarrel arising at Syracuse and Chicago over the obscenity question had been helped along by the St. Louis and Milwaukee Congresses, which tacked Socialism to the platform, and made the Liberal issue subordinate to the social question, and the people were tired; and though the League would hav survived the Syracuse factional fight, when unwise leaders pressed the issue again at Chicago and drove away the man whose name commands respect from all Liberals; and when at St. Louis and Milwaukee the same unwise leaders incorporated in the platform economical theories accepted by but few of those who were and are willing to support the true Liberal platform throughout their lives, whether successful or defeated, the League was doomed. Apathy and indifference replaced zeal and enthusiasm; moral and financial support was withdrawn, and only a dozen or two responded to the call for the Cassadaga Congress. They were there to bury the corpse decently, or to watch it rise from its ashes, a new life and being—which, was problematical.

The result of that gathering is known. From the ashes of the League rose the American Secular Union, an organization exactly what the National Liberal League was before the Socialistic rocks were tied to its wings. The Union had a definit plan and purpose, and two men were commissioned to fulfil them. In this the mistake was made of trying to do too much. The phœnix soared too high, and the Union was left in debt at the close of its fiscal year. Two men in the field was one more than the Union could support. The error was rectified and a new start taken. The way was easier, and much greater work was accomplished. The third year, it seems, has been the best of all, and now the Union enters the field with not only a working secretary but a working president as well. Certainly the organization is to be congratulated upon the progress made, and those who hav contributed to this end deserve all praise. The working officers hav proved the wisdom of their policy, demonstrated their fitness to guide the organization, and shown their worthiness of support by the Liberals of the country, and there is no danger that they will forget that every year is a period by itself and a time of trial or triumph for them.

There are three sorts of work to be done by the Union—delivering of public lectures, distribution of pamphlets supporting the Nine Demands, and legislativ work. The first, so far as the Union is concerned, may safely be left in the competent hands of its president. He undertakes to do that, and depends upon the generosity of his audiences for his support. The distribution of literature involves two parties—some one to pay for its preparation, and some one to scatter it when printed. The first party to this is the people; the second, the Executiv Committee of the Union. We place great reliance upon both. The legislativ work must devolve upon the secretary, and we hope that Mr. Stevens will develop surprising talents as a lobbyist. Of his executiv ability and energy there is no doubt; let him bend them to his purpose, and see what results follow. Years ago Col. R. G. Ingersoll effected the constitutional separation of church and state in Illinois; there is, however, some work in Mr. Stevens's state yet to be done, particularly at the State University, whose faculty recently expelled a student solely because of his Freethought principles. These three methods of advancing Liberalism are the best and most effectiv, and each should, and no doubt will, be pushed as far and fast as means and opportunities will permit.

Another thing that will please the Liberals of the country is the statement that this Congress was harmonious. This is good news, and news that, since reading Mr. Putnam's apostrophe to Mr. O'Neil's baby, we are prepared to believe. No man who was not convinced that his enemies had forgiven him could hav written that happy tribute to a babe. And now, if a few of our esteemed and loved lecturers will say good things instead of ill-natured ones of their fellow-lecturers to the people whom they visit, the reign of harmony will be complete and upon all will rest the gentle benediction of that white-winged Peace which hath her victories just as profitable as war. If any of our esteemed rhetorical allies retort that editors should practice what they preach, we calmly reply that Infidel editors were never known to speak ill of each other. When they criticise a contemporary they do it to spread his fame and help him along.

The very full and complete report of the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union which we publish this week will, we feel convinced, be read with satisfaction by every Freethinker. The Union is prosperous, the officers are able and tried men, and the people are behind the Union and willing to support it, so long as it is not switched off the track on a side issue. Its prospects are brightening each year, and with the steadfast and expanding Union of Liberals under its banner—our flag above the cross—we think we are justified in expecting a successful resistance to the ecclesiastical tyranny which encompasses us on all sides. But the Union must get down to work on the practical issues of the day.

Interesting Criticisms to Come.

The conclusion of a long editorial on "Anarchy and the Anarchists" in the Open Court is this:

"It is well to bear in mind that the issue in the supreme court was not between the punishment of the defendants and their absolute acquittal, but between death and a new trial; and we believe that by reason of the errors confessed in the decision itself a new trial should hav been allowed. And this is the conviction, we are assured, of men as eminent for legal ability and attainments as any of the learned gentlemen by whom this decision has been rendered. A lawyer in this city remarked a few days ago, 'I believe the men are guilty and ought to be hanged, but I am sorry that they did not hav a fair trial.' Guilty or not, if they 'did not hav a fair trial,' they should hav another."

It has taken Mr. Underwood a long while to form his opinion, but it is a sound one, and is precisely the opinion we formed and expressed months since.

It will be interesting now to read the long criticisms that will be heaped upon the Open Court for being an Anarchist organ, edited by an Anarchist of a peculiarly dangerous species.

Barton, Washington County, Wis.

The proof is multiplying that the most dangerous foe of the American republic is the Roman Catholic church. Again we hav to record a successful attack upon the public schools by that church in the Northwest. Almond Owen, of Milwaukee, Wis., sends us the story of Barton, Washington county, that state. It runs this wise:

"At the annual meeting of the district last year, without any notice that the question of extinction would come up, the enemies of the public school system rallied in force and carried a resolution that no public school should be maintained during the year, and that, therefore, no school tax should be raised. Under the law, it became the duty of the school board, in such circumstances, to include the amount necessary for school purposes in the regular tax roll; but as the members of the school board were all Catholics, interested in compelling children to attend the Catholic parochial school, they failed to do this. There was no public school in the district last year. This year, under the law giving women the right to vote at school elections, the Catholic faction rallied their women also and managed to carry the same measure for this year. So once more the only school open to the children of the district is the sectarian parochial school."

We pass the record along, in the hope that it will open people's eyes. How many more places are in the same condition of slavery to popery only the church authorities know. Melrose, Minn., is one; Stearns county, Minn., adds several to the list, and Mr. Owen writes that he personally knows of instances in Milwaukee in which priests hav used intimidation to induce people to withdraw their children from the public schools and send them to the parochial institution.

The Milwaukee Sentinel says that "these instances can only serve to put the people on their guard, and especially against the election to places on school boards of persons who are among the enemies of the system," which is well enough so far as it goes, but how, tell us, shall the people of Barton right their wrongs under the present law? The Catholics are in the majority, and can and do outvote the friends of the public schools. They can refuse to hav a school, can refuse to vote the money for one, can put their own tools on the school board, which can refuse to engage teachers; and what can the decent part of the population do about it?

The only way, it seems to us, is to go straight to the legislature, and pass and enforce a law that every town shall maintain free public schools, in which no religion of any kind or sort shall be taught, for from six to nine months in the year according to the size of the town. The duty of managing them should be put on the town officers, with severe penalties attached for non-fulfilment of this duty. Then if the Catholics put their men into office, the people could put them into jail in cases like this in Barton.

An Anti-Liberty League.

The Personal Liberty League formed by the Germans of this state to influence legislation in behalf of beer on Sunday after 2 P.M., has been met by the organization of the clergy to resist it. The ministers say that "the time has come for all who believe in the sacredness of God's holy day to decide on methods to resist the persistent and wicked efforts of those who wish to destroy it." The program of the clerical league will be to pledge its members to vote for no candidate for office who will not swear to oppose the Germans. The ministers are also to use all their power and influence with the voters of their particular congregations to induce them to make a similar discrimination against saloon candidates.

It is claimed by the movers in this affair that there are six hundred thousand Christians in the state who will unite to retain the present Sunday laws, and even make them more restrictiv. The Germans claim but one hundred thousand votes, but as they are concentrated in this city, where they will do the most good, the contest is about equal. Outsiders, who do not care particularly for beer on Sunday, but who do desire liberty to spend the day as they like, will watch the fight with interest.

Unkind Collaboration.

See how ingeniously one who wants to, and is not particular how he does it, can make out a case! The following is from the Ironclad Age of October 8, 1887:

"And so the Chicago Anarchists will be hanged unless Governor Oglesby or the United States Supreme Court interferes.

"The people of Chicago are bloodthirsty and demand the death of individuals who desire to revolutionize society, and obtain a little more comfort for the workers of the world. To this end the police, by perjury, connected the defendants with some wretch who threw a bomb which killed seven policemen, the lower court by partiality secured their conviction, and the higher court by sophistry sustains the verdict.

"That is all there is to it, and we hope the people of Cook county are satisfied.

"The sightless eyes of justice are filled with tears.—Editorial in TRUTH SEEKER, Sept. 24, 1887.

"C. P. Somerby, the business end of the Truth Seeker Company, is . . . in social economy a Communist.—TRUTH SEEKER, Sept. 17, 1887.

"The political program [of the Communists] is absolute individual liberty by means of the suppression of government, and the division of nationalities into communes more or less federated; their political economy consists essentially in the dispossession, with compensation, of present holders of capital, and in assignment of the coin, land, etc., to associations of workmen."—A member of the fraternity, quoted by Lib. of Useful Knowledge, vol. 4, p. 193. B."

All of the above is truthful, except the definition of Communism, and that is nearly so, but the implication and inference which the writer (who is also one the editors of the Age) desires drawn is a gross falsehood.

Our editorial was written, not because our valued associate holds certain opinions, but because the truth of the Chicago cases needed to be stated. It was written by one who is neither Socialist, Communist, nor Anarchist, but is a believer in Jeffersonian principles, and the American republic as the biggest nation on earth, and the best so far as the Christians let it alone. Our associate had no more idea that that editorial was to appear than had Dr. Monroe. We hav stated something like a dozen or two times that THE TRUTH SEEKER agrees with none of the three social sects mentioned, and the desire to hav people believe it does—which is the animus of the writer who placed these paragraphs in juxtaposition—proceeds from dishonest motivs. We are sorry to hav to write this, but it is a fact.

The Cartoon.

Brother Jamieson, it appears, is the only one among our lecturers who still persists that duty calls him to take up the club of argument against that most mephitic Mephitis, the Rev. Clark Braden. He holds that whatever stands upon the Bible and offers a mark from that ground is desirable game. We doubt it.

Mr. Heston givs us good likenesses of Messrs. Jamieson, Reynolds, Bell, Remsburg, and Putnam. That of Mr. Jamieson, in particular, is striking. The others seem to think striking under the circumstances would be unproductiv of good results. We hav never seen the Rev. Mr. Braden, but hav no doubt that our artist has done him justice.

Editorial Notes.

MR. HOLLAND acknowledges a slip of the pen, in his former article on the tariff, about the tariff of 1846. He writes: "It was lower than that of 1842, but still protectiv, and industry continued to be burdened by heavy taxes on pig-iron, wool, and other raw materials."

W. H. BENSON, the Philadelphia Socialist, sees Terence V. Powderly, the head of the Knights of Labor, through very clear glasses. Mr. Benson says: "Powderly is boss of the Knights once more. Would he be boss if he were not a Roman Catholic? Did not the Roman Catholic Knights support him to a man? Cannot any sensible man perceive the guile of the Jesuitical snake? Is Powderly, the mental and moral slave of priests, a fit leader for progressiv men?"

MRS. SLENKER writes us that her enemies are circulating reports that her husband and son hav abandoned her. This is an infamous falsehood. Mrs. Slenker not only possesses the love of her family, but she has as well the respect of her neighbors, and the most influential and highly-regarded ladies of the vicinity hav signed a testimonial setting forth their esteem for their persecuted friend. Not the least contemptible aspect of Mrs. Slenker's arrest is the cruel tales told about her by some miserable scamp who dislikes her.

THE death of Seward Mitchell removes a fearless, positiv, and erratic figure from Freethought circles. In his thinking Mr. Mitchell agreed with only one person—himself. He was a plain-spoken and harsh critic, but in daily life he was tender, generous, and loving. He was an Abolitionist of the "blackest" hue, and transferred his hatred of chattel slavery to industrial oppression. Those who hav sometimes been vexed at his vehement denunciation of many things usually considered beneficent, would not hav been ruffled had they known the gentle character of the man. May his sleep be undisturbed.

THE trial of Mrs. Slenker begins Monday, October 1st, at Abingdon, Va. E. W. Chamberlain, of this city, and Roland & Heermans, of Blacksburg, Va., are her counsel. Mr. Heermans is the district-attorney of Montgomery county. A full report of the trial will appear in THE TRUTH SEEKER. The case against E. C. Walker, Moses and George Harman, seems to hav gone over. Mr. Walker says: "When we were in Leavenworth it had not been given to the grand jury, and so we were permitted to go, on our own recognizances. We hav not yet learned who the prosecuting witness is. In short, we are in the hands of government, subject to its inscrutable providence." This is pleasant news, and we hope next week to be able to announce Mrs. Slenker's vindication at the hands of a jury of her neighbors.

THE Liberator Company of Melbourne, Australia, is about to enlarge its paper and its business. In the circular soliciting the purchase of its new shares the chairman of its board of directors says: "We hav now an established and growing reputation. We did not mount like a rocket, and end in smoke; but hav won success by hard work and honest perseverance, combined with strict economy and a most scrupulous care for the shareholders' interests. Considering the opposition and obloquy, the cowardice and dishonesty of many newsagents, and the ceaseless storm of harsh and inhuman criticism by which we hav been assailed, our success is phenomenal. Our credit is as good as that of any company in Australia. When we began we had to win commercial confidence; merchants were shy and unsympathetic. Now we are besieged with travelers and agents anxious to do business with us." THE TRUTH SEEKER congratulates its contemporary of the antipodes.

THE president of the German Catholic Convention, just held at Chicago, is credited with this tomfoolery: "This country gained its liberty through the Catholics, and its liberty will be retained through the instrumentality of the Catholics." The Detroit Evening News, in quoting this, is at a loss which to pity most, the arrogance or the ignorance of the statement, and regrets that Herr Spaunhorst should hav made it. The News adds: It is a false claim, however, from which other religious zealots outside of the Catholic church are not exempt. The country owes its freedom to no sect. The Infidels or Agnostics might with equal propriety claim the guerdon, and cite in proof the work of Jefferson, Franklin, Paine, and others, in the Revolution. But the liberties of the country were achieved and will be maintained by the people of the country, and not by any religious denomination or faction." The fact, however, remains that the Catholics and Protestants are trying to abridge the people's liberty in every state, and it is only the Infidels who are protesting against it. The body of the people who are neither church-members nor outspoken Infidels are so busy getting together a little property that they notice nothing, and might as well be deaf and dumb. When they get their property, they will find they hav lost about everything else.

As a sample of the mistaken kindness we often meet, may be instanced a letter from a new friend, Mr. Jas. M. Murphy, who says: "I am surprised at the stand you hav taken on the tariff question. I don't see how any one, with so level a head on other matters, and one who has advocated and still advocates freedom, could be a protectionist!" Mr. Murphy then fills out two fat pages arguing that protection is not good public policy, and asks if we hav the moral courage to answer him. We might reply in the words of Terence, "I dare do all that may become a man," but inasmuch as we hav not, in these columns, advocated protection, we do not see the pertinence of Mr. Murphy's query. He should address his arguments to our esteemed friend, Van Buren Denslow, who is the ablest attorney for protectiv tariff that we know. At any rate, the coat Mr. Murphy has cut out will not fit us, and if it did, we should not fill our editorial columns with free trade arguments. The fight against the church is not yet done, and that field is large enough for us.

SAYS the Galveston News:

"If the New York TRUTH SEEKER is still seeking the truth it will hav learned that the law of Texas excepts newspapers from the provisions of the Sunday law, and that the News has maintained its rights within the law. THE TRUTH SEEKER, an Infidel paper, has been pitching into the News with nearly as much zeal as its former antagonists of the ecclesiastical press. Fire away, practical Infidels and theoretical Infidels. Abuse does not hurt."

The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know just how the News has maintained its rights, by selling every other tradesman out, that it may hav the exclusiv right to make money on Sunday. The News has gained its point, but in doing so has earned the just contempt of even the ministers whose dirty Sabbatarian work it is doing. There was a hope that Texas might come to the front in the protest against bigotry and count one against the Puritans of the times, but the News has killed the hope. The church has done well to get the press on its side, and it can soon hope to get a law passed compelling every one to attend "divine" service on Sunday.

A GREAT many readers hav written us asking to hav Mr. Heston's Bible cartoons explained, as the text given does not always sufficiently enlighten them, and in families where there are ladies and children it will not do to hav a Bible lying around for reference. Always anxious to oblige friends, we hav persuaded our brother, Mr. George E. Macdonald, to undertake this task for the benefit of the studious and historically inclined. The mysterious pictures and the commentary will appear in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1888, which will appear simultaneously with the new year. The ANNUAL will also contain a calendar revised to date, a complete resumé of Freethought happenings of the year, much statistical matter of interest, and articles by the ablest of Freethinkers. We shall also in this number add to our Freethought picture gallery by presenting the likenesses of noted American Freethinkers who hav passed away. In renewing their subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER our friends can inclose another twenty-five cents, and hav the ANNUAL mailed to them as soon as it comes from the press.

IT will be remembered that at the trial of the Union Hill, N. J., Anarchists, arrested for resisting the police when the police were the sole aggressors, the judge charged the jury that they were to judge the prisoners' right to resist the police by inquiring whether the meeting would hav been unlawful had it been held. This instruction reminds Liberty of a story: "Does your b-b-bwother like cheese?" asked Lord Dundreary of Miss Georgiana Mountchessington. "Why, really, my lord, you know I hav no brother," responded the bored Georgiana. "Oh, ya-a-as, I forgot," drawled the incorrigible Dundreary; "I meant, if you h-h-had a b-b-bwother, w-w-would he like cheese?" Mr. Tucker adds: "Here's a chance for THE TRUTH SEEKER. If that enterprising paper will hammer the skull of this idiot of the bench as vigorously as it did that of the better-deserving magistrate who tried C. B. Reynolds, Liberty will applaud it as warmly now as it condemned it then." That is to say, for administering an obsolete blasphemy law which is directly contrary to the spirit of the federal Constitution, Mr. Tucker will applaud a judge; while for administering an ordinance designed to preserve the peace—but villainously stretched in this instance—Mr. Tucker will condemn the judge. It seems to us that a charge of sectarianism would lie very snugly against the editor of Liberty. As for ourself, we condemn every act of injustice, whether committed under the form of law or not. Both of the New Jersey judges are Dogberrys writ large, and equally worthy of condemnation.

Literary Notes.

IN the November number of the Forum the Rev. Dr. Henry Van Dyke will hav an article in refutation of the claim of the Socialists that the Mosaic law and the New Testament teachings favor their doctrins. Dr. Van Dyke is a very able twister of scripture.

THE October number of the Cosmopolitan is as bright and entertaining as any of the purely literary monthlies. It is handsomely printed and profusely illustrated. W. T. Hornaday, Richard A. Proctor, P. T. Barnum, Lee Meriwether, Walt Whitman, and Ella Wheeler Wilcox are among the contributors.

PROF. JOSEPH LE CONTE will endeavor to show, in an article on "Agassiz and Evolution," in the November number of the Popular Science Monthly, that the whole inductiv basis upon which was afterward built the modern theory of evolution was laid by Agassiz, although he himself persistenty refused to build upon it any really scientific structure.

Letters from Friends.

HARRISBURG, PA., Oct. 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, for which please enroll my name for a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. After reading one copy through I hav to wonder that I was not a subscriber long ago. E. B. SWAYNE.

FRANKLIN, OR., Oct. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I think a few lines from this section may be of interest to some of your readers, so I take the present moment to send you a word of cheer.

Brother Putnam has come and gone without my being able to see him, but he has made a lasting impression on the hosts of ignorance and superstition.

I was particularly pleased to see the way he shut up the old war-horse of Presbyterianism, Rev. T. H. Small, of Silverton, and also pleased to see the Rev. I. D. Driver's back-down, as all the little fish of the Methodist church use him to try to terrorize their Liberal friends when driven to the wall in an argument. There is quite a strong Liberal element here, and I think that ere long we can organize and get to work in earnest. If I could only induce some of them to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, organization would soon follow. One satisfaction is that we are not bothered much by the clergy.

I am truly sorry to see Aunt Elmina in trouble, but don't think the bloodsuckers will be able to quite put her out of existence.

I will close this by saying that when Brother Putnam makes his next tour of this coast I will try to secure him for a lecture at this place. D. A. DODSON.

MT. PLEASANT, TEX., Oct. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I want to cheer our friend Kelso for his letter of September 1st, where he asks, "Is there any such thing as Liberalism?" My limited experience among Infidels is that there are very few Liberals. Of course, as they are mostly from Christian parentage and influenced by Christian intolerance, with which they come in contact every day, we would hardly expect them to be full-fledged Liberals. But surely there is such a thing as Liberals in the ranks. The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER keeps knocking along pretty close on to Liberalism. But a man may believe and advocate the Nine Demands and be anything but a Liberal. I know several who are working for the cause of Freethought (so they say) who would invite a Freelover to not come to their house with his teachings. It is to be hoped that time will giv us a great many genuin Liberals in the fullest sense. It is undoubtedly one of the isms most needed among Infidels to-day. Most of them hav so much orthodoxy in their system (inherited and otherwise) that they are as intolerant when they deal with extremists as any Christian would be dealing with the same parties. There is undoubtedly such a thing as Liberalism, but whether it is possible for many to be Liberals is a question that I think must at present be answered in the negativ.

Hoping to be truly Liberal is my greatest desire.

E. E. PARK.

SAN JOSÉ, CAL., Oct. 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the "tab" on my paper I hav got behind. Well, credit me up now as far as the inclosed $5 will go.

I take, besides your paper, the good old Investigator, the Ironclad Age, the Independent Pulpit, the Freethinker, Foote's Health Monthly; the Golden Gate (Spiritual), and hav the reading of a great many others published on this coast. My reading days are about over (most eighty-four), but I shall do what I feel able to help the cause of Freethought. If I cannot read your fine type and faint impression papers with my old and dim eyes I can hand them out, giv them away, send them by mail to distant friends in Oregon, Washington territory, Illinois, and Wisconsin, so that some may be induced to subscribe. All the Liberals throughout the country should contribute what they are able in sustaining free papers, free lectures, and free literature. I shall send with this mail $25 to our treasurer, Eckhard, which will help a little in paying the expenses of the Secular Union.

I am done scolding about your fine type and faint impression, as I find it does no good; but take your own course, do as you please, go ahead, keep the flag of Freethought fluttering, vanquish the hosts of superstition, explain the spiritual phenomena if you can, let in more light, and may you be abundantly successful in all youunder take, is the wish of yours, Most respectfully, SAMOS PARSONS.

TALENT, OR., Oct. 3, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2—for $1 send me the Nine Demands, and the other apply to the Defense Fund of Mrs. E. D. Slenker. The Liberals of this country ought to pay every cent of the cost of her trial. I do not agree with you when you say that no vital principle of Freethought is involved in the persecution of Mrs. E. D. Slenker. I think she strikes at the root of all reform. To start aright in the beginning is the right way. I want Liberalism to be liberal enough to hav a cheering word for all reforms. But, alas! it is not so at this place. With only a few exceptions they do not even take a Liberal paper, and, perhaps, if a Liberal lecturer comes along they will come and hear him speak providing it is not any more than once or twice a year. Their Liberalism has only taken them out of the church, and if you extend your Liberalism to the department of love and marriage, you are a Freelover. Yes, even if you speak for justice to the laboring classes they oppose you by boycotting and ostracism. Now, with Brother Kelso I would ask you, "What is Liberalism?" Can you tell us? If you can tell us you will confer a favor on one, perhaps more, of your readers.

I am sorry to hear that Brothers Remsburg and Putnam hav refused to debate with Braden; they hav too much of the old orthodox style: I am a saint and you are a sinner. I think the letters of Brothers Kelso, "Alhaza," and Jamieson are splendid. Whenever Brother Jamieson comes to this coast he will hav crowded houses. Liberalism needs a standard bearer who is not afraid to defend our cause even against Braden and his best friend (the devil). I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will always seek and advocate true reform in all the affairs of human life. WM. F. BREESE.

ONEIDA, KAN., Oct. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Noticing that a patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER writes to the Editor, in the issue of the 8th inst., that he is ashamed of the pollution of such "pictures" as are gotten up by your artist, reminds us of what Sam Jones said—namely, that you might throw a stone among a lot of dogs, and the one that is hit is the one that will yelp. Not comparing the "grumbler" to one of the dogs, of course, but we only use the comparison-like. We want to say that those pictures, especially the four that are to be seen on the front page of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 14th of May, 1887, are the most vivid illustrations of the way Romanism is creeping into our country, aided by Protestantism and our govermental officials, we hav ever seen. It should be enlarged, also, and placed on the other side of the entrance to the White House; and if Mr. Watson Heston illustrated the placing of the prince of the Catholic church of America (as he was denominated) on the occasion of the first Centennial celebration of our constitutional government, at which he was placed in a position when he could and did display the "red hat" and the balance of his papal vestments for all they were worth, that picture ought to be placed on the other side of the entrance, enlarged, that we constituents might gaze on them, in common with our Solons, from afar off. The balance of the pope's prelates that aided in the celebration on the occasion should occupy a prominent position in the picture. CYRUS SHINN (AMERICA).

ROCKPORT, MO., Oct. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: S. P. Putnam has been here, and delivered two lectures, one on "Universal Mental Liberty" and one on "True Democracy, the Declaration of Independence, and Their Relations to the Demands of Liberalism," and, notwithstanding the smallness of the audiences, Brother Putnam, in his own inimitable style, did full justice to those subjects, and a few of us, at least, hav a warm place under our vests for S. P. Putnam, secretary of the American Secular Union.

We had no time to advertise the lectures; our circuit court was in session; the Oddfellows had their lecturer here lecturing; and last, but not least, the church, with all its influence and prayer-meetings, and everything, with the whole combination of circumstances, contributed to our discomfiture; but, after all that, there were a few brave souls who dared to come and hear the truth, and were well pleased with the lectures, and say they want to hear Brother Putnam again.

There is enough of the leaven here, we think, to organize a Secular Union, and we are going to do it in the near future. The churches here are dying with dry-rot. The Baptist church is shut up, and has suspended business. Its last minister, the Rev. Menifee, was starved out because he refused to preach prohibition and politics, and we outsiders made him up a purse of $75, which enabled him to get away from here, and he lit out. The Methodist church takes the lead, and it is running off after Christian science and other strange gods. The Presbyterian church has no regular minister and no regular services; but, after all, this is the worst priest-ridden place I know of.

Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER family and all other Liberal friends success, I remain, as ever,

Yours truly, G. G. BECK.

GOLDTHWAITE, TEX., Oct. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: For some time past I hav been, through the kindness of a friend, enabled to read and study the principles set forth in THE TRUTH SEEKER. So forcible and pointed are they that I find the old numbers to me interesting and instructiv. However, it will not be long before I become a subscriber.

What is known as the M. E. C. S. hav been holding forth at this place for about one week, through two or three of their gifted Bible-bangers, the greater part of the audiences being the ladies and children. Such terrific outbursts hav been evoked as almost frightened the poor children into hysterics. The strongest manifestation of any good being accomplished was shown on the street the other day by the meeting of two of our best citizens, one being of Catholic persuasion, the other tainted with Campbellism, when the following dialog ensued:

Campbellite: Well, what did you think of the goings on last night?

Catholic: Ah, an' I don't believe in any such d—d humbug, begorra. My religion is this: "To visit the fatherless and the widow in their affliction, and to keep unspotted from the world."

Campbellite: You are mistaken in that quotation; you hav left out, "and administer unto their wants."

Catholic: Be dad, I'll bet you the whisky that arnt there.

"Done," says the Cambellite; and after a long search through the town the apostle of the pope returned with a Bible that might hav been in use in the church for half a century. "Now, begorra, we'll see who's right." The passage was found in James and the question settled in favor of the pope's follower.

The Campbellite made good his bet, and the two members of different denominations parted without following the example set by their churches (to wit), quarreling and fighting.

Moral: The Methodist meeting did hav the effect of driving these two reprobates to search the scriptures, but in place of eternal life, whisky was found.

We are in great need of some good Liberal lectures here. The hellfire and brimstone doctrin is about played out in this country; our people are beginning to think for themselvs. A LIBERAL.

HAVANA, ILL., Oct. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We hav been giving Liberalism a boom. On October 1st and 2d we had Dr. Gray ("Zoa Topsis"), of Beardstown, Ill., giv us two lectures to fair and appreciativ audiences. "The Superior Benefits of Secularism" was his first lecture. The doctor, since his evolution from orthodoxy into Liberalism, can see great benefits in Secularism. The second night his subject was "The Origin of the Bible." With this subject the doctor seemed to be perfectly at home. The audience listened very attentivly, and I am quite sure he put a great many of them to thinking about this Bible business. I am happy to say that we hav made arrangements with so able a lecturer as Dr. Gray to visit us once a month and giv us a course of lectures on Liberalism, and I wish to say to the Liberals of this vicinity that they can do no better good for Liberalism than to get Dr. Gray to come and giv them regular lectures. He is ready to answer any call you may giv him, and he is a good worker in the cause.

After the doctor had given orthodoxy a good shaking up, we had the pleasure on the following Tuesday night to hear Mr. C. B. Reynolds fire into the enemy's camp. He had a good and appreciativ audience composed of the leading men of the city. Could he hav been here the second night we would hav had the hall full of people. No one tired of listening to him. I think if he had talked until midnight his audience would hav remained to listen. Mr. Reynolds made lots of friends while here, and when he passes through this state next year he will hav to stop and giv us a course of lectures. We were sorry that he could not remain longer, but we will watch for him next time, and keep him a whole week with us. The unanimous opinion was that Mr. Reynolds is an able and competent lecturer. The Liberals along the route would better write to Mr. Reynolds at once and secure his services before it is too late. We came very near missing him. J. A. WEABER.

MILTONVALE, KAN., Oct. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As the time is out for our grand old pathfinder, THE TRUTH SEEKER, I ask that you suspend it until further orders, as I leave here to-morrow for the Pacific states, and know not where to hav it sent as yet.

This is a Christian country and a Christian government; the army of a hundred thousand drunkards going down to a premature grave; the millions of unhappy homes caused by utter ignorance of a true life; the immense number of prostitutes that walk our streets, both male and female, prostituting not only their sex, but their digestiv organs by gluttony and drink; their muscles and bones, brains, minds, all prostituted to gaining "filthy lucre," following fashion, maiming and killing each other, teaching an accursed, false religion, or giving damnable drugs and medicins, or plying the enginry of Christian law; making poisons, pistols, cannons, gunpowder, dynamite, bombs, dungeons, scaffolds, anything, everything to rob poor, ignorant, short-sighted man—yes, we liv in a Christian country and among Christian people that hav been following and teaching the Christian religion for nearly two thousand years.

A beautiful kaleidoscope, is it not? It is a wonder that the billions of so-called heathens do not all become Christians when the sweet picture is held up for their inspection. We are born with Christian blood in our veins, fed, as we grow older, on Christian food (blood and meat of the harmless dumb beasts), and on the body and blood of Jesus Christ at the sacramental or Lord's supper, as it is called, until we are all a race of cannibals, i.e., blood and meat eaters. Is it a wonder we thirst for the blood of the Anarchists and the criminals generally? Is it any wonder that among us bloodthirsty Christians we find the worst wars, the most murders, rapes, abortions, child murders, and crime and immorality of every description? If we sow the wind, we must expect to hav the whirlwind and cyclone. Visit our slaughterhouses and abattoirs, our pork and beef packing houses; see and smell the rivers of blood, flowing in a crimson stream from the hearts and vitals of our domestic animals; listen to their awful and piteous groans, as they cry for life and mercy; watch the terrible struggles in the agonies of death, or in their fight for life; then think, reflect that millions of these harmless creatures are slain every week, and hav been for centuries, that Christians may eat their quivering flesh, or drink their blood, and suck the marrow from their bones like cave-dwellers in prehistoric ages.

That conglomeration of absurdity, the Bible, teaches this shameful, awful wholesale slaughter of the kind, loving, intelligent animals all around us. Christianity will never elevate humanity (neither will Liberalism) out of the sway of the passions and appetites, until we learn to abstain from praying to a bloodthirsty God and believing that Jesus's blood can atone for every crime imaginable, and stop building up muscles, bones, brains—and souls, if we hav any, and it is doubtful, the way we liv and eat—out of the blood, flesh, and marrow of our near lower relativs.

Mother Nature has draped our swift-rolling planet with waving grain, clinging purple vine, and fruiting orchard; filled the bosom of our grand old earth with roots and tubers, all to be had for the taking. Then why sacrifice thousands of millions of lives of beast, fish, and fowl, that enjoy life as well as and better than ourselvs, making our beautiful world a theater of blood and carnage? Let Christianity step down and out, in disgrace and shame. Let the kingdom of God be heard of no more, with its bloody historic page. And let us hav the Republic of Man in its place, with no love for God, but a world of charity for ignorant, erring humanity. Let us build it of better and finer material than blood, nerve, and muscle as a food, and war, famin, pestilence, drunkenness, licentiousness, and murder will soon be eliminated from our wretched, sorrowing globe, and heaven, with its long-anticipated joys, will come to us, and life will be worth the living. DEWITT C. SEYMOUR.

BURNETT, NEB., Oct. 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I think you had better giv up the palm to Mr. Jamieson on the Clark Braden case. Your head is very level on nearly all subjects, but I think Jamieson has the better of you on that one. The point is this, as I see it: No matter how indifferent or how low a preacher may be in the scale of morality, some youth will hear him debate whom we could not get out to hear a Liberal lecture. As far as lying is concerned, how much is Braden ahead of all other educated ministers? If they are educated as they should be to fill the pulpit, they certainly know that what they are teaching is false. From my personal acquaintance with ministers, none of them is to be depended upon for truth and veracity when it comes to the religious subject. Nothing is too mean or low for them to do to carry their point; and if we wait to get a strictly honest preacher to debate with, it will be a long while before we ever get a chance to show up our side of the question to some of the Christians. The only object I can see in debate is to draw out an element that will not come to hear a lecture; and if a minister gets excited and uses harsh and unbecoming language in debate, it does our cause more good than it would if he confined himself strictly to argument. I think with Mr. Jamieson that our Liberal lecturers should ever hold themselvs in readiness to enter into debate with any Christian who is able to draw out any of the Christian element to hear him. I hav been instrumental in getting seven lectures delivered at Burnett, and I must say that I hav made a perfect failure in securing the attendance of any of those I most desired should come out. They talked as though it were a disgrace to go to hear a Liberal lecture.

Now, as bad a man as Clark Braden may be, a great many Christians think him far superior to any of our lecturers. I hav heard women here in this town—and respectable women, too—declare that Ingersoll ought not to be suffered to liv. The most of Christians think that all influential Liberals are the most dangerous men on earth. The most of them that I hav conversed with think that Ingersoll does not believe what he preaches, but is simply doing it for money. One Mormon preacher told me that Ingersoll acknowledged to another Mormon minister in conversation aboard of a train in Illinois that he did not believe what he preached, but that he preached what paid him best. This same man says the earth is flat, and that the sun revolves around it. The Bible says so, and he believes it, and he defies any man to prove to him that it doesn't. That is the kind of men and women we hav to deal with mostly. If they are not that ignorant on one subject, they are on most others. They don't know what is in their own Bible, for I never talked fifteen minutes with a man on the subject of religion who would not contradict passages that I would quote from it, and declare and offer to bet that I could not show them. My idea is to not discourage debating with any man that is able to draw out to hear him any one that would not come otherwise.

CHICAGO, ILL., Oct. 11, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Away off here I make out now and then to get a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and, with small exception, think it "the very best." To see the holy scriptures illustrated is a novelty, and, as I think, "catching."

It may be that you pay no attention to what people in this benighted section may think, but I assure you some of them feel. Looking over your "Letters from Friends" in your number of the 8th, I find one that signs himself "J. Downes," of date of September 23d. To my mind, Mr. Downes was not here when that famous bomb was thrown; nor has he heard the speeches made by the condemned Anarchists; nor has he been where he could read the violent articles written by them and published in their organs; nor has he been among them to know of what stuff they are made; nor has he read up the trial and evidence; nor does his mixing up "millionaires" and "monopolists" with the case indicate any knowledge whatever of the actual facts.

Having lived here long before and since all this ugly feature of the Anarchists, and knowing from the first to the present time of the intent of these people, I believe I can tell Mr. Downes of things in connection with the Anarchists that even he will call unlawful—always supposing that Mr. Downes is a loyal citizen.

I am a workingman, and think I can understand what oppression means, but, being a workingman, I do not think it just the thing to throw bombs at "millionaires" or "monopolists, because, first, millionaires and monopolists possess the money that keeps the wheels turning, and thus prevent millions from starving; and, second, it is utterly useless for mules to kick when by kicking they injure only themselvs.

Now, if Mr. Downes is a citizen, he has a ballot. If he has a ballot, he should know how to use it. His letter to your paper evidently shows that he needs "posting."

Violent speeches, as those of the condemned Anarchists, never accomplished any good. If there be a wrong, the people will suffer, but the people are at fault here in America for all evils that fall to them, because of their selection of representativs. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," so if the people of these United States of America are indifferent to the duties of a citizen, they must suffer for their own faults.

It is my advice to Mr. Downes that he let the Anarchists and all breakers of the Constitution hang, and pay closer attention to the subtle workings of the Roman Catholic church. If he looks, he will find that the Anarchist will do little damage or be little damaged, while in the mean time the Roman Catholic church, with their Jesuits, are stealthily drawing his and this government's life-blood. Perhaps he does not know it, but their pestiferous convents are the only places that this United States government has not yet entered without first giving notice to that intent. Mr. Downes should drop those few bloodthirsty Anarchists and look at the quiet but sure efforts of the Roman harlot to suppress the common school system. He should read up what he can find about the Jesuit snake that has been so finely illustrated in THE TRUTH SEEKER. No man livs but has some influence, and my hope is that Mr. Downes will hereafter use his in the right direction. BEN SMEAD.

OTTAWA, CAN., Oct. 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In spite of the assertions of over-confident Freethinkers that Christianity is doomed, it never was more powerful, never so alive, as at the present time—at least, in this part of the world. And I dare say it never accumulated money more rapidly than it does now. I hav been in this city six months, and I must say that I admire the cleverness of the church at money-making more and more every day. The Roman Catholics are like sponges in the hands of the priests; when these want money they hav but to squeeze, and, lo! liquid wealth pours out from the precious porifera. To illustrate, the Roman Catholic clergy organized last summer no less than three pilgrimages in this city to St. Anne de Beaupré, "the Canadian Mecca" of Roman Catholics. It is estimated that 35,000 or 40,000 people of Ottawa and vicinity attended these pious excursions. It is needless to say that if trade suffered thereby, the clergy turned a very nice penny, if not an honest one, from them. The city was drained of about $40,000 as a result, but what matters that? To show how knowing these priests are, it is but necessary to relate that one of them would not consent to organize one of these pilgrimages until after he had auctioned off the church seats, and pocketed the result. "I did so last year," he said, "and I am not yet paid for some of the seats I had to sell on time, the pilgrims spending more money on the journey than they can afford."

That which is most astonishing in connection with all this is that believers do not profit by experience. It is a noted fact that there never was an authenticated case of one single person being cured, but, on the contrary, many hav contracted diseases, while others hav died from the effects of discomfort, naturally attendant on such crowded excursions, yet the church has but to advertise one of them and thousands leave everything to obey the command.

The majority of your readers must be aware of the numerous accidents that annually occur at this shrine. I will relate but one, to show the tenderness and consideration St. Anne holds toward her devotees. A short time ago, several bishops and priests, as well as thousands of pious believers, congregated to crown St. Anne (a wooden statue) with a massiv gold crown, so costly that the price was not given to the public, the priesthood being fearful that if the price was known, sacrilegious thieves might be tempted to defy the power of this anti-Christian saint. As a matter of course, there was great rejoicing on this occasion, singing of hymns, booming of cannon, when, behold, one of the cannons exploded, maiming for life three fathers of families, devotees of the saint.

I heard some one remark on this occasion that St. Anne had repeatedly, by making a few of them ill, warned the fools to remain at home, but that as they were too thick-skulled to take the hint, she now tried to kill them outright. Last Sunday at the benediction of a bell (cost, $500), the donations from the faithful amounted to $3,000.

And some Freethinkers say the church is doomed! Not so. Freethought cannot be too activ, if it will overthrow the crafty and wealthy followers of the humble Galilean.

L. F. MATHÉ.

CONCORD, N. C., Oct. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Why am I not a Christian? To be a Christian, I must bury common sense and reason, which God has given me as a mariner's needle to warn me off the dangerous rocks of superstition, absurdities, and persecution. To be a Christian, I must believe the musty and rusty superstitions and myths of an illiterate and barbarous people who lived five, or, maybe, ten thousand years since. To be a Christian, I must believe that God made the world and all it contained in six days, when he became tired, exhausted, and rested the seventh day. To be a Christian, I must believe that God made the first man Adam of dust—made him in his own image; that God made the first woman Eve, not of dust or clay, nor in the image of God, but out of a rib of Adam. This was the first surgical operation on record. As Eve was not fashioned after the image of God, this may account for her getting angry with her maker, and tempting Adam with the forbidden fruit. Does anatomy prove that Eve was made from the rib of man? No. If such had been the fact, would not God hav giv us proof of that fact by a want of one rib in man to-day? To be a Christian, I must believe that God placed before Adam and Eve a temptation stronger than they had power to resist—a temptation to be equal with God. I fear this spirit to be equal with and superior to God has a deep hold on some—yes, many—of the learned men of to-day, including the clergy. To be a Christian, I must believe that God believed in man offering sacrifices, and delighting in the blood of beasts. To be a Christian, I must believe that God became angry with the inhabitants of the earth, Adam's seed, and sent a flood that covered the whole earth a mile deep, and destroyed all animals, fowls, and insects, and every human being, except Noah and his family and one pair of each kind of beasts, fowls, and insects. Does any intelligent, reasonable man or woman believe this fable? Would not God hav spared that part of his creation that knew no sin? To be a Christian, I must believe that God encouraged theft, directing the children of Israel to borrow jewels of silver and gold and raiment from a people they never expected to see (Exod. iii, 22) before they ferried the Red Sea on foot. Their journey of forty years in a territory less in area than Texas is a romance that puts a blush on a Texas cowboy. To be a Christian, I must believe that the ten commandments were written by the finger of God on Mount Sinai, as a guide to Moses and Joshua's little band—a band of murderers and cutthroats—when they entered the land of Canaan, equal to or worse than the James gang or the Baldknobers of the West. To be a Christian, I must believe that God encouraged polygamy as practiced by Jacob and Solomon, and sanctioned the adultery of David and the incest of Lot. To be a Christian, I must not forget and must believe the story of Joshua's influence over God when he wanted to thrash the Amorites, and asked God to stop the sun and moon one day that he might slay the Amorites as he had slain the men of other tribes, and God hearkened to his entreaties. To sum all in all of Bible teachings and be a Christian, I must be an idiot, and believe all the nonsense, myths, and fables of the Old and New Testaments, and pay the preachers of such nonsense liberally, so they can liv in ease and luxury without working. The Jews crowned one man with thorns, but these preachers of ancient fables and myths strew the paths of all who differ with them in their theology with thorns and cobblestones, hoping that all such persons may fall into the bottomless pit.

J. W. MEHAFFEY.

TORONTO, ONT., Oct 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Orthodox and gloomy Toronto has received a shock—a shock similar to that given a few years ago by Colonel Ingersoll at the Grand Opera House—by the advent of Mr. Wong Chin Foo, the noted author of "Why I Am a Heathen," in the North American Review recently, who has had the audacity to inform a large Toronto audience that he still remains a heathen. The lecture was extensivly advertised by the Toronto press previous to his arrival, so that a large audience assembled to hear the celebrated heathen, thinking no doubt that he would giv some pointers to intending missionaries to that benighted land, but, strange to say, the lecture was the other way. Wong Chin Foo commenced by saying that until Christianity proved its superiority to Confucianism, it would never succeed in China. The Chinese could never believe it ever was necessary to kill a god in order to take away their sins. As the doings of Jesus are not recorded between the age of fourteen and thirty, it is probable he studied the wisdom of the East, or came into contact with some of the Eastern philosophers, and incorporated their wisdom into Christianity, which is full of the teachings of Confucius, practiced in China thousands of years before the Christian era. "Do unto others as ye would they do unto you" was taught by Confucius before Christ was ever heard of, and when Christian Englaud was in a state of barbarism the social life of the Chinese was far more humane than that of Christians. The finger of an aged man had more effect on the youths of China than the clubs of policemen hav upon Christian youths. Christian missionaries rarely got an intelligent Chinaman to become a convert to Christianity, their converts were of the illiterate and unthinking class. And although Christian missionaries hav labored for forty years in China, their success among that immense body of people has been far from flattering. Christianity is puffed up too much, and the philosophy of the heathens is either not read or unfairly condemned. Wong Chin Foo studied the Bible with the intention of preaching the "glad tidings" to his fellow-countrymen, but he found the grand precepts contained in that book nearly word for word the same as taught by Confucius, and already known throughout the Chinese empire; besides, he found the orthodox idea was that those who never heard of Christianity would be saved, and it would hav been positivly dangerous to giv his countrymen an opportunity to get damned by refusing their belief in the Lord Jesus Christ. In America a man was considered to be a good citizen if he belonged to a church; in China a man's good conduct, and not his religious belief, as the qualification for a good citizen. In Christian countries everyone is trying to get ahead, and all appear to be perfectly indifferent to the misery they occasion others in their efforts to succeed. The ambition in life is to accumulate gold—an ambition that is the very essence of selfishness, which, as a rule, only ends with the grave. The Chinese heathenism teaches him a very different method of existence. When the head of the family has made a decent competency he hands his business over to his eldest son, and so on through the family.

Wong Chin Foo described minutely the peculiar social customs of his country, which appeared to be far in advance of ours, and provoked repeated applause.

Considerable excitement prevailed while the lecturer read the excommunication curse of the Roman Catholic church, which he characterized as the most horrible curse the human mind ever conceived, and in indignant tones asked, "What would you Christians think if heathens formulated such a curse as that?"

The speaker was listened to with great attention, and spoke for nearly two hours, answering questions at the finish of his address.

A considerable number of Freethinkers were present, and enjoyed immensely the "points" of Wong Chin Foo.

The newspapers, with one exception, instead of reporting the lecture, devoted the little space they gave the Chinaman to sarcastic remarks about his personal appearance, and one very Christian paper publicly gave the names of the promoters of the lecture (although requested not to do) saying: "These gentlemen are responsible for the preaching of heathenism to a Toronto audience!" What a terrible crime, to be sure! How tolerant these Christians are when in the majority! If a missionary got insulted in China they would denounce the barbarism of the heathen, and petition the government for redress, smiled a royal welcome to the many earnest thinkers who had met together to propose plans for the work of the ensuing year. The call had been for a business congress only, but the local society of Chicago determined to make it as much of a success as possible. It congratulates itself that what it proposed to do it accomplished.

Wong Chin Foo had to pay $50 to pass into Canada.

GEO. WILLIAMS.

Numbers of delegates were present from all over the country, especially from the great West; and these all seemed to be vieing with one another as to which should be the most earnest and self-sacrificing in his devotion to our cause. Gray-haired old men, their eyes afire with the enthusiasm of youth, and voices tremulous with feeling, spoke of the time when in all the town, or perhaps in all the county, they had been the only Freethinkers, the only ones who dared to speak for truth. And to-day they had met in this great city, delegates to an organization representing one hundred thousand members. They no longer stood alone. They held no longer the forlorn hope. The grandest, brightest thinkers in the nation had come to the front, and high up, side by side with their own, had written their names, subscribing to the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

The proceedings throughout were characterized by the most complete harmony, "Peace on earth and good-will to men" being the prevailing sentiment.

At the afternoon session in Madison-street Theater the president, Courtlandt Palmer, produced a most favorable impression by his candid, thoughtful words and the dignity and courtesy of his manner. Mr. Palmer has made for himself a warm place in every Liberal heart, and will not soon be forgotten. Even the Chicago papers, which are not predisposed to anything like justice when considering the Union or its work, recognized the ability of the gentlemanly young president, and acknowledged his honesty and worth.

Judge Waite's address was received by the audience with the warmest applause.

Mr. Samuel P. Putnam spoke on "Dangers Ahead." He was glad that Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Helen Gardener, and others were getting up a "Woman's Bible;" he had no doubt that it would be immensely superior to the men's Bible that had been responsible for the woman's degradation. Susan B. Anthony had called it the "he" book. One of the most palpable dangers ahead was the movement to place God in the Constitution. The success of this would overthrow the Declaration of Independence and American liberties. He denounced in unstinted terms the tyranny of the Sunday laws, and said that the American people submitted to infringements on their personal rights which no subject of a European monarch would endure. The church cared nothing for the working people, only for the money they paid into its coffers. She never started a single reform. Poverty was the supreme problem. Christianity had never made a move to do away with this tremendous evil. He hated poverty. The hope that Christianity gave was, "the poor ye hav always with you." The hope of the Secular Union was that a universal fraternity would take the place of the grinding curse. The union of church and state meant a blind, fanatical feeling combined with the sword. There was no feeling like theological hatred. Theology was organized ignorance, and that was the church. If the church were supreme in the state, there would be no hope of human advancement. The Liberals wanted a separation of religion from all physical force. Their ideal was a free exercise of intellect and a harmony of the inner with the outer life. Mr. Putnam spoke with the earnestness of conviction, and with force and power that showed his whole soul was in his work, and concluded his address amid the long-continued applause of the audience. At the conclusion of the lecture President Palmer, who made a most excellent presiding officer, being always ready with anecdote, wit, and personal reminiscence to enliven the occasion, related an interview with Charles Bradlaugh, in which he asked if much interest was taken in the Union in England. "No," answered Mr. Bradlaugh, "unless there is an issue, and then there is a great gathering of the clans." Mr. Palmer thought that impending danger of a union of church and state in this country should bring the one hundred thousand members of the American Secular Union together into one grand body to combat the danger.

The evening session was quite largely attended. Herr Julius Vohlteich, ex-member of the German Reichstag, gave an address in German. He spoke with enthusiasm, and the applause was frequent, loud, and long. It is to be regretted that no translation of his speech was furnished, as it would no doubt be excellent reading, judging from the delight with which it was received by our German friends.

It is embarrassing to refer so often to the applause of the audience, but those present will bear testimony to the fact that it was a most enthusiastic audience, and unstinted in its appreciation.

A lecture on "His Satanic Majesty" by the unfortunate secretary of the Chicago Secular Union transcribing these proceedings closed the program for the evening.

On Sunday morning a number of friends and delegates met in the hall of the Secular Union to listen to reports of the officers and committees. Charles Reynolds presented the report of Treasurer Charles Eckhard. Some little discrepancies were referred to, and George Collins, of the Chicago society, asked for an explanation, saying that our secretary, like Cæsar's wife, should be above suspicion. President Palmer arose and said that the explanation rested with him. At the time he accepted his office he had been too indisposed to attend to its duties. The accounts had been left with his clerk, of whose honesty he was perfectly assured; but through inadvertence some receipts or something had not been entered. If there was any fault in the matter it was his own, and not Mr. Putnam's. He added, laughingly, that he did not think the officers of the American Secular Union had made any money out of their positions. Mr. Putnam said he had not always obtained vouchers for money paid out.

Mr. Palmer was urged most earnestly by the committee to accept a renomination for president, but positivly declined, stating that he felt it best that a worker should be selected to represent the Union, and strongly recommended Mr. Putnam for that place, considering that his devotion in the past indidicated that he was the one best man to carry the work into the future.

The afternoon session was opened in the Madison-street Theater by the newly-elected president of the American Secular Union, Samuel P. Putnam. The Aurora Turner Singing Section, composed of twenty-five magnificent male voices, furnished the music. They were recalled again and again. They are members of the Turner societies, whose demands are identical with our own, and we of Chicago do not see why we should not work together for the attainment of our grand object.

Miss Voltairine de Cleyre, late editor of the Progressive Age, gave an address on "Secular Education." She treated her subject with intelligence and familiarity, having been educated in the tenets of the Roman Catholic faith, graduating with high honors from a Catholic seminary. The young lady wears a gold medal, conferred upon her as a distinction for the high honors she had attained. Her address was pointed, brilliant, and dramatic. The audience evinced its appreciation by oft-repeated applause. Miss de Cleyre is also a finished musician, and enlivened every session of the Congress by an excellent performance on the piano. She promised her lecture for publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it will no doubt soon make its appearance.

Following was an address from Prof. Charles Orchardson on "Morality of Christian Teachers." This is a subject with which the professor is perfectly familiar; and, combining his remarks with scientific facts, his illustrations are most entertaining. The professor excels in sarcasm, and kept his audience in delightful expectancy, appreciating most thoroughly the brilliant hits he gave again and again to opponents. He doesn't spare even himself in his illustrations. The writer is more considerate, and will not repeat his well-told story of Elisha and the bears.

Mr. E. A. Stevens, the newly-elected secretary of the American Secular Union, was then introduced, and spoke on "God in the State." This is a lecture which should be read by every man and woman in America. It is a most thorough refutation of the oft-repeated assertion that there is no danger in this country, that we hav a separation of church and state. It bristles with hard facts well told, pointed illustrations, and is a sharp, incisiv, and brilliant arraignment of the insidious, fanatical power which is leaving no stone unturned to rob the people of this American Republic of their liberties. Mr. Stevens was often interrupted with applause, and his audience listened intently to his words as though startled into an appreciation of the danger and of the need of earnest, aggressiv work on the part of the American Secular Union.

On Sunday evening, the last session of the Congress, the theater was filled with an intelligent, brilliant audience, made up of the thinkers of the great metropolis of the West. President Putnam, in a very happy speech, introduced the retiring president of the American Secular Union and president of the Nineteenth Century Club, Courtlandt Palmer, who spoke on the "Aristocracy of Freethought." The lecture was a well-worded, dignified production, characterized by the grace inherent in its author.

The aristocracy of Freethought, the incoming chivalry, it was soon apparent, were not to be the brigands of money, the accidents of birth, or the representativs of power, but the possessors of true moral worth and intellectual greatness. In the old chivalry men must be brave. In the new they must be true—true to right; devotees to principle.

Many inquiries were made as to whether the lecture was published. It should be, as it would make a desirable addition to Freethought literature, and fit into a place that seems to hav been left vacant on purpose to be thus filled. The lecture was given amid great applause, the audience evincing the most enthusiastic appreciation. It seemed to comprehend instinctivly the worth of the man who, in defiance of the conventionalities of his training, dares to stand bravely forth as an apostle for right and truth and liberty. He showed that he himself was one of the new nobility, the coming aristocracy of Freethought.

Mrs. Juliet H. Severance, M.D., was to follow Mr. Palmer, but was unable to be present, much to the regret of her many admirers, having been detained in Minneapolis, where she had been sent as a delegate to the Knights of Labor Convention. Your humble servant, secretary Chicago Secular Union, made a short speech, and President Putnam presented the resolutions prepared by the committee to the Congress.

With a few forcible, brilliant words, eulogizing Col. Robert Ingersoll for his demand in New Jersey that our flag should be placed above the cross, the president introduced Chas. B. Reynolds. Mr. Reynolds in his remarks was bright, witty, and satirical. He kept his audience convulsed with laughter, giving some inimitable imitations of himself, perhaps, when he was an Adventist preacher and plied his mission of saving souls.

The Chicago Congress was a pronounced success—the best held, it was said, for several years—and the various delegates from the different localities, scattered through the length and breadth of the land, protested again and again that they wouldn't hav missed it for any consideration whatever.

President Putnam generously called attention to the Freethought papers, urging Liberals to sustain them—THE TRUTH SEEKER, Boston Investigator, Secular Thought, Freethinkers' Magazine, Progressive Age, and so on. A number of copies of Secular Thought, sent by Chas. Watts, were given away among the audience.

It was nearly 11 o'clock when, after much handshaking and leave-taking, the audience dispersed, promising to meet again the next year, should the Congress be held in this Garden City of the West—Chicago.

Died.

At his residence in Greeley, Kan., October 12th, Major Joseph Henry, aged 74 years. Funeral on the 13th.

At the residence of Mrs. S. L. Clark, Newport, Maine, Seward Mitchell, aged 74 years. The following letter explains the painful circumstances:

"NEWPORT, ME., Oct. 19.

"EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Seward Mitchell passed away October 17th. His death was caused by a very painful accident. He was taken ill in the night, got up from his bed with his lamp in his hand, but fainted and set fire to his night clothes; was so badly burnt that it caused his death in one week from the time of the accident. He was a very great sufferer, but bore it with patience and resignation. His funeral was conducted in accordance with his wishes. A poem from Whittier was read by one of his friends and a few remarks made; also singing by acquaintances, 'When the mists hav cleared away,' and 'Nearer, my God, to thee.' Everything was done for him by his friends that love, tenderness, and good nursing could do. His daughter was summoned at once, and was with him to the last. He was 74 years of age. He will be greatly missed by those who knew him best. Respectfully, MRS. SUSAN L. CLARK."

Feeding the Family Stock of Vanity.

George Standring Among His Exchanges with the Radical.

First let us take THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York, which arrives every Monday morning. Here is a goodly-sized sheet, with a large cartoon on its front page, and a smaller one on its back—making it look something like a sandwich-man fixed between his boards. The number which you now hold is the 36th of the 14th volume. THE TRUTH SEEKER was founded by my dear old friend D. M. Bennett; and since his death, in 1882, it has been carried on by his "young man," Eugene M. Macdonald. Eugene is a very smart and able editor, and keeps his paper well up to the times. He is, of course, an uncompromising Freethinker, and always keeps his anti-theological doctrins to the front. A few years ago he introduced the feature of cartoons into his pages, and apparently has been satisfied with the result, as he has regularly continued them. They are invariably drawn by Watson Heston, and, despite a certain crudity of style and occasional heresies in the matter of perspectiv, they are on the whole well designed and executed. Eugene is an Individualist of the militant type, and sometimes he crosses swords with Benjamin R. Tucker, the Anarchist editor of Liberty. Let me call your attention to the writings of a genuin humorist, George Macdonald (brother of Eugene). He reports the meetings of the Liberal Club, and—alas! too rarely—he contributes delicious articles of a more ambitious nature.

From the Home Advocate, Mapleton, Iowa.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York, is a leader of the Liberal movement, and its editor, E. M. Macdonald, is one of the intellectual forces that are revolutionizing the religious sentiment of our states-republic.

IF the church expects to win a victory over the columns of Infidelity, so rapidly recruiting and bringing to bear the strongest weapons of argument, it will need to march against them with something more effectiv than the pop-gun of sentiment and the blank charges of threadbare phrases easily rolled off the tongue. Its writers and its speakers, its journalists and its pulpit orators, will hav to fight as if they meant business, and were not play soldiers, kept for show on a holiday. Religious namby-pambyism is out of date.—The Better Way.

THERE is a chance for a bright boy—from fifteen to eighteen years old—to learn the printing trade at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. He must be able to read manuscript.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Great Man.

That man is great, and he alone,
Who serves a greatness not his own
For neither praise nor pelf;
Content to know and be unknown,
Whole in himself.

Strong is that man, he only strong,
To whose well-ordered will belong,
For service and delight,
All powers that, in face of wrong,
Establish right.

And free he is, and only he,
Who, from his tyrant passion free,
By fortune undismayed,
Hath power upon himself to be,
By himself, obeyed.

If such a man there be, where'er
Beneath the sun and moon he fare,
He cannot fare amiss.
Great Nature hath him in her care,
Her cause is his.

The Trials of a Schoolmistress.

Teacher (in mental arithmetic): If there were three peaches on the table, Johnny, and your little sister should eat one of them, how many would be left?

Teacher: Now listen, Johnny. If there were three peaches on the table, and your little sister should eat one, how many would be left?

Johnny: We ain't had a peach in the house this year, let alone three.

Teacher: We are only supposing the peaches to be on the table, Johnny.

Johnny: Then they wouldn't be real peaches!

Teacher: No.

Johnny: Would they be preserved peaches?

Teacher: Certainly not.

Johnny: Pickled peaches?

Teacher: No, no. There wouldn't be any peaches at all, as I told you, Johnny; we only suppose the three peaches to be there.

Johnny: Then there wouldn't be any peaches, of course.

Teacher: Now, Johnny, put that knife in your pocket or I will take it away, and pay attention to what I am saying. We imagin three peaches to be on the table.

Johnny: Yes.

Teacher: And your little sister eats one of them and then goes away.

Johnny: Yes, but she wouldn't go away until she had finished the three. You don't know my little sister.

Teacher: But suppose your mother was there, and wouldn't let her eat but one.

Johnny: Mother's out of town, and won't be back till next week.

Teacher (sternly): Now, Johnny, I will put the question once more, and if you do not answer it correctly I shall keep you after school. If three peaches were on the table, and your little sister were to eat one of them, how many would be left?

Johnny (straightening up): There wouldn't be any peaches left. I'd grab the other two.

Teacher (touching the bell): The scholars are now dismissed. Johnny White will remain where he is.

A Little Boy's Temperance Speech.

Some people laugh and wonder
What little boys can do
To help this temperance thunder
Roll all the big world through:
I'd hav them look behind them,
When they were small, and then
I'd like just to remind them
That little boys make men!

The bud becomes a flower,
The acorn grows a tree,
The minutes make the hour—
'Tis just the same with me.
I'm small, but I am growing
As quickly as I can;
And a temperance boy like me is bound
To make a temperance man.

Panacea for Trouble.

Life is filled with trouble, as a writer in Our Homes has said, and we must shoulder our share with the best grace we can. We may only seek to make them as light as we can, since to avoid them is impossible.

There is one sovereign panacea for this. It is work. Brooding over trouble is like surrounding oneself with a fog. It magnifies all objects seen through it. Occupation of the mind prevents this; hard work, manual work even, givs the mind other matters of concern, tires the body so that sleep will come.

Very few suicides occur when men are activly employed. When out of work, they think of their other troubles, and the despondency arising from this added one throws the mind from its balance, and the fatal deed is done. Many a man would hav committed suicide if he had had the time. Work of any kind, especially work for others, is the great panacea for a troubled mind.

Little Jack.

A winter day hung o'er the earth,
And filled our childish hearts with mirth;
For on the newly fallen snow
The sunbeams lay, like gems aglow.

Along the lake shore, by the mill,
We children coasted on the hill,
And, with our voices full of glee,
We woke the echoes glad and free.

My heart was full of selfish pride,
As down the long hill's sunny side,
With merry shout, I swiftly sped
Upon my gayly-painted sled.

And, toiling up the hill once more,
I heard a plaintiv voice implore,
"Oh, won't you let me hav a ride?"
I roughly pushed the boy aside.

I crossly bade him clear the track,
And struck at him—poor little Jack!
The next I saw him, cold he lay,
A pallid piece of lifeless clay.

This was long, weary years ago,
Yet when I see new fallen snow
Regretful memory brings back
The pleading voice of little Jack.

Correspondence.

ARMSTRONG, IOWA, Oct. 6, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I was sorry to think that your mother is dead. I think I know how I would feel if my own mother was dead. My brothers and I hav sent for "Little Lessons for Little Folks." We are going to send for "The Story Hour." J. E. Remsburg has come and gone. The Christians raised a howl because the black man has been among them. I was glad to see a letter from his boy, and feel like shaking hands with him. I like the Children's Corner very much. Your little Freethinker friend,

A Piece of Granit.

Just a small piece or slice of granit, that you can hold in your hand—but what a story it tells! What a song it sings! What a history it reveals!

How hard and firm it is! and how it glistens!

You want to know what it is composed of, don't you? Well, let us see.

You sit still and listen, and let me do the talking.

Why is it called granit?

There is an Italian word grano, and it signifies grain, or like grain, and if you observe the piece of granit, it looks like packed grains, hence its name—granit. In this piece there are crystals of quartz, mica, and feldspar. The quartz looks like glass, but it will not cleave and separate, as the grayish mica does, in thin layers. The feldspar is the yellowish-white, but sometimes it is gray or pink.

Ah, here is a bit of hornblende—it is that speck of greenish-black substance.

This piece came from a quarry a short distance from my home, where a great number of tons of granit hav been taken out.

You want to know how it is taken out. I'll tell you. A number of men go into the quarry and patiently drill holes where a block is to be taken, to the depth of three or four to six inches; then they pound iron wedges into the holes between laps of steel, and then the wedges are soundly tapped with a hammer, and in this way big blocks are split off from the solid rock, fifty or more feet in length.

Some think that granit is the first or original rock, that is, the oldest rock. But this is a mistake, for there are rocks below the lowest granit formations, though we may say that the earth's big cellar is formed of granit.

In some localities there is a great deal of this sort of rock, notably in New England. In the city where I liv (Fall River, Mass.) there are several quarries of granit, and it seems to be all over the place, so that it is met with in digging foundations for houses, and other buildings, in laying water, gas, and sewer pipes. The large cotton mills here are built of granit taken from our quarries, and one long block of stores on Main street is built of the same material, and is known as the "Granit Block."

There is a lovely shade of red granit found in Scotland, and also in this country, in Maine and New Brunswick.

It varies in texture in various parts of the world, some of it being very fine and handsome; sometimes it is found extending for a long distance without a single seam.

It may interest you to know that the big granit pillars in front of the Astor House in New York were shipped from Quincy, Mass., where they were quarried, and taken to New York by my father in his vessel when he was a follower of the sea. Granit lasts a long time, and can be highly polished, so as to shine and glisten in the sunbeams like smooth glass.

For building purposes it stands in the first rank. The Egyptians prized it highly, and used it in building their obelisks and pyramids. There are still standing in Egypt towering granit pyramids known to be three thousand years old, and some whose age is unknown. But we read that

The granit rocks disorganize
To feed the hungry moss they bear;

And after awhile they crumble and fade to dust, a part of the change that is written upon all things that we see. S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—From what word does granit receive its name? Of what is it composed? How is granit taken from its bed in the quarry? Is granit the primitiv or first rock in the world's formation? In what localities is granit found? Where is found the red granit? Does it vary in texture? What about the pillars of the Astor House? What is granit used for? What can you say of its durability?

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

THE STRUGGLE
FOR
Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

THE Rev. Mr. Millen, of Brooklyn, is found guilty of immorality; also Pastor Decker, of the same city. Pastor Gulick, likewise of Brooklyn, charged with crooked financiering, and the Rev. Brother Azarias, of Washington, accused of immoral letter-writing, had better luck, and are "vindicated."

THE Chicago Anarchists will hav a hearing before the Supreme Court of the United States.

HENRY GEORGE has started a one-cent daily for campaign purposes. It is called the Argus.

IN a quarrel, Oct. 21st, at Magnolia, Ark., between the Rev. E. M. Williams and Thomas Decker, the former was fatally stabbed.

THE Universalists hav just held a convention in this city. A motion to amend their Confession of Faith was laid over until the next convention.

THE Rev. Thomas B. Miller was last Friday convicted in Philadelphia of causing the death of Mrs. Sarah E. Robinson by criminal malpractice on June 26th last, and was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment in the Eastern penitentiary.

THE case against the managers of the Anti-poverty Society's fair, charged with conducting a lottery, has been dismissed. There are too many managers of church fairs tarred with the same stick. The decision, however, does not reimburse the fair for the loss of money caused by stopping the sale of chances.

THE Progressiv Labor party has put John Swinton is nomination for senator from the seventh senatorial district.

THE Long Island Baptist Association has decided that it cannot accept certain moneys offered it by the city of Brooklyn, because the money comes from the licensing of liquor saloons. The association has set a good example of the kind it did not contemplate. Religious institutions hav no right to public money, whether drawn from licenses or any other source.

THE printers' strike is in an unsettled condition. The union demands that employers shall discharge all men not belonging to the Typographical Union, together with all who hav worked since the strike in offices where the scale is not enforced. Employers announce their willingness to pay the advanced price, but decline to allow the union to say whom they shall employ.

THE Rev. Father Kirney, a Roman Catholic priest, secured a permit to erect a two-story building for a parochial school in the upper part of this city. He superintended the work himself, and, in violation of the law, ran the structure up three stories. The work was so flimsily done that one day last week, before the building was completed, it fell on the priest and killed him, together with a half dozen workmen.

THE Association for the Advancement of Women began its fifteenth congress in the Masonic Temple, New York, on Wednesday. The object of the congress is to consider the best methods for securing to women a higher intellectual, moral, and physical condition, and for the improvement of the domestic relations. The first congress was held in the Union League Theater in 1873. Mrs. Julia Ward Howe is the president.

SUIT was entered by the United States in the United States Circuit court last Friday against the trustees of Holy Trinity church for violating the Contract Labor law by importing the Rev. E. Walpole Warren under a labor contract to preach the gospel. The penalty fixed by law is a fine of $1,000. The steamship company which knowingly transports persons under contract is also liable. The defendants hav twenty days in which to file their answer.

Gems of Thought.

EVERYONE'S duty is first to provide for himself and for his own household, but this being performed faithfully a love for humanity is the next highest and holiest sentiment he can feel. Humanity is our highest object of reverence.—D. M. Bennett.

WE fancy, in our dark days, that no other heart ever felt what we feel. There was a man who directed that when he was buried his grave-stone should bear no record of his name or history, but just the single word, "Miserrimus"—"most wretched," and he sleeps under the pavement of one of the great cathedrals of England, with that one word to mark the place. You see there, my friends, the natural feeling which you yourselvs hav known, but you may be sure it is wrong. It is not now, after the tribulation of ages, that any human soul can reach that sad pre-eminence.—Counsel and Comfort by the Country Parson.

THE trustees of a college do not ask their professor of chemistry to sign a creed, not even the smallest. What they do is to assure themselvs by inquiry and conference with him that he knows his subject, and is the right sort of a man for a teacher, and then they engage him, leaving him, as they would say, entire liberty in his lectureship. And yet if he were suddenly to announce that he had come to believe in the non-existence of matter and the delusivness of phenomena, and that henceforth he should only use the laboratory as a gymnasium, or a smoking-room, certainly the trustees would say that they must look out for another man, and nobody would cry out that they were not allowing him that free lectureship on chemistry which they promised him.—Brooke Herford.

THERE were one or two sayings uttered by the prince which much impressed Ivan at the time, and which long afterward lingered in his memory. "The greatest man of this age, my young friend, would be the man who should know everything, and yet hold his tongue." Another of the prince's sayings was, "Above all things, do not be anxious to shine; if shine you must, let it be in broad daylight, not when all around you is dark. The glow-worm has the shortest life of all insects."—Ivan de Biron, by the author of Friends in Council.

To each his sufferings: all are men,
Condemned alike to groan;
The tender for another's pain,
The unfeeling for his own.
Yet, ah! why should they know their fate,
Since sorrow never comes too late,
And happiness too swiftly flies?
Thought would destroy their paradise.
No more; where ignorance is bliss,
'Tis folly to be wise. —Gray's Eton College.

THERE was nothing easy-going or complacent in Channing's doctrin of the dignity of human nature. It did not mean the actual dignity of human character. . . . When he spoke of the dignity of human nature, it was its possibilities, not its actual results, he had in mind. And how he loved to speak of it! How he rejoiced in all the powers and manifestations of man's intellectual life; in the capacity for affection latent in every soul! In what awe he stood before the inspirations of conscience! This search for truth, the law of right within us, this hunger of the soul for God—how he bowed down and worshiped when he thought of all these things! But his worship never ended in complacency. The more he thought of what a man might be, "how noble in reason, how infinit in faculties, in action how like an angel, in apprehension how like a god"—the more he thought of this, the more terrible it seemed to him to fall short of this beatitude; the more dark seemed every stain on such a spirit; the more ignoble for it to rest in error; the more monstrous any crime against its liberty.—J. W. Chadwick.

MATERIALISTS [by which term Mr. Underwood here means the sort of persons who go by many other names, such as Secularists, Scientists, Agnostics, and generally Infidels, that is, unbelievers in any alleged revelation.—Hylax.] believe that true worship, if the term may be used, consists in living an honest life, and trying to make ourselvs and our fellow-beings better and happier. We confess we do not profess to love a being we know nothing about, but among our own species we can find objects worthy of our deepest affections. We do not speak the praise of a being of whom we hav no proof, but we render homage to genius and worth in humanity. We never thank an unknown something or somebody for our misfortunes, but we hold to a philosophical resignation to the harshest decrees of nature, if they cannot be averted or avoided. For religion, we substitute morality; for prayer, self-reliance; for love of God, love of man a tender regard for everything that feels, in common with us, the consciousness of existence.—Underwood's Materialism and Christianity.

REASON must be our last guide and judge in everything.—Locke.

JOSEPH CAST INTO THE PIT.

And they took him, and cast him into a pit: and the pit was empty, there was no water in it.—Gen. xxxvii, 24.

Odds and Ends.

A WIFE famin prevails in the far Northwest. What that country needs is cheap railway communication with Massachusetts.

MINISTER: "And do you like to go to church with your papa and mamma, Bobby?" Bobby (inclined to be non-commital): "Well, I guess I like it as well as pa does."

LIPS, however rosy, must be fed;
Songs, however airy, must be hushed;
Books, however sinful, must be read;
Hair, however auburn, must be brushed.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher (speaking of the conscience): "After you hav done something which you ought not to do, what is it, Bobby, that makes you feel so uncomfortable and unhappy?" Bobby: "Pa."

"GEORGE," she said, and her manner betrayed anxiety, "what has come over papa of late? He treats you coldly and evidently tries to avoid you." "He borrowed $10 of me a couple of weeks ago," explained George.

THERE was nothing new in "The Old, Old Story" for a little girl who had been unfortunate in her demands for a story. "Well, my little one, what shall it be about?" asked the tormented. "Oh, tell me 'bout anythin' 'cept Jesus. Gran'ma's told me all there is 'bout him," replied Tot.

THE king of Spain is seventeen months old and only gets $1,000,000 a year. But if he sticks to business and gets around to the throne early in the morning, and only takes twenty minutes for lunch, and doesn't knock off before dark, there is no reason why he shouldn't hav his salary raised.

A GRATEFUL animal. Some years ago a fellow in Grand Forks, Dakota, who was running for sheriff went out hunting. He came across a bear who couldn't move on account of a thorn in his foot, and taking compassion on the animal he pulled the thorn out. To show his gratitute, darned if the sagacious animal didn't go and eat up the other two men that were running opposition to his benefactor for sheriff, leaving that gentleman a clear field.

WE heard the other day of a young minister who was "taken down" very handsomely by a bright little girl. He had been called upon quite unexpectedly to address a Sunday-school, and to giv himself time to collect his thought he asked a question. "Children," said he, "what shall I speak about?" A little girl on the front seat who had herself committed to memory several declamations, held up her hand, and in a shrill voice asked, "What do you know?"

FEMALE suffrage agent: "I called to see if I could not induce you to join our suffrage association, Mrs. Politician." Mrs. Politician: "Indeed I will. I was opposed to the whole business until I happened to attend a mass meeting last evening, and now I want a vote just as quick as the law will let me." "Yes, I saw you there with your husband. He seems to be very popular. But nothing was said at that meeting about woman suffrage. What changed you so suddenly?" "It just occurred to me that if I had a vote my husband would be polite to me during every campaign."

REV. MOSES BLACK concluded his able sermon Sunday night as to wit: "No, bredren; yer kaint sarve God and mammon bofe. Dat's as suah as twice two am fouh. Doan make yese'fs slaves ter money in dis hier free country. Ef yer expec ter gain eternal salwation and sleep in the ams ob de Lawd doan wo'ship mammon, fur mammon am money, an' de wust kind ob money. Gib yer lub to de Lawd an' yer mammon to his sarvant, which stan's afore yer widout a cent in his pocket fur ter keep his body and soul togedder. Brudder Johnsing will now pass de conterbution hat, an' doan yer furgit de woice of de Lawd."

"WILL you be mine?" said the ardent youth;
"No, no," the maiden said,
As she looked at him with a mocking smile,
And pertly tossed her head.

He slipped on her finger a sparkling ring,
And drew her to his side:
"Two noes mean yes, you saucy minx,"
Exultingly he cried.

He held her fast; he watched her frown—
Then pout—then blush and stammer;
The dear girl couldn't stand a siege
Of love and English grammar.

NOT PREPARED FOR THAT KIND OF PENANCE.

He was a very old clergyman, and as there was an intermission of some time between the penitents going to confession he had fallen into a doze, when a very small boy entered the confessional. A few minutes later three old women took their places in front of the confessional, awaiting their turn to enter. The boy evidently was under the impression that he was in duty bound to tell, among other things, the slightest move he made while at play. When he had unburdened himself he suddenly said:

"Father, I played leap-frog, and stood on my head."

"What's that, my child?" inquired the old gentleman.

"I can't show you in here," innocently answered the boy.

"Well, go outside the confessional and show me," said the dozing confessor.

Taking the father at his word, the boy went out and, putting his hands upon the shoulders of the first old woman, jumped over her head, and then went to the second and third and did the same act. He then threw his feet up in the air, and on his hands and head passed in front of the confessional several times.

When the three old women had recovered from their intense surprise at such actions in a church, one of them, with horror depicted upon her countenance, thinking it was a penance that had been given the boy, said to the other two:

"Glory be to God! what'll I do if the priest givs me such a penance as that?"

Notes and Clippings.

MINISTER: "And do you like to go to church with your papa and mamma, Bobby?" Bobby (inclined to be non-committal): "Well, I guess I like it as well as pa does.

"MAMMA," said a little girl, on her way home from a fashionable church, "are people who sit in the middle aisle wickeder than those at one side?" "Certainly not, dear. Why?" "Because the minister only preached to them."

IMPORTANT news from several English papers: "In the United States the telephone is already being superseded. A writing telegraph is already working on a commercial scale and with marked success. The writer uses a stylus or pen, with which he writes in ordinary fashion, but only on the empty air. Before his face is a second pen, which reproduces his words on the tape in front of it. At the other end the receiving pen reproduces the message in fac-simile."

IT is said that once when the missionaries ruled in the Sandwich islands one of them preached a sermon adjuring his congregation that they were in danger of eternal damnation because they persisted in the disrespect of coming to church without any hats on their heads. Besides this, he went on and told them just the style of hat that they ought to wear to insure their salvation. Next morning his flock, going to buy hats after his commands, found that they could be procured at only one place, which was the store in which the missionary was a partner. The firm had got a big consignment of hats the week before the sermon was preached.

A SMALL monument has been set up at Bennington Center, Vt., by the Bennington Historical Society, to mark the situation of the printing-office of William Lloyd Garrison, where he edited his Journal of the Times, between 1828 and 1829.

THE Jewish Progress notices with evident relish the slap administered by Emma Abbott to "a loud-mouthed clergyman" the other day while he descanted in his church on the alleged immoralities of actors and actresses. There are women on the stage to-day, says our contemporary, who are good, true, and pure, and not deserving of the odious stigma that ministers would cast upon them. "People who liv in glass houses should not throw stones," is an old saying, and it is especially applicable to the clergy. Whoever doubts this had better procure a copy of the "Crimes of Preachers," a small work published by Colonel Billings, a prominent lawyer of Iowa. In it are recorded the cases, within a few years, of some one thousand clergymen—taken only from court records—charged mostly with criminal offenses against women, many of the charges being of an infamously criminal character. Miss Abbott should by all means procure the brochure given to the public by Colonel Billings. It is for sale by the Truth Seeker Co., 28 Lafayette Place, New York city.—Jewish Times.

IT is claimed that Socialism is being practically experimented with in New South Wales, Australia. There is no state church, and no hereditary aristocracy; suffrage is free, and there is no property qualification for members of parliament. "Eight hours," said Lord Carrington, the governor, in a recent speech, "are considered long enough working hours; public houses are shut on Sundays and museums are opened; the sale and transfer of land is made very easy by statutory enactment; men unable to find employment are provided with work by the government, and education is practically free. In fact, if we leave out the demand for a free daily meal for each child attending school, and a proposal that steps be taken to organize labor under skilled direction on uncultivated lands, we find a state of things exactly similar to that suggested in a memorial presented last year to Lord Salisbury by the English Social Democratic Federation, who in Europe would be considered generally as dangerous and half crazy visionaries. The result is an almost perfect system of government."

THE mounting for the thirty-six-inch telescope, which was designed and built by Warner and Swazey, of Cleveland, O., is finished, and will at once be shipped to its destination on Mt. Hamilton, Cal., where it will be placed in the Lick Observatory. The column is of cast-iron, 10 by 17 feet at the base, and 4 by 8 feet at the top, and weighs 18 tons. On this column rests the head, weighing 4 tons, in which the steel polar axis, 10 feet long and 12 inches in diameter, supports the declination axis, also of steel and 10 feet long, 10 inches in diameter, and weighing 2,300 pounds. The steel tube is 56 feet 6 inches long, is 4 feet in diameter at the center, tapering to 38 inches at each end, and weighs over four tons. The driving clock and balcony for the assistant astronomer is reached by a spiral staircase at the south side of the column. The center of motion is 37 feet above the base, and when the telescope is pointed to the zenith, the object glass, which is 36 inches in diameter, is 65 feet from the base. The total weight of the telescope is 35 tons. It is the largest in the world.

THE Nonconformist and Independent of September 29th analyzes the statistics of religious accommodation in the metropolis, which the committee of the London Congregational Union hav, for their own purposes, recently completed. They comprise, first, the sittings of all the places of worship in the ring of metropolitan parishes beyond the registrar-general's districts—viz., Epsom, Croydon, Kington, Richmond, Bromley, Dartford, Staines, Uxbridge, Brentford, Hendon, Barnet, Edmonton, Watford, West Ham, Epping, and Romford, with an aggregate population of 1,198,874. For these there is provision in churches, chapels, and mission-rooms for 446,810 persons, being in the proportion of 37.2 per cent to the population. Of these sittings, the Established Church finds 51.7 per cent; Congregationalists, 13.2 per cent; Baptists, 9.3 per cent; Wesleyans, 9.4 per cent; other Methodists, 3.9 per cent. In 1884 the London Congregational Union published statistics of a similar kind relativ to Inner London. Combining these with the returns for Outer London, the following results come out: Aggregate population at midsummer, 1887, 5,415,066; sittings, 1,903,509; being in the proportion of 35 per cent to the population. Of these the Church of England supplies 49.5 per cent, and the Free Churches 50.5 per cent, a difference of rather more than 1 per cent in favor of the latter. No estimate is given of attendance; but it is believed that, on the average, not more than one-half the accommodation is used for public worship.

Ingersoll's Reply to Rev. Henry M. Field, D.D.

From an Article in the North American Review.

My Dear Mr. Field: I answer your letter because it is manly, candid, and generous. It is not often that a minister of the gospel of universal benevolence speaks of an unbeliever except in terms of reproach, contempt, and hatred. The meek are often malicious. The statement in your letter, that some of your brethren look upon me as a monster on account of my unbelief, tends to show that those who love God are not always the friends of their fellow-men.

Is it not strange that people who admit that they ought to be eternally damned, that they are by nature totally depraved, and that there is no soundness or health in them, can be so arrogantly egotistic as to look upon others as "monsters?" And yet "some of your brethren," who regard unbelievers as infamous, rely for salvation entirely on the goodness of another, and expect to receive as alms an eternity of joy.

The first question that arises between us is as to the innocence of honest error—as to the right to express an honest thought.

You must know that perfectly honest men differ on many important subjects. Some believe in free trade, others are the advocates of protection. There are honest Democrats and sincere Republicans. How do you account for these differences? Educated men, presidents of colleges, cannot agree upon questions capable of solution—questions that the mind can grasp, concerning which the evidence is open to all and where the facts can be with accuracy ascertained. How do you explain this? If such differences can exist consistently with the good faith of those who differ, can you not conceive of honest people entertaining different views on subjects about which nothing can be positivly known?

You do not regard me as a monster. "Some of your brethren" do. How do you account for this difference? Of course, your brethren—their hearts having been softened by the Presbyterian God—are governed by charity and love. They do not regard me as a monster because I hav committed an infamous crime, but simply for the reason that I hav expressed my honest thoughts.

What should I hav done? I hav read the Bible with great care, and the conclusion has forced itself upon my mind not only that it is not inspired, but that it is not true. Was it my duty to speak or act contrary to this conclusion? Was it my duty to remain silent? If I had been untrue to myself, if I had joined the majority—if I had declared the book to be the inspired word of God—would your brethren still hav regarded me as a monster? Has religion had control of the world so long that an honest man seems monstrous?

You draw a distinction between what you are pleased to call "superstition" and religion. You are shocked at the Hindoo mother when she givs her child to death at the supposed command of her God. What do you think of Abraham, of Jephthah? What is your opinion of Jehovah himself? Is not the sacrifice of a child to a phantom as horrible in Palestine as in India? Why should a God demand a sacrifice from man? Why should the infinit ask anything from the finite? Should the sun beg of the glow-worm, and should the momentary spark excite the envy of the source of light?

You must remember that the Hindoo mother believes that her child will be forever blessed—that it will become the especial care of the God to whom it has been given. This is a sacrifice through a false belief on the part of the mother. She breaks her heart for the love of her babe. But what do you think of the Christian mother who expects to be happy in heaven, with her child a convict in the eternal prison—a prison in which none die, and from which none escape? What do you say of those Christians who believe that they, in heaven, will be so filled with ecstasy that all the loved of earth will be forgotten—that all the sacred relations of life, and all the passions of the heart, will fade and die, so that they will look with stony, unreplying, happy eyes upon the miseries of the lost?

You hav laid down a rule by which superstition can be distinguished from religion. It is this: "It makes that a crime which is not a crime, and that a virtue which is not a virtue." Let us test your religion by this rule.

Is it a crime to investigate, to think, to reason, to observe? Is it a crime to be governed by that which to you is evidence, and is it infamous to express your honest thought? There is also another question: Is credulity a virtue? Is the open mouth of ignorant wonder the only entrance to paradise?

According to your creed, those who believe are to be saved, and those who do not believe are to be eternally lost. When you condemn men to everlasting pain for unbelief—that is to say, for acting in accordance with that which is evidence to them—do you not make that a crime which is not a crime? And when you reward men with an eternity of joy for simply believing that which happens to be in accord with their minds, do you not make that a virtue which is not a virtue? In other words, do you not bring your own religion exactly within your own definition of superstition?

The truth is, that no one can justly be held responsible for his thoughts. The brain thinks without asking our consent. We believe, or we disbelieve, without an effort of the will. Belief is a result. It is the effect of evidence upon the mind. The scales turn in spite of him who watches. There is no opportunity of being honest or dishonest in the formation of an opinion. The conclusion is entirely independent of desire. We must believe, or we must doubt, in spite of what we wish.

That which must be, has the right to be.

We think in spite of ourselvs. The brain thinks as the heart beats, as the eyes see, as the blood pursues its course, in the old accustomed ways.

The question then is, not hav we the right to think—that being a necessity—but hav we the right to express our honest thoughts? You certainly hav the right to express yours, and you hav exercised that right. Some of your brethren, who regard me as a monster, hav expressed theirs. The question now is, hav I the right to express mine? In other words, hav I the right to answer your letter? To make that a crime in me which is a virtue in you, certainly comes within your definition of superstition. To exercise a right yourself which you deny to me is simply the act of a tyrant. Where did you get your right to express your honest thoughts? When, and where, and how did I lose mine?

You would not burn, you would not even imprison me, because I differ with you on a subject about which neither of us knows anything. To you the savagery of the Inquisition is only a proof of the depravity of man. You are far better than your creed. You believe that even the Christian world is outgrowing the frightful feeling that fagot, and dungeon, and thumb-screw are legitimate arguments, calculated to convince those upon whom they are used that the religion of those who use them was founded by a God of infinit compassion. You will admit that he who now persecutes for opinion's sake is infamous. And yet, the God you worship will, according to your creed, torture through all the endless years the man who entertains an honest doubt. A belief in such a God is the foundation and cause of all religious persecution. You may reply that only the belief in a false God causes believers to be inhuman. But you must admit that the Jews believed in the true God, and you are forced to say that they were so malicious, so cruel, so savage, that they crucified the only sinless being who ever lived. This crime was committed, not in spite of their religion, but in accordance with it. They simply obeyed the command of Jehovah. And the followers of this sinless being, who, for all these centuries, hav denounced the cruelty of the Jews for crucifying a man on account of his opinion, hav destroyed millions and millions of their fellow-men for differing with them. And this same sinless being threatens to torture in eternal fire countless myriads for the same offense. Beyond this, inconsistency cannot go. At this point absurdity becomes infinit.

Your creed transfers the Inquisition to another world, making it eternal. Your God becomes, or rather is, an infinit Torquemada, who denies to his countless victims even the mercy of death. And this you call "a consolation."

You insist that at the foundation of every religion is the idea of God. According to your creed, all ideas of God, except those entertained by those of your faith, are absolntely false. You are not called upon to defend the gods of the nations dead, nor the gods of heretics. It is your business to defend the God of the Bible—the God of the Presbyterian church. When in the ranks doing battle for your creed, you must wear the uniform of your church. You dare not say that it is sufficient to insure the salvation of a soul to believe in a god, or in some god. According to your creed, man must believe in your God. All the nations dead believed in gods, and all the worshipers of Zeus, and Jupiter, and Isis, and Osiris, and Brahma prayed and sacrificed in vain. Their petitions were not answered, and their souls were not saved. Surely you do not claim that it is sufficient to believe in any one of the heathen gods.

What right hav you to occupy the position of the Deists, and to put forth arguments that even Christians hav answered? The Deist denounced the God of the Bible because of his cruelty, and at the same time lauded the God of Nature. The Christian replied that the God of Nature was as cruel as the God of the Bible. This answer was complete.

Man has filled the world with impossible monsters, and he has been the sport and prey of these phantoms born of ignorance, and hope, and fear. To appease the wrath of these monsters man has sacrificed his fellow-man. He has shed the blood of wife and child; he has fasted and prayed; he has suffered beyond the power of language to express, and yet he has received nothing from these gods—they hav heard no supplication, they hav answered no prayer.

You may reply that your God "sends his rain on the just and on the unjust," and that this fact proves that he is merciful to all alike. I answer, that your God sends his pestilence on the just and on the unjust—that his earthquakes devour and his cyclones rend and wreck the loving and the vicious, the honest and the criminal. Do not these facts prove that your God is cruel to all alike? In other words, do they not demonstrate the absolute impartiality of the divine negligence?

Do you not believe that any honest man of average intelligence, having absolute control of the rain, could do vastly better than is being done? Certainly, there would be no drouths or floods; the crops would not be permitted to wither and die, while rain was being wasted in the sea. Is it conceivable that a good man with power to control the winds would not prevent cyclones? Would you not rather trust a wise and honest man with the lightning?

Why should an infinitly wise and powerful God destroy the good and preserve the vile? Why should he treat all alike here, and in another world make an infinit difference? Why should your God allow his worshipers, his adorers, to be destroyed by his enemies? Why should he allow the honest, the loving, the noble, to perish at the stake? Can you answer these questions? Does it not seem to you that your God must hav felt a touch of shame when the poor slave mother—one that had been robbed of her babe—knelt, and with clasped hands, in a voice broken with sobs, commenced her prayer with the words, "Our father?"

It gave me pleasure to find that, notwithstanding your creed, you are philosophical enough to say that some men are incapacitated, by reason of temperament, for believing in the existence of God. Now, if a belief in God is necessary to the salvation of the soul, why should God create a soul without this capacity? Why should he create souls that he knew would be lost? You seem to think that it is necessary to be poetical, or dreamy, in order to be religious, and by inference, at least, you deny certain qualities to me that you deem necessary. Do you account for the Atheism of Shelley by saying that he was not poetic, and do you quote his lines to prove the existence of the very God whose being he so passionately denied? Is it possible that Napoleon—one of the most infamous of men—had a nature so finely strung that he was sensitiv to the divine influences? Are you driven to the necessity of proving the existence of one tyrant by the words of another? Personally, I hav but little confidence in a religion that satisfied the heart of a man who, to gratify his ambition, filled half the world with widows and orphans. In regard to Agassiz, it is just to say that he furnished a vast amount of testimony in favor of the truth of the theories of Charles Darwin, and then denied the correctness of these theories—preferring the good opinion of Harvard for a few days to the lasting applause of the intellectual world.

I agree with you that the world is a mystery, not only, but that everything in nature is equally mysterious, and that there is no way of escape from the mystery of life and death. To me, the crystallization of the snow is as mysterious as the constellations. But when you endeavor to explain the mystery of the universe by the mystery of God, you do not even exchange mysteries—you simply make one more.

Nothing can be mysterious enough to become an explanation.

The mystery of man cannot be explained by the mystery of God. That mystery still asks for explanation. The mind is so that it cannot grasp the idea of an infinit personality. That is beyond the circumference. This being so, it is impossible that man can be convinced by any evidence of the existence of that which he cannot in any measure comprehend. Such evidence would be equally incomprehensible with the incomprehensible fact sought to be established by it, and the intellect of man can grasp neither the one nor the other.

You admit that the god of nature—that is to say, your god—is as inflexible as nature itself. Why should man worship the inflexible? Why should he kneel to the unchangeable? You say that your God "does not bend to human thought any more than to human will," and that "the more we study him, the more we find that he is not what we imagined him to be." So that, after all, the only thing you are really certain of in relation to your God is, that he is not what you think he is. Is it not almost absurd to insist that such a state of mind is necessary to salvation, or that it is a moral restraint, or that it is the foundation of social order?

You insist that man is not capable of self-government, and that God made the mistake of filling a world with failures—in other words, that man must be governed not by himself, but by your God, and that your God produces order, and establishes and preserves all the nations of the earth. This being so, your God is responsible for the government of this world. Does he preserve order in Russia? Is he accountable for Siberia? Did he establish the institution of slavery? Was he the founder of the Inquisition?

You answer all these questions by calling my attention to "the retributions of history." What are the retributions of history? The honest were burnt at the stake; the patriotic, the generous, and the noble were allowed to die in dungeons; whole races were enslaved; millions of mothers were robbed of their babes. What were the retributions of history? They who committed these crimes wore crowns, and they who justified these infamies were adorned with the tiara.

You are mistaken when you say that Lincoln at Gettysburg said: "Just and true are thy judgments, Lord God Almighty." Something like this occurs in his last inaugural, in which he says—speaking of his hope that the war might soon be ended—"If it shall continue until every drop of blood drawn by the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, still it must be said, 'The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.'" But admitting that you are correct in the assertion, let me ask you one question: Could one standing over the body of Lincoln, the blood slowly oozing from the madman's wound, hav truthfully said: "Just and true are thy judgments, Lord God Almighty?"

Do you really believe that this world is governed by an infinitly wise and good God? Hav you convinced even yourself of this? Why should God permit the triumph of injustice? Why should the loving be tortured? Why should the noblest be destroyed? Why should the world be filled with misery, with ignorance, and with want? What reason hav you for believing that your God will do better in another world than he has done and is doing in this? Will he be wiser? Will he hav more power? Will he be more merciful?

According to the account in the New Testament, Christ was dead for a period of nearly three days. After his resurrection, why did not some one of his disciples ask him where he had been? Why did he not tell them what world he had visited? There was the opportunity to "bring life and immortality to light." And yet he was silent as the grave that he had left—speechless as the stone that angels had rolled away.

How do you account for this? Was it not infinitly cruel to leave the world in darkness and in doubt, when one word could hav filled all time with hope and light?

The hope of immortality is the great oak round which hav climbed the poisonous vines of superstition. The vines hav not supported the oak—the oak has supported the vines. As long as men liv and love and die, this hope will blossom in the human heart.

All I hav said upon this subject has been to express my hope and confess my lack of knowledge. Neither by word nor look hav I expressed any other feeling than sympathy with those who hope to liv again—for those who bend above their dead and dream of life to come. But I hav denounced the selfishness and heartlessness of those who expect for themselvs an eternity of joy, and for the rest of mankind predict, without a tear, a world of endless pain. Nothing can be more contemptible than such a hope—a hope that can giv satisfaction only to the hyenas of the human race.

When I say that I do not know—when I deny the existence of perdition—you reply that "there is something very cruel in this treatment of the belief of my fellow-creatures."

You hav had the goodness to invite me to a grave over which a mother bends and weeps for her only son. I accept your invitation. We will go together. Do not, I pray you, deal in splendid generalities. Be explicit. Remember that the son for whom the loving mother weeps was not a Christian, not a believer in the inspiration of the Bible nor in the divinity of Jesus Christ. The mother turns to you for consolation, for some star of hope in the midnight of her grief. What must you say? Do not desert the Presbyterian creed. Do not forget the threatenings of Jesus Christ. What must you say? Will you read a portion of the Presbyterian Confession of Faith? Will you read this?

Although the light of nature, and the works of creation and Providence, do so far manifest the goodness, wisdom, and power of God as to leave man inexcusable, yet they are not sufficient to giv that knowledge of God and of his will which is necessary to salvation.

Or, will you read this?

By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestined unto everlasting life and others foreordained to everlasting death. These angels and men, thus predestined and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed, and their number is so certain and definit that it cannot be either increased or diminished.

Suppose the mother, lifting her tear-stained face, should say, "My son was good, generous, loving, and kind. He gave his life for me. Is there no hope for him?" Would you then put this serpent in her breast?

Men not professing the Christian religion cannot be saved in any other way whatsoever, be they never so diligent to conform their lives according to the light of Nature. We cannot by our best works merit pardon of sin. There is no sin so small but that it deserves damnation. Works done by unregenerate men, although, for the matter of that, they may be things which God commands, and of good use both to themselvs and others, are sinful and cannot please God or make a man meet to receiv Christ or God.

And suppose the mother should then sobbingly ask: "What has become of my son? Where is he now?" Would you still read from your Confession of Faith, or from your Catechism—this?

The souls of the wicked are cast into hell, where they remain in torment and utter darkness, reserved to the judgment of the great day. At the last day the righteous shall come into everlasting life, but the wicked shall be cast into eternal torment and punished with everlasting destruction. The wicked shall be cast into hell, to be punished with unspeakable torment, both of body and soul, with the devil and his angels, forever.

If the poor mother still wept, still refused to be comforted, would you thrust this dagger in her heart?

At the Day of Judgment you, being caught up to Christ in the clouds, shall be seated at his right hand and there openly acknowledged and acquitted, and you shall join with him in the damnation of your son.

If this failed to still the beatings of her aching heart, would you repeat these words which you say came from the loving soul of Christ?

They who believe and are baptized shall be saved, and they who believe not shall be damned; and these shall go away into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels.

Would you not be compelled, according to your belief, to tell this mother that "there is but one name given under heaven and among men whereby" the souls of men can enter the gates of paradise? Would you not be compelled to say: "Your son lived in a Christian land. The means of grace were within his reach. He died not having experienced a change of heart, and your son is forever lost. You can meet your son again only by dying in your sins; but if you will giv your heart to God you can never clasp him to your breast again?"

What could I say? Let me tell you: "My dear madam, this reverend gentleman knows nothing of another world. He cannot see beyond the tomb. He has simply stated to you the superstitions of ignorance, of cruelty and fear. If there be in this universe a God, he certainly is as good as you are. Why should he hav loved your son in life—loved him, according to this reverend gentleman, to that degree that he gave his life for him; and why should that love be changed to hatred the moment your son was dead? My dear woman, there are no punishments, there are no rewards — there are consequences; and of one thing you may rest assured, and that is that every soul, no matter what sphere it may inhabit, will hav the everlasting opportunity of doing right. If death ends all, and if this handful of dust over which you weep is all there is, you hav this consolation: Your son is not within the power of this reverend gentleman's God—that is something. Your son does not suffer. Next to a life of joy is the dreamless sleep of death.

Does it not seem to you infinitly absurd to call orthodox Christianity "a consolation?" Here in this world, where every human being is enshrouded in cloud and mist—where all lives are filled with mistakes—where no one claims to be perfect, is it "a consolation" to say that "the smallest sin deserves eternal pain?" Is it possible for the ingenuity of man to extract from the doctrin of hell one drop, one ray, of "consolation?" If that doctrin be true, is not your God an infinit criminal? Why should he hav created uncounted billions destined to suffer forever? Why did he not leave them unconscious dust? Compared with this crime, any crime that man can by any possibility commit is a virtue.

Think for a moment of your God—the keeper of an infinit penitentiary filled with immortal convicts—your God an eternal turnkey, without the pardoning power. In the presence of this infinit horror, you complacently speak of the atonement—a scheme that has not yet gathered within its horizon a billionth part of the human race—an atonement with one-half the world remaining undiscovered for fifteen hundred years after it was made.

A man having committed a crime may be pardoned, but I deny the right of the state to punish an innocent man in the place of the pardoned—no matter how willing the innocent man may be to suffer the punishment. There is no law in nature, no fact in nature, by which the innocent can be justly punished to the end that the guilty may go free. Let it be understood once for all: Nature cannot pardon.

You hav recognized this truth. You hav asked me what is to become of one who seduces and betrays, of the criminal with the blood of his victim upon his hands. Without the slightest hesitation I answer, whoever commits a crime against another must, to the utmost of his power in this world and in another, if there be one, make full and ample restitution, and in addition must bear the natural consequences of his offense. No man can be perfectly happy, either in this world or in any other, who has by his perfidy broken a loving and a confiding heart. No power can step between acts and consequences—no forgivness, no atonement.

But, my dear friend, you hav taught for many years, if you are a Presbyterian, or an evangelical Christian, that a man may seduce and betray, and that the poor victim, driven to insanity, leaping from some wharf at night where ships strain at their anchors in storm and darkness—you hav taught that this poor girl may be tormented forever by a God of infinit compassion. This is not all that you hav taught. You hav said to the seducer, to the betrayer, to the one who would not listen to her wailing cry, who would not even stretch forth his hand to catch her fluttering garments—you hav said to him: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and you shall be happy forever; you shall liv in the realm of infinit delight, from which you can, without a shadow falling upon your face, observe the poor girl, your victim, writhing in the agonies of hell." You hav taught this. For my part, I do not see how an angel in heaven, meeting another angel whom he had robbed on the earth, could feel entirely blissful. I go farther. Any decent angel, no matter if sitting at the right hand of God, should he see in hell one of his victims, would leave heaven itself for the purpose of wiping one tear from the cheek of the damned.

You seem to hav forgotten your statement in the commencement of your letter, that your God is as inflexible as Nature—that he bends not to human thought or to human will. You seem to hav forgotten the line which you emphasized with italics: "The effect of everything which is of the nature of a cause, is eternal." In the light of this sentence, where do you find a place for forgivness—for your atonement? . . . . . .

If by atonement you mean the natural effect of self-sacrifice, the effects following a noble and disinterested action; if you mean that the life and death of Christ are worth their effect upon the human race—which your letter seems to show—then there is no question between us. If you hav thrown away the old and barbarous idea that a law had been broken, that God demanded a sacrifice, and that Christ, the innocent, was offered up for us, and that he bore the wrath of God and suffered in our place, then I congratulate you with all my heart.

It seems to me impossible that life should be exceedingly joyous to any one who is acquainted with its miseries, its burdens, and its tears. I know that as darkness follows light around the globe, so misery and misfortune follow the sons of men. According to your creed, the future state will be worse than this. Here, the vicious may reform; here, the wicked may repent; here, a few gleams of sunshine may fall upon the darkest life. But in your future state, for countless billions of the human race, there will be no reform, no opportunity of doing right, and no possible gleam of sunshine can ever touch their souls. Do you not see that your future state is infinitly worse than this? You seem to mistake the glare of hell for the light of morning.

Let us throw away the dogma of eternal retribution. Let us "cling to all that can bring a ray of hope into the darkness of this life."

You ask me how it came to pass that a Hebrew peasant, born among the hills of Galilee, had a wisdom above that of Socrates or Plato, of Confucius or Buddha, and you conclude by saying, "This is the greatest of miracles—that such a being should liv and die on the earth."

I can hardly admit your conclusion, because I remember that Christ said nothing in favor of the family relation. As a matter of fact, his life tended to cast discredit upon marriage. He said nothing against the institution of slavery; nothing against the tyranny of government; nothing of our treatment of animals; nothing about education, about intellectual progress; nothing of art, declared no scientific truth, and said nothing as to the rights and duties of nations.

You may reply that all this is included in "Do unto others as you would be done by;" and "Resist not evil." More than this is necessary to educate the human race. It is not enough to say to your child or to your pupil, "Do right." The great question still remains: What is right? Neither is there any wisdom in the idea of non-resistance. Force without mercy is tyranny. Mercy without force is but a waste of tears. Take from virtue the right of self-defense, and vice becomes the master of the world.

Let me ask you how it came to pass that an ignorant driver of camels, a man without family, without wealth, became master of hundreds of millions of human beings? How is it that he conquered and overran more than half of the Christian world? How is it that on a thousand fields the banner of the cross went down in blood, while that of the crescent floated in triumph? How do you account for the fact that the flag of this impostor floats to-day above the sepulcher of Christ? Was this a miracle? Was Mohammed inspired? How do you account for Confucius, whose name is known wherever the sky bends? Was he inspired—this man who for many centuries has stood first, and who has been acknowledged the superior of all men by hundreds and thousands of millions of his fellow-men? How do you account for Buddha—in many respects the greatest religious teacher this world has ever known—the broadest, the most intellectual of them all; he who was great enough, hundreds of years before Christ was born, to declare the universal brotherhood of man, great enough to say that intelligence is the only lever capable of raising mankind? How do you account for him, who has had more followers than any other? Are you willing to say that all success is divine? How do you account for Shakspere, born of parents who could neither read nor write, held in the lap of ignorance and love, nursed at the breast of poverty—how do you account for him, by far the greatest of the human race, the wings of whose imagination still fill the horizon of human thought; Shakspere, who was perfectly acquainted with the human heart, knew all depths of sorrow, all hights of joy, and in whose mind were the fruit of all thought, of all experience, and a prophecy of all to be; Shakspere, the wisdom and beauty and depth of whose words increase with the intelligence and civilization of mankind? How do you account for this miracle? Do you believe that any founder of any religion could hav written "Lear" or "Hamlet?" Did Greece produce a man who could by any possibility hav been the author of "Troilus and Cressida?" Was there among all the countless millions of almighty Rome an intellect that could hav written the tragedy of "Julius Cæsar?" Is not the play of "Antony and Cleopatra" as Egyptian as the Nile? How do you account for this man, within whose veins there seemed to be the blood of every race, and in whose brain there were the poetry and philosophy of a world?

You ask me to tell my opinion of Christ. Let me say here, once for all, that for the man Christ—for the man who, in the darkness, cried out, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me?"—for that man I hav the greatest possible respect. And let me say, once for all, that the place where man has died for man is holy ground. To that great and serene peasant of Palestine I gladly pay the tribute of my admiration and my tears. He was a reformer in his day—an Infidel in his time. Back of the theological mask, and in spite of the interpolations of the New Testament, I see a great and genuin man.

It is hard to see how you can consistently defend the course pursued by Christ himself. He attacked with great bitterness "the religion of others." It did not occur to him that "there was something very cruel in this treatment of the belief of his fellow-creatures." He denounced the chosen people of God as a "generation of vipers." He compared them to "whited sepulchers." How can you sustain the conduct of missionaries? They go to other lands and attack the sacred beliefs of others. They tell the people of India and of all heathen lands, not only that their religion is a lie, not only that their gods are myths, but that the ancestors of these people—their fathers and mothers who never heard of God, of the Bible, or of Christ—are all in perdition. Is not this a cruel treatment of the belief of a fellow-creature?

A religion that is not manly and robust enough to bear attack with smiling fortitude is unworthy of a place in the heart or brain. A religion that takes refuge in sentimentality, that cries out: "Do not, I pray you, tell me any truth calculated to hurt my feelings," is fit only for asylums.

You believe that Christ was God, that he was infinit in power. While in Jerusalem he cured the sick, raised a few from the dead, and opened the eyes of the blind. Did he do these things because he loved mankind, or did he do these miracles simply to establish the fact that he was the very Christ? If he was actuated by love, is he not as powerful now as he was then? Why does he not open the eyes of the blind now? Why does he not with a touch make the leper clean? If you had the power to giv sight to the blind, to cleanse the leper, and would not exercise it, what would be thought of you? What is the difference between one who can and will not cure, and one who causes disease?

Only the other day I saw a beautiful girl—a paralytic, and yet her brave and cheerful spirit shone over the wreck and ruin of her body like morning on the desert. What would I think of myself had I the power by a word to send the blood through all her withered limbs freighted again with life, should I refuse?

Most theologians seem to imagin that the virtues hav been produced by and are really the children of religion.

Religion has to do with the supernatural. It defines our duties and obligations to God. It prescribes a certain course of conduct by means of which happiness can be attained in another world. The result here is only an incident. The virtues are secular. They hav nothing whatever to do with the supernatural, and are of no kindred to any religion. A man may be honest, courageous, charitable, industrious, hospitable, loving, and pure without being religious—that is to say, without any belief in the supernatural; and a man may be the exact opposit and at the same time a sincere believer in the creed of any church—that is to say, in the existence of a personal God, the inspiration of the scriptures, and in the divinity of Jesus Christ. A man who believes in the Bible may or may not be kind to his family, and a man who is kind and loving in his family may or may not believe in the Bible.

In order that you may see the effect of belief in the formation of character, it is only necessary to call your attention to the fact that your Bible shows that the devil himself is a believer in the existence of your God, in the inspiration of the scriptures, and in the divinity of Jesus Christ. He not only believes these things, but he knows them, and yet, in spite of it all, he remains a devil still.

Few religions hav been bad enough to destroy all the natural goodness in the human heart. In the deepest midnight of superstition some natural virtues, like stars, hav been visible in the heavens. Man has committed every crime in the name of Christianity—or at least crimes that involved the commission of all others. Those who paid for labor with the lash, and who made blows a legal tender, were Christians. Those who engaged in the slave trade were believers in a personal God. One slave ship was called "The Jehovah." Those who pursued with hounds the fugitiv led by the Northern Star prayed fervently to Christ to crown their efforts with success, and the stealers of babes, just before falling asleep, commended their souls to the keeping of the most high.

As you hav mentioned the apostles, let me call your attention to an incident.

You remember the story of Ananias and Sapphira, The apostles, having nothing themselvs, conceived the idea of having all things in common. Their followers who had something were to sell what little they had, and turn the proceeds over to these theological financiers. It seems that Ananias and Sapphira had a piece of land. They sold it, and after talking the matter over, not being entirely satisfied with the collaterals, concluded to keep a little—just enough to keep them from starvation if the good and pious bankers should abscond.

When Ananias brought the money, he was asked whether he had kept back a part of the price. He said that he had not. Whereupon God, the compassionate, struck him dead. As soon as the corpse was removed, the apostles sent for his wife. They did not tell her that her husband had been killed. They deliberately set a trap for her life. Not one of them was good enough or noble enough to put her on her guard; they allowed her to believe that her husband had told his story, and that she was free to corroborate what he had said. She probably felt that they were giving more than they could afford, and, with the instinct of woman, wanted to keep a little. She denied that any part of the price had been kept back. That moment the arrow of divine vengeance entered her heart.

Will you be kind enough to tell me your opinion of the apostles in the light of this story? Certainly murder is a greater crime than mendacity.

You hav been good enough, in a kind of fatherly way, to giv me some advice. You say that I ought to soften my colors, and that my words would be more weighty if not so strong. Do you really desire that I should add weight to my words? Do you really wish me to succeed? If the commander of one army should send word to the general of the other that his men were firing too high, do you think the general would be misled? Can you conceive of his changing his orders by reason of the message?

I deny that "the Pilgrims crossed the sea to find freedom to worship God in the forests of the New World." They came not in the interest of freedom. It never entered their minds that other men had the same right to worship God according to the dictates of their consciences that the Pilgrims themselvs had. The moment they had power they were ready to whip and brand, to imprison and burn. They did not believe in religious freedom. They had no more idea of liberty of conscience than Jehovah.

I do not say that there is no place in the world for heroes and martyrs. On the contrary, I declare that the liberty we now hav was won for us by heroes and by martyrs, and millions of these martyrs were burnt, or flayed alive, or torn in pieces, or assassinated by the church of God. The heroism was shown in fighting the hordes of religious superstition.

I believe in the family. I believe in family life; and one of my objections to Christianity is that it divides the family. Upon this subject I hav said hundreds of times, and I say again, that the roof tree is sacred, from the smallest fiber that feels the soft, cool clasp of earth to the topmost flower that spreads its bosom to the sun, and like a spendthrift givs its perfume to the air. The home where virtue dwells with love is like a lily with a heart of fire, the fairest flower in all this world.

What did Christianity in the early centuries do for the home? What hav nunneries and monasteries, and what has the glorification of celibacy done for the family? Do you not know that Christ himself offered rewards in this world and eternal happiness in another to those who would desert their wives and children and follow him? What effect has that promis had upon family life?

As a matter of fact, the family is regarded as nothing. Christianity teaches that there is but one family, the family of Christ, and that all other relations are as nothing compared with that. Christianity teaches the husband to desert the wife, the wife to desert the husband, children to desert their parents, for the miserable and selfish purpose of saving their own little, shriveled souls.

It is far better for a man to love his fellow-men than to love God. It is better to love wife and children than to love Christ. It is better to serve your neighbor than to serve your God—even if God exists. The reason is palpable. You can do nothing for God. You can do something for wife and children. You can add to the sunshine of a life. You can plant flowers in the pathway of another.

It is true that I am an enemy of the orthodox Sabbath. It is true that I do not believe in giving one-seventh of our time to the service of superstition. The whole scheme of your religion can be understood by any intelligent man in one day. Why should he waste a seventh of his whole life in hearing the same thoughts repeated again and again?

Nothing is more gloomy than an orthodox Sabbath. The mechanic who has worked during the week in heat and dust, the laboring man who has barely succeeded in keeping his soul in his body, the poor woman who has been sewing for the rich, may go to the village church which you hav described. They answer the chimes of the bell, and what do they hear in this village church? Is it that God is the father of the human race; is that all? If that were all, you never would hav heard an objection from my lips. That is not all. If all ministers said: Bear the evils of this life; your father in heaven counts your tears; the time will come when pain, and death, and grief will be forgotten words, I should hav listened with the rest. What else does the minister say to the poor people who hav answered the chimes of your bell? He says: "The smallest sin deserves eternal pain." "A vast majority of men are doomed to suffer the wrath of God forever." He fills the present with fear and the future with fire. He has heaven for the few, hell for the many. He describes a little grass-grown path that leads to heaven, where travelers are "few and far between," and a great highway worn with countless feet that leads to everlasting death.

Such Sabbaths are immoral. Such ministers are the real savages. Gladly would I abolish such a Sabbath. Gladly would I turn it into a holiday, a day of rest and peace, a day to get acquainted with your wife and children, a day to exchange civilities with your neighbors; and gladly would I see the church in which such sermons are preached changed to a place of entertainment. Gladly would I hav the echoes of orthodox sermons—the owls and bats among the rafters, the snakes in crevices and corners, driven out by the glorious music of Wagner and Beethoven. Gladly would I see the Sunday-school, where the doctrin of eternal fire is taught, changed to a happy dance upon the village green.

Music refines. The doctrin of eternal punishment degrades. Science civilizes. Superstition looks longingly back to savagery.

You do not believe that general morality can be upheld without the sanctions of religion.

Christianity has sold, and continues to sell, crime on a credit. It has taught, and it still teaches, that there is forgivness for all. Of course it teaches morality. It says: "Do not steal, do not murder;" but it adds: "but if you do both, there is a way of escape—believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." I insist that such a religion is no restraint. It is far better to teach that there is no forgivness, and that every human being must bear the consequences of his acts.

The first great step toward national reformation is the universal acceptance of the idea that there is no escape from the consequences of our acts. The young men who come from their country homes into a city filled with temptations, may be restrained by the thought of father and mother. This is a natural restraint. They may be restrained by their knowledge of the fact that a thing is evil on account of its consequences, and that to do wrong is always a mistake. I cannot conceive of such a man being more liable to temptation because he has heard one of my lectures in which I hav told him that the only good is happiness—that the only way to attain that good is by doing what he believes to be right. I cannot imagin that his moral character will be weakened by the statement that there is no escape from the consequences of his acts. You seem to think that he will be instantly led astray—that he will go off under the flaring lamps to the riot of passion. Do you think the Bible calculated to restrain him? To prevent this, would you recommend him to read the lives of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, and the other holy polygamists of the Old Testament? Should he read the life of David and of Solomon? Do you think this would enable him to withstand temptation? Would it not be far better to fill the young man's mind with facts so that he may know exactly the physical consequences of such acts? Do you regard ignorance as the foundation of virtue? Is fear the arch that supports the moral nature of man?

You seem to think that there is danger in knowledge, and that the best chemists are the most likely to poison themselvs.

You say that to sneer at religion is only a step from sneering at morality, and then only another step to that which is vicious and profligate.

The Jews entertained the same opinion of the teachings of Christ. He sneered at their religion. The Christians hav entertained the same opinion of every philosopher. Let me say to you again—and let me say it once for all—that morality has nothing to do with religion. Morality does not depend upon the supernatural. Morality does not walk with the crutches of miracles. Morality appeals to the experience of mankind. It cares nothing about faith, nothing about sacred books. Morality depends upon facts, something that can be seen, something known, the product of which can be estimated. It needs no priest, no ceremony, no mummery. It believes in the freedom of the human mind. It asks for investigation. It is founded upon truth. It is the enemy of all religion, because it has to do with this world, and with this world alone.

Does it relieve mankind from fear to believe that there is some God who will help them in extremity? What evidence hav they on which to found this belief? When has any God listened to the prayer of any man? The water drowns, the cold freezes, the flood destroys, the fire burns, the bolt of heaven falls—when and where has the prayer of man been answered?

Is the religious world to-day willing to test the efficacy of prayer? Only a few years ago it was tested in the United States. The Christians of Christendom, with one accord, fell upon their knees and asked God to spare the life of one man. You know the result. You know just as well as I that the forces of nature produce the good and bad alike. You know that the forces of nature destroy the good and bad alike. You know that the lightning feels the same keen delight in striking to death the honest man that it does or would in striking the assassin with his knife lifted above the bosom of innocence.

Did God hear the prayers of the slaves? Did he hear the prayers of martyrs, or did he allow fiends, calling themselvs his followers, to pile the fagots round the forms of glorious men? Did he allow the flames to devour the flesh of those whose hearts were his? Why should any man depend on the goodness of a God who created countless millions, knowing that they would suffer eternal grief?

The faith that you call sacred—"sacred as the most delicate or manly or womanly sentiment of love and honor"—is the faith that nearly all of your fellow-men are to be lost. Ought an honest man to be restrained from denouncing that faith because those who entertain it say that their feelings are hurt? You say to me: "There is a hell. A man advocating the opinions you advocate will go there when he dies." I answer: "There is no hell. The Bible that teaches it is not true." And you say: "How can you hurt my feelings?"

You seem to think that one who attacks the religion of his parents is wanting in respect to his father and his mother.

Were the early Christians lacking in respect for their fathers and mothers? Were the pagans who embraced Christianity heartless sons and daughters? What hav you to say of the apostles? Did they not heap contempt upon the religion of their fathers and mothers? Did they not join with him who denounced their people as a "generation of vipers?" Did they not follow one who offered a reward to those who would desert fathers and mothers? Of course you hav only to go back a few generations in your family to find a Field who was not a Presbyterian. After that you find a Presbyterian. Was he base enough and infamous enough to heap contempt upon the religion of his father and mother? All the Protestants in the time of Luther lacked in respect for the religion of their fathers and mothers. According to your idea, Progress is a Prodigal Son. If one is bound by the religion of his father and mother, and his father happens to be a Presbyterian and his mother a Catholic, what is he to do? Do you not see that your doctrin givs intellectual freedom only to foundlings?

You insist that religion does not leave man in "abject terror"—does not leave him "in utter darkness as to his fate."

Is it possible to know who will be saved? Can you read the names mentioned in the decrees of the Infinit? Is it possible to tell who is to be eternally lost? Can the imagination conceive a worse fate than your religion predicts for a majority of the race? Why should not every human being be in "abject terror" who believes your doctrin? How many loving and sincere women are in the asylums to-day fearing that they hav committed "the unpardonable sin"—a sin to which your God has attached the penalty of eternal torment, and yet has failed to describe the offense? Can tyranny go beyond this—fixing the penalty of eternal pain for the violation of a law not written, not known, but kept in the secrecy of infinit darkness? How much happier it is to know nothing about it, and to believe nothing about it! How much better to hav no God!

You discover a "Great Intelligence ordering our little lives, so that even the trials that we bear, as they call out the finer elements of character, conduce to our future happiness." This is an old explanation—probably as good as any. The idea is, that this world is a school in which man becomes educated through tribulation—the muscles of character being developed by wrestling with misfortune. If it is necessary to liv this life in order to develop character, in order to become worthy of a better world, how do you account for the fact that billions of the human race die in infancy, and are thus deprived of this necessary education and development? What would you think of a schoolmaster who should kill a large proportion of his scholars during the first day, before they had even had the opportunity to look at A?

The intelligence of man guided by a sense of duty is the only power that makes for righteousness.

You tell me that I am waging "a hopeless war," and you giv as a reason that the Christian religion began to be nearly two thousand years before I was born, and that it will liv two thousand years after I am dead.

Is this an argument? Does it tend to convince even yourself? Could not Caiaphas, the high priest, hav said substantially this to Christ? Could he not hav said: "The religion of Jehovah began to be four thousand years before you were born, and it will liv two thousand years after you are dead?" Could not a follower of Buddha make the same illogical remark to a missionary from Andover with the glad tidings? Could he not say: "You are waging a hopeless war. The religion of Buddha began to be twenty-five hundred years before you were born, and hundreds of millions of people still worship at great Buddha's shrine?"

Do you insist that nothing except the right can liv for two thousand years? Why is it that the Catholic church "livs on and on, while nations and kingdoms perish?" Do you consider that the survival of the fittest?

Is it the same Christian religion now living that lived during the Middle Ages? Is it the same Christian religion that founded the Inquisition and invented the thumb-screw? Do you see no difference between the religion of Calvin and Jonathan Edwards and the Christianity of to-day? Do you really think that it is the same Christianity that has been living all these years? Hav you noticed any change in the last generation? Do you remember when scientists endeavored to prove a theory by a passage from the Bible, and do you now know that believers in the Bible are exceedingly anxious to prove its truth by some fact that science has demonstrated? Do you know that the standard has changed? Other things are not measured by the Bible, but the Bible has to submit to another test. It no longer owns the scales. It has to be weighed—it is being weighed—it is growing lighter and lighter every day. Do you know that only a few years ago "the glad tidings of great joy" consisted mostly in a description of hell? Do you know that nearly every intelligent minister is now ashamed to preach about it, or to read about it, or to talk about it? Is there any change? Do you know that but few ministers now believe in "the plenary inspiration" of the Bible, that from thousands of pulpits people are now told that the creation according to Genesis is a mistake, that it never was as wet as the flood, and that the miracles of the Old Testament are considered simply as myths or mistakes?

How long will what you call Christianity endure, if it changes as rapidly during the next century as it has changed during the last? What will there be left of the supernatural?

It does not seem possible that thoughtful people can, for many years, believe that a being of infinit wisdom is the author of the Old Testament, that a being of infinit purity and kindness upheld polygamy and slavery, that he ordered his chosen people to massacre their neighbors, and that he commanded husbands and fathers to persecute wives and daughters unto death for opinion's sake.

It does not seem within the prospect of belief that Jehovah, the cruel, the jealous, the ignorant, and the revengeful, is the creator and preserver of the universe.

Does it seem possible that infinit goodness would create a world in which life feeds on life, in which everything devours and is devoured? Can there be a sadder fact than this: Innocence is not a certain shield?

It is impossible for me to believe in the eternity of punishment. If that doctrin be true, Jehovah is insane.

Day after day there are mournful processions of men and women, patriots and mothers, girls whose only crime is that the word Liberty burst into flower between their pure and loving lips, driven like beasts across the melancholy wastes of Siberian snow. These men, these women, these daughters, go to exile and to slavery, to a land where hope is satisfied with death. Does it seem possible to you that an "infinit father" sees all this and sits as silent as a god of stone?

And yet, according to your Presbyterian creed, according to your inspired book, according to your Christ, there is another procession, in which are the the noblest and the best, in which you will find the wondrous spirits of this world, the lovers of the human race, the teachers of their fellow-men, the greatest soldiers that ever battled for the right; and this procession of countless millions, in which you will find the most generous and the most loving of the sons and daughters of men, is moving on to the Siberia of God, the land of eternal exile, where agony becomes immortal.

How can you, how can any man with brain or heart, believe this infinit lie?

Is there not room for a better, for a higher philosophy? After all, is it not possible that we may find that everything has been necessarily produced, that all religions and superstitions, all mistakes and all crimes, were simply necessities? Is it not possible that out of this perception may come not only love and pity for others, but absolute justification for the individual? May we not find that every soul has, like Mazeppa, been lashed to the wild horse of passion, or like Prometheus, to the rocks of fate?

You ask me to take the "sober second thought." I beg of you to take the first, and if you do, you will throw away the Presbyterian creed; you will instantly perceive that he who commits the "smallest sin" no more deserves eternal pain than he who does the smallest virtuous deed deserves eternal bliss; you will become convinced that an infinit God who creates billions of men knowing that they will suffer through all the countless years is an infinit demon; you will be satisfied that the Bible, with its philosophy and its folly, with its goodness and its cruelty, is but the work of man, and that the supernatural does not and cannot exist.

For you personally, I hav the highest regard and the sincerest respect, and I beg of you not to pollute the soul of childhood, not to furrow the cheeks of mothers, by preaching a creed that should be shrieked in a mad-house. Do not make the cradle as terrible as the coffin. Preach, I pray you, the gospel of Intellectual Hospitality—the liberty of thought and speech. Take from loving hearts the awful fear. Hav mercy on your fellow-men. Do not drive to madness the mothers whose tears are falling on the pallid faces of those who died in unbelief. Pity the erring, wayward, suffering, weeping world. Do not proclaim as "tidings of great joy" that an Infinit Spider is weaving webs to catch the souls of men.

What I Condemn, and What I Applaud.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: My condemnation of your condemnation of the judge who tried C. B. Reynolds you unwarrantably and wantonly distort, in your last issue, into applause from me of that judge's conduct. Far from applauding it, I condemn it fundamentally. The adjectiv "better-deserving," which I applied to him, meant, as every reader of the paragraph upon which you comment, and also of the editorial in Liberty in which I first discussed the matter, well knows, better-deserving at your hands. I, an Anarchist, consider that this judge was engaged in very dirty business, and hav simply declared that, considering the nature of the business, he dispatched it with commendable decency. But you believe that it is the business of the majority to make laws for the government of the people and appoint officers to administer them. From your standpoint, then, this judge simply did his duty, for which you roundly abused him. I told you that your complaint was but the wry face which a quack makes when he has to swallow his own medicin, and so I still regard it. But I applaud neither you nor your laws nor your judge, and you hav no business to lead your readers to suppose the contrary.

Respects to Mr. Palmer.

The following resolutions are those ordered by the Congress of the American Secular Union to be drawn by the secretary and published in the Liberal journals:

WHEREAS, The American Secular Union learns with profound regret that, owing to ill-health, its honored president, Courtlandt Palmer, is compelled to retire from the executiv chair; and,

WHEREAS, The name of Courtlandt Palmer is endeared to every member of this Union, as one who in its darkest hour of discouragement—through storm and stress—has ever been steadfast and firm in advocacy of its principles; who could neither be frightened by foul vilification of this organization nor allured by seductiv flattery from his fidelity to truth; who realized that they who would fetter the mind are endeavoring to withhold the nutrition of the human race; who took alarm at the earlier experiments to suppress mental liberty, nor delayed until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents, but, seeing the consequences in the principle, sought to avoid the consequences by denying the principle; who in this age of sordid selfishness voluntarily surrendered ease and comfort to climb the rugged rocks which bar the progress to mental and social reform, and help humanity to realize the prophetic vow of Victor Hugo, "There shall be no slavery of the mind;" therefore,

Resolved, That this Congress hereby tenders its sincere gratitude for services to one whose exalted moral aims and personal integrity hav been above the breath of slander; whose culture, capacity, and literary productions lend additional luster to our glorious galaxy of mental emancipators—to this truly liberal Liberal, whose never-failing generosity stamps him as one of nature's true noblemen, our retiring president, Courtlandt Palmer.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

III.—Moral Maxims.

CHAPTER XV.—EDUCATION.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

The doctrine of Pythagoras, the philosophic Messiah of Paganism, included the strange tenet of metempsychosis. After death, held the confessors of that dogma, the souls of men and brutes would reappear in new forms, higher or lower, according to the character-traits of the dying individual. Thus the soul of a wealthy glutton might be reborn in a pig-sty, that of a high-minded peasant perhaps on the throne of a king. Death and rebirth are the upper and lower spokes of a wheel that turns and turns forever, and in the persons of their neighbors the Pythagoreans saw wanderers that might have walked this earth thousands of years ago.

The strangeness of such a theory is still increased by the circumstance that its teacher was an eminent astronomer, an accomplished mathematician, and the leader of a memorable hygienic reform. Our astonishment is not lessened by the well-established fact that, under some form or other, the doctrine of soul-migration has for ages been the accepted creed of a large plurality of our fellow-men. It is well known, however, that to his trusted disciples Pythagoras imparted an esoteric or explanatory version of his dogmas; and if we learn that the great philosopher attached a special importance to the influence of hereditary dispositions, the truth at last dawn upon us that the doctrine of metempsychosis referred to the reappearance of individual types, passions, and dispositions in the bodily and mental characteristics of the next generation. "Parents live in their children." The instinctive recognition of that truth reconciles our dumb fellow-creatures to the prospect of death. At the end of summer the night-moth carefully deposits her eggs in a silver cradle, hidden safe in the crevice of some sheltering nook, where they will survive the rigor of the winter and answer the first summons of spring. Having thus, as it were, insured the resurrection of her type, the parent moth quietly resigns herself to the fate of sleeping her own winter-slumber in the arms of death. On the Orinoco wounded river-turtles will use their last strength to climb the slope of some bush-hidden sand-bank, and after intrusting their eggs to the protection of the deep drift sand, will reënter the water and quietly float off with the seaward currents. In the virgin-woods of Southern Mexico, where the harpy-eagle fills the maws of her hungry brood by incessant raids on the small denizens of the tree-tops, the traveler D'Armand once witnessed a curious scene. An eagle had pounced upon a nursing mother monkey, who at first struggled desperately to free herself from the claws of the murderer; but, finding resistance in vain, she loosened her grasp on the branches, and, just as the eagle carried her off, she disengaged the arm of her baby from her neck, and shaking off the little creature with a swing of her arm, she deliberately flung it back into the sheltering foliage of the tree-top, thus taking the last possible chance of surviving in her child.

The "dread of annihilation" reveals itself in the instincts of a dying philosopher as plainly as in the instincts of a wounded animal; but, on self-examination, that fear would prove to have but little in common with a special solicitude for the preservation of material forms or combinations—conditions which the process of organic change constantly modifies in the cradle as well as in the grave. It is rather the type of the body and its correlated mental dispositions which the hope of resurrection yearns to preserve, and even childless men have often partly realized that hope by impressing the image of their soul on a younger mind, and transmitting their cherished projects and theories through the medium of education. In the consciousness of that accomplished task Socrates could as calmly die in the arms of his disciples as the Hebrew patriarch in the arms of his children and grandchildren. "You kill a sower," cried St. Adalbert under the clubs of his assassins, "but the seed he has planted will rise and survive both his love and your hatred."

Even the influence of a great practical example has often impressed the mental type of a reformer or patriot on a series of subsequent generations. The Buddhist Calanus, preaching the doctrine of renunciation to an audience of scoffers, deeply affected the most thoughtless of his witnesses by proving his personal convictions in the flames of a funeral pile. "I leave no sons," were the last words of Epaminondas, "but two immortal daughters, the battles of Leuctra and Mantinea." Rousseau smiled when he learned the intrigues of his enemies who were trying their utmost to enlist the coöperation of a violent pulpit-orator. "They are busy recruiting their corps of partisans," said he, "but Time will raise me an ally in every intelligent reader of the next generation."

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

In the simple lives of the lower animals every day may bring the sufficient reward of its toil; but the problem of progress, even from the first dawn of civilization, involves tasks too apt to extend beyond the span of individual existence. The forest-clearing husbandman, the state-founding patriot, the scientific inquirer, all risk to receive the summons of night before the completion of their labor. Before reaching the goal of their hopes their earthly pilgrimage may end at the brink of the unknown river, and education alone can bridge that gulf, and make every day the way-station of an unbroken road. Children or children's children will take up the staff from the last resting-place of their pilgrim father; and, moreover, all progress is cumulative. Every laborer works with the experience of his forefathers, as well as his own; every son stands on the shoulders of his father. Even the failure of individual efforts contributes a helpful lesson to the success of the next attempt:

> Freedom's brave battle, once begun,
> Bequeathed from bleeding sire to son,
> Though often baffled, e'er is won.

Persistent adherence to the programme of a traditional policy has often made the work of successive centuries the triumphant execution of a single plan. The empire of Islam sprung from the seed which the prophet of Mecca had planted in the soil of his native land. The storm of the Protestant revolt rose from the anathemas of a poor Wittenberg friar; the unquenchable fire of the French Revolution was kindled by the burning indignation of a Swiss recluse, and his fervid appeals:

> Those oracles that set the world aflame,
> Nor ceased to burn till kingdoms were no more;

and the vast fabric of our republican federation was founded by the poor colonists who sought independence in the freedom of the wilderness, and combined against the power of a selfish despot. Education sows a seed which may sprout even during the lifetime of the sower, and bless individual life with the sweets of a guaranteed triumph over the power of death. Resurgam, "I shall live after death," expresses the significance of that triumph, and of the "esoteric doctrine of Pythagoras."

C.—PERVERSION.

The Christian church has constantly perverted the purpose of education, but has never yet deserved the reproach of having neglected its means. From the very beginning the sect of the apostle-training Galilean has been a sect of assiduous educators. They were not satisfied with founding schools and opening their doors to all comers, but went forth in quest of new converts, and pursued their aim with a persistence of zeal and a versatility of skill that could not fail to accomplish its purpose. As soon as a sufficient increase of power enabled them to control the institutes of primary instruction they turned their chief attention to the dogmatical education of the young. They derived no aid from the attractiveness and still less from the plausibility of their doctrine, but they realized Schopenhauer's remark that "there is in childhood a period measured by six, or at most by ten years, when any well-inculcated dogma, no matter how extravagantly absurd, is sure to retain its hold for life." And though the propagation of an unnatural creed is not favored by natural fertility, the naturally barren doctrine of renunciation was thus successfully propagated by a system of incessant grafting. By the skilful application of that process the most dissimilar plants were made subservient to its purpose. The "Worship of Sorrow" with its whining renunciation of worldly enjoyments, and its indifference to health and physical education, was grafted on the manful naturalism of the Hebrew lawgiver. Saint-worship, the veneration of self-torturing fanatics, was grafted on a stem of pagan mythology, and dozens of Christian martyrs hav thus usurped the honor and the sacrifices of pagan temples. Christian holidays were grafted on the festivals of the nature-loving Saxons. But persuasion failing, the missionaries of the cross did not hesitate to resort to more conclusive measures. Like refractory children cudgeled along the path of knowledge, the obstinate skeptics of northern Europe were harassed with fire and sword till they could not help admitting the dangers of unbelief. The gardenlands of the Albigenses were wasted till they found no difficulty in yearning for the peace of a better world. Philosophers were tortured in the prisons of the Holy Inquisition till the sorrows of life favored the renunciation of its hopes.

For thirteen centuries the sunshine of millions of human hearts was ruthlessly sacrificed to promote the task of luring mankind from life to ghost-land, and during all those ages education was systematically turned from a blessing into an earth-blighting curse.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

There is a story of a Portuguese slave-dealer who carried a private chaplain on his pay-roll, and frequently expressed his solicitude for the spiritual welfare of his shackled captives. A very similar kind of spiritual duty has for centuries been made the excuse for an almost total neglect of secular education. Divorced from the control of common sense, religion soon degenerated into mere ceremonialism. A priest who would travel twenty miles through a snow-storm to supply a dying man with a consecrated wafer had no sympathy with the needs of the living. He would extort the last penny of his tithes at the risk of starving a village full of needy parishioners. He would groan at the sight of an unbaptized child, but had not a drop of water to cool the brows of burning Moors or Jews. He would rave about the cruelty of a prince who had deprived the clergy of their mass-shillings, but had no ear for the laments of the exiled Moriscoes or the curses of starving serfs.

Such was the morality which arrogated the right of suppressing that system of physical and intellectual education which had filled the homes of the Mediterranean nations with all the blessings of health, science, and beauty. Theological training had failed to kindle the dawn of a supernatural millennium, but had thoroughly succeeded in extinguishing the light of human reason. Not absolute ignorance only, but baneful superstition—worse than ignorance by just as much as poison is worse than hunger—was for centuries the inevitable result of all so-called school-training; and the traditions of that age of priest-rule have made religion almost a synonyme of cant. It also gave book-learning its supposed tendency to mental aberration. Can we wonder at that result of an age when the literary products of Christian Europe were confined almost exclusively to ghost-stories and manuals of ceremony? Can we wonder that delusions of the most preposterous kind assumed the virulence of epidemic diseases? Maniacs of self-mutilation, of epileptic contortions, of were-wolf panics, traversed Europe from end to end. Men gloried in ignorance, and boasted their neglect of worldly science till the consequences of that neglect avenged its folly in actual madness.

The saddest of all the sad "it might have beens" is, perhaps, a reverie on the probable results of earlier emancipation—of the employment of thirteen worse than wasted centuries in scientific inquiries, agricultural improvements, social and sanitary reforms. We might have failed to enter the portals of the New Jerusalem, but we would probably have regained our earthly paradise.

E.—REFORM.

The days of the Holy Inquisition are past; but the restless propaganda of Jesuitry still shames the inactivity of Rationalism. Our friends sit listless, relying on the theoretical advantages of their cause, while the busy intrigues of our enemies secure them all practical advantages.

Even in our model republic only primary education stands neutral, while private enterprise has made nearly every higher college a stronghold of dogmatism. And even the semi-secularism of primary instruction is more than offset by the ultra-orthodoxy of "Sunday-schools." Millions of factory children have to sacrifice their only day of leisure at the bidding of their dogmatic task-master and with the timid connivance of their parents. "We cannot row against the stream," I have heard even Freethinkers say. "Let the youngsters join the crowd; if it does them no good, it can do no harm." But it will do harm, even beyond the waste of time and the wasted opportunities for health-giving exercise. The process of dogmatic inoculation may fail to serve its direct purpose, but the weekly repetition of the experiment is sure to contaminate the moral organism with unsound humors which may become virulent at unexpected times and, likely enough, undermine that very peace of the household which a short-sighted mother hoped to promote by driving her boys to Sunday-school, as she would drive troublesome cattle to a public pasture.

The Freethinkers of every community should combine to engage a teacher, or at least facilitate home instruction by collecting text-books of Secularism, such as Voltaire's "Philosophical Cyclopedia;" Rousseau's "Emile;" Hallam's "History of the Middle Ages;" Ingersoll's pamphlets; Paine's "Age of Reason;" Lecky's "History of Rationalism" and "History of Morals;" Lessing's "Nathan;" Goethe and Schiller's "Xenions;" Darwin's "Descent of Man;" Plutarch's Biographies; Trelawney's "Last Days of Shelley and Byron;" McDonnell's Freethought novels; Parker Pillsbury's "Review of Sabbatarian Legislation;" Reade's "Martyrdom of Man;" Bennett's "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times;" Gibbon's "History of Christianity;" Keeler's "Short History of the Bible;" "Bible Myths and Their Parallels in Other Religions;" "Supernatural Religion;" Greg's "Creed of Christendom;" Lord Amberley's "Analysis of Religious Belief;" "Religion Not History."

We should hav Freethought colleges and Secular missions, and even isolated Liberals might do better than "drift with the stream." They might let their children pass their Sundays in the freedom of the forests and mountains to worship the God of Nature in his own temple, and learn a lesson from the parental devotion of their dumb fellow-creatures. She-wolves, deprived of their whelps, have been known to enter human habitations at night to suckle their young through the bars of a heavy cage. Thrushes and fly-catchers will enter an open window to feed or rescue their captive nestlings, and with a still wider sympathy a Liberal friend of mine tries to aid his neighbors' children, as well as his own. Renouncing the hope of abolishing Sabbatarianism, he conceived the idea of controling it, and induced his neighbors to send their children to a "Sunday Garden" with a free museum of pictures and stuffed birds, gymnastic contrivances, and a little restaurant of free temperance refreshments—apples, peanuts, and lemonade. He defrays the expenses of the establishment, which his neighbors consider a sort of modified kindergarten; and under the name of "Sunday books" circulates a private library of purely secular literature.

"If life shall have been duly rationalized by science," says Herbert Spencer, "parents will learn to consider a sound physical constitution as an entailed estate, which should be transmitted unimpaired, if not improved;" and with a similar recognition of social obligations Freethinkers should endeavor to transmit to their children a bequest of unimpaired common sense. Loyalty to their Protestant ancestors, loyalty to posterity, and to the majesty of truth herself, should prompt us to stand bravely by our colors and train our children to continue the struggle for light and independence.

By the far-reaching influence of education Secularists should bridge the chasm which orthodoxy hopes to cross on the wings of faith. Secularism shall preach the gospel of immortality on earth.

The Revisers Revised.

II.

Nearly every schoolboy has read the "Arabian Nights' Entertainment," but everybody does not know that the volume of stories popularly known by that title contains but a small selection from the original series, which numbers nearly or quite a thousand. These hav been done into English for the first time by a celebrated traveler and oriental scholar, printed for the author by an eminent English firm, and delivered to subscribers only. Each set comprises forty large octavo volumes, subscribed for at a guinea a volume, and a thousand sets were printed. The law against obscene publications being strictly enforced in England, they are not offered to the public at all, and are jealously guarded by those who hav charge of them. But (no matter how I obtained the privilege) I hav seen two or three of the volumes and dipped into them, and the wonder is why so much labor and money has been expended on such a heap of filthy trash (I was about to say), but seeing that the Spectator of Addison alludes to them as "those excellent Eastern allegories," I qualify the term, and say pueril fables, calculated for the most part to gratify only prurient curiosity and a libidinous taste.

The tales are interspersed with a great deal of poetry, chiefly of an amatory kind, of which a literal and not a metrical translation is given. It bears a striking resemblance to the poetry of the Bible, particularly to that incomprehensible rhapsody known as Solomon's Song. Poets, both ancient and modern, are responsible for an awful amount of nonsense and twaddle, but the Song of Solomon caps everything of the kind. How it became in the first place reckoned among the canonical books is a mystery that nobody can explain; but in order to account for its presence in the authorized English version, the translators introduced some head-lines describing it as a kind of colloquy between Christ and his church. A couple of sublime idiots Christ and his church must be if that be the character of their conversation. The dialogs of lovers are for the most part interesting only to themselvs, and as the newspapers say of a trial for attempt, "quite unfit for publication." Yet this precious nonsense is published by the million, and distributed all over the habitable globe. One of the interlocutors must hav been a full-blooded negress, for she describes herself as "black, but comely," which shows a depraved taste on the part of her royal lover, who compares her to "a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariot," though why horses he does not say.

He goes on to say that her cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, and her neck with chains of gold. She must hav worn a nose-ring, and ear-drops of immense size. Her mouth, no doubt, was large and her lips thick, but she had a good set of teeth without a gap, for they are described as "a flock of sheep which go up from the washing, whereof only one beareth twins and there is not one barren among them." Her neck "is like the tower of David, builded for an armory, whereon there hung a thousand bucklers, all shields of mighty men." She appears to hav been a camp-follower and common trull, but there is no accounting for taste. Her royal lover sees beauties which are invisible to the skeptical reader, and minutely describe parts of her body that are usually concealed, and would be best left to the imagination. (See ch. vii, 2.) The indelicacy of this citation must be excused, for the language is inspired and dictated by the Holy Ghost! The original translators hav the credit of using plain Saxon-English, and in the general way call a spade a spade, but here their courage and outspokenness was for once at fault. They chose to use the wrong word, with the result of making absolute nonsense of the translation; and the revisers, having the same difficulty before them, elected to follow their example. The latter hav, it is true, left out the nonsensical heading by which it was intended to convey a mystical and spiritual meaning, under grossly carnal figures of speech. But if these be the words of truth and soberness, why did they not giv the whole truth and nothing but the truth? If, on the other hand, it is the imbecil raving of a besotted libertin, why did the revisers (who must hav been aware of the fact) allow it to be re-imposed on the world as the language of divine truth and wisdom? The mystical meaning was no doubt invented by the lecherous monks of the Middle Ages, to assist them in their designs on the daughters of the laity, to induce them to enter convents, professedly as the spouses of Jesus Christ, but really as concubines of his ministers. And is it not much the same in the present day? Is not so-called "Christian love" merely another name for erotic impulse, and do not the ministers of Christ, as in the days of the Apostle Paul, "creep into houses, and lead captiv silly women, laden with divers lusts?" A nice employment for a Christian minister to read and expound the Song of Solomon in company with a female devotee, and it is not infrequently done.

OUTIS.

Fifth Annual Report of the Australasian Secular Association, Melbourne.

The Sunday evening lectures hav been carried on uninterruptedly and without any interference from the authorities throughout the year. Mr. Symes, who has succeeded in attracting large and appreciativ audiences, has occupied the platform for the major portion of the time. During his absence on visits to Sydney and Tasmania, lectures were delivered by Mrs. A. L. Ballou and Messrs. W. W. Collins, M. Miller, and J. Donovan.

The week-night debates hav been well attended, especially since the removal to the new rooms, and the discussions hav been well maintained.

The Sunday-school has been reorganized, and with every prospect of success.

The science classes, through the winter months, under the tuition of Messrs. Symes and Brookhouse, attract fair audiences, and are doing good work.

Financially, the association has suffered somewhat from the prevailing depression, and in consequence the general fund is not so flourishing as at the close of the previous year. The last quarter has, however, shown a marked improvement, which we hope will be maintained.

The building fund is steadily increasing, and its present value is about £2,000. The committee has offered a premium of £25 for competitiv designs for a Freethought hall, and are endeavoring to devise means to go on with the building. If, by another effort, an additional £1,000 could be raised, a hall might be erected immediately and without further trouble.

Altogether, we hav every reason to be hopeful for the future.

During the past five years we hav been prosecuted by the government, denounced and slandered by the parsons and the press, and refused halls to lecture in, but in spite of all opposition we hav pushed our way along and beaten our enemies on almost every point; we hav disseminated our opinions throughout the colony and made Freethought a household word, and the association is now on a sound basis and in a position to carry on the battle against superstition more vigorously than ever.

J. N. FRYER, Secretary.

Heretical Personalities.

CAPT. S. P. Putnam, who has just been promoted from secretary to president of the American Secular Union, enjoys, probably, the personal acquaintance of more Infidels than any other man in the country. This is because it is so easy to get acquainted with him. In physique Mr. Putnam is short and rotund, and his alimentativness runs away up in phrenological charts. There is not much formality about him, but he encompasses an enormous amount of humanity, and when he enters a man's house he is at home at once. Mr. Putnam was once a shoemaker, and entered the army in the late civil war as a private, coming out a captain. Then he went to Dartmouth College and prepared for the ministry. He pursued the preacher business for several years, winding up in a Unitarian pulpit. Afterward he obtained a position in the custom-house here, and figured out the ad valorem and specific duty on assorted sizes of glass. In the civil service examination he was perfect in mathematics and superexcellent in everything but penmanship. His writing sent his average away down, and if our compositors had been on the examining committee it would hav been much lower. Mr. Putnam is a poet, but not a rhymester, and can see more glory in cactus, sage-brush, and rocks than a million ordinary mortals. This is why some of his descriptions of Western scenes are said by critics to be extravagant. He always looks on the bright side of things, and is endowed with boundless energy and hope. His hair and mustach are turning gray because he thinks so much, and not from age, for he has been only forty years old since the memory of man runneth back. He is honest to the core, much too generous and accommodating for his own good, and afraid of neither man nor ghost. The ladies like him, and he likes them, and the Liberals hav done well in putting him at the head of the Union, with instructions to continue his campaign. Mr. Putnam's chief failing is that he thinks that he can write novels. But of late years he has reformed somewhat, and refrained from writing them.

A YEAR or two ago George Hartley was the instrument of grace through whom Liberal lecturers spoke to the people of Turner's Falls, Mass. His last efforts in that town much provoked the ire of the Christians, and Mr. Hartley was boycotted by all the followers of the other-cheek-turning Nazarene. They conspired against him and against his business, and finally he was forced to leave town. He went to Florida, located at Orange Lake, bought six hundred acres of land, and is now booming Orange Lake for all it is worth. One of his near neighbors is Professor Proctor, who has built a house there, and is contemplating the erection of a $20,000 observatory. Mr. Proctor's brother, now living in France, is negotiating with Mr. Hartley for thirty-five of his six hundred acres, with a view to building a winter home. Mr. Hartley considers himself on the road to wealth, which he regards as a fulfilment of the scripture statement that the righteous are never forsaken, nor their seed compelled to beg bread.

MR. JEROME DUTTON is one of the whilom Iowa war-horses of Liberalism. but lately he has given the better part of his attention to Greenbackism and labor politics. But we love him still, and copy the following good words for him from the Spectator of Wheatland, Iowa, where Mr. Dutton resides: "The Labor party could not hav very well made a better selection than that of Jerome Dutton for the legistature had they sifted the country. Of course it is absurd to think that he could be elected by the party nominating him, but the people of Clinton county might go farther and fare worse. As for Mr. Dutton's politics we are at a loss to properly classify them, but as to his citizenship we do not hesitate a moment in saying that he is one of the most esteemed and respected in this part of the county. We do know, however, that Mr. Dutton has ever been a sympathizer with the laboring elements and their political organizations, and could he be elected no stronger champion of their rights would be found in the house than he. Last fall he was nominated and elected justice of the peace by the Democrats, but this fall he is running on the wrong ticket, and therefore must be defeated."

CHARLES WATTS, who lectures much, may be known, by the friends who go to the depot to meet him. by his hight and size, English air, and big blue eyes. Mr. Watts is about six feet tall, of bony, muscular structure, sanguin, bilious temperament, and general bonhomie style. The first public lecture Mr. Watts ever gave was when he was fourteen years old, and bore the ambitious title of "The Curse of the Nation, and the Remedy." For a youngster this was a reasonably large subject. Since then Mr. Watts has appeared in public several thousand times, and most acceptably to his audiences when they were not Christians. For many years he was co-editor with Bradlaugh of the National Reformer, and afterward editor and proprietor of the Secular Review, now owned and edited by W. Stewart Ross, England's most brilliant and poetic Infidel. Mr. Watts used to be an Atheist, but is now an Agnostic—the same thing under another name. He is fifty-two years old, and counts one of the handsomest ladies of the continent, and two smart boys and a girl, as his family possessions. Mr. Watts is a terrific debater, and, one lecturer says, cuffs his opponents about as an old-time pedagog did his scholars. He is par excellence an advocate, and had he taken to the law would hav cut out a brilliant career for himself. When good-natured he quotes Shakespere. When vexed he says "Um," and wags his head. When traveling he takes a seat in a parlor car, and writes editorials and answers his correspondence. He is a long-headed, shrewd business man, a splendid lecturer, and a good editor. His Secular Thought is one of the civilizing agencies of Canada, and no country needs it more.

HENRY GEORGE'S municipal ticket bears the names of two known Infidels—Louis F. Post and Frederick C. Leubuscher. Mr. Post will be remembered by our older readers as the writer of "Truth's Sunday Sermons," transferred with Mr. Post's corrections from that daily paper to these columns bv Mr. Bennett. As reporter, editor, lawyer, and assistant United States district attorney, Mr. Post is familiar to New Yorkers. Occasionally he has orated at Paine celebrations, and he was one of the speakers at the banquet given D. M. Bennett on his return from around the world. Mr. Post now aspires to the district attorneyship of the city in place of Mr. Martine. He was an early convert to Georgism, having long been a labor sympathizer. He is short in stature, dark-haired, smooth-faced, with the exception of a light mustach, and rotund body. He is very brainy, and would make a good district attorney. Though a bosom friend of George and McGlynn, he hasn't "worked the religious racket" with much zeal. His part of the business is to answer objections to the land scheme. Frederick C. Leubuscher, the other known Infidel on the ticket, is a young man about thirty, a member of the Society of Humanity, and has done some law work for THE TRUTH SEEKER. He is a stenographer and lawyer, handsome and pert, with a keen eye to the main chance. While he believes in George's scheme, he makes no secret of the fact that he joined the United Labor party with his gaze fixed on the General Sessions judgeship, for which he is nominated. He has had no practice as a criminal lawyer, but would make as good a judge as most of the men now on the bench. Mr. Leubuscher worked hard for George last fall, and deserves whatever political rewards his party can giv him.

THE Rev. Charles F. Deems is measurably honest. Before the New Haven Congregationalist Club, in discussing the public schools, he said: "Religion should not be taught in schools supported by general taxation, and children should not be sent to schools where religion is not taught. There is none of necessity in the curriculum. None hav so much interest in our public schools as the Infidels, Agnostics, and Atheists. I oppose the system because it is unjust, un-American, injurious, unnecessary, and un-Christian. The end to be obtained is good; the method of obtaining it, evil. According to my lights and opportunities I am bound to labor for the disestablishment of the common school." Mr. Deems has much in common with the Catholics.

TWO THINGS WANTED.

First. We want some money from every friend who owes on his subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The balance in the bank from which to draw to satisfy the paper manufacturers and the printer is very small, and we must increase it, or run in debt. There are many hundreds of dollars owing us by subscribers, and we desire to kindly but firmly call their attention to the matter. We need the money, and it is not right for them to keep it from us. We would also respectfully suggest to those whose subscriptions expire during the present month that now is the time to renew. We would call attention, too, to our club rates. Get a new subscriber, and so get your own paper cheaper.

Second. We once more ask our friends to send us the names of all the Infidels of their acquaintance who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER. The intention is to send them sample copies of the paper with the hope that they may subscribe.

Giv Thanks.

In accordance with "immemorial custom," broken only by the Infidel president, Thomas Jefferson, Mr. Grover Cleveland has issued the following proclamation:

"By the President of the United States:

"The goodness and the mercy of God, which hav followed the American people during all the days of the past year, claim their recognition and humble acknowledgment. By His omnipotent power He has protected us from war and pestilence, and from every national calamity; by His gracious favor the earth has yielded a generous return to the labor of the husbandman, and every path of honest toil has led to comfort and contentment; by His loving kindness the hearts of our people hav been replenished with fraternal sentiment and patriotic endeavor, and by His unerring guidance we hav been directed in the way of national prosperity.

"To the end that we may, with one accord, testify our gratitude for all these blessings, I, Grover Cleveland, president of the United States, do hereby designate and set apart Thursday, the twenty-fourth day of November next, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer, to be observed by all the people of the land. On that day let all secular work and employment be suspended, and let our people assemble in their accustomed places of worship, and with prayer and songs of praise giv thanks to our heavenly father for all that He has done for us, while we humbly implore the forgivness of our sins and a continuance of His mercy.

"Let families and kindred be reunited on that day; and let their hearts, filled with kindly cheer and affectionate reminiscence, be turned in thankfulness to the source of all their pleasures, and the giver of all that makes the day glad and joyous. And in the midst of our worship and our happiness, let us remember the poor, the needy, and the unfortunate, and by our gifts of charity and ready benevolence, let us increase the number of those who, with grateful hearts, shall join in our Thanksgiving.

"In witness whereof I hav set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

"Done at the city of Washington, this twenty-fifth day of October, in the year of our Lord 1887, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and twelfth. GROVER CLEVELAND.

"By the president:

"THOMAS F. BAYARD, Secretary of State."

Mr. Cleveland, in becoming president, it seems, has also become pious. This is well. We trust it also betokens due repentance for his sins of early days. He should, however, remember the fate of Ananias and Sapphira, a gentleman and lady who lived some time ago, and made statements having about the same relativ agreement with facts that Mr. Cleveland's recapitulation of causes for rejoicing does.

We suppose it would be cruel to remind the pietists, whose mouthpiece Mr. Cleveland is, that since last Thanksgiving Day the United States army has had some disagreement with certain red men whose lands we hav taken—a disagreement which the red men called a war; that we hav had Asiatic cholera brought to our shores, and a pestilence averted only by science, but not by God; that the earth has not returned full crops, but has been dried up with such exceeding dryness that thousands of farmers are nearly ruined; that honest toil has not led to comfort, and the honest toilers are notoriously *dis*contented; that fraternal sentiment does not prevail, or Mr. Cleveland would not hav been forced to rescind his famous battle flag order;—and because it would be cruel to call attention to these things we forbear. Neither will we, in these piping times of peace and fraternal sentiment and comfort and contentment and gratitude to God, snub our worthy president by asking where he obtained legal authority for the issuance of this document. Let it suffice that it is issued, and let us turn our attention to the matters in hand. Let us thank God.

Let us thank Him for the poor we hav with us. Let us thank Him that a year ago, on this blessed occasion, five thousand people had to be fed in the godly city of Boston by charity; that twice that number waited in rags, with blue hands and pinched faces, at the charitable doors of this city.

Let us thank Him for the mighty storm that crushed in the deck of an ocean steamer, killing six men and injuring twelve others. An ocean storm is one of the grandest works of God.

Let us thank Him for the religious riots in Belfast.

Let us thank Him that Jay Gould has become a regular attendant at church.

Let us thank Him that more people got drunk in celebrating the last birthday of His Son than ever before. This betokens the spread of His own religion, which givs us the blessing of Thanksgiving Day and Grover Cleveland.

Let us thank Him for the fire in Madras, India, which burnt up three hundred heathen, and thus helped settle the Andover controversy.

Let us thank Him again for the wrecks of the Elizabeth and the Harvey Mills, by which forty-eight souls were added to the choir of the blest.

Let us thank Him for the railroad collision at Tiffin, Ohio, which killed sixteen travelers. He holds us all in the hollow of His hand.

Let us thank Him for the epidemic of measles in this city, by which several hundred children were saved from further sin on earth.

Let us thank Him again for the Belfast riots. The blood of Catholic and Protestant is precious in His sight.

Let us thank Him for the scores of cases of smallpox in this city.

Let us thank Him once more for a Belfast riot.

Let us thank Him for the wind-storm at Rochester, which swept down a bridge with all its occupants.

Let us thank Him for the New Ross Irish riot.

Let us thank Him for the earthquake along the Mediterranean coast, which added about two thousand souls to the angelic choir.

Let us thank Him for the Missouri freshets, and the Kansas and Texas drouths.

Let us thank Him many times for more Belfast religious fights.

Let us thank Him for the tornado which destroyed thousands of dollars' worth of property and many lives in Missouri and Kansas. The breath of God bloweth where it listeth.

Let us thank him for Anthony Comstock.

Let us thank Him for the coal-mine explosion in British Columbia and the burial alive of two hundred miners.

Let us thank Him for the Paris theater fire and the death of seventy people. The theater is the scene of the devil's pernicious activity.

Let us thank Him that the death rate in large cities has been higher during the last twelve months of His unexampled blessings than ever before.

Let us thank Him for the railroad horror of Illinois—one hundred and eighteen killed, and four hundred mangled and injured.

Let us thank Him for the burning at sea of the City of Montreal and for the death of thirteen presumed sinners.

Let us thank Him for the B. & O. railroad wreck and the death of twenty persons thereby.

Let us thank Him for the August ocean cyclone and for the scores of lives lost by drowning.

Let us thank Him for the Exeter theater fire, by which He presented a hundred souls to His rival.

Let us thank Him for sending the cholera to our shore from Italy. Especially should the people of Naples thank Him for the scourge which is reducing the population of the place by hundreds, and thus giving more room to those left by the mercy of God.

And there are many other things, O Grover, for which we should thank the Lord, but which we in our weakness of memory forget. Archbishop Corrigan should thank Him for Dr. McGlynn, and Mr. Powderly should sacrifice much for Cardinal Gibbons. The merchants of Chicago, St. Louis, Atlanta, and other towns should thank Him for President Cleveland's wife; Bishop Potter, for Miss Catharine Wolf and the power of love; Dr. Field should rejoice that Colonel Ingersoll livs to giv him fame; and the Christian church owes immeasurable thanks for the great general spread of foolishness.

So, taking it all in all, there is uncommon cause for thankfulness this year, even if we do but rejoice that matters are no worse. And that they are not, we suppose, we owe to the same divine being who has made them as bad as they are.

The Poet of Passion Moralizes.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox has, it seems, been made welcome to the Ingersoll mansion, and has made a commercial transaction of her visits. In doing it, she has also found space to talk back to the great heretic, and emphasize her own belief in Christianity.

There is something remarkable in the fact that no critic of Colonel Ingersoll, no matter how hard they try, can be fair. Dr. Field made the most strenuous exertion to be courteous to Colonel Ingersoll, and in the sincerity of his Christian stupidity thought he had succeeded. But he deliberately accused Colonel Ingersoll of being dishonest and not believing what he preached. Mrs. Wilcox has gone somewhat beyond Dr. Field in penning miserable little flings at a man who she has to acknowledge is good and great, but who happens to differ from her on theological matters. There is something about orthodox Christianity which makes its adherents stupid as moles. They calmly call an Infidel dishonest, tell him that he has done an infinit deal of harm in the world, that though his own life is kind and generous and a magnificent example, he is yet a monster of wickedness, and all the time they are saying these polite things they seem blissfully unconscious of even transgressing the bounds of good breeding. Such pachydermatous simplicity is amusing to behold, but hardly elevates its possessors or their religion in the estimation of unprejudiced folks.

Supposing we should take Mrs. Wilcox's "Poems of Passion," and proceed with our assertions as idiotically as she has done in her description of Colonel Ingersoll's followers. Here is a sample of Mrs. Wilcox's poetry:

"She touches my cheek, and I quiver—
I tremble with exquisit pains;
She sighs—like an overcharged river
My blood rushes on through my veins;
She smiles—and in mad-tiger fashion,
As a she-tiger fondles her own,
I clasp her with fierceness and passion,
And kiss her with shudder and groan.

"Once more, in our love's sweet beginning,
I put away God and the World;
Once more, in the joy of our sinning,
Are the hopes of eternity hurled.
There is nothing my soul lacks or misses
As I clasp the dream-shape to my breast;
In the passion and pain of her kisses
Life blooms to its richest and best.

"O ghost of dead sin unrelenting,
Go back to the dust, and the sod!
Too dear and too sweet for repenting,
Ye stand between me and my God.
If I, by the Throne, should behold you,
Smiling up with those eyes loved so well,
Close, close in my arms I would fold you,
And drop with you down to sweet Hell!"

Another, giving Mrs. Wilcox's ideas of the right argument to bring sinners to God:

"I hav lived this life as the skeptic livs it,
I hav said the sweetness was less than the gall

Praising, nor cursing, the Hand that givs it,
I hav drifted aimlessly through it all.
I hav scoffed at the tale of a so-called heaven,
I hav laughed at the thought of a Supreme Friend;
I hav said that it only to man was given
To liv, to endure; and to die was the end.

"But now I know that a good God reigneth,
Generous-hearted, and kind and true,
Since unto a worm like me he deigneth
To send so royal a gift as you.
Bright as a star you gleam on my bosom,
Sweet as a rose that the wild bee sips;
And I know, my own, my beautiful blossom,
That none but a God could mold such lips.

"And I believe, in the fullest measure
That ever a strong man's heart could hold,
In all the tales of heavenly pleasure
By poets sung, or by prophets told;
For in the joy of your shy, sweet kisses,
Your pulsing touch and your languid sigh,
I am filled and thrilled with better blisses
Than ever were claimed for souls on high.

"And now I hav faith in all the stories
Told of the beauties of unseen lands;
Of royal splendors and marvelous glories
Of the golden city not made with hands
For the silken beauty of falling tresses,
Of lips all dewy and cheeks aglow,
With—what the mind in a half trance guesses,
Of the twin perfection of drifts of snow;

"Of limbs like marble, of thigh and shoulder,
Carved like a statue in high relief—
These, as the eyes and the thoughts grow bolder,
Leave no room for an unbelief.
So my lady, my queen most royal,
My skepticism has passed away;
If you are true to me, true and loyal,
I will believe till the Judgment-day."

What could we not say about the pernicious influence of such sensuous teaching! What sarcasm could not be used against such a religious argument! Every word of criticism directed against Swinburne bears with added force on Mrs. Wilcox's poems. But it would be cruel to retort upon her criticism of those who agree with Colonel Ingersoll, that she has imitated Swinburne's sensuous style and exceeded his poetic license, but with no comprehension of his great brain and greater heart—simply aping his ideas, and living in the midst of viciousness. If one of Colonel Ingersoll's mental friends should say that to her, she would be justified in telling him that he was not a gentleman. With the circumstances actually reversed, what is one of Colonel Ingersoll's friends justified in saying to Mrs. Wilcox?

Mrs. Wilcox has written many fine poems, some of them necessarily of a pessimistic tone, as she relates the world's travel "through the narrow aisles of pain." We wonder if in writing them she did not feel the folly and fallacy of her religion and of her views of a future life? Is the great Swinburnian poetess laying down her arms before the battle is over, acknowledging her religion a failure, her savior a myth, her heaven an idle dream?

Supposing Mrs. Wilcox should entertain some genius who ground out copy for the newspapers, at so much a column, a few evenings in her beautiful home, and that genius should say all this to the public? Supposing he said that while Mrs. Wilcox's rhyming was good, she was tearing down morality, and painting the "raptures and roses of vice" in such attractiv colors as to lead astray the young maidens of the land? Supposing he wrote, too, that she didn't care how many were ruined so long as she sold her books? Supposing this genius added that she gave her gift of poesy to tumbling over the idols of the fireside, and further said that her readers were low-impulsed, coarse-grained people, who see only the sensuality in her poems, and do not appreciate their art and merit; and when rebuked for vicious, immoral lives, say they are followers of Ella Wheeler Wilcox, and "don't believe in no morality, nohow," and quoted this reminiscence of a rake to prove that Mrs. Wilcox believed in "freelove?"

"Two small slippers with big rosets,
Peeped out under your kilt-skirt there,
While we sat smoking our cigarets
(Oh, I shall be dust when my heart forgets!)
And singing that selfsame air;
And between the verses for interlude,
I kissed your throat, and your shoulders nude.

"You were so full of a subtle fire,
You were so warm and so sweet, Lisette;
You were everything men admire,
And there were no fetters to make us tire,
For you were—a pretty grisette.
But you loved, as only such natures can,
With a love that makes heaven or hell for a man."

Would Mrs. Wilcox consider that a certificate of her own purity absolved this genius from the commission of gross injustice?

We are glad that even so obtuse a Christian as Mrs. Wilcox has testified to the nobility of the life and character of a man whom every Freethinker in the world admires—for in the years to come this testimony, wrung from a follower of the meanest of all religions, may be used against other followers of that religion—but as one in intellectual agreement with Colonel Ingersoll, we must rebuke her cruel and ignorant estimate of the character of Infidels.

Mr. Tucker and His Opinions.

Our beloved friend Tucker is again troubled at something we hav said, and in another column alliterativly accuses us of misrepresenting him. But, we ask, are we to blame if his thought is so obscurely expressed that the meaning is not apparent? If he did not mean to condemn us for condemning the judge who tried C. B. Reynolds, why did he say this: "If that enterprising paper [THE TRUTH SEEKER] will hammer the skull of this idiot of the bench [the judge who tried Tueber, the victim of the Hoboken police outrage] as vigorously as it did that of the better-deserving magistrate who tried C. B. Reynolds, Liberty will applaud it as warmly now as it condemned it then?" Mr. Tucker is not lacking in linguistic gifts; why did he choose those words if they did not convey his thought? His explanation does not explain at all. Mr. Tucker's position in the Reynolds matter was, and we think is, that Liberals who will defend a law made by a majority ought to be subject to that law, and take uncomplainingly whatever befalls them. In other words, Mr. Tucker thinks that Mr. Reynolds was served just right because Liberals uphold the governmental system which givs majorities the power to make laws. But even this does not make Mr. Reynolds's judge better deserving at our hands than Mr. Tueber's judge. We believe first that government is necessary. Just how much government, is apart from the question, for Mr. Tucker holds that no government is better than any at all. Admitting that government is necessary, our position is that it must be by the people themselvs, as expressed by them and enforced by representativs duly chosen. The people of this country hav drawn up a federal Constitution, contrary to which no state can go. Through the influence of Infidelity—another name for liberty—this Constitution is a good one, and guarantees free speech. Mr. Reynolds exercised his constitutional guarantee and was punished by an unconstitutional law of New Jersey administered by a judge of that state. We condemned the judge for his action, and Mr. Tucker condemned us for condemning him. Now, who was right, the law-violating judge (for the United States Constitution is the supreme law of the land), or the law-upholding TRUTH SEEKER, or the Anarchistic Liberty which denounces all laws—even those guaranteeing free speech, though not free speech itself—but applauds their unrighteous, illegal, and tyrannical enforcement, except in a case where they restrain an Anarchist?

In this country, in discussing the good and evil of government, we must go to the fountain-head, the federal Constitution. In sentencing Mr. Reynolds the judge went contrary to that instrument, and therefore he did not do his duty, the eminent Boston Anarchist to the contrary notwithstanding.

The people of the United States hav limited the powers of their officers by carefully drawn documents, unchangeable except by their own will. When officers or states exceed their delegated powers or overstep their constitutional limitations, we condemn them. Mr. Tucker, in his hasty and revolutionary zeal, applauds them. If he would pause but a moment to think, he would see that the wrong is not in the system but in the administration. The supreme law forbids the punishment of a man for telling what he thinks; the Anarchists revile that prohibition because it has been broken.

With such exponents as Mr. Tucker it is not surprising that Anarchistic philosophy makes little headway.

Our Friends, the Presbyterians.

The Presbyterian state synod's committee on religion and public education hav made to that body the following recommendations:

"1. That the synod affirm its conviction that our national vigor and permanence are guaranteed only by a religiously-grounded morality.

"2. That without claiming it to be the province of the state to teach religion for religion's sake, the synod should yet confess its belief that, in order to promote the state's own interest, there should be in every school maintained by the state the inculcation of such principles of dependence upon God and obligation to him as are essential to sound learning, safe character, and wholesome citizenship.

"3. That the synod should encourage the appointment of such teachers as shall be in accord with the spirit of the second recommendation, and bring the entire weight of its influence to bear against whatever, by statement or suggestion, shall antagonize the claims of the God upon whom we depend and to whom we owe obligation.

"4. That your committee should be continued, and should hav it for its duty to communicate to the synod whatever information it may be able to secure as to the policy pursued in this particular direction in other Christian countries, and the results respectivly reached, and to scrutinize and report upon whatever attempts may be made to introduce Atheistic teaching into our public schools.

"5. That the synod should instruct its ministers publicly to recognize the difficulties in which the case is involved, and to bring those difficulties to bear as an argument for more thorough, intelligent, and faithful religious instruction on the part of the family, Sunday-school, and the church."

We suppose that the benefits of a religiously-grounded morality are testified to by the lecherous priests, rascally deacons, and defaulting Sunday-school superintendents of the present time. Canada ought to be a very moral country. If sound learning, safe character, and wholesome citizenship depend upon a belief in "God," will the synod tell us which God, and why it is that the Atheists of the United States are as a body the best citizens we hav? The penitentiaries are full of believers in God. Again, will the synod explain why the people must pay taxes to support teachers who are the advocates of a system of theology before they are instructors in secular education?

In other words, if the Presbyterians desire that the church shall run the state, upon what principles of justice will they defend themselvs from the charge of arrogance and religious intolerance? In ancient days Presbyterians administered affairs secular as well as religious; the school, the family, the town, the state, were all under Calvinistic domination. Blood flowed freely then, and the theocracy made of the church a religious slaughter-house. It took two hundred years for the people to break the rule of the Presbyterians, and it cost uncounted lives and untold suffering. For the people now to reinstate the miserable scamps would be to crawl back to the little Dark Age of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

If the Presbyterians were not so narrow and bigoted, they could see the foolishness of their synodical proposition.

MRS. SLENKER writes: "Here we are once more in Abingdon, in good spirits and ready to do battle for free speech and free mails. We left home Saturday at 2 P.M. (after the mail came in). I received a few cheery letters as a stimulus to start upon, in one of which was inclosed $7 for a pair of blankets from our woolen mill. The writer kindly says: 'Of course I can buy much cheaper blankets, but don't want them, and more, I want something to remember the brave words and deeds of "Aunt Elmina" by, and know of nothing that would oftener remind one of her than that which brings constant solid comfort.' Now, this is ever so nice a compliment to me, and I think when he gets the solid wear, as well as 'solid comfort,' out of said blankets, he will find them fully as cheap as less costly ones, for the price doesn't always represent the real value. The day was the first warm, sunshiny one of the week, and we had a pleasant ride of ten miles from Snowville to Central—Mr. Slenker, Mr. W. (one of my witnesses and personal friends), the driver, and myself. Our son Oscar had been at Richmond fair, and at the laying of the corner-stone of Lee's monument, and he met us at Central on his way home. We had a four hours' wait at Central before our train arrived, but some friends came in and enlivened the time with cheery chat, and one special friend took the same train and rode along with us as far as Marion. We had hardly got seated when Mr. Barclay, my decoy, who sat in the seat in front of ours, turned and greeted me as cordially and kindly as if he were a real friend. And right across the aisle an old gentleman spoke to me, whom I at first took to be Mr. Ronald, but a moment after saw it was Diana. I had not hoped for his coming, so it was a very agreeable surprise, and with him was Mr. Chamberlain, the one man in whose hands rests more of the results of the war than perhaps in those of any or all others. Though we had long been correspondents, we had never before met. We steamed out of Central, but were over an hour in going the first mile, owing to a coupling drawing out from between two of the cars. So we were all pretty tired by the time we reached the Colonnade Hotel and ready for 'tired nature's sweet restorer.' We found a large, warm room prepared for us, and in a few moments sank as quietly in the embraces of old Morpheus as if we were off on a pleasure trip. This morning we awoke to find a cold wave striking the place and snowflakes thickly falling, a sudden change from the warm and sunny weather of yesterday. Variety is the spice of life, so we will make the most and the best of whatever comes, knowing that there is more sunshine than shade and more joy than sorrow in the cup of the majority of life's children."

Letters from Friends.

SOUTH PUEBLO, COL., Oct. 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I had the extreme pleasure of listening, about two weeks ago, to a splendid exposition of the principles of Liberalism by Mr. Phelps, at a hamlet near Albuquerque, away down on the Rio Grande. I intended to send you an extended synopsis of the address, but fear I shall be intruding.

I am not a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I am reading my cousin's paper. I shall send you several subscriptions soon, my own among the number.

WILL A. TERRY.

SNOHOMISH, WASH. TER., Oct. 7, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $16, to pay for five new recruits and the reënlistment of three veterans. I think the time is not far distant when we shall be able to increase your subscription list very materially in this part of the country. We hav Prof. J. H. Cook, of Columbus, Kan., with us. He is a veteran in the cause of humanity, and is quite an accession to our town. He has concluded to make this his home for the balance of his days.

The Liberals of this place are looking forward with much interest to the time when Mr. Reynolds will visit us. He is looked upon as a martyr to the cause of humanity, and we will giv him a warm reception. J. S. MARTIN.

CERESOO, MICH., Oct. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Your missiv reached me all right, and that is the right way to protect yourselvs. I hav been very sick and like to die, and had three sons and one daughter come clear from Denver, Col., to attend my funeral, but I gave old Death the slip once more. But it is only a matter of a short time with me, as I am eighty-two. Inclosed find postal for your paper for six months longer, and then, if I liv, I will renew. I want the grand old TRUTH SEEKER as long as I liv. I consider it the most useful paper to the human family I ever saw in print. May it liv for a thousand years, and a thousand more papers just like it. The human family needs them all. THOS. KNIGHT.

LAKE PROVIDENCE, LA., Oct. 19, 1887.

Mr. EDITOR: Right recently we had a series of protracted meetings at this place, of the Methodist persuasion, in which the officiating D.D. abused people most unmercifully for dancing and said many insulting things about them.

Now, I hav long been of the opinion that the church had no right to prevent its members from dancing; that there was no authority in their "Holy Bible" for so teaching; and, if they are endeavoring to teach "God's word" just as it is, they hav no authority from it to condemn dancing unless they can prove that in and of itself it is immoral, which none can do. Now, I want to ask you to send me all the passages of scripture bearing upon that subject, either in THE TRUTH SEEKER or in private letter, and I think it would be edifying to many to see an article from your pen in THE TRUTH SEEKER on that subject. I know it would to me. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is a most excellent paper, and I read it and hand it to a few of my Liberal friends.

There is a great deal of skepticism here, but very little enlightened skepticism. People doubt because there are many things in orthodoxy revolting to common sense, but they never investigate further.

Hoping all success to the cause of Liberal enlightenment, I remain, Yours truly, F. M. KERLIN.

ANAHEIM, CAL., Sep. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The paper and picturcs improve each week. I hav been looking over Elmina's epistles to see if I could find anything in the past ten years that contained a suggestion of obscenity. I fail to find a word. I hav conversed with those that hav read her ideas in public and private, and all are unanimous in the opinion that she has given much needed wise instruction, all of a nature to raise our standard of morality, truth, and virtue. I think if she were a member of some orthodox church the people would put her on the list as a very deserving Christian. Alas! the false views held by fashionable women! One of them was saying to me: "My daughter attends a non-sectarian college." I asked, "Do they hav prayers?" "Why yes, of course." "Well," said I, "then it's not non-sectarian." "Oh, yes it is," she said; "why, anyone that belongs to the Baptists, Catholics, or anybody that pays, can go." I replied, "I should prefer the time of prayers, telling God what he must know, spent more profitably." "Oh, you are an Infidel; don't believe in a God; that is awful. I fear when you lie on your deathbed you will ask God in vain. Oh, I hope you will repent before it is too late. Really, madam, I am surprised at a woman holding Ingersoll's views." "Well," said I, "suppose we try and understand our own views. Thirty years ago I tried to believe as you do, but to-day I am happy to inform you that I hav found that humanity is more necessary to God than God can possibly be to them." You ought to see the look she gave me (she is a member of the church) to hear such a statement. She tried to make me understand that our immaculate civilization was all owing to what Christianity had done for it; that Christians had a monopoly of morality; that if my ideas were taught to the young they would hav no restraint, etc. I gave her my ideas, off-hand, of the impurities contained in their guide-book, and offered her a premium if she or her minister would read before an intelligent audience some plain selections from it. Her husband stood by, and when she found herself cornered she said, "Why don't you stand up for your religion?" Smiling, he replied, "I think you are both doing as well without me." Afterward I found he did not believe it himself. He was able to outgrow the old superstitions and still liv with a fanatic in peace. Now, Liberals, men and women, the time has come, in self-defense, for us to be up and doing, showing by our daily records that we hav been emancipated from the myths of the past, and try by every means to impress the minds of our friends with the unbounded joy and happiness of working for universal mental liberty. MRS. K. PARKER.

CYNTHIANA, KY., Oct. 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of 1st inst. Dr. C. L. Carter, of Holden, Mo., represents Elder Coke, of Nevada, Mo., as using the following language in a lecture on the divinity of Christ: "The old delusion that Christ was born of a virgin is too absurd for any preacher to preach or anybody to believe." I could hardly believe that the Campbellites were evoluting so fast; and, thinking there might be some mistake, I wrote to Elder Coke in regard to it, and received the inclosed reply, which speaks for itself. Of course I hav no means of knowing who is mistaken, but, in justice to all parties, and especially the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I would like to see this note with Elder Coke's reply published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I believe in telling the naked truth if the heavens fall.

Very truly, H. A. BEAMER.

THE PREACHER'S GENTLE NOTE.

NEVADA, MO., Oct. 7, 1887.

H. A. BEAMER, Cynthiana, Ky., Dear Sir: Yours of the 3d inst. is before me.

I suppose you mean the lecture at Warrensburg ("Holden").

First. I was not discussing in the paper the divinity of Christ only constructivly or incidentally.

Second. No! I did not say: "The old delusion that Christ was born of a virgin is too absurd for any preacher to preach or anybody to believe." Nor anything kin to it. No allusion was made to it in the paper. Whoever reported it, saying I said it, is a liar. Yours truly, E. B. COKE.

DETROIT, MICH., Oct. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Brother James Graham has taken exceptions to my article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 3d, but he did not read the article with care, so as to get its full meaning. Now, the question of liberty is certainly the most important of any and all that ever came before the mind of mankind. It has been sought for, fought for, labored for, prayed for, daily for thousands of years; often won, often possessed, but never enjoyed. It is the hope and desire of all people, yet has never been understood or appreciated. Brother Graham does not know what makes slavery, or what constitutes liberty. It is one thing to be a Freethinker, and quite another to be a free man. For eighteen hundred years hav the Christians been telling the people that there is a God; "a son of God, most singularly and unnaturally born; a heaven and a hell, locations unknown;" and hav formulated a creed to suit these claims and stories, none of which they hav ever given any proof of. Just so hav certain persons in all lands formed governments and declared the people living under those governments free; and hav formulated a Constitution, a creed, to suit their ideas of liberty, and hav dinged their declarations of liberty and freedom in the ears of the people continuously, that the people may believe them for their much speaking. And it must be acknowledged that they hav been too successful. Yet they hav never yet formed a free government any more than has the kingdom of heaven come to hand, and it is about time that Liberals should take thought whether they are working for liberty or slavery, for it looks to me as if they hav a creed, called the Nine Demands of Liberalism, which is just as useless as are the Thirty-nine Articles of the orthodox creed. Certain I am that not one of them will ever become useful until our government is made free, and when that is done the Nine Demands will not be wanted.

Now, I am glad that Brother Graham has read and commented on my letter, and I hope that every reader and writer for THE TRUTH SEEKER will seriously read it and think upon it. I said that the people of this country were slaves under the English government. I challenged any man to show a line or sentence in all past history of this country that even proposes to make the people free. On the contrary, the government has never recognized in any manner the least shadow of right of the people to either life, liberty, or to pursue their happiness. "The political creed of the country, the Constitution, provides all necessary powers for alienating every right from the people, but neither provides nor recognizes any rights of the people to life, liberty, or to pursue their happiness." Brother Graham says it is true that slavery was permitted to exist for a time, etc. This is not so; slavery was not permitted to exist, for all were slaves under government, by the very nature of the government. Freedom never did, never can, exist under any government that has ever yet been formed. Slavery is the natural and inevitable consequence of such governments.

Brother Graham says that Jefferson sowed the seeds of liberty when he declared that all people are endowed with an inalienable right to life, liberty, and to pursue their happiness. Yet Mr. Jefferson lived many years, and saw the government enslave all of the people, and alienate every vestige of those rights which he had declared were inalienable. Now, what does Mr. Graham understand to be the meaning of the word "inalienable?" He knows that the gallows has been in frequent, and has come to be an almost daily requisition in some parts of this country, so common that mobs frequently make a true answer to save time and trouble, and often the people go through the performance themselvs as a short road out of slavery! To me the word "inalienable" means that no power but that which conferred those rights has the right to interfere with or abridge them; and if this is true, then are the people of this country not only slaves, but they are through their government also daily murderers, robbers, and thieves; for we claim that ours is a government of the people.

Mr. Graham says nowhere else has the poor man enjoyed so fair a chance to better his condition as in the land of Washington and Franklin. Brother Graham's vision does not reach very far from home, I fear, and I judge that his past life has been fortunate. Will he please take THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 20th and read over "The Gospel Racket," and note the extract from the Hartford Examiner? Will he take his history and read of the times just after the war closed and the adoption of the Constitution; how a rebellion arose in Massachusetts, and courts of law (slavery) were closed by mobs armed to resist the collection of debts and taxes; and four thousand of the trained slaves were sent by the slave power (the governor) to put down the insurrection, and fourteen were found guilty of treason! And the great convention was at work for four months, and came near dissolving without accomplishing anything; and when it was finished and signed, the people at once were divided by it into two strong political parties upon the good or evil that they feared or hoped would follow the adoption of the new political creed. Let Mr. Graham read more carefully than he has ever done the past history of this so-called free country, and then tell me where to find the liberty which after a hundred years makes every worker poorer, deeper in slavery at night than when he went to work in the morning; that has brought us to that time when thousands can declare they hav no pleasure in them and prefer death to slavery.

J. H. WOOD.

DECATUR, ILL., Sep. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been waiting with the utmost impatience for some one of your readers to giv the desired information called for by our worthy and Liberal friend, J. D. Shaw, of Waco, Texas.

Since no one seems to take up the gauntlet in defense of Liberalism and human justice, I beg leave of you, Mr. Editor, to allow me a limited space in THE TRUTH SEEKER to throw a faint light upon this wanted information. No doubt Mr. Shaw has been apprised of the facts long ere this, but no doubt that your many readers are equally interested as himself about this misrepresentation.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 3d Mr. Shaw says: "Rev. W. F. Black, a pedantic Campbellite preacher, who commended himself to the Christian people of this city by claiming some relationship with the late Judge Jeremiah Black, and as having preached in the city where Colonel Ingersoll was raised, tells his congregations that he once converted and baptized twenty-seven out of twenty-eight members of a Liberal League in Mechanicsburg, Ill. Upon reading this I wrote to Mr. A. H. Martin, a stauch Liberal and a man of truth, who resides at that place. In reply to my letter Mr. Martin said: "Mr. Black says that he baptized twenty-seven out of twenty-eight persons belonging to the Liberal League. There were but ten charter members and three constitutional members, making in all thirteen members. Out of these he baptized four. Prodigous! don't you think so? And they were weak-kneed members at that." And now if said Black said he baptized twenty-seven out of twenty-eight, and said it on his own responsibility, what does he tell? A—a—a—you know. But sometimes these shepherds tell things to boom up their orthodoxy like Paul. Mr. Black, when preaching here, said to his congregation that Paine, while he was writing the "Age of Reason," had never read the Bible. As he said these words he brought his hand up and down, exclaiming, "I know what I am talking about." I would say to the Liberals who hav read the "Age of Reason," "You know that Black does not know what he is talking about." Paine does say that while he was writing the first part of the "Age of Reason" he did not hav the Bible, but quoted it only from memory. I wonder if Mr. Black could do as well, had it not been that he spent the greater part of his life dreaming over that old mass of superstitious fables? While Mr. Black was telling his congregation at Waco that he was related to Judge Black, why did he not inform them, also, as to what relation he was to Prof. W. F. Black, who, several years ago, eloped with another man's wife, and went to St. Louis? And while they were there spending their honeymoon, the newsboys of Indianapolis were running about the streets vending their papers, yelling, "All about the Black scandal," pointing at the same time at the large heading, "The Black Scandal." I wonder again if Mr. Black ever saw the little pamphlet called "The Crimes of Preachers." If he has not, I would advise him to send at once to THE TRUTH SEEKER and secure a copy, wherein he will find an elaborate list of the somewhat unfortunate holy shepherds, with their beautiful behavior respectfully attached thereto. The author of this little book collected only about nine hundred of these fallen heroes for Christ's sake in the space of six years. And during that six years the Black scandal of Indianapolis was added to this nine hundred list. And, as the Christian says, the Lord knows how large that list is by this time. If Mr. Billings has kept a sharp eye on the newspapers his book ought to be three times its original size. W. L. SANDERS

NORSE, TEX., Sept. 25, 287.

MR. EDITOR: The unprecedented drouth, of which I wrote you last spring, has continued through the summer just closing in this and the south and southwestern portions of this, the Lone Star State, leaving us in a rather precarious condition financially, as but very little of any kind of crops was raised here this year. It is worse even than last year in this vicinity, as a comparativly good crop of wheat was then produced. But we must struggle the best we may, hoping for better times in store for us in the future. The drouth was suddenly broken on the 30th of August by a regular flood. It then rained heavily for eight consecutiv hours without the least interruption, which caused the streams to rapidly swell and overflow their banks, destroying considerable property within their raging water's reach. So you will perceive we hav had the remarkable—almost paradoxical—experience of actually suffering from both drouth and flood at one and the same time. Fortunately, but few here, however, hav been affected by the flood; on the rivers is where it did the most damage. Nature has, since the rain, put on her spring-like garb of green, and stock will be in fine condition for winter.

The Farmers' Alliance, an organization composed chiefly of farmers, are doing a noble work here—not only in Texas, but it is rapidly spreading throughout the Southern States—and I hope that by a consolidation with the Farmers' Alliance of the North we may finally, together with other labor organizations having the same general principles and ends in view, coöperate and march in solid phalanx against the cohorts of monopoly's oppressiv reign, and victory perch upon our banners.

The specific aims and objects of the Farmers' Alliance are, as I would define them: Our industrial emancipation from the thraldom of monopoly's rule. In the words of the platform of purposes it is: "1. To labor for the education of the agricultural classes in the science of economical government in a strictly non-partisan spirit. 2. To indorse the motto, 'In things essential, unity; in all things, charity.' 3. To develop a better state, mentally, morally, socially, and financially."

These are the three first and most important principles of our order (I say "our order," being a member of it)—principles which it seems to me every right-minded and conscientious person would indorse. The other propositions I leave out for want of space here. Our watchwords are organization, education, and coöperation. I expect much good to be accomplished through this organization. It will, I confidently hope, be no mean nor small factor toward the attainment and ultimate achievement of universal emancipation for all mankind, especially in the quickening of intelligence or education of the masses to become industrially and politically independent, so that we may in time all become in fact truly independent citizens of a true republic.

Something is undoubtedly imperativly needed to avert the threatening and imminent dangers by which our once free institutions are to-day menaced by the constantly increasing corrupting influence and power of money, corporate capital, banking institutions, land syndicates, etc., both domestic and foreign, or we may awake some day to the realization that our boasted republic has been converted into a moneyed oligarchy, from whence even the semblance of liberty may hav forever fled. But as we find that the leaven of intellectual advancement is silently but surely going on among the people, we feel assured that such a dire calamity will be averted. A revolution seems, however, inevitable, which I hope may be a peaceable revolution by means of the ballot, instead of a bloody and barbarous one by the bullet.

I must close for this time. Please send a sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER to each of the inclosed names.

Fraternally, T. THEO. COLWICK.

PACIFIC, MO., Oct. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I scare know what to do with myself. Do without the paper? I am loth to do it, although at times it makes me feel unpleasant, and I think I ought to. Firstly, I am tired of religious subjects; secondly, it gives me too much cause for worry; and, thirdly, the many statements made are inconsistent with relations and my knowing.

I am a Republican, radical and outspoken; I am an Infidel of a pronounced type. I am, withal, a Spiritualist of necessity. So you may know that I am not likely to be one-sided or biased.

Religion rules and shapes; it has caused conditions and holds them yet, if somewhat weakened, or even much. The mass of people yet require the showing up of it, I will admit, but I do not any more.

I hav all my interest in the present, in life and causes as they affect us now; I care nothing for exhibitions of learning of the past. What are the positions reformers take? What are their attitudes to one another—to the cause they advocate? Are they consistent with friendship, harmony, and correlativ principles? It is often the case that they are not, and that is what agitates my mind, robs me of my peace, and makes me fear.

I am down on all that is technical, on all book-learned wisdom, on all inspired and self-circumstanced, self-conditioned construction and contrivance. I want a true exhibition of facts and causes as they are us, as they condition us, and none other. Hear all, then decide, is a very good maxim; but where lies the truth? Can all men judge? Hav they all knowledge of the truth—the cause? How can you harmonize and unite without agreeing as to cause and methods?

Here are Infidels. One set are Anarchists, one Socialists, one Communists, one real Liberals; one, and a large percentage, Spiritualists; one Freclovers. Each one is fired up from his own standpoint of life, circumstance, and condition, past and present. The first is utterly at variance with sense itself; the two succeeding hav some fine features in them, but yet are void of wholeness, because of correlates, the life and natures of the people of this amalgamated nation. Make love free and lawful, and what would life be worth in a generation? It is absurd. Spiritualism has produced much agitation. It is true it has, and holds within itself, much fraud and deception, much abuse. But is it true? It is, in all of its phases. But has it any virtue for man? As far as my experience goes, as far as I hav seen, heard, and felt, as far as my own condition in life is concerned, it has not. "Negativs" are never good in any cause or purpose, in any life or nature. For what is spirit $x$ of cause? But that does not do away with the fact, and spirit life is as true as this life, for one depends upon the other; both are equal. I hav wondered often how a man can reason against the thought of a life or state above the present, or immortality. If matter is eternal, and has evolved out of itself life, thought, and consciousness, a motiv state, how can the elements be annulled? how can the law itself be annulled? If man can think and reason because of his complex state, as of the eternal sum, how is it possible for him to discontinue? On the other hand, is it not logic to reason that, while nature remains, which has evolved man, in which man has thought and been a motiv being for untold ages in all its cosmical changes, he will continue to liv hereafter—to liv after death? Looking at things in that light, Mr. Editor, what is there left of Materialism?

You had no need to remind me of duty. I always paid before. I say every one that is a man ought to pay for this best and grandest paper without being dunned.

Yours truly, A. H. KRUGER.

DR. YORK IN BOSTON.

BOSTON, Oct. 22, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to say, for the benefit of those interested in our work, that I am still on the war-path, and hav arrived at the objectiv point of my Eastern trip across the continent, and the Mecca of all faithful pilgrims of Freethought.

Since my last letter, I hav lectured three Sundays in Pittsburgh, three Sundays in Philadelphia, and two Sundays in Boston, to large and enthusiastic audiences. Our stay in Pittsburgh was made highly pleasant by the warm-hearted courtesy of Roman Staley, Harry Hoover, H. H. Timbey, Mr. Barker, Mr. Pearce, and in fact by all of the official members of that most activ and thoroughgoing Liberal League. But more especially are we under many obligations to Mr. Abel and Mr. Mingel, and their families, for much kindness, and assistance in taking in the many (to us) novel sights with which Pittsburgh, the great workshop of America, abounds.

Iron works for the manufacture of almost everything which can be made out of iron, as also glassware works, which were highly interesting, are to be seen; and I may say that a visit to the great works where iron is converted into steel, in the night-time, is most fearfully beautiful. And the amount of enterprise and energy displayed in this intensely busy city is most wonderful. And Pittsburgh, once shrouded in blackness and smoke, is finding a happy resurrection to light and brightness by the use of natural gas instead of coal for all heating purposes. Long last the natural gas, to brighten the prospects and increase the wealth of Pittsburgh!

Our lectures in Pittsburgh were well received by increasing audiences, and we are anticipating a good time on our return visit on our way West with the Liberals of Pittsburgh.

Of course we regret the mishap, which has been explained by the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which prevented our speaking in New York, and rendered our stay quite brief in that greatest of American cities—and yet long enough to take a good look through the TRUTH SEEKER office, which is commodious, convenient, and cheery, and to hav a good chat with its Editor, as also with that most genial spirit, the business manager of the concern, C. P. Somerby, and family, to whom we are indebted for courtesy and what seemed to us like real Western hospitality and kindness. Of course, sight-seeing was not our business in New York, and yet our hopes in this regard were gratified. The courtesy of the Editor and manager of THE TRUTH SEEKER made it possible for us to see some of the great things in this city; among which were the great Brooklyn bridge, one of the wonders of the world, the product of intellect and genius, both grand and beautiful; the Egyptian Obelisk in Central Park, covered over with strange characters which tell the tale of the far-off past long since obscured by the night of ages; the museum, containing, among many rich and rare things in nature and art, some most magnificent paintings, which filled me with delight, only the time was too short to drink in half of the beauty and glory contained in only three of these great works of art. "The Horse Fair," by Rosa Bonheur, is a $50,000 picture, her masterpiece, which one would never tire in beholding, every particular horse is so strongly marked with individuality, not only in outward form, but the soul and temperament of every animal is made to shine through by her lofty genius. Another great picture is "The Organ Rehersal," in which the figures seemed to stand out and away from the canvas, and so lifelike one might fancy he could hear them sing—none but a master hand could portray so faithfully and grandly—not the subject of the piece is grand, as churches and church choirs in their use are the elements of superstition and bondage—but the living soul with which the artist has endowed the canvas is the glory of refinement and beauty.

One other great work of art carried me back to the inception of American liberty, and that was of Columbus and a few followers before that queenly queen presenting his theory, hope, expectation, and desire to find a new world, and as I gazed upon it, I thought, if there is anything which should entitle a soul to immortality, such genius should be that thing divine.

From these works of nature and art we were conducted by our friend and Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER to St. Patrick's Cathedral, the work of devotion to a false and cruel system of religion. The structure is grand, the finest of the kind on our continent, and we were informed by our guide that the valuable land on which this temple of sin rested was procured of the city for the astounding sum of $1, and that the greater part of the vast sum which this structure has cost has been wrung from the scanty wages of the servant-girls of this pagan city—and then to hav that great statue of Liberty with flaming torch standing in her portals is to my mind a burlesque on the name of human liberty. Poor New York! how she is stifled by the red-mouthed policy of Rome! And not much of a prophet is needed to predict what the harvest will be.

Our stay of three weeks in Philadelphia, I trust, was profitable to people and speaker. The hall was filled to its fullest capacity, and all seemed to enjoy the lectures, which was attested by their generous contributions to the speaker. Many thanks are due to the Liberals of Philadelphia for their warm support and kindness to us, and especially our thanks are due to Professor Seymour, J. O. Bently, Geo. Longford, and all others who by word and deed gave us a helping hand. The City of Brotherly Love is a grand old city—not so mighty as New York, and not so beautiful as Boston—and yet it contains some features of historic interest which make it great and precious to the American people.

There stands old Independence Hall, the cradle of American liberty. There look down upon you from the walls the faces of those noble men who gave their lives for us and freedom. There hangs the old liberty bell, whose voice rang out to tell the story of our nation's birth. There the relics by pen and sword and deeds of those brave spirits who laid the foundation of an empire of which I am proud to be a son. Here lie Franklin and many others of that noble band, in the Quaker burial-ground, carefully and sacredly kept, near the center of this great city, now full of life on every side.

Here is the room in which Thomas Paine wrote his grand and glowing inspirations of human liberty, and we were glad to see his portrait hanging again where it rightfully belongs, among the fathers of the Revolution in Independence Hall, now made sacred by the memories of the past. Hardly can an American visit the Quaker City, and not feel a manly pride and tenderness toward these relics and monuments which point back to the infancy of our national life.

Our stay in Boston has been most pleasant. Our audiences hav been large, bright, and lively; and I must say that I was full and proud to make my bow in Paine Hall to a Boston audience, with our friends, Mendum and Seaver, two old beacon-lights of American Liberalism, to preside. Messrs. Mendum and Seaver, I like them much, and though well stricken with years, they giv promis of some good service in the future. Mr. Seaver is big-hearted, clear-headed, jolly, and good, and withal broad-minded and tolerant. Mr. Mendum, with whose family of kindly and gifted daughters we spent a pleasant evening, is a most genial and courteous man, who begins to show the marks of an intense, earnest, activ life in our cause. And these two men, so widely different in temperament, are more nearly like brothers than one often will find.

We are also made glad by the kindness of Ernest Mendum, as also the long-time clerk in their office, Mr. O'Malley, who hav helped to make our stay pleasant in Boston, and our thanks are due to the Liberals of the Hub, and we carry away with us many happy recollections of these friends and our visit.

We hav not space to tell all of what we think about Boston, and can only say from our brief visit that it is a most beautiful city, and an epitome of American enterprise, industry, and culture. We hav paid a visit to Bunker Hill, marked by a splendid monument; the rooms of natural history, and many places of interest to the newcomer, all of which attest in a large degree to the enterprise of these people. We hav noted Boston Common, Faneuil Hall, the Old South church, and Brimstone Corner. We hav paid particular attention to the Paine Memorial building, and can assure the Liberals of the West that this grand structure is indeed a most worthy memorial to that great and good man, Thomas Paine, as well as a credit to those who projected it, and the hearts and hands which hav assisted to make this great and only monument of American Liberalism a grand success.

We were glad to meet our brother Washburn, a grand specimen of true manhood, and a worthy worker in the field of Freethought. We also had great pleasure in listening to that veteran Unitarian minister, Bartoll, of whom we hav heard and read for many years; and also had a rare treat at Tremont Temple in listening, with three thousand others, to the eloquent Mary A. Livermore, in an address before the Women's Temperance Union. She is a grand woman, who has taken a brave stand for many years in favor of woman suffrage and human rights. Her presence is commanding; her speech is a flood of good sense; and her magnetic, persuasiv power sweeps like a breeze through the hearts of her auditors.

There are many good things which must be left unsaid, for want of space, about Boston and the Liberals at Paine Hall.

Our thanks are due to our old friend Samos Parsons, of San Jose, the garden city of California, for his gift of $5, sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER for us, to help us, as he said, in fighting the battle of Freethought. This is not a new thing for him to do, and we trust that he may liv many years yet to enjoy the advance of our noble cause.

One more Sunday and our work is done here, and we turn our faces once more toward our Western home. We will speak at Buffalo on October 30th; at Bradford, Pa., on November 1st; at Pittsburgh on November 6th and 13th; at Akron, O., on November 16th; at Kent, November 19th, 20th, and 21st; at Des Moines, Ia., November 27th; at Denver, December 4th; at Greeley, December 6th and 7th; Salt Lake, Utah, December 11th; and are sorry that we cannot respond to one-half of the calls to speak in Maine, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Iowa, and Kansas, as circumstances call us home and to bring our Eastern trip to a close. And with many good wishes for THE TRUTH SEEKER and its readers,

I am, Yours for truth, J. L. YORK.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

To the Children.

We trust you will not forget about the prizes offered by Mr. Marlett, of Chicago, for the best essays on "Why I am a Liberal."

We would like all the children to try for the prizes, under the conditions stated in the Corner Oct. 1st, and please send them in as early as convenient.—ED. C. C.

Free Speech.

All conviction should be valiant:
Tell thy truth, if truth it be,
Never seek to stem its current;
Thoughts, like rivers, find the sea;
It will fit the widening circle
Of eternal verity.

Speak thy thought if thou believ'st it,
Let it jostle whom it may,
E'en although the foolish scorn it,
Or the obstinate gainsay;
Every seed that grows to-morrow
Lies beneath the clod to-day.

If our sires, the noble-hearted,
Pioneers of things to come,
Had like some been weak and timid,
Traitors to themselvs, and dumb,
Where would be our present knowledge?
Where the hoped millennium?

Where would be triumphant Science,
Searching with her fearless eyes,
Through the infinit creation
For the soul that underlies—
Soul of beauty, soul of goodness,
Wisdom of the earth and skies?

Where would be all great inventions,
Each from bygone fancies born,
Issued first in doubt and darkness,
Launched 'mid apathy and scorn?
How could noontime every light us
But for dawning of the morn?

Where would be our free opinion,
Where the right to speak at all,
If our sires, like some mistrustful,
Had been deaf to duty's call,
And concealed the thoughts within them,
Lying down for fear to fall?

Though an honest thought, outspoken,
Lead thee into chains or death,
What is life compared with virtue?
Shalt thou not survive thy breath?
Hark! the future age invites thee!
Listen! tremble, what it saith.

It demands thy thought in justice,
Debt, not tribute of the free;
Hav not ages long departed
Groaned, and toiled, and bled for thee?
If the past hav lent thee wisdom,
Pay it to futurity. —Charles Mackay.

Do the Best You Can.

If in this world you would succeed,
You must be brave and true;
Don't stand aloof and slight your work
Because 'tis hard to do.
If troubles come and sorrows rise,
Then show yourself a man;
Let courage nerve you for your work,
And do the best you can.

And in your study or your play
Determin to excel;
Don't lag behind, but "hoe your row,"
And strive to hoe it well.
In all your play, in all your work,
Just try the golden plan;
Be activ, ready, brave, and bold,
And do the best you can.

Life's battle now is fairly on,
And there is work to do,
Will you be activ in the fight
And to your colors true?
You see the men around you now
Who thus their lives began;
Then courage take, brave efforts make,
And do the best you can.

—Golden Days.

Little Courtesies.

What a pleasant world this might be if everyone would strive to remember and observe the little greetings of common, everyday life. A cheerful "Good-morning" has made sunshine in a house all day long, while a solemn, silent visage appearing at the breakfast table has struck a shadow of gloom over the entire household.

It is a deplorable fact that parents, and teachers generally, neglect to impress, by precept and example, upon the plastic mind of childhood the importance of observing the "sweet, small courtesies" that go so far to make living agreeable at home and elsewhere. It is written that "the Lord loveth the cheerful giver," and we humans love the cheerful speaker. Involuntarily the heart goes out to the one who scatters bright words and happy smiles, whose hearty "Good-morning," "Good-afternoon;" and "Good-night" linger on memory's ear like notes of sweetest music.

How many people think these greetings of no consequence in one's own family, but are careful to observe them strictly with a chance acquaintance. But the little courtesies, like charity, should begin at home.

People forget to say "Thank you" for home favors, and often fail to evince any pleasure at little tokens of good-will given by members of the family circle. Many childish hearts hav been chilled at the coldness shown by a parent at the work of tiny little fingers, crude and imperfect though it may hav been, yet as an offering of childish love it was entitled to as much show of gratitude, yes, and more than if it had been proffered by a prince. Careful should parents be in observing the graces of life, the etiquet of the table, the kitchen, sitting, and dining room, as well as the parlor; then there will be no reason to fear that the children will not follow the example of their elders. Good words are next to good acts, and let us not be chary of them. They cost nothing, and can create a world of pleasure. Then, too, words once spoken can never be picked up again. So should we be careful to speak only those words that will bring no sorrow or regret when we remember them, and at all times and upon all occasions to cherish the little courtesies that sweeten and make bright the life we liv, as well as the lives of those around us. S. H. W.

Smart Little Jakie.

On Clinton place, near where THE TRUTH SEEKER office used to be, there is a barber shop kept by a man whose first name is Jacob. He is a German, and he has a little son seven or eight years old, who is of course a German also, and whose name is Jakie. One day the barber went out of his shop for a few minutes and told Jakie to stay there until he came back; so down Jakie sits in one of the chairs, puts his feet up in the air as he had seen his father do when waiting for a customer, and pretended to read a paper.

Pretty soon a rough-looking man came in and asked for the barber.

"He's gone out for a minute," says Jakie.

"Where?" asks the man.

"Roun' der corner," Jakie replied.

"Well, you just run roun' der corner an' tell him I want to see him," said the man.

Jakie at first was going after his father, but he noticed that the man didn't look as if he had the price of a shave, and he noticed, too, that he was looking at the drawers along in front of the chairs as though he wanted the one containing the money. Jakie got out of the chair and stood with his shoulders against the money-drawer; and when the man said again, "Go tell your father a gentleman wants to engage his services," he shook his head and said, "Nixy," which meant no.

"Go on," said the man.

"Go 'way," said Jakie.

Just here Jakie saw his father coming. "There's me fader," he said to the man.

But the customer didn't wait; he ran out as Jacob came in.

"Vhat did dot feller want, my leedle son?" inquired Jacob.

"He wanted me to go after you," replied Jakie.

"And why didn't you go?"

"He must hav thought I was pretty young," said Jakie, "to leave the shop and let him go through the till."

"By jimmineddy," said Jacob, "you was right. I bet you dot feller wanted to run off with the money-drawer."

"Course he did," said Jakie, very importantly."

"You was a brave lad, my leetle son, and one time I make you a present already. Hold on; here, take this evening Telegram and go sell it for a cent, and buy you a stick of candy, and gif your sister half."

Little Jakie took the paper and galloped out to the corner of Broadway, where he sold it for two cents instead of one.

When he was gone his father said to a customer: "By hokey, dot boy is smarter than what his old fader is already. I bet your life he was a policeman some day."

Infusorial Life.

A matter of surprise and wonder to those who witness it for the first time is the rousing to life of whole colonies of infusoria by the addition of a drop of water to a few grains of earth or dust. These microscopic organisms abound everywhere in water containing decomposing vegetable or animal matter, and some forms may in a dried state remain for months or even years apparently dead, to be revived when water is again supplied to them. Mr. Jabez Hogg has been experimenting during the past three years with one form of infusorial life, the rotifers or wheel animalcules, and has even kept dried specimens for a time at a temperature of 200 degrees Fahrenheit, and afterward exposed them to intense cold, neither process killing them or greatly diminishing their vital powers. Mr. Hogg supposes that as the animal dries it shuts itself up like a telescope, its skin taking an egg-like shape, and that a secreting organ coats the body with a gelatinous envelope which protects it from further change.

With the Children.

Bright Fancies and Odd Speeches of the Little Ones.

A BORN LAWYER.

Street scene: Three small boys, one manipulating a long stick of molasses candy by inserting it into his œsophagus, and bringing it to view again.

Second small boy: "Say, Johnny, giv me a piece."

"Naw, I won't, coz you axed me."

Third small boy: "Say, Johnny, I didn't ax ye."

"Well, I seed you didn't want any."—Providence Journal.

DISCREDITED BY INSINUATION.

It is pleasant to know even one family in which the child of tender years takes an interest in those practical details of housekeeping which make a woman so valuable to a man who wants to keep house. The youngster is but seven. They are a family of three, and none of them like dessert. But the other evening a guest unexpectedly came to dinner, and it came to a question as to whether he might not like a bit of cheese. The young lady, with great urbanity, looked up and said:

"Mamma, I don't believe there's anything in the house except some 'mouse' cheese, and I don't think the general would like that."—San Francisco Chronicle.

THE GENUIN HUNTSMAN SPIRIT.

A small boy was given a toy gun in the use of which beans served as ammunition. The little fellow was tremendously excited over the toy, and came in one morning from the yard, where he had been firing it, exclaiming excitedly:

"I shot a bean right up through God's house, and think I hit him!"

The earnestness of the little lad showed how unconscious he was of any sound of irreverence in his words.—Providence Journal.

A THEORY AND A QUERY.

A little three-year-old Chicago girl and her grandmother were walking on Madison street a day or two ago when they met a man who was hobbling along on crutches.

"Grandma," said the little girl, "what a funny looking man. What's the matter with him?"

"That poor man has only one leg," replied the lady, "he is a cripple."

The little blue eyes looked sympathizingly and thoughtfully at him, and for a few moments the child said nothing. Then, having apparently formed some kind of a theory as to the cause of the poor man's deformity, she asked:

"Grandma, what is God doing with his other leg?"—Chicago Tribune.

THE REFORMED HOME GOVERNMENT.

Mother (to four-year-old): If your dolly has been so naughty as you say, Flossie, why don't you giv her a good whipping?

Flossie (thoughtfully): 'Cause I don't b'lieve in that sort of thing.—Philadelphia North American.

A QUESTION OF PEDIGREE.

Little Mabel, five years old, is not so young but that she has picked up some knowledge of the ways of the world. She said to her mother the other day, after a fit of deep musing, "Say, mamma, who was papa before he married us, anyway?" "Who was papa? Why, he was the same man that he is now." "Yes, but what was he to you? Was he just a man that you mashed?"—Alton, Ill., Democrat.

EQUAL RIGHTS DEMANDED.

A little Sedalia girl who had been taught to offer prayer to God before retiring to rest nights was with her mother at the St. Louis fair last week and stopping with friends in the city, where there were other visitors, among whom were some ministers. Ministerial vacation had been the theme of the after-supper conversation, two of the ministers saying they were enjoying a much-needed rest. The little lady was reminded, on preparing for bed at night, that she had neglected her usual prayer. With a manifest feeling that all was right with her she replied, "Why, these ministers are here on a preaching vacation; I am tired, and want a praying vacation, too."—Sedalia, Mo., Bazoo.

WEAKENING INFLUENCES.

Jamie's mother took him to a Christian convention, and he was so much impressed that he was a very good boy for several days after. One day he was very restless, and had to be corrected several times. After his mamma had talked with him seriously for some naughty action he exclaimed, "I guess you'll hav to take me to another convention, won't you, mamma?"—Youth's Companion.

KNEW ALL ABOUT PETER.

It was at a Sunday-school exhibition, and the superintendent was showing off the results of his labors. During the exercises he asked the children who could tell him anything about Peter. No one answered. The question was repeated several times, till finally a little girl held up her hand. "Well, my dear," said the superintendent, "that's right; I am glad to see there is one little girl who will put these larger boys and girls to shame." The little girl came forward to the platform and was told to tell the audience what she knew of Peter. She put her finger in her mouth, and, looking very smiling, said:

Peter, Peter, pumpkin eater,
Had a wife and couldn't keep her;
Put her in a pumpkin shell,
And there he kept her very well.

Amid the roar that followed she hurried gaily to her seat.—Our Dumb Animals.

HOW THE BABY LOOKS.

A little Byfield girl, two years old, went with her aunt to see a baby, and when she came home exclaimed, "O mamma! the baby cried till it bent its face all over."—Newburyport News.

OPPOSED TO MIDDLEMEN.

A little four-year-old chubby-faced boy sat clenching his fingers around a silver dollar at the Sunday-school service at the Methodist Episcopal church, in Tyrone, Pa., on Sunday, and later reluctantly surrendered it to a person who collected the contributions to the church fund, saying afterward, "I didn't want to giv it to Mr. B.; I wanted to giv it to the Lord."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

Correspondence.

SNOHOMISH, W. T., Oct. 16, 1887.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Madam: I saw in your Corner, in the last TRUTH SEEKER, that prizes were offered for the best essays on the subject, "Why I am a Liberal." As Liberalism is about to institute through the American Secular Union one of the grandest reforms in human history, I thought this a good chance to tell the people of the country why I am a Liberal. I do not expect to get a prize, as there are many of the competitors who hav had advantages over myself. This is my first essay outside of several short essays in the public school at Snohomish, six attempts at orations in the public school, and one in the Snohomish High School. I am only fifteen years of age, but I hav the reputation of having the best knowledge of History and Geography of any one under twenty years of age. and I am further advanced in other studies than the majority of Snohomish scholars of the same age. When S. P. Putnam was at Snohomish I joined the Secular Union, and now, with the rest of the Society, await the arrival of Mr. Reynolds and the return of Mr. Putnam.

Respectfully, EDWARD C. MORSE.

[The essay was duly received, and awaits examination. We hope to receive a large number of essays upon the subject, "Why I am a Liberal." All will be printed, whether taking prizes or not.—ED. C. C.]

The Gods. Paper, 50 cts; cloth, $1. In five lectures, comprising, "The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," and "Heretics and Heresies."

The Ghosts. Paper, 50 cts; cloth, 1.25. Contents: "The Ghosts," "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child," "The Declaration of Independence," "About Farming in Illinois," "The Grant Banquet," "The Rev. Alexander Clark," "The Past Rises before Me Like a Dream," and "A Tribute to Ebon C. Ingersoll."

Some Mistakes of Moses. Paper, 50cts; cloth, $1.25.

Interviews on Talmage. Paper, 50cts; plain cloth, $1.25.

What Must We Do to Be Saved? Paper, 25 cents.

The Christian Religion. By R. G. Ingersoll, Judge Jeremiah S. Black, and Prof. George F. Fisher. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

Orthodoxy. 56 pages, 12mo, paper, 10 cents. $1.00 per doz. post paid. Printed in large, clear type, and containing as much as could be delivered in two ordinary lectures. This makes a grand missionary document. Liberals should scatter it generously.

Ingersoll Catechised: His Answers to a Number of Vital Questions Propounded by the editor of the San Franciscan. 5 cents; 50 cents per dozen; 25 copies, $1; 100 copies, $3. Millions of these should be circulated.

Vindication of Thomas Paine from the attacks of the New York Observer, by Robert G. Ingersoll. Price, 15 cents.

Address on the Civil Rights Bill. Large size octavo, paper, 10 cents.

Ingersoll's Lectures Complete. Bound in one volume. To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the three will be forwarded to any address, for 50 cts, or either one for 15 cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, 4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, 7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

Life. A Prose Poem. Printed in colors on board, beveled gilt edges. 50 cents.

Among the subjects considered by Mr. Remsburg are: The Church and Morality; Criminal Statistics, showing the creeds of the prisoners in the penitentiaries; the Church and Civilization; the Church and Science; the Church and Learning; the Church and Liberty; the Church and the Antislavery Reform; the Woman's Rights Movement; the Temperance Reform; the Church and the Republic.

Bible Morals. Twenty Crimes and Vices Sanctioned by Scripture Falsehood and Deception; Cheating; Theft and Robbery; Adultery and Prostitution; Murder; Wars of Conquest and Extermination; Despotism; Intolerance and Persecution; Injustice to Woman; Unkindness to Children; Cruelty to Animals; Human Sacrifices; Cannibalism; Witchcraft; Slavery; Polygamy; Intemperanc Poverty and Vagrancy; Ignorance and Idiocy Obscenity. Price, single copies, 25 cents; 6 copies, $1. Special discount on larger quantities.

Sabbath-Breaking. This is the best and most thorough work ever written on the Sabbath from a rational point of view. Large and handsome print. The question is discussed under the following heads: Origin of the Sabbatic Idea; The Jewish Sabbath; The Christian Scriptures and the Sabbath; Examination of Sunday Arguments; Origin of Christian Sabbath; Testimony of the Christian Fathers; The abb ath during the Middle Ages; The Puritan Sabbath; Testimony of Christian Reformers, Scholars, and Divines; Abrogation of Sunday Laws Price, 25 cents; six copies, $1.00.

Thomas Paine. The Apostle of Religious and Political Liberty. Tells the story of the Author-Hero's life, delineates the leading traits of his character and genius, and vindicates his name from the aspersions cast upon it. Choice extracts from "Common Sense," "American Crisis," "Rights of Man," and "Age of Reason" are given; also, tributes to Paine's character from more than one hundred noted persons of Europe and America, many of them written expressly for this work. Second edition, 160 pages, printed on fine tinted paper, neatly bound, and containing a handsome steel portrait of Paine. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Image Breaker. Six Lectures: Decline of Faith, Protestant Intolerance, Washington an Unbeliver; Jefferson an Unbeliever; Paine and Wesley; Christian Sabbath. Each 5 cents; bound, paper, 25 cents; per doz. 40 cts.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Sea and Sky.

Long ago, when the world was new,
The sapphire sky and the ocean blue
Wedded one summer day;
And the sky still bends as the years go by,
And the ocean leaps to the bending sky,
For constant lovers are they.

But when a mist arises between,
The ocean grown with jealousy green,
His doubts to the listener tells,
He storms and frets, he rages and roars;
In furious wrath he beats his shores,
While his turbulent bosom swells.

The sky, though dark with a moment's frown,
Will tenderly from its hight look down,
With a radiant smile divine.
The green to blue with its magic skill
'Twill change, and the stormy ocean still,
And the sun of love will smile.

Pause, thou, my heart, and the lesson read,
When the darkness falls and with jealous speed
The mists of doubt arise—
Fret not! 'twill pass, and thou wilt know
That the sun still shines with a fervent glow
In love's unchanging skies.

Fate of a County Fair Politician.

He started for the county fair, the ambitious candidate,
While his rival went a-fishing with a flask he labeled "bait."
"Upon the sun-tanned sons of toil my heart with pleasure dotes;
I love their simple ways," said he, "and venerate their votes."

He arose before the people, but their eyes were all agog,
In strained expectancy to see the thousand-dollar hog;
"My fellow-countrymen," he said, in accents loud and full—
A deep, stentorian, mighty roar came from the Durham bull.

"Good men from Geebuck county, and brothers one and all——"
At this the champion donkey brayed from out his neighboring stall;
Just then the horse race was announced, the people scattered wide,
And a sympathetic Jersey cow looked up at him and sighed.

Thus left in solitude alone, he staggered to the rail;
A cow began to taste his coat and masticate its tail.
He seized his tailless covering and from the stage he ran,
And squandered all his money on a three-card monte man.

Such fate the luckless candidate had on that direful day,
And next his rival at the polls bore all his votes away.
"We want no man to govern us," each farmer said, "I swow, Who'll let himself be all et up by any durned old cow!"

Colonel Ingersoll at Home.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox in the World.

To understand the belief of Robert Ingersoll one needs to know his home life. The moment the door opens to admit you the warm, affectional atmosphere of the home seems to envelop you. I believe every house is strongly impregnated with the mental and spiritual condition of its inmates, just as garments reveal the shape and odor of their wearers.

I once entered a house filled with rich hangings and elegant furniture. All that money and good taste could do was done to render it a bower of beauty. But I felt as if chilled by a cold fog when I passed through its wide and splendid halls. There were discordant and inharmonious elements in that house. It was not a home in the true sense of the word. Its members were divided among themselvs, and their unhappy feelings generated a current which affected every sensitivly organized person who entered the door.

Unfortunately, not every so-called Christian household is a home. I know a family who indulged in morning and evening prayers, and were strict in attendance at church. Yet the daughters quarreled with each other, were impudent to their mother, and the father was constantly finding fault with the most trivial household affairs.

To such men, certainly the beautiful home life of Robert Ingersoll is a severe rebuke. The first time I saw Mrs. Ingersoll I said to a friend, "She looks like a much-loved woman." People who receive a great deal of love and good care usually show the evidence of it, just as a loveless, harassed life revcals its starved and pitiful condition, no matter how it may seek to disguise the fact.

Mrs. Ingersoll radiates happiness and content. She looks up into the beaming, jovial face of her husband with an expression which tells its own story—it is so full of happy gratitude and sweet affection.

The two fair daughters are like rays of sunlight emanating from this union. One of the girls looks like a young goddess, and possesses an exquisit voice in song. I heard America's greatest ballad-maker say recently that no world-famous diva ever gave him the peculiar pleasure he found in listening to Miss Ingersoll's singing.

"Not a highly cultivated or powerful voice," he said, "but possessed of that subtle magnetism which sends the little thrills creeping up and down your spine."

I never saw a sweeter household. I never before saw so much affectionate reverence exhibited by wife and children toward any man. It seems a pity that this great orator, whose daily life at home and among humanity is a religion in itself, should be quoted as their leader by brainless men who liv only to make the world wicked.

Let me say right here that I earnestly and confidently believe in a future life, in the efficacy of prayer, and in some mode of punishment in the next existence for sinful souls who hav escaped it here. Yet I believe Robert Ingersoll has done the world a great deal of good by hurling his thunderbolts of irony against the closed doors of narrow creeds.

As that remarkable girl-poet, Lizette Woodworth Reese, has said in her wonderful couplet,

> Creeds grow so thick along the way,
> Their boughs hide God—I cannot pray.

But Robert Ingersoll in his sarcastic denunciations of worn-out theological dogmas, in his ridicule of the old-fashioned hell of burning brimstone, and in his earnest plea to men to worship the "divinity within themselvs," has only helped to cut away the boughs which obstructed our view and allowed us to see God more clearly in the world about us.

He has compelled the Christian churches to broaden their creeds and to preach more love and less fear from the pulpit. The most prejudiced bigot dares not offer an intelligent congregation to-day the theories which were served to us undiluted with reason fifteen years ago. I am convinced that greater credit is due to Robert Ingersoll for this result than to all other causes.

Yet, on the other hand, he has done a great deal of harm.

There is, unfortunately, more ignorance than intelligence in the world. A great many coarse-grained and low-impulsed people, unable to grasp the idea of high morality which he teaches, merely seize at his "no hell" theories, chuckle over his blows at creeds, and quote him as their teacher and guide. If rebuked for their vicious, immoral, and ungodly lives, they say they are followers of "Bob Ingersoll," and "don't believe in no religion nohow."

All his illustrations of noble manhood, strict morality, and never ceasing benevolence are lost on this brutal herd, who are only able to understand that he is a great man, and that he scoffs at creeds.

Many young poets claim to study and follow the methods of Byron, of Browning, of Swinburne. Byron indulged freely in poetical license and faulty rhymes. Browning is mystical and often labored. Swinburne given to over-much alliteration and sensuousness. But the great thoughts and brilliant wit of Byron, the profundity and master workmanship of Browning, the splendor and gorgeousness of Swinburne's style, all render these faults excusable.

The young poet who has neither wit, depth, nor originality copies the poetical license, the vagueness, or the sensuousness, and says he has but followed the masters.

Just so many young men believe they are followers of Robert Ingersoll. With no comprehension of the man's great brain, greater heart, and profoundly moral life, they ape his skepticism of creeds, his scorn of priestly rites and ceremonies, and in the midst of viciousness declare themselvs "converts to Ingersollism."

I hold this indisputable fact to be a great misfortune to the world. But that his earnest desire and aim is to better and broaden humanity I sincerely believe.

Colonel Ingersoll givs more of his splendid strength to tumbling down error than to building up pedestals for truth.

If he would say more about his belief in the need of fine principles, and less about the uselessness of piety; if he would giv us two words for morality to one against hell-fire, he would accomplish more good in the world.

A skilful physician knows that a diseased system needs toning after purging.

Colonel Ingersoll givs us too much bluemass and not enough tonic. He cleanses us from error, but he does not giv us much to brace up our shattered nerves. He sends up his magnificent conversational fireworks, not caring where the sparks fall.

His conversation is a noble poem. His speech a string of glittering pearls. Language is his most ready and obedient servant. Words rush to obey his slightest command, and vie with one another to render him eloquent. Similes and comparisons, epigrams and metaphors worthy of Shakspere, enrich his common conversation. You hold your breath while listening, lest some wonderful conceit escape you.

Yet in spite of this opulence of phraseology and his supreme disbelief in the orthodox method of punishment, he has a remarkable fondness for the adjectiv "damn." From the midst of his superb utterances of fine thoughts this naughty word leaps forth and surprises you, like a bulldog in a drawing-room.

There are situations in life, I think, when the most devout Christian and the most refined woman thinks damn! Very good men sometimes utter it on such occasions. But it should be reserved for times of great need. I wish Colonel Ingersoll would not vitiate its usefulness by such frequent utterance.

Mr. Ingersoll has no methods of work, no clock-work system of rising or toiling. He never makes anything but notes before his greatest speeches, and these only a day or two preceding. His orations are never written out until the stenographer takes them down during their delivery.

He is fond of all games, and is, so his wife tells me, an excellent cook. During one of their summer outings he cooked all the breakfasts, and invited several friends to partake of his delicious omelets and delicate "fries."

He is a great jester. Some of his jokes are too subtle for the ordinary mind.

Knowing the proverbial propensity of the street beggar for using alms unworthily, he solemnly cautioned one recently in this wise: "Now, don't go and waste this dime on bread; buy whisky with it, my good fellow." The bystander who overheard him did not know it was a joke. I am afraid the beggar did not.

Colonel Ingersoll does not like the American custom of interviewing. He does not like the intrusion of the public through the newspapers into a man's private life. All those who hav suffered from the misrepresentation and misconstruction of the press can understand how he may hav arrived at this state of feeling.

Yet we hav a right to know something of the daily life of the men and women who set themselvs before us as teachers or advisers. We hav a right to look into the private life of the clergyman who tells us that he can save our souls from perdition, and if his practice is not harmonious with his preaching we hav reason to doubt his protestations.

We hav a right to look into the private life of Colonel Ingersoll, who declares that the humanitarian is greater than the Christian. If his conduct as husband, father, and citizen is open to criticism, we hav the right to criticise and condemn him as an intellectual adviser. Fortunately for him and his cause, his private life is worthy of all praise and emulation.

He has a nameless air of well-bred ennui while listening to the talk of other people. It is not to be wondered at; our commonplace expressions must seem to this king of oratory like the music of the hand-organ to Beethoven.

Colonel Ingersoll said to me the other evening:

"Life is a railroad train on which every passenger knows he must be killed. Maybe to-day, maybe to-morrow, but somewhere down the line he must meet his doom. Ah! I hav no use for a world with death in it," and the jolly face grew sad, the clear, honest eyes shadowed with pain as he spoke.

I wondered if this great man did not know that the folly and fallacy of his theories of future life were expressed in the words he uttered.

I wonder if he does not feel that the beautiful and holy love which unites his family is divine and cannot end with this world.

There is a pessimistic tone to much he says of late. Is the great Agnostic warrior laying down his arms before the battle is over?

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

Afraid of the Millennium.

Professor Harvey, writing to the Tribune, about the brilliant meteor which fell recently, says: "The phenomenon has caused great excitement in this region, and has been the topic of conversation since the fall. Many were badly frightened, thinking the millennium had come." At first sight this remark looks rather comical, and it might be thought that the good people of Maine and Canada who saw the meteor were somewhat confused as to the nature of the millennial program. But reflection must convince the thoughtful that, after all, consternation was quite natural and consistent in the circumstances, and that most people really would hav ample ground for alarm if they thought the advent of the millennium was at hand. For nothing more revolutionary could be conceived than a state of existence such as the millennium has been prefigured; and nothing more fatal to the ambitions and inclinations of the majority could be looked forward to. When evolution has done its perfect work, and we hav all improved the "ape and tiger" out of ourselvs, and hav ceased to regard heaven as a place to keep out of as long as possible, and no longer lament the passage of our friends to what we profess to believe is eternal bliss, and think as much of preparing for another life as we do of having "a good time" in this one—there will be nothing in the millennial expectation to trouble any one.

At present, however, the world is a long way from being in a state of millennial preparation. It is not capable of "living up to" the idea. Notwithstanding all the efforts of all the churches for so many centuries, the conception of a state of existence controled wholly in the interest of good remains practically unthinkable. The most conscientious deacon would feel lost in a world where horse-trades were excluded unless rigidly equitable. The stoutest professors would find their faith weaken if on any day but Sunday they could not keep up their end of the log in business at the expense of somebody else. A world in which Number One was systematically sent to the rear, and Number Two was systematically brought to the front, would indeed be not worth living in for the majority of us. How, then, should most people be anything else than frightened at the rumor that the millennium was at hand? If the fish in the sea were told that at a certain time all the water was to be drained off, leaving them high and dry, would they be charmed at the prospect? Truly not so, and fish out of water the majority of human beings would be if what they think they desire most, and believe to be best worth hoping for, were of a sudden to occur to them. The good folks who "were badly frightened, thinking the millennium had come," were, after all, very sensible people, and appreciated the situation shrewdly.—Tribune.

TRY-SQUARE;

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

THE Democrats of New York hav nominated for district attorney a man against whom judgments to the amount of about $9,000 hav been found in the courts of the state for unpaid personal debts—board, clothes, borrowed money, etc.

THE printers did not win the recent strike, and hav gone back to work at the employers' terms.

THE steamer Manitowoc went down in a storm on Lake Michigan last week with all on board, some thirty persons.

DENIS KEARNEY, the San Francisco sand-lot orator, is in New York working for anti-Chinese legislation and harassing Henry George.

THE New York Knights of Labor held a mass-meeting last Saturday night to express sympathy for the Chicago Anarchists. Prof. Felix Adler also spoke Sunday in behalf of the condemned men.

SUPERINTENDENT WALLING, of the New York police, has just published a book in which he relates how the stolen remains of the late A. T. Stewart were recovered from the thieves. The body is now in a crypt at Garden City, L. I., so connected by electric wires that any disturbance will ring all the bells in the cathedral.

AT a Catholic church fair in Portland last week a barrel of beer was put up and sold by lottery, thus violating both the gambling and the liquor laws. No arrests followed.

THE Rev. H. M. Keck (Methodist), Cedarville, O., has been suspended for stealing.

SIXTY-SEVEN arrests were made in this city last Sunday for violations of the liquor law.

"HAPPY BOB" VAN BRUNT, of the Salvation Army, will be hanged at Warsaw, N. Y., Nov. 8th, for murder.

THIS is the season of collections for Peter's pence, which go to pay the personal expenses of the pope. In St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, the collection amounted to $2,000.

IT is reported that the seven condemned Anarchists of Chicago hav very little hope in the interference of the United States Supreme Court, and expect to die on November 11th. The shrouds and caps to be used at the execution are already prepared.

THE Court of Appeals has decided adversely to the Henry George party on the appeal in the mandamus suit to compel the New York Police Board to appoint a representativ of that party as the fifth member of every one of the 812 boards of inspectors of elections.

FROM a table prepared by City Superintendent Jasper it appears that 6,664 children were turned away from schoolhouse doors for the first ten months of this year because there was not room for them in the schoolhouses. This is regarded as paradoxical, in view of the fact that New York has a law making attendance at school compulsory.

SOME Episcopal clergymen met in this city one day last week to discuss the labor question. A paper, which was received with applause, urged that "it shall be the duty of each member to devote a certain portion of his time to the study of the social questions of the day in the light of the Incarnation." Great results should attend this method of viewing the differences between capital and labor!

PATRICK FORD, editor of the Irish World, has seceded from the Henry George party, and denounces Dr. McGlynn in double-leaded type. He says: "When he (McGlynn) began to traduce the church and insult and defy the pope amid the applause of scoffing Infidels and avowed enemies of the entire Christian system, then I halted and drew the line." Mr. Ford is a Catholic, and has undoubtedly received warning from headquarters.

JOSEPH IS SOLD TO THE MIDIANITES.

Then there passed by Midianites, merchant-men; and they drew and lifted up Joseph out of the pit, and sold Joseph to the Ishmeelites for twenty pieces of silver; and they brought Joseph into Egypt.—Gen. xxxvii, 28.

Gems of Thought.

IT would seem that religion of all kinds has only resulted in debasing man, rendering him more savage than the beasts of prey. He certainly has shown more ingenuity in inflicting torture upon his fellow-man than the cruelest tiger that roams the jungle.—D. M. Bennett.

IT is not want of power in God that he cannot lie or sin: it is the infinit purity of the divine nature that makes this impossible, by reason of his infinit perfection. With the power of creating we must also join that of annihilating, which is equal to it, and must necessarily be supposed to be in God, because we plainly perceive it to be a perfection.—Bishop Burnett's Thirty-nine Articles.

As an ardent advocate of all progress, political, social, or moral; as one who hails with joy every onward stride of the human mind toward further enlightenment, the Broad Churchmen find in me a very devoted adherent. I sympathize most cordially with their outspoken intolerance of the mere conventionalities of religion, in their determination to prove all things and to hold fast only that which is good.—Rev. Fenton E. Winslow.

WHO art thou that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth: yea, he shall be holden up; for God is able to make him stand.—Rom. xiv, 4.

THE man who calls religion obedience to a God, and the man who calls it a sense of mystery or devotion to ideal excellence, substantially agree that morality is practical good conduct. The man who says that "mere morality" is not enough, tacitly confesses that it is a practical reality, so far as it goes, although he may sometimes set religion above it. That is, he confesses that, if there were no God and no future life, there is still something that may practically be called morality; and the man who (after Mr. Arnold) calls religion "morality touched with emotion," recognizes a distinct reality in the morality which is touched with emotion. I may safely say, therefore, that if men knew there was no God, nor immortal life, nor revelation, there would still be conduct that is good for something, and it would then be conduct that would produce the most manhood or life in existence we know, because there would be no other standard of measurement.—S. J. Stewart.

"LET me carry your pail, my dear,
Brimming over with water!"
"No! I'll take hold and you take hold,"
Answered the farmer's daughter.

And she would hav her own sweet way,
As her merry eyes grew brighter;
So she took hold and he took hold,
And it made the burden lighter.

And now they're at the eve of life,
While the western skies grow brighter,
For she took hold and he took hold,
And it made the burdens lighter.

THE insect-world, if it understood how to use its powers, might, in seven centuries, at least, drive away man and take possession of the soil. These pests could do what they liked, if only they would combine, and, instead of preying upon each other, use all their power against man. As a matter of fact, the insect-world largely maintains its equilibrium by the cannibalism and constant strife that obtain between creatures of the same species—caterpillars chase and eat each other, spiders devour nearly as many spiders as flies, wasps kill wasps, fleas bite fleas, and bugs destroy bugs. Nor is this all, for assassination is constant, and the younger members of a family pull their elders to pieces, not for food, but simply as a practical joke. This proves, no doubt, a corrupt nature [let the parsons explain this if they can], but it is one which makes life possible for us, and saves our species from the poet's stricture that—

"Man only mars kind Nature's plan,
And turns the fierce pursuit on man."

—London Spectator.

SOME years ago, I visited one of the London Board schools, and on the wall I saw a list of the daily Bible lessons appointed to be given by the master. He must teach exploded history, absurd miracles, a crude and fallacious morality. He must teach the children that God intentionally designed the innumerable carnivora, and sent them forth to their fearful and never-ending feast of blood; that he condemned all men for the fault of one; that he drowned all animals because the chief animal, man, proved morally imperfect, having been purposely created so; that he commanded his "chosen race" to utterly exterminate whole nations, not sparing man, woman, child, or anything that breathed; that he stayed the sun at Joshua's command to facilitate that slaughter, that the same "gracious and long-suffering" Jehovah solemnly and deliberately commanded that all who did the least work on Saturday should be stoned to death, etc.—Religion in Schools.

THE Lord hath made all things for himself—even the wicked for the day of evil.—Prov. xvi. 6.

Odds and Ends.

THERE is a king in Afrion who has no tongue. He is at once the king and the kingdumb.

IT is sad to see family relics sold at auction, but the most painful thing under the hammer is generally your thumb nail.

THIS is the composition a new teacher had the pleasure of hearing read in a school not far from Concord: "Going to School.—I like to go to school when we hav a good teacher. I don't like to go to school this term."

TEACHER (to class): "If a hole were made right through the center of the earth, where would it come out at?" Several guesses were made, when Johnny yelled: "I know, teacher." "Well, where?" "On the other side of the earth."

AN up-town rector was writing his sermon for Sunday when his little girl came into his study. Taking her upon his knee for a moment, she looked at his manuscript curiously, and turning to him in a thoughtful way said: "Pa, does God tell you what to write?" "Certainly, my child." "Then what makes you scratch so much of it out?" queried the little one.

ETHEL and Egbert were bidding each other a proper good-bye the other eveniug, when the draft from the open front door blew the hall light out and left the two young people in sudden darkness. "Weren't you awfully afraid," asked Ethel's dearest friend next day when Ethel was telling the story, "to be left in alone in the dark like that?" "Yes, dear, I was," confessed Ethel, frankly. "Egbert is quite bashful, you know, and I was afraid he wouldn't see how perfectly helpless I was."

ONE of Detroit's best known evangelical ministers has a half interest in a four-year-old daughter. The other day she broke over the traces of disciplin, and her mother sent her into a closet with the injunction to tell God all about what a naughty little girl she had been. At the expiration of her penance hour she came forth very quietly, as if her disciplin had had a wholesome effect. "Well, little daughter," said the mother, "did you tell God all about it?" "No, mamma," was the reply; "I dess didn't do it 'tause I fought my papa wouldn't like to let it det out of the family."

"GRANDMA, where do they get the babies sweet,
With their dimpled hands and tiny feet?"
"Out of a cabbage-head, my child."
And the needle clicked as grandma smiled.

Grandma left home one beautiful day
An old friend a long-promised visit to pay,
But the little brain with a plan was rife,
As she captured grandma's carving-knife.

Out where the cabbages gleamed in the sun,
To surprise grandma would be such fun,
With the knife she cut each head so round,
Nor left uncut one in the ground.

When grandma returned and the ruin spied,
"Why did you do it, my child?" she cried.
"I wanted to s'prise you, grandma," she replied,
"But I guess they've all taken wings and flied."

TOLD AT THE CAMPFIRE.

"Come, Corporal Joe!
Tell us a tale of old Shiloh!"
Corporal Joe, long-legged and thin,
Wrinkled of brow and grizzled of chin,
Up to the blazing campfire stole,
And lighted his pipe with a glowing coal.
"Strange," said he,
"What a comfort a pipe can be!

"In the spring of '62, you see,
Our army camped on the Tennessee.
Old Grant and Buell, by day and night,
Were getting their forces in trim to fight
Old Johnson's rebel host, which lay
At Corinth, some twenty miles away.

"With mud and muskeeters, 'twas bad enough,
And rations was short. But what came tough
Was this: our fellers was all dead broke,
And no tobacker to chaw or smoke:
A state of matters that wasn't no joke.

"Before the battle, on Saturday night,
When the boys were asleep, I spied by the light
Of the waning campfire a blue-coat rise
To his elbow and peer with cautious eyes
On all around. Then, drawing a plug
From his pocket, he stowed in his stingy mug
Sich a generous chaw
That I quite forgot old Sinai's law,
The sweet home rules of the Sunday-schools,
And, waiting until the miser slept,
Like a pitiful thief to his side I crept,
Stole his tobacker, then went to rest
With the treasure hugged to my guilty breast.

"You remember, boys, how the morning broke
Through the lurid folds of battle smoke,
And there ain't no call for me to tell
How the tide of victory rose and fell
For three long days. You fellows know
All I can tell you about Shiloh.

"What I mean to tell
Is somethin' you don't know quite as well.
'Twas near the close of the last dread day—
Just how it happened I never could say—
Whilst storming the ridge through shot and shell,
Somethin' hit me and down I fell,
While the boys swept on with a terrible yell.

"It seemed for a minute my time had come,
As I lay there all so faint and numb;
But I hadn't the slightest trace of pain;
I hadn't even a bruise or strain;
And what I took for the flowing blood
Was dampness pressed from the soft spring mud.
So, taking courage, I looked around;
And say, boys, what do you think I found,
As I gathered myself from the mud and dirt?
Why, there in the pocket of my shirt,
Just over my heart, in the plug I stole,
Lay a rifle ball in a snug little hole.
I tell you, boys, I held my breath—
Just a chaw of tobacker 'twixt me and death!
I thought, as I riz from the muddy ground,
Them's born to be hanged won't never be drowned
And I sometimes think, as I look at that 'chaw,'
That it ain't always safest to stick to the law."

THE Watts and Leake Orphan Asylum has finally been purchased by the Episcopalians as the place for their new cathedral. The price paid is $850,000.

A SERGEANT of the army has invented a means of using nitro-glycerin shells, propelled by gunpowder. He has fired 327 shots, all of which are said to hav been successful.

THIS is a Christian nation, says the Union Labor Express, and adds: "Millions of children shivering and starving, millions of blankets and comforts lying idle on the shelves waiting for buyers, and millionaired Christians feeding meats and cakes to dogs, cats, and polyglotic politicians."

A RUMOR is going round that President Cleveland will remodel his cabinet soon. Secretary Lamar will go from the interior department to the supreme bench as the successor of Justice Woods, and Postmaster-General Vilas will be made secretary of the interior. Don M. Dickinson, of Michigan, will be the next postmaster-general.

"I GREATLY dislike," said a Dakota minister, last Sunday, after the singing of the first hymn, "to make any personal allusions from the pulpit, but I feel as if a certain occurrence demanded a word. I refer to the case of Brother Hopkins, who lost $10 on old Royal George, the running horse, at the county fair this week, and got mad, and set up a great howl about fraud, and tried to clean out the whole committee, and so forth. It was in poor taste, and deserves the strongest denunciation. I suppose I might also add by way of example," continued the good man, as he turned over the leaves searching for his text, "that I was backing Royal George to the tune of $30 myself, but when I lost I didn't go around roaring as if I had lost a right leg."—Chicago Tribune.

"I HAV pitched many a ball game, but I never pitched one that I did not first ask our heavenly father's assistance." This is what Mr. Stagg, Yale's baseball pitcher, got off at the evangelist meeting at Dockstader's on Sunday evening. If this is the stuff that is welcomed by the evangelical brethren that held forth at Dockstader's, remarks the Herald, the sooner the evangelists take to the woods the better.

MAIL advices per steamer City of New York, from Hong Kong, say that the typhoon which raged on the night of September 17th struck the island of Hoi Ling with its full force. The total number of lives sacrificed it is difficult to ascertain, but the general opinion is that one hundred or two hundred personsons were drowned on the islands. At Chick Lung, some ten miles distant from Ye Yung Kong, thirty-two lives were lost and three passage-boats sunk. This is another act of God for which President Cleveland desires thanks returned.

IN the supreme judicial court, sitting for Essex, Mass., on the 1st inst., there was filed the appeal of Prof. Egbert C. Smyth, of Andover, from the decision of the board of visitors removing him from his professorship and a prayer for a writ of certiorari to command them to produce in court all things relating to the case. The court made an order, by consent of counsel on both sides, that the writ should issue by December 1st. It was intimated by the court that owing to the importance of the case it might be heard in Boston rather than in Essex.

A DELEGATION representing the American Bible Society, the Mohonk Conference, and several religious and missionary societies, called upon the president on the 2d inst. to urge upon him a modification of the order of the interior department prohibiting the use of the Indian language in the Indian schools. The delegation said that the interpretation given to the order had put an end to the religious instruction of the Indians, and that several mission schools had been compelled to suspend their work in consequence. The president's reply was entirely satisfactory to the delegation. He said that it was not intended that the order should be so literally construed as to forbid religious instruction in the Indian language, and that the recent annual report of the commissioner of Indian affairs has made this clear. The president is good to the pious.

THE World of the 3d inst. says: "It is high time New York was rechristened 'Little Russia.' The high-handed doings of the police of this city will soon giv it that title. Tuesday, about noon, Theron B. Doty was arrested by Detectiv Price, of headquarters, at the corner of Broadway and Thirty-first street. The prisoner was taken to 300 Mulberry street, and was charged, before the sergeant in Superintendent Murray's office, with being a 'disorderly person.' He was then taken into the detectiv bureau, and before Sergeant Bird was charged with being a "suspicious person." Doty asked the privilege of sending a message to a brother-in-law doing business on Broadway, and his request was refused. He was locked up. Detectiv Price said that Doty was 'abusing Christ' when he arrested him, and 'he could stand it no longer, and so he locked him up for one day.' Doty is a person who goes about preaching and writing. Price said Doty had written several articles, anti-Christ in tone, for the newspapers. Detectiv Price evidently takes it unto himself to make a law against blasphemy, and to act as judge, jury, and executioner."

PARISIANS, who, in these latter days, at least, are not remarkable for the depth or fervor of their religious feelings, says the London Daily Telegraph, are about to hav a museum of religions. The founder of this remarkable and interesting institution is a M. Guimet. The building is in the Greco-Roman style of architecture, and with its pillared porticoes, its rotundo, its columns, and its caryatides, looks like an ancient temple. It is situated near the Trocadero, at a corner of the Avenue de Jéna. The edifice has been constructed after designs which were taken from the last mosaics discovered at Pompeii. The religions of Greece and Rome are most strongly represented, and in the northern gallery is an atrium which is to contain the alter of a pagan divinity copied from an original model. In the lateral galleries will be exhibited objects appertaining to the religions of Egypt, India, and China. In a garden attached to the building there is to be placed a large conservatory and a pond containing plants consecrated to religious uses. It is stated that the museum will be opened to the public in a fe eks.

CHAPTER XVI.—FOREST CULTURE.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

It is wonderful how often instinct has anticipated the practical lessons of science. Long before comparative anatomy taught us the characteristics of our digestive organs the testimony of our natural predilections indicated the advantages of a frugal diet. Long before modern hygiene pointed out the perils of breathing the atmosphere of unventilated dormitories the evidence of our senses warned us against the foulness of that atmosphere. And ages before the researches of agricultural chemistry began to reveal the protective influence of arboreal vegetation, an instinct which the child of civilization shares with the rudest savage revolted against the reckless destruction of fine woodlands, and sought to retrieve the loss by surrounding private homes with groves and parks. The love of forests is as natural to our species as the love of rocks to the mountain-goat. Trees and tree-shade are associated with our traditions of paradise, and that the cradle of the human race was not a brick tenement or a wheat-farm, but a tree-garden, is one of the few points on which the genesis of Darwin agrees with that of the Pentateuch. The happiest days of childhood would lose half their charm without the witchery of woodland rambles, and, like an echo of the foreworld, the instincts of our forest-born ancestors often awake in the souls of their descendants. City children are transported with delight at the first sight of a wood-covered landscape, and the evergreen arcades of a tropical forest would charm the soul of a young Esquimaux as the ever-rolling waves of the ocean would awaken the yearnings of a captive sea-bird. The traveler Chamisso mentions an interview with a poor Yakoot, a native of the North Siberian ice-coast, who happened to get hold of an illustrated magazine with a woodcut of a fine southern landscape: a river-valley, rocky slopes rising towards a park-like lawn with a background of wooded highlands. With that journal on his knees the Yakoot squatted down in front of the traveler's tent, and thus sat motionless, hour after hour, contemplating the picture in silent rapture. "How would you like to live in a country of that kind?" asked the professor. The Yakoot folded his hands, but continued his reverie. "I hope we shall go there if we are good," said he at last, with a sigh of deep emotion.

The importance of hereditary instincts can be often measured by the degree of their persistence. Man is supposed to be a native of the trans-Caucasian highlands—Armenia, perhaps, or the terrace-lands of the Hindookoosh. Yet agriculture has succeeded in developing a type of human beings who would instinctively prefer a fertile plain to the grandest highland paradise of the East. Warfare has in like manner engendered an instinctive fondness for a life of perilous adventure, as contrasted with the arcadian security of the Golden Age. There are men who prefer slavery to freedom, and think pallor more attractive than the glow of health, but a millennium of unnaturalism has as yet failed to develop a species of human beings who would instinctively prefer the dreariness of a treeless plain to the verdure of a primeval forest.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

The love of forest-trees is a characteristic of the nature-abiding nations of the North, and has rewarded itself by an almost complete reversion of the original contrast between the garden lands of the South and the inhospitable wilderness of the higher latitudes. Forest destruction has turned Southern Europe into a desert, while the preservation of forests has made the homes of the hyperborean hunters an Eden of beauty and fertility. "One-third to the hunter, two-thirds to the husbandman," was the rule of Markgrave Philip in his distribution of forest and fields, and expresses the exact proportion which modern science indicates as most favorable to the perennial fertility of our farm-lands. In a single century the forest-destroying Spaniards turned many of their American colonies from gardens into sand-wastes, while, after fourteen hundred years of continuous cultivation, the fields of the Danubian Valley are still as fertile as in the days of Trajan and Tacitus. Along the river-banks and half-way up the foot-hills the arable land has been cleared, but higher up the forest has been spared. All the highlands from Ratisbon to Budha-Pesth still form a continuous mountain park of stately oaks and pines, and, as a consequence, springs never fail; crops are safe against winter floods and summer drouths; song-birds still return to their birthland, and reward their protectors by the destruction of noxious insects; meadows, grain-fields, and orchards produce their abundant harvest year after year; famine is unknown, and contagious diseases rarely assume an epidemic form. In Switzerland and Prussia the preservation of the now remaining woodlands is guaranteed by strict protective laws; Scandinavia requires her forest-owners to replant a certain portion of every larger clearing; in Great Britain the parks of the ancient mansions are protected like sacred monuments of the past, and landowners vie in lining their field-trails with rows of shade-trees. The fertility of those lands is a constant surprise to the American traveler disposed to associate the idea of eastern landscapes with the picture of worn-out fields. Surrounded by Russian steppes and trans-Alpine deserts, the homes of the Germanic nations still form a Goshen of verdure and abundance. Forest protectors have not lost their earthly paradise.

C.—PERVERSION.

Sixteen hundred years ago the highlands of the European continent were still covered with a dense growth of primeval forests. The healthfulness and fertility of the Mediterranean coastlands surpassed that of the most favored regions of the present world, and the dependence of those blessings on the preservation of the spring-sheltering woodlands was clearly recognized by such writers as Pliny and Columella, though their own experience did not enable them to suspect all the ruinous consequences of that wholesale forest destruction, which modern science has justly denounced as the ne plus ultra folly of human improvidence. Practical experiments had, however, demonstrated such facts as the failing of springs on treeless slopes, and the violence of winter floods in districts unprotected by rain-absorbing forests, and tree culture was practiced as a regular branch of rational husbandry. But with the triumph of the Galilean church came the millennium of unnaturalism. Rational agriculture became a tradition of the past; the culture of secular science was fiercely denounced from thousands of pulpits; improvidence, "unworldliness," and superstitious reliance on the efficacy of prayer were systematically inculcated as supreme virtues; the cultivators of the soil were treated like unclean beasts, and for a series of centuries the garden regions of the East were abandoned to the inevitable consequences of neglect and misculture.

Millions of acres of fine forest lands passed into the hands of ignorant priests, who, in their greed for immediate gain, and their reckless indifference to the secular welfare of posterity, doomed their trees to the ax, entailing barrenness on regions favored by every natural advantage of soil and climate. Drouths, famines, and locust-swarms failed to impress the protest of nature. Her enemies had no concern with such worldly vanities as the study of climatic vicissitudes, and hoped to avert the consequences of their folly by an appeal to the intercession of miracle-working saints.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

Yet the saints failed to answer that appeal. The outraged laws of nature avenged themselves with the inexorable sequence of cause and effect, and in spite of all prayer-meetings the significance of their crime against the fertility of their Mother Earth was brought home to the experience of the ruthless destroyers. In their net-work of moss and leaves forests absorb the moisture of the atmosphere, and thus nourish the springs which in their turn replenish the brooks and rivers. When the highlands of the Mediterranean peninsulas had been deprived of their woods the general failing of springs turned rivers into shallow brooks, and brook-valleys into arid ravines. Summer rains became too scarce to support the vegetation of the farm lands; the tillers of the soil had to resort to irrigation and eat their bread in a harder and ever harder struggle for existence, till vast areas of once fertile lands had to be entirely abandoned, and the arable territory of this planet was yearly reduced by the growth of an artificial desert. And while the summer drouths became more severe, winter floods became more frequent and destructive. From the treeless slopes of the Mediterranean coastlands winter rains descended like waterfalls, turning once placid rivers into raging torrents, and depriving the fields of their small remnant of fertile mould. Hillsides which in the times of Virgil had furnished pastures for thousands of herds were thus reduced to a state of desolation almost as complete as that of a volcanic cinder-field; their dells choked with rock debris, their terraces rent by a chaos of gullies and clefts, while the soil, swept from the highlands, was accumulated in mudbanks near the mouth of the river. Harbors once offering anchorage for the fleets of an empire became inaccessible from the ever-growing deposits of diluvium. Yearly mud inundations engendered climatic diseases and all-pervading gnat swarms. Insectivorous birds, deprived of their nest shelter, emigrated to less inhospitable lands, and the scant produce of tillage had to be shared with ever-multiplying legions of destructive insects. Along the south coasts of Italy the shore-hills for hundreds of miles present the same dreary aspect of monotonous barrenness. Greece is a naked rock; forests have almost disappeared from the plains of Spain and Asia Minor; in northern Africa millions of square miles, once teeming with cities and castles, have been reduced to a state of hopeless aridity. The Mediterranean, once a forest-lake of paradise, has become a Dead Sea, surrounded by barren rocks, and sandy or dust-clouded plains. According to a careful comparison of the extant data of statistical computations, the population of the territory once comprised under the jurisdiction of the Cæsars has thus been reduced from 290,000,000 to less than 80,000,000, i.e., from a hundred to less than thirty per cent. In other words, an average of seventy-eight in a hundred human beings have been starved out of existence, and the same area of ground which once supported a flourishing village, at present almost fails to satisfy the hunger of a small family. For we must not forget that modern industry has devised methods of subsistence undreamed of by the nations of antiquity, and that the religion of resignation has taught millions to endure degrees of wretchedness which nine out of ten pagans would have refused to prefer to the alternative of self-destruction. A whole tenement of priest-ridden lazaronis now contrive to eke out a subsistence on a pittance which a citizen of ancient Rome would have been too proud to ask a woman to share; yet with all their talent for surviving under conditions of soul and body degrading distress, only eight children of the Mediterranean coastlands can now wring a sickly subsistence from the same area of soil which once sufficed to supply twenty-nine men with all the blessings of health and abundance.

E.—REFORM.

The discovery of two new continents has respited the doomed nations of the Old World, but the rapid colonization of those land supplements will soon reduce mankind to the alternative of tree-culture or emigration to the charity-farm of the New Jerusalem. In the words of a great German naturalist, "We shall have to work the world over again." On a small scale the practicability of that plan has already been conclusively demonstrated. By tree-culture alone arid sand-wastes have been restored to something like tolerable fertility, if not to anything approaching their pristine productiveness. In the lower valley of the Nile (the ancient Thebaïd) Ibrahim Pasha set out thirty-five million Circassian forest-trees, of which one-third at least took root, and by their growth not only reclaimed the sterility of the soil but increased the average annual rainfall from four to fifteen inches. In the Landes of western France a large tract of land has been reclaimed from the inroads of the coast sand by lining the dunes with a thick belt of trees, and some fifteen hundred square miles of once worthless fields have thus been restored to a high degree of productiveness. In the Austrian Karst, a sterile plateau of limestone cliffs and caves has been dotted with groves till the valleys have been re-freshed with the water of resuscitated springs, and pasture-lands, long too impoverished even for the sustenance of mountain goats, once more are covered with herds of thriving cattle.

The experience of the next three or four generations will not fail to make every intelligent farmer a tree-planter. Our barren fields will be turned into pine plantations, every public highway will be lined with shade-trees. The communities of the next century will vie in the consecration of township groves, in the founding of forestry clubs, in the celebration of arbor days and woodland festivals. The barren table-lands of our central states will be reclaimed, and before the end of the twentieth century the work of redemption will be extended to the great deserts of the Eastern continents. And as a hundred years ago armies of tree-fellers were busy wresting land from the primeval forest, in a hundred years more armies of tree-planters will be busy wresting land from the desert. The men that will "work the world over again" will not be apt to forget the terms of their second lease.

In turning up the soil of the reclaimed desert they will unearth the foundations of buried temples, temples once sacred to the worship of gods whose prophets drenched the world with blood to enforce the observance of circumcision rites, wafer rites, and immersion rites, and filled their scriptures with minute instructions for the ordinances of priests and the mumbling of prescribed prayers. In musing over the ruins of such temples, the children of the future will have a chance for many profitable meditations—the reflection, for instance: From what mistakes those alleged saviors might have saved the world if their voluminous gospels had devoted a single page to an injunction against the earth-desolating folly of forest-destruction!

Thousands of Starving Children.

Some days ago Vienna was startled by a statement in the newspapers that there are in the Viennese schools 2,300 starving children who remain without food from morning till evening, having, perhaps, but one miserable meal a day. It now appears that the statement is only too true, and that great misery prevails among the poorer classes of Vienna. The disclosure has been promptly followed by generous contributions to a fund to be started for the purpose of providing dinners for poor school children.—Vienna Dispatch to the London Standard.

Let us not forget on Thanksgiving Day to thank God for that.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

OLNEY, ILL., Oct. 12th, 13th, and 14th.—Olney is a very handsome city, located in beautiful picturesque country, and givs evidence of more than ordinary enterprise and public spirit. Olney has a full share of Christianity, but her best citizens do not work at it much. I had a very interesting interview, at his own home, with the most able and popular minister of the city, and found him a good man, honestly in some error, but a much more faithful devotee of science than of orthodoxy. If they will only permit him he will enlighten and finally humanize his church.

Fear of Mrs. Grundy has much more influence in Olney than fear of God. The first night of my lectures only the brave and self-reliant ventured to the Opera House, but each succeeding night the attendance greatly increased, and great interest was awakened. The burden of sustaining the standard of Freethought has long been borne by the venerable I. H. Rowland, 84 years of age, yet hale and energetic, a loving, kind-hearted, lovable old man, who regards THE TRUTH SEEKER as his mental bread of life. He fully realizes that death is near, yet looks toward it in calm serenity, without a shade of fear; but, like a tired child, ready and willing to fall into the sweet oblivion of sleep. I. M. Tobias, the wide-awake, public-spirited young merchant, is his main helper in liberal work, and on his young shoulders must soon fall the mantle and responsibilities of noble old Father Rowland. May friend Tobias liv as long, happy, and useful a life, and battle as valiantly for human freedom and mental liberty; and I feel assured he will, for he certainly possesses the qualification to do so.

KEWANEE, ILL., Oct. 19th, 20th, and 21st.—I had the honor of delivering the first Liberal lecture in this place. The Christians labored diligently, using the stay-away argument. The attendance was not large, but embraced the best class of people, and all listened with attention and by their applause evinced appreciation. I was highly gratified to meet here the well-known advocate of Freethought and outspoken foe to supernaturalism, A. W. Wood, an old subscriber and contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Despite his rank Infidelity, even the devout Christians year after year re-elect him to the responsible position of police justice. Rigidly just, yet tender-hearted and compassionate, he commands the respect of all, and wins the love of the good and true. He has for co-worker Levi North (another stanch friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER and a great admirer of its Editor), the distinguished lawyer and veteran Abolitionist and Infidel, whose son so bravely withstood the decrees of the faculty of the University of Illinois, in the spring of 1885, and was finally expelled from the University, although admitted to be of most exemplary conduct in all else, and a diligent student—but he refused to attend or take part in the prayers and religious services held each day in the University chapel.

The trinity of Freethought in Kewanee is completed in the person of C. Leonard, a Liberal Spiritualist, a genuin Liberal who, like my noble, tried, and trusty friends, Elias H. Gault and his wife, of Kalamazoo, Mich., desires before all and above all full, free, perfect liberty for all alike, mental and physical, and always ready and willing to contribute alike time and money to aid the good work.

There are many valiant workers for reason, right, and truth in adjacent towns. Some came quite long distances to attend the lectures, and shake the hand of the Jersey blasphemer. Among them was friend C. Ostram, of Necoma, who came sixteen miles to see me and attend the lectures.

NUNDA, ILL., Oct. 23d.—There are but few Liberals in this place. The cause is ably championed by the old veteran of the late war, Capt. J. E. Beckley. The design was to hav a gathering of Liberals and their friends from the surrounding country, and the lectures were very thoroughly advertised to this end. But the fervent prayers of the righteous availed, or at least a savage storm prevailed, so that only a few very determined ones ventured in from a distance. The attendance was quite meager, but the few Christians who attended were aroused to the necessity of investigating the foundations of their faith and hope.

OXFORD, IA., Oct 25th, 26th.—That most able and devoted exponent of Liberalism, John E. Remsburg, has done pioneer work here, and succeeded, as he does everywhere, in arousing a spirit of inquiry, and popularizing Infidelity. The banner-bearer here is the gentle, genial, good old Uncle Thomas Sherlock, a veteran of seventy-five. Everyone in the village, old and young, always greets him with kind smiles and cheering words, although he is such a dreadful Infidel. He is an Englishman with a heart of oak, sturdy, resolute, fearless; ever the friend of every creature that is in need or suffering, always to be found on the side of the weak against the strong, the hater of all cruelty, all shams, frauds, and hypocrits.

Quite an enthusiasm was aroused by my lecture on "Why I Left the Pulpit," resulting in a very large demand for copies of "Bible Inquiries." More Bible-reading resulted from the lecture than from all the sermons preached here during the whole year. Wednesday evening I had to share the use of the hall with a Democratic speaker. After he concluded, I spoke on "The Bible: From Whence It Came, and What It Really Teaches." The Presbyterian minister was present, but spake no word. "Like a lamb dumb before his shearer, so he opened not his mouth: in his humiliation his judgment was taken away" (Acts viii, 32, 33). I find it vain to hope that ministers will come to the defense of their creeds. Really, one prophecy of the Bible is verified: "His watchmen are blind, they are all ignorant, they are all dumb dogs, they cannot bark; sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber; yea, they are greedy dogs, which can never hav enough, and they are shepherds that cannot understand; they all look to their own way, everyone for his gain from his quarter" (Isa. lvi, 11, 12). I left the people texts that will enable them to propound conundrums enough to that minister to keep him on the anxious seat all winter.

Liberals of Colorado, I shall enter your state about the middle of January. Now is the time to decide if you need my services. Please write me soon as possible.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

A Champion of Old Theology.

The Rev. Dr. Sunderland, of Washington, a veteran in the Presbyterian church militant, has unsheathed his sword in defense of the Calvinistic theology. In a letter to the New York Sun he repudiates "every implication affecting the stability of the Westminster Catechism, and the doctrins known as the 'old theology,' or the system of Calvin, Augustin, and Paul." He denounces "the wild theorists in the Congregational church" who "are higgling over the state of the dead, rather than spending their strength in preaching the old gospel to the living; and prophesies that "the doctrins of the old theology will never be exploded so long as the world stands;" but "let once a great tempest arise, which threatens the very foundations of society, and the existence of civil government itself, and these youngsters of the new theology will not be heard of."

Dr. Sunderland has been engaged in the work of saving the souls of God's elect about forty-five years, most of the time in the city of Washington. He has been chaplain of the United States Senate in former years, for which divine service he has received over five thousand dollars, at the rate of about nine dollars for each prayer, averaging a minute and a half long. He officiated at the funeral of the Infidel senator, Charles Sumner, but having inadvertently omitted to name in his prayer the vice-president, he went to a newspaper correspondent to hav that omission supplied in the printed report. In that way doubtless the Lord heard the amended prayer, but I fear that the chaplain's published petition did not prolong Henry Wilson's days.

In 1871 I had a newspaper controversy with Dr. Sunderland on the Sunday question. Some months afterward I published it, with additions, in a pamphlet. That did not please my adversary, and being debarred from renewing the controversy in the same newspaper, he induced another editor to print a whole column of vituperation and falsehood about me and my pamphlet. I took the starch out of him in half a column.

About that time an aged gentleman called on me with a personal grievance against Dr. Sunderland. I declined to espouse his quarrel, but some months afterward, having looked into the merits of the case, I obtained from him an affidavit which I thought I might use in a future contingency. That affidavit charged the Rev. Byron Sunderland with having lobbied a claim through Congress, for which service the affiant paid him three hundred and fifty dollars.

After nearly a year of quiet, Dr. Sunderland meanwhile having become chaplain of the Senate a second time, the idea occurred to me of sending the affidavit to the New York Sun. The editor published it with caustic comments, Jan. 14, 1874, omitting the affiant's name, but saying that the gentleman would appear at once if any committee of the Senate wanted to see him.

Dr. Sunderland replied, seconding the Sun's suggestion, and saying, "If he [the affiant] can prove that I ever received one dollar from him, I will at once resign the chaplaincy of the Senate."

Thereupon the Sun disclosed the affiant's name, J. O. Armes. He was temporarly sojourning in Chemung Co., N. Y., but Dr. Sunderland had offered to pay his fare to Washington, if necessary, and the editor of the Sun reiterated the suggestion to go right ahead with the investigation.

It was more than a month before Dr. Sunderland was heard from again, when he came out with a card in the Sun, denying that either the affiant, or anyone else for him, had ever paid him (Dr. Sunderland) a dollar, and he added: "For further particulars I refer the curious to the suggested investigation before the Senate committee, whenever Mr. Armes is ready to proceed."

Two weeks later, in answer to a hint in the Sun, that if the charge was false why wait for the accuser to move? Dr. Sunderland said: "Let him choose his Senate Committee and proceed to substantiate his statements. Your first intimation was that he would be ready to do this, and until it is done, I am content to leave the matter, so far as your paper is concerned, to the judgment of the public."

Thus the matter lay, and Dr. Sunderland continued in the chaplaincy four years. The venerable accuser meanwhile returned to Washington, his permanent home, where he died in 1879. Repeatedly he called on me with tottering steps, but retaining all his mental faculties. Repeatedly he sought to stir the matter up with senators. It was not the payment of the money for Dr. Sunderland's service, but the manner in which the doctor had treated him after the claim was passed, that galled the proud spirit of the old Virginian.

Once he prevailed on me to write a memorial to the Senate. I did it in haste, and it began in this wise: "How much longer is the Senate of the United States going to employ for its chaplain a clerical lobbyist?" The old gentleman handed this to the de facto presiding officer. Mr. Wheeler took it, and after reading the first sentence handed it back indignantly, saying, "It is not respectful, and I will not present it." I knew it was not respectful, but how could I feel much respect for a legislativ body which had kept in such a chaplain four years?

In regard to the payment of the three hundred and fifty dollars, this I understand to be the fact: Dr. Sunderland sought to get the fee before the claimant was paid. This aroused the latter's anger. Then Dr. Sunderland sought to get the bill reconsidered and rejected, but failing in that, he tried to stop payment by the department, and the matter was at last adjusted at the department by drawing two checks on the treasury, one of which, for three hundred and fifty dollars, the claimant indorsed and left with the auditor, for the use of whom it might concern. Dr. Sunderland probably knew who got it, and whether it went for his own benefit or that of his church. The claimant was a man of property, and left at his death an estate of several thousand dollars. And he lived and died a Christian.

In the case of the Rev. F. M. Todd, of Manassas, Dr. Sunderland was the attorney of the accused before the presbytery, and the case is now appealed to the synod. The case turned on the credibility of the negro, who testified that on the 24th of May last he saw the Rev. Mr. Todd in the woods, about two hundred yards from the road, with a lap robe spread and lying down upon it, accompanied by a white woman, while his horse was tied to a tree. A majority of the presbytery voted to dismiss the case, because the evidence of the negro was not sufficiently supported. Dr. Sunderland, in his eagerness to discredit the negro's testimony, inadvertently used the expression, "but the nigger said," and then paused, while everybody snickered. The doctor was embarrassed, and turning to the reporters apologized for using language that was "not respectful." This slip of the tongue was the more unfortunate on account of Dr. Sunderland's political proclivities, he having served as chaplain in the Republican Senate some half a dozen years altogether.

It is said that in the early days of Dr. Sunderland's ministry he underwent a tribulation very similar to that of his brother Todd, but survived the ordeal and maintained his standing quite as well, if not better, than his client has so far maintained his. And now, having fought the good fight and kept the Calvinistic faith, he has qualified himself to become a leading champion in the crusade against the "youngsters of the new theology," who dare to doubt the goodness of God in tormenting forever in hell the poor heathen who never heard of Jesus Christ.

The Refinement of Cruelty.

From Judge.

"Don't you pine for freedom?" asked a visitor at the Toombs of a prison.

"Sometimes I do," replied the latter.

"When does that feeling come over you the strongest?"

"Whenever I see a fresh batch of religious papers comin' into the place."

An Awkward Attitude for God.

From the Henderson, Texas, Times.

Sam Small says it was an insult to God to leave his name out of the Constitution of the United States. That's the first we hav heard of it. God has never sent a delegation to Congress to hav his name put there; in fact, we don't believe God wants his name in it. His name is in the organic laws of several nations—no two of them alike—and the attempt to make him the indorser of all the governments would place him in rather an awkward attitude, to say the least of it.

God Can't Indorse the Acts of Christian Statesmen.

From the Overton, Texas, Sharpshooter.

We think it would be an insult to God to put his indorsement to many acts of the government. The advantage that our government has over all other governments is that God and religion are kept entirely separated from the Constitution, and ever ought to be. We hav too high a veneration for the supreme ruler of the universe to ever want to see the sacred name mixed up with the filth of politics. Such cranks as Sam Small and others that we could mention may advocate such a proceeding, but the true friends of God will ever oppose it and prevent it.

The Liberal Club.

Inquiries hav reached this office from persons who desire to know if the Manhattan Liberal Club is still holding regular meetings, and if the man with a badge-pin continues to exist. We should smile. Unhurt amid the war of elements, the wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds, the Liberal Club holds its serene and uninterrupted way; and on the evening of Friday, November 4th, a man upon whose westcut gleamed a ten-dollar emblem of intellectual disenthralment followed the brass railing up the steps of the hall at 220 East 15th street, and sat amid the audience there assembled. It was a fine audience indeed, and the pleasure of the visitor was somewhat dashed to think that he had not worn his best clothes.

All around are familiar faces. Over there is Ex-Treasurer Morris, who smiles and nods. Here is Madam Delezcluse, who shakes hands cordially. By the table sits Mrs. Leonard, with gold-bowed glasses, a determined expression of countenance, and a V-shaped southern exposure. At the door is Treasurer Clark, none the less a sea-captain because he is now a second officer of the club. He takes the journalist's dime with a bow so profound that the visitor accepts it in lieu of change. Another treasurer present is Mr. Charles Eckhard, who knows that the world is a delusion generally, but who enjoys delusions. He looks on genially. Away up front Deacon Dean's intellectual head is observable, and Mr. Isaac Rosenbourgh's pleasing Teutonic countenance turns this way occasionally to illuminate the space behind him. Poet Fountain is grayer than a year ago, but he arises as gracefully as ever to yield his chair to Mrs. Wallace Britton, the actress, who comes in late. Beware of him; he will spring a yard of poetry on you if you giv him a chance. And who is this whose hair and beard seem to radiate, as it were, from a common center? By the Great Horn Spoon, it is none other than Herr Oppenheimer, ex-candidate for the German Reichstag. A gray bunch of hair is growing upon his forehead, which adds to his picturesque appearance without impairing his serene beauty.

Upon the platform something seems lacking. The chair once filled by Mr. Wakeman is vacant. He is at the Germania Assembly Rooms impressing upon an enthusiastic constituency the necessity of supporting the Progressive Labor Party in general and your humble servant for attorney-general; but over opposit the empty seat Vice-President E. B. Foote, Jr., holds the mallet of fate that has fallen upon many an unfinished period and let many an orator down suddenly from a lofty hight.

Behind the speaker's stand is Prof. Van Buren Denslow, the lecturer of the evening. He is arguing that capital, i.e., machinery, does nine-tenths of the work, labor being merely the director. The produce exchange is a beneficent institution in that it fixes and maintains the price of wheat and corn over a large area of the world and over considerable periods of time. Socialists like Henry George and Karl Marx want to change things without understanding the present state of society.

Mrs. Leonard was the first to say, "Mr. Chairman," after Professor Denslow had concluded. She maintained that the grain speculators were the biggest hogs in Chicago. If they could control the leather market shoes would be fifteen dollars a pair.

Herr Oppenheimer claimed that brokers were a legitimate product of our present imperfect system, which should be abolished as soon as possible. Henry George was a confiscator and a highwayman, not a Socialist. Herr Oppenheimer remarked that he spoke within limits when he said that Professor Denslow astonished him.

Dr. Weeks, author of the "Songs of the Morning," defended Mr. George to the extent of saying that Mr. George proposed to confiscate only that which had been obtained by robbery. The doctor reaffirmed that he was a Methodist with modern improvements, and repudiated the doctrin of total depravity. He didn't like Mrs. Leonard's fling at hogs. There was a good deal of human nature in the hog, or a good deal of the hog in human nature, he couldn't quite make out which. Vices were not generally so difficult to reform as hidebound virtues.

Captain Clark recalled that Dr. Johnson had said patriotism was the last resort of scoundrels. He would add that Labor reform was the last resort of played-out politicians. The captain indorsed the lecture of the evening, and said Professor Denslow had never uttered a word that did not coincide with his (Captain Clark's) experience. As is well known, Captain Clark has had experience in all parts of the world, both civilized and barbarous.

Madam Delezcluse confessed that she arose with hesitation, having the crushing intellect of Captain Clark against her; she nevertheless went ahead and made some good points against the lecturer.

Mr. Sutherland characterized the lecture as an intellectual feast, and added that Mrs. Leonard's unpractical remarks showed the kind of a scrape we would get into if women were allowed to vote.

Dr. Foote here announced the lecture for the next meeting, to be delivered by Professor Rawson, on the Jews and their Bible. He then inquired of Mr. Denslow if speculating in wheat did not raise the price above the normal one fixed by supply and demand.

Mr. Denslow replied that no broker could raise the price of a product. If he paid more or asked more for it than demand and supply justified, he would assuredly be left in the end. His function was merely the beneficent one of establishing a uniform price for the benefit of the producer. Mrs. Leonard interrupted to inquire if each broker or middleman who bought and sold grain didn't speculate on it. Mr. Denslow answered that we were all speculating more or less intelligently about grain, that being the subject of discussion. Owing to the unreasoning nature of the female mind, Mrs. Leonard did not appear to be satisfied with this candid and lucid reply. Professor Denslow casually observed that if they could get it into their heads by that method it would pay the Socialists to purchase a forty-million-ton triphammer to drive sense through their impenetrable armor of stupidity. This made Herr Oppenheimer turn pale and he retained his seat only by a great effort.

When these solemnities had closed, the journalist went home, to write the account here superimposed, and end it with this pome.

The Trial of Mrs. Slenker.

I deem it due to the friends who hav so liberally contributed for Elmina's defense that a report should be made of the practical work which through their generosity I hav been enabled to do. The good result of this work will be great and permanent. Many things hav transpired which I cannot tell of in a brief article, and some things hav developed that it is not politic at this writing to mention; but I intend to tell some of the principal facts, which together will form a connected story, and giv an idea of the true character of this remarkable and persistent persecution.

It seems that a year or more ago a trivial accident occurred on a railroad in Indiana which was the prime cause of all Elmina's trouble. A mail pouch being delivered from a train at a way station by means of a crane was struck a violent blow, and one of Elmina's packages, which was in the pouch, being crowded full of matter and inclosed in a fragil envelope, was burst open and the contents scattered promiscuously through the pouch. The postmaster, instead of reading the address on the envelope and forwarding the package according to directions, without prying into its contents, undertook to gratify his curiosity by an examination, and was surprised to find that the papers were devoted to a discussion of the awful subject of sex relations. Constituting himself a censor of morals, he then proceeded to a second violation of the postal laws, and detaining all the matter and diverting it from the direction to which it was addressed, he sent it to Washington for criticism by the high authorities there.

Instead of rebuking this officious postmaster for his violation of the sacred trusts confided to him and for the two crimes against the postal laws he had been guilty of, and instead of directing him to atone so far as he then might for his betrayal of the citizen's right of free mails by immediately forwarding Elmina's package to the person to whom it was addressed, the authorities at Washington, as faithless to their trust as their subordinate, called in the notorious Comstock, and ordered him, in his capacity of spy, sneak, and detectiv, to take the case for investigation. Comstock, who started in 1878 to "stamp out" a certain class of Freethought literature (see "Fourth Annual Report New York Society for Suppression of Vice," p. 7), had already had his bellyful, and prudently discovered that his engagements were so numerous that he could find no time to make this very interesting investigation, so the task of decoying Elmina into the toils was assigned to Post-office Inspector W. H. Barclay, a man who so far as I hav been able to learn had previously had no connection with the inquisition department of the post-office, but who seems not to hav had character enough to be too busy to undertake such dishonorable employment. He and one Williams, alias McAfee, a Western man well known to the Defense Association, undertook to make out a case against Elmina. They carried on a correspondence with her extending over a considerable length of time. One of the letters written by this Williams may serve to show how, under the pretense of a common interest in the research Elmina was making, this worthy undertook to win her confidence and procure from her matter which he could falsify and pervert for his infamous purpose. Here it is:

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Sept. 22, 1886.

ELMINA SLENKER, Snowville, Va., Madam: I hav just read in the Word, Sept., Y.L. 14 [1886], that you hav truths about starved women, etc.

If you will send me some samples of them I can use them for the good of the great cause. If you sell them, please send bill, and I will remit. Address,

R. M. WILLIAM, Drawer D 6.

Thus lured, and suspecting no evil, Elmina sent to him letters of the kind she was in the habit of exchanging with her other correspondents, and after a time he had a number of letters and papers which he thought he might plausibly pervert to suit his pretenses that it was obnoxious to the law. An indictment was then drawn containing two counts, each setting out one letter addressed severally to each of the sneaks and mailed under the sanctity of a seal, and upon this extraordinary indictment was had the trial which has excited so much interest and attracted to Elmina so much sympathetic devotion of her friends. Of this trial I prefer not to speak at present. It was extraordinary in many respects. The result was conviction. Nothing else could hav been expected under the conditions in which the case was tried. One feature of the trial I cannot refrain from mentioning. It was most romantic and pathetic. The superb old woman was called to the witness stand, and alone, the only one of her sex in a room crowded with the low, the vile, the wretched, and the degraded, with an eloquence which, notwithstanding her defectiv speech, I hav never seen equaled, and never expect to see equaled, she told her simple story to a judge who did not, to an audience who could not, and to a prosecution who would not understand her. She proceeded in her own way, and though she often wandered wide of the rules of evidence, no one dared to break the spell which she threw around that court-room. After this the prosecution softened a little, and stated that they did not care to put an old woman to the torture, but that they must stop the circulation of the leaflets, and that Elmina had persistently refused to tell who was the author of them, though she had been repeatedly assured that if she would disclose their author she would be allowed to go in peace, and that she would even now be allowed to take advantage of this very gracious offer, though a terrible retribution awaited the malefactor who wrote those wicked leaflets. Still she declined. Then the author of "Diana" was called to testify, and with quiet imperturbability acknowledged that he was the author of some of the leaflets, the editor of others, and the writer of all. The awful wrath of the prosecution oozed out rapidly. They didn't seem to want to see the writer of the leaflets quite as bad as they did a few minutes before. Indeed, they did not appear at all glad of the opportunity afforded them of turning loose the majesty of the law upon him. They let him go without cross-examination. But enough. The summing up came with the dire threat on the part of the prosecution that the jury must not violate the oath they had taken under penalty of the consequences. The judge submitted the case to the jury, and they struck infallible wisdom in about ten minutes, which was quite a gain in time over anything the court or counsel had accomplished. Their verdict was "guilty," and sentence was postponed to the next day. The next day we devoted to argument of a motion in arrest of judgment, and the day following, on the opening of the court, the judge struck the right chord, and, sustaining our motion, discharged poor Elmina.

I've seen a great many dead men, and I hav always observed that they are quiet and peaceable and don't make much disturbance, but I never saw such an unreasonable dead man as Prosecuting Attorney Allen. He would not be convinced that he was dead. He thrashed around lively. He wanted a reargument. He acted as fresh as if he were just born instead of being just killed and laid out cold and stiff. He was going to send Elmina to jail anyway, in spite of her discharge. I don't believe he ever will be quite right in his mind again. I don't know how much of the taxpayers' money he squandered on telegrams to the inquisition department of the post-office. He did not get things fixed to suit him. I came down the road with him that night on the train. He looked wild. Where he went I don't know. If anyone finds a dead man ripping and tearing around the country and lamenting Elmina's good fortune, please return him to Abingdon, Virginia.

ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

DETAILS OF THE TRIAL.

On October 21, 1887, the trial of the indictment upon which Mrs. Slenker was arrested last April, was commenced before Judge Paul and a jury. There was much interest manifested, and a large audience assembled nowithstanding the entire want of seats outside the bar. Mrs. Slenker sat, accompanied by her husband, near her counsel, Ed. W. Chamberlain, of New York city, and Messrs. Rowland and Heermans, of Virginia.

The offense charged being a misdemeanor under the statute, no peremptory challenges were allowed, the only ground of exclusion being for favor. One witness was excluded upon examination by the court on the ground of having formed an opinion. Mr. Chamberlain also asked the jurors a series of questions, among which were the following:

Hav you now or hav you ever had any business relations with any society for the suppression of obscenity or vice, or with any person known to you to be an officer or agent of any such society?

Are you acquainted with or are you on terms of friendship with Anthony Comstock, alias J. G. Phillips, alias Ella Bender, alias Mrs. Farnsworth, alias E. Semler, alias Annie E. Ray, alias Hy. Bean; or Samuel Colgate, or Killaen Van Rensselaer, or R. M. Williams, alias R. M. McAfee, alias Nettie G. Harlan; or W. H. Barclay, or any other agent or officer of any society for the suppression of vice or obscenity?

If it should appear that the defendant differed widely from you in her opinions upon moral, religions, economic, or political topics, would that fact preclude you from giving the defendant the benefit of any reasonable doubt which you may hav as to her guilt?

Assuming that one of the witnesses in the case is a government official, and that in procuring the testimony which he offers he has violated the law, would the fact of his official position induce you to giv any greater weight or credit to his testimony than you would giv to the testimony of any other confessed or proved law-breaker?

Assuming that the doctrins or principles contained in the matter which will be presented to you are in your opinion erroneous, are you under the influence of any social, religious, political, or economic views or opinions which will tend to prevent your acting impartially as a juror in the trial of this case?

THE COURT: It will be a question for the court to determin what the character of the testimony is.

THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY: I do not think what their views may be with regard to the peculiar doctrins of the accused has anything to do with this case. The question is whether the writings contained in the letters are obscene, and whether they come within the inhibition of the statute.

[The district attorney proceeded to read from the opinion in the case of Regina vs. Hicklin, before the Queen's Bench, and the opinion of Judge Blatchford in the case of the United States vs. D. M. Bennett.]

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: That is the very argument I should make why the question should be sustained. This is a case of the deepest importance, not only to the defendant, but to every American citizen, involving great questions of liberty; and it is my right to assure myself that the jurors are free from such bias as will lead them to convict this defendant not merely because she has sent obscene matter, but on account of something else.

The question was allowed. Mr. Chamberlain also asked the following:

Does the nature of the charge excite in you any prejudice or animosity against the defendant?

Do you believe falsehood and treachery to be either justifiable or necessary to promote morality or to advance the interests of religion? (Question excluded; exception.)

Hav you ever bought liquors, cigars, books, or other commodities for the purpose of entrapping dealers therein, or for the purpose of securing evidence against dealers in those articles to convict them of any real or imaginary crime? (Question excluded; exception.)

Hav you ever induced any person to violate the law in order to procure for yourself any benefit by an exposure of such violation?

Hav you ever feigned, forged, or otherwise used any other name than your own in any transaction whatever?

If on the trial of this case it becomes a question whether you shall believe the defendant or one of the witnesses for the prosecution, would you giv any greater credit to a witness if he should be shown to be a government officer than you would to the defendant?

If it should appear that the defendant was engaged in a work which do not approve, would that fact incline you to conviction, if that work were not a violation of the statute?

Mr. Ronald asked each juror his residence. Mr. Jones having replied that he resided in Abingdon, Mr. Ronald objected to his incompetency, on the ground that the matters claimed to be obscene had been circulated in the streets of Abingdon, and were familiar to everybody in the town.

The court excluded the juror, and another was called.

No other objection appearing, the jury were sworn. It may be interesting to note that the jury consisted of 11 white men, 1 colored man, 0 white women, 0 colored women.

The district attorney (Ex-Judge H. C. Allen) read to the jury the statute, section 3,893, known as the Comstock law.

Mr. Chamberlain objected to the reading of the whole section, as it contained an enumeration of offenses with which the defendant was not charged. There had been no charge that she had violated that portion of the section relating to information with regard to the prevention of conception.

The court called upon the district attorney to read the portion of the section upon which he relied; whereupon the district attorney read that portion relating to the sending of papers, letters, and other publications; and the court ruled that the evidence should be confined to that point.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I learn that it is the practice here for the defendant's counsel to make an opening at this stage. I am not prepared to do that. The indictment alleges very vaguely certain matters which are not even referred to by title. It is usual in criminal cases to inform the defendant specifically and precisely of just what thing he is accused. Otherwise he cannot prepare his defense. Otherwise, if acquitted and subsequently charged with the same offense, he cannot plead that he has been once tried upon that charge. That little formality has been omitted. We are not apprised, and do not know to this moment, of what we are accused; and will hav to make out the defense as the case goes on, and as the prosecution develops it. If the prosecution do not establish a case, we shall hav nothing to meet.

William H. Barclay was called to the witness stand.

Before he had taken the oath he was interrogated by Mr. Chamberlain:

Q. Do you believe in a God? A. I do.

Q. Do you believe in one everliving and true God? A. I do.

Q. Do you believe in a future state of rewards and punishments? A. I do. I am an old-fashioned blue-stocking Presbyterian, if you know what that is.

Q. Do you believe in the saving grace of Jesus Christ? A. Yes.

Q. Do you believe that if you perjure yourself on this occasion and repent you will be saved? A. I do; the thief was saved on the cross.

Q. Is that the way you expect to be saved, after having done this mischief?

THE COURT: The religious belief of a witness in Virginia is no disqualification.

Q. Do you believe that the Bible is the word of God? A. I shall answer no more questions, except upon the instruction of the judge.

THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY: Answer the question. A. Yes.

Q. Do you believe that it is all the word of God? A. I do.

Q. From beginning to end? A. I refuse to answer such questions as this, unless compelled to do it by the court.

THE COURT: No matter what his answer may be, I shall be compelled to admit him. The binding obligation of an oath may result from other causes than a belief in the Bible.

Q. Do you realize the nature and obligation of an oath? A. I do, most fully.

THE COURT: The court does not exclude the question, but decides that he is a competent witness, no matter how he answers the question.

The question was repeated, and the witness refused to answer.

The court declined to direct him to answer. (Exception.)

William H. Barclay was thereupon duly sworn, and examined by the district attorney.

Q. Do you know Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker? A. I do.

Q. Do you know anything about her having deposited or caused to be deposited knowingly in the mail for mailing and delivery, etc. (reading the description from the statute)?

Mr. Ronald objected that the paper must be produced.

THE COURT: He must produce the paper.

Q. Hav you received any letters from Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker?

(Objection offered.)

THE COURT: The question is whether he has received a letter. He may answer whether he has received a letter purporting to be from her.

Q. Hav you a letter received from her, or purporting to hav come from her; and if so, please to state how you know it was from her?

Q. (by Mr. Ronald). Was it a sealed letter that you received? A. It was.

Mr. Ronald objected to the admissibility of the contents of a sealed letter upon the ground that the law does not embrace sealed letters; that the law, in referring to letters as unmailable, has expressly limited the inhibition to such as showed on the outside that they were obscene. He cited the case of ex parte Jackson, in 96 U. S. Reports, in which the law had been so adjudicated.

THE COURT: Is it your position that if matters are obscene, yet when inclosed under seal they lose their obscene character?

MR. RONALD: That a sealed letter does not fall within the purview of the statute. Unless there is some obscenity upon the envelope of a letter, it is not unmailable.

THE COURT: That there is no charge that there was an obscene letter sent?

MR. ROLAND: There is no charge in the indictment that Mrs. Slenker ever sent an obscene letter through the mails.

MR. HEERMANS: How could it be known that a sealed letter was obscene?

Q. Did you receive from Mrs. Slenker a letter containing writings, publications, and prints; and if you did, state when you received them, and how you knew the letter was mailed to you by Mrs. Slenker? A. On March 15th, I received this package of papers. On the same day I received a letter containing other matters and a letter with it. (Objection.) It was received in due course of mail at Richmond, Va.

Q. State from whom it was received, whom it was mailed by, and how you knew it?

Objected to as incompetent, unless witness saw the mailing.

THE COURT: He may show that he knew from her statement afterward, or writing in reply to a letter written by him, acknowledging the receipt of his.

Q. Did she ever make any statement to you about that letter?

Objected to on the ground that such statement would be in the nature of a confession; and that a confession cannot be received until the corpus delicti has been established.

THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY: I am proving the corpus delicti.

Q. Did you receive those through the mail? A. I did.

Q. Did she admit that she mailed them?

THE COURT: We will first see if they are objectionable matter.

Q. (by the court). Where did you receive them? A. At Richmond, at the post-office.

Q. (by the district-attorney). Just read the documents.

MR. RONALD raised the constitutional question that the exhibits were not set forth in the indictment; that when a warrant is issued, both the state and the federal constitutions prescribe that the warrant shall specify what is complained of. (Citing authorities.)

THE COURT: The question of the insufficiency of the indictment ought to be raised upon demurrer. The proof must correspond with the allegations in the indictment. The letter is not in evidence. The district attorney offers to prove the reception of obscene matter, and then follows the question who sent it.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The force of the objection is that a sealed letter is protected by the decisions.

THE COURT: A sealed letter directed to other parties, not directed to the man himself, how can the law prevent it from being opened?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: When taken from and out of the mail, it is conveyed away from the mail, and its connection with the mail ceases.

THE COURT: It can be submitted to the court, and the court can determin whether it shall go to the jury.

Mr. Chamberlain made an argument upon the language of the statute, and cited authorities, showing that the unmailable matters must be publications, and that it had been decided that matters sent by mail to intimate friends or in a limited way were not publications, and did not come within the inhibition of the statute, for the reason, that they were sent under seal.

THE COURT: I understand that your objection is that no matter, if received by a party in a sealed envelope, can be introduced in evidence to sustain the indictment; that the fact that it was put in a sealed envelope renders it sacred; so that it is no offense against the statute to send these matters through the United States mail, if under seal. Is that the proposition?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: You hav stated the proposition very accurately.

THE COURT: I will hear the district attorney upon that.

The district attorney cited authorities to show that the decisions referred to had since been overruled.

Mr. Chamberlain said he had not concluded his argument when interrupted, and cited other authorities.

The Court reserved its decision and adjourned until Tuesday morning.

NOVEMBER 1, 1887.

The court concurred in the decision of Judge Drummond that the word "writing" embraces a letter, and overruled the objection.

Q. Is that one of the inclosures in that package? A. (A written paper headed, "The Girl and the Dog," handed witness.) I opened it myself, and this is one of the inclosures.

The paper offered in evidence.

Mr. Ronald renewed the objection that the letters should hav been set forth in full in the indictment. A long argument ensued, in which the district attorney read at length the decision of Blatchford in the case of D. M. Bennett, adopting it as his argument. Mr. Ronald gave a history of the Bennett case, and referred also to the Heywood case, showing that Bennett had been convicted, and Heywood acquitted, when tried for the same offense of selling "Cupid's Yokes."

THE COURT: The court is bound by the decisions; and there is a long line of almost unbroken precedents to sustain the decision that the excuse here given is sufficient reason for not spreading the matter in extenso upon the records. If there should be another indictment upon the same matter, parole testimony is always admissible to show that the party has once been tried for the same offense. The court rules that the matter is sufficiently described. (Exception.)

Mr. Chamberlain argued that, these papers being private papers of the defendant, and particularly indicated to be so as alleged, they are to be returned to the defendant, they are her property, under the decisions which he cited. She desires that they may be returned to her, and may not be used for this purpose; and therefore under the decisions such use is unreasonable seizure, and compelling a defendant to testify against herself, in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

THE COURT: The simple indorsement on the back of papers, "These are private papers," does not excuse the character of the matter. If the court established that proposition, the statute would be a nullity; for all that would be necessary would be to indorse papers as private. The court thinks the point is not well founded. The court is not here to determin which way the mischief works.

The objection was also made and argued that the indictment does not allege that the matters they produce are unmailable.

The court said that in speaking of the offense, the word "unmailable" was not used in the statute.

The witness was asked by the district attorney to read the paper to the court and jury.

THE COURT: Is there any objection to its going to the jury without reading?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I desire a public trial

MR. RONALD: I suggest that they go to the jury to peruse in their jury-room.

Mr. Barclay read the story of "The Girl and the Dog" mentioned in the indictment, with the comments interlined.

News and Notes.

A few busy days at Chicago, and the iron horse bears me Eastward. Saturday morning I strike my good friend Dick Smith, of Alliance, generous comrade, always ready with the open hand. His brother, D. W. Smith, is ever on the watch, and makes things go like clockwork for Liberalism and humanity. This time I drop my gripsack at Hotel Central, where the goodly landlord Sourbeck givs the traveler hearty welcome. Arrangements are made for lectures Sunday afternoon and evening in the People's Theater. I hope for fair weather, and as I look into the kindly skies I think that for once fate is propitious in Alliance, and that I shall be allowed to lecture to a full house. Alas for all my expectations! Sunday rolled in to the music of a mighty storm. The rain dashed down and the dust was furious just at the hour for gathering. I wonder what mystic elements are in play that I can make no alliance with fair weather in this glorious old fort of Liberalism. My friend Thornberg says that hereafter when there is a drouth he will send for the president of the American Secular Union, and when he puts in an appearance the gates of heaven will surely be opened and the showers descend. They say there is a tide in the affairs of men which, taken at the flood, leads on to fame and fortune. I hav taken Alliance so often at the flood that it is about time for fame and fortune to appear. However, spite of storm and cloud, the friends at this point always giv a cordial greeting. There was a fair audience, weather to the contrary notwithstanding, present afternoon and evening, and their appreciation was reward for every disappointment. I always enjoy Alliance. It is a lively place. It is one of the central points of labor reform, and our Liberal friends are in the midst of the struggle. Comrade Smith has won his laurels, and is now one of the councilmen of the city, representativ of the people's party, and worthy to bear the honor.

A Liberal lecture association has been formed at Alliance. Whatever happens, there will be no backward step. There is a large Freethought element in the community, and the earnestness and ability of our workers here insure a decided success.

East Rochester is a quiet, comfortable, wealthy place amid the rolling, wooded hills, where the brown fields shine radiantly in the glimmering glory of the Indian summer. I inquired for East Rochester. The magnates of the train sent me to Beloit, by what tergiversation I cannot understand. However, I had the pleasure of taking dinner with my friends, Mr. and Mrs. Bailey. I lectured twelve years ago in the hall above the store. This was one of my first efforts on the Freethought rostrum. After dinner I take a twelve-mile drive over the sparkling country. I was delighted with the quaint, solemn villages through which I passed. I seemed to be in the world before the flood, and expected every moment to meet Noah driving his herd into the ark. The barns in this country are big enough to hold all the occupants of that ancient hulk.

Meandering down the shining valley, on the outer edge of Rochester, I reach the Quaker-like residence of my friend Eli Taylor. He is one of those philosophic farmers who enjoy life. He does not work himself to death, and he likes to see the world. He has traveled over Europe, and touched the Golden Gates of the Pacific. Over seventy years of age, he still enjoys life with youthful zest. Mrs. Taylor is of gentle Quaker blood, and "the inner light" mingles with her Liberal convictions, and she delights more in the harmonies of faith than in differences of thought. Around this peaceful fireside reminiscence, mingled with happy hope, traveled.

I also traveled in the dreamy moonlight after lecture to the stately mansion of Enoch Wickersham. Here, too, are comfort and elegance in the atmosphere of liberty. Mrs. Wickersham is a noble entertainer, and I hope again to see this beautiful home amid the generous harvest lands.

I lectured three evenings, and the little old schoolhouse, holding about a hundred, was crowded to its utmost capacity. The audiences were appreciativ. Many of those present were Christians, but they gave respectful attention.

I was glad to meet old friends—I call them old friends because they take THE TRUTH SEEKER and read it through from week to week. There were Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Kintner and baby, of Hanover, where there is quite a circle of Liberals; Mrs. Fanny Freed, whose husband, a noble Liberal, died last summer of injuries received; Joseph Coulson, postmaster of the place; H. P. Brashaw, Dr. Waldron, Wm. Wickersham, Amos Brogan. Wm. Robbins, Milton Betts and Wm. Betts, John Emmons, Morris Taylor, Howard Taylor, M. W. Coulson, and others. We quite enjoyed this rural campaign; and we shall not soon forget the little school-house round the corner.

We are now at the Farmdale House, D. G. Brockway, proprietor, who is a sterling Liberal. The moon shines bright, and the prospects are that we shall hav sunny days for our closing work. I expect to hav a bright story to tell of Farmdale. There are three Roots here who are Liberals. That is the kind of Radicalism that means success.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Word to Liberals Everywhere.

Having been urged to accept the secretaryship of the American Secular Union, I hav done so with considerable fear that friends hav over-estimated my capacity, and many misgivings as to my fitness for so important a position—a post to which such eminent talent as Rawson, Leland, and Putnam brought their special genius.

However, where lacking ability, the present incumbent will sedulously endeavor to make reparation by assiduous application to its practical needs and conscientious work to make the American Secular Union an organization whose numbers, strength, and importance will suitably reflect the vast host of those who demand to "keep the church and state forever separate."

If this is not accomplished you will be to blame, provided you hav not subscribed to the Campaign Fund this year. For this is a personal letter to you. Consider it such. In the first place, money is needed to print and publish circulars and campaign literature, bearing strictly on secularization of the state and organization of Unions. Those who aid the Campaign Fund this year will receive supplies for gratuitous distribution.

Friends, furnish us the funds, and we will supply you with more and better ammunition for an effectiv fusilade on the enemy than you could possibly procure yourselvs. We hav the documents. They need to be printed. Where is the money? This is for you to answer.

Joe Cook says the Freethinkers of the United States never had a home, and own but one building in Boston, covered by mortgages. Too true. The headquarters of the American Secular Union has been long enough in the secretary's hat or in his trunk. If this organization "means business," it has got to do its business in a business-like manner. Let us, at least, hav an office, decently furnished, ready to receive the Liberals of East and West, of North and South, when passing through this greatest inland entrepot of the continent. In time our modest office of 1887–8 may develop into reading-room, library, club-house, hall of science, etc. Let the office be the germ. Should there be such an office? This is for you to answer.

If the American Secular Union is to become popular with many who approve of secularizing the government, it must hav an influential appearance; then it will gain numbers, and (sad as it is to admit) numbers is respectability; with this respectability comes wealth, with wealth comes power to accomplish what we propose. So, in the last analysis of our grand, exalted ideals, we hav to come down to the unpoetic, sordid dollars and dimes for their accomplishment. Then, do you really approve of the Nine Demands? How much do you believe in them? How much is that belief when expressed in dollars? This is for you to answer.

Resolutions adopted at the late Congress call for a guarantee fund of $1,000, which should remain untouched as secretary's salary. As it is useless to salary a secretary without furnishing him something to do, I hav incurred expenses absolutely necessary to carry on the work, relying on the liberality of Liberals to be sustained. This is for you to answer.

Don't expect this office is a sinecure, as I am performing more labor than has fallen to my lot for some time, but if only the results can be reached it will be, in large measure, a labor of love. Will you help toward those results? This is also for you to answer.

As soon as arrangements are made I propose to keep on sale a supply of the best Liberal books and tracts, the profits of which shall be credited to the Campaign Fund. For every $2 received for those books, the sender will also be credited (if he will pay postage) with an annual membership in the American Secular Union. If $10 worth of books are purchased we will credit them with $5 to the Campaign Fund, and they will receive gratuitously whatever documents, bearing on the Nine Demands, we are able to print. Will you help make this a success? This is for you to answer.

I want the intelligent coöperation of all friends of Freethought, your suggestions and friendly criticism; hope to be on terms of personal intimacy with every earnest worker. Yours for the inauguration of Universal Mental Liberty,

E. A. STEVENS,
Secretary American Secular Union.

ECHOES.

Jas. A. Greenhill, of Clinton, Iowa, makes haste to join the Grand Army of Secular Soldiers by enlisting as a life member and paying us $25 bounty. That's the kind of an army to join—where you hav to pay to get in. You can be sure of good company then. Other armies are so organized that men often pay to keep out.

M. M. Secor, ex-mayor of Racine, has not read his Investigator, but he sends $10 and an apology for delay, as he intended to contribute toward expenses of Congress. As the expenses of the Congress are all liquidated, we'll put that to credit of Campaign Fund. Thanks, Brother Secor. Whenever you've got $10. send it. No apology necessary. Next.

Prof. W. S. Bell will ring the changes on Elder T. J. Williamson in a four-nights' debate at Salem, Nebraska, to be held November 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th. Methinks there will be considerable of a buzzing in the elder's ears when the Bell ceases. Brother B. has several engagements at various points in Kansas also.

The Eleventh Annual Congress was a bad one for badges. I had ordered one hundred on white satin, with Treasurer Eckhard's unique design in colors, "Our Flag Above the Cross," engraved in New York, and which our ever-vigilant treasurer promptly attended to. It happened I was compelled to be absent from the city nearly two weeks prior to the Congress. Express company took parcel to office; was informed I was out of town. On my return no mention was made, although a postal had been sent. Received notice Tuesday after Congress that there was a parcel on which $10 was due. Well, the delegates missed a very pretty and appropriate memento. That is not all. Otto Wettstein, who has made Rochelle, Ill., famous, and whose badge-pin is a thing of beauty and a joy to every Freethinker fortunate enough to possess one, sent a number of these gems by express. Through one circumstance and another, we did not receive them until Monday or Tuesday afternoon following the Congress.

If ever E. A. Stevens was startled in his life, it was to receive from a well-known Liberal worker now resident in Chicago, but better known in Washington territory and Oregon as a man of large landed interests in the West, the following letter, inclosing warranty deed, abstract of title. The secretary of the Chicago Secular Union read the letter at the meeting Sunday evening. The president could only reply that he had had considerable mud thrown at him during an activ life with unpopular ideas, but this was the first time in his experience when he had it thrown at him in such quantities. He expressed his gratitude to the donor, and hoped his work as secretary of the national body would giv as much satisfaction as his endeavors as president of the Chicago Union had apparently met with. The letter reads:

CHICAGO, Oct. 21, 1887.

E. A. STEVENS, Secretary American Secular Union, Dear Sir and Brother: Allow me to sincerely congratulate you on your election to the responsible office to which you hav attained. However, it seems more appropriate for me to congratulate the American Secular Union in its fortunate selection of one who would, if need be, die in the last ditch in keeping aloft the banner of our noble cause at the hight to which Brother Putnam had raised it. I inclose a deed to you of a beautiful residence lot in Baker City, Oregon, the future great inland city of the Pacific Northwest. Please accept it as my humble contribution to yourself personally, and as an evidence also of my appreciation of the cause in which you will now engage, and believe me

Yours very truly, E. S. MCCOMAS.

A Union Doing Union Work.

From the Marshall County Democrat.

EDITOR DEMOCRAT: In last week's issue of your paper is a notice that if certain parties continue to do farm work on the Sabbath (Sunday) they are to be prosecuted. Now, as we hav the only organization in the county that I know of that is squarely opposed to the laws enforcing a religious observance of Sunday, we feel it to be our duty to assist in the defense of anyone that may be arrested out of religious hate. We do not know the offense, or the parties offending, but we feel sure that some preacher is trying to stir up hatred and revenge. We wish to hear from the accused; also from every Liberal in the county, with a view to county organization. If the churches cannot attract their share of the crowd without the aid of courts, we can tell them how they can. Our motto is "Universal Mental Liberty." Our aim is to cause the laws to be so changed as to make this a purely secular government, such as the United States Constitution established. Let every church hav the same right one as another, and let them pay taxes to the government for the protection they receive. Let me hear from everyone that favors our movement.

E. W. MINER,
Sec. Axtell (Kan.) Liberal Union.

Catholicism Ruining Canada.

Correspondence Detroit Evening News.

Some twenty years ago an intellectual Frenchman, Bath by name, of Sorel, P. Q., published a book entitled, "La Canada Reconquir par la France," or, as it was translated, "Canada Reconquered by the French." At the time Bath was put down as a wild theorist, for he sought to show that Canada would sooner or later be entirely populated by French people, with a French language and literature, while the English-speaking people would gradually be elbowed out. But Bath's idea is no longer a wild theory. It is accepted throughout Ontario. Leading journals are discussing what they regard as the rapid advance of the French line westward. Already all of the province of Quebec has become entirely French, while the easterly townships of Ontario are gradually giving way to the French population. Ottawa is already more than half French.

Connected with this racial problem is a religious one, for the French are ardent Catholics. These two questions, race and religion, hav gradually opened a gulf between Quebec and Ontario which threatens to dismember Canada. It is this, as much as anything else, that is urging many men and newspapers of Canada to talk of annexation.

With a view to ascertaining the extent of this racial and religious growth the News correspondent chose this ultra French place, St. Hyacinthe. Quebec is French and so is Montreal, but they are truly English in comparison with St. Hyacinthe. Here, with a population of about seven thousand, there are scarcely one hundred English-speaking people. Not only is their language French, but all their inspirations are the same, and there is not even a faint bit of sentiment of loyalty for the English crown. The only flag flying is the tri-colored flag of France, over the skating rink. "God Save the Queen" is not heard, but the "Marseillaise" rings out at the festiv gatherings. As one glances over the album of M. Bernier, M. P., the pictures of Bonaparte and Josephine, Napoleon III. and Eugenie, are most conspicuous. They do not look to London for their ideas, but to Paris. Merely in name is it part of the English empire. It is not even Canadian, but French. Their most cherished friend is the States, and it would take but little to arouse such people into enthusiasm for annexation. Judge William T. Mitchell, of Port Huron, the United States consul here, tells me that there are constant demands for his stars and stripes, to be used on public occasions. They seek it to fly over the race-course, to decorate the Yamaska club-house, and even to lower to half-mast on the death of a distinguished citizen. In so thoroughly a French Catholic community the real extent of the racial and religious growth could well be ascertained.

The amazing fecundity of the French in the province of Quebec is without a parallel in history, and this is the main cause of the rapid spread of the race. It is an invariable rule for the women to hav 10 children, while most of them hav more than this number. There are many families having from 17 to 23 children, while the broods frequently number 25 and 27. Census statistics show that the average is over 10 to a family, or more than twice the average of the United States, England, or Europern countries. Even as far west as Lindsay, Ontario, I hav seen two families having 25 and 22 children respectively, the Grozelles and the Forbears.

This remarkable reproduction is due largely to early marriages and to the thoroughly "moral" ideas of the communities. The sturdy French girls develop young and marry when about 16. Thereafter they hav a child about once a year. Naturally this undermines their constitutions, and the older French women are lame and halt. The children, too, coming so rapidly, cannot receive proper attention, and as a result the morality is enormous. That of Hull, a French town opposite Ottawa, is the largest on the continent, while Montreal's death rate is almost equally bad. But in all cases the mortality is from natural causes. Infanticide is unknown in the province, for in the eye of the people, and particularly of the church, this blow at reproduction is a most heinous offense.

With such large families the ratio of poverty is also increased. Although not in actual want, the French Canadians are poorly fed and clothed. With a brood of 15 mouths to feed the head of the family has a hard struggle. But as the boys grow up they lend a hand, and in most cases the girls also work in factories. This, too, has its drawbacks, for it makes an enormous supply of cheap labor, and the result is that wages are not half as high as in the States. In some of the shoe factories here and in Quebec there are seven or eight employees, boys and girls, from the same family. Each gets only small wages, though combined the amount is considerable. But with cheap wages there is cheap food. The cost of living is low and the habitant can liv on about as little as a Chinaman. He is obliged to economize, too, for his 40-acre farm has been doled out in long strips to his 10 or 15 children, who hav in turn subdivided it until these French farms look like checkerboards, each square containing about an acre.

It is this rapid spread of the French that is alarming many in Ontario. They see that the English cannot keep pace with it. There are a few towns in Quebec which hav had a fair representation of English, but gradually the great annual increase in French families has driven them out. The tide has already crossed the Ontario border. Ottawa is now French, and all of the border townships hav succumbed to the same influence. Little by little the line is moving westward and approaching Toronto. It is certain to reach there at an early day, if statistics and previous experience can be relied upon. The Toronto Mail, a leading newspaper of Canada, is treating the question daily in a most serious vein. On the other hand, there are those who contend that so long as this French fecundity is natural and legitimate the English cannot complain. This I heard urged by Senator Sullivan, at Kingston, Ont., who said he had been much among these large families, and found them honest and industrious. But the Ontario view is that some stop must be put to the reproduction, and as a measure in that direction a law to prevent women from marrying under twenty-one has been suggested.

Closely connected with this race question is a religious one, which is also forcing its way into public prominence. The French are mainly Roman Catholics, so that the rapid increase of their race makes a proportionate increase in the church's strength. This is already enormous, and the church practically rules not only the people of Quebec, but the entire government of the dominion. In this way laws hav been framed and are now in force which would surprise an American. For instance, the system of tithes prevails, and every farmer must pay one-twenty-eighth of his crop to the church. This, exclusiv of his municipal assessment, is a tax of nearly 4 per cent on his production. He pays it gladly, although a Detroiter groans under a city tax of one-fourth of the church tithes here. This tithing does not include the tax for church building. Whenever the majority of a church society vote for a new building, a public assessment is made on every Catholic, and the public, not church, officials collect it. The assessments for new church buildings take priority over even a first mortgage.

As a result the province of Quebec has the most superb churches. They are not alone in the large cities, but every town with a handful of people has an imposing church, built in good taste and with architectural elegance. The little village of Longueil, opposit Montreal, has a superb cathedral of cut stone, costing over $100,000. There is no such church in Detroit, and yet Longueil has not more than 2,000 inhabitants, while Detroit has 200,000. Throughout the province the churches, in proportion to the population, are the most splendid in the world. Nearly all of Montreal was formerly owned by the church, which still holds a good portion of the best property. The nuns own large wharf property.

There are two sets of schools, Catholic and Protestant, and a taxpayer's quota goes to that religious school to which he belongs. With corporate property, however, the entire tax is given to the Catholic board. There are, therefore, two recognized classes of public schools. In both of these the French language is almost entirely used, and most of them are in the care of the clergy. In the districts of Sherbrooke and Richmond there are twenty-five priests conducting the Protestant schools. The assertion was recently made by the Montreal Witness that the number was twenty-eight. Denials were made, and an investigation established the number at twenty-five.

The Anticlericals claim that many abuses hav resulted from the extensiv power of the church. For instance, the most complete censorship is maintained against the introduction of Liberalism and Infidelity into Quebec. In one case a young author had been to much expense and labor to get out a book of somewhat Liberal views. This came under the eye of the church censor, was condemned, and thereupon burnt. Here at St. Hyacinthe I was told of a similar instance. A Parisian bookseller, who had formerly lived at St. Hyacinthe, returned to his own home and sought to make a sale of books to the provincial library. Among those chosen was one treating of prehistoric man. This was rejected by M. de Labruere, the provincial censor, as having too much that was against orthodox doctrin. In fact, the province of Quebec knows nothing of Darwin, Herbert Spencer, or Huxley. The censor would bar them from the libraries, the book dealer who sold them would be publicly denounced and crushed.

An instance of the manner in which the church may interpose to stop Freethinking occurred here. A wealthy and leading manufacturer, M. Boas, was speaking on politics, when he admitted incidentally that he was a Freethinker. In the next issue of Le Courier, the paper published by M. de Labruere, the provincial censor, there was an article calling upon the church authorities to interpose against Boas. Owing to the fact that the vicar-general interceded, nothing was done. However, it was conceded that, had the bishop seen fit, Boas could hav been so anathematized that his workmen, his customers, and his friends would hav ostracized him.

Indictment of Harman and Walker.

At last the blow has fallen! We are all indicted—severally and jointly.

The names of nine of the subscribers on our local list appear as the witnesses cited, presumably to prove the receiving of the indicted copies of Lucifer through the mail. Among these names is that of one of our bondsmen, N. H. Harman. Evidently "our friend, the enemy," Mr. McAfee, does not mean to be accused of partiality in selecting witnesses! Five issues of Lucifer are indicted. The alleged mailing of a copy of each of these to each of the nine subscribers named in the indictments is a "count" against each of us separately, and against all jointly. This makes forty-five counts against each separately and forty-five more against the editors and publishers jointly, thus aggregating ninety counts each against M. Harman, Geo. Harman, and E. C. Walker, or two hundred and seventy in all against the unfortunate members of the "Lucifer outfit," to use a favorit expression of a pious local contemporary.

And what is the offending matter? What articles in these five numbers of Lucifer are obscene, lewd, and lascivious? We do not know. In the indictments this is alleged of each copy specified:

> And said obscene, lewd, and lascivious paper and publication aforesaid so knowingly deposited as aforesaid is of a nature so obscene, lewd, and lascivious as to dispense with the incorporation of the words and figures in this indictment.

What a very modest grand jury! How tenderly solicitous for the morals of the court officials and other unworldly gentlemen!

Seriously, the infamy of such a prosecution renders it impossible to fitly characterize it. When men can be indicted for words written or printed, and then be prevented from knowing what those words are until the hour of trial, the attack upon the liberty of the press has assumed so outrageous a form that earnest and thoughtful men are justified in declaring that the machinery of the grand jury system is being used, not to advance the cause of justice, but to carry into execution the schemes of private hate, class interests, and religious bigotry. How do we know what words or paragraphs in these indicted issues of Lucifer are "obscene, lewd, and lascivious," as viewed through the smoked glasses of these grand jurymen, and so what is to prevent us from again and again committing the "crime" of writing, printing, and mailing them? What right has a grand jury to tell a man that some words of his are "obscene," etc., and yet refuse to inform him which those words are? Is this Comstockian method of drawing indictments intended to promote "law-breaking?" It certainly has that appearance.

But whether we do or do not know what the offending words and phrases are, we shall never admit that we hav exceeded our rights as editors and publishers, for we hav not, and we shall continue to conduct our paper to suit ourselvs and our subscribers, regardless of the meddling intolerance of McAfee and the obsequious grand juries which do his bidding.

The above-named special agent of the post-office department was in Leavenworth while the grand jury was in session, and to this Western Comstock we are indebted for the indictments. He seems anxious to rival in scoundrelism his Eastern coadjutor and exemplar. But let none ever forget that he is merely an instrument—the infamous and unconstitutional law which he enforces is the real enemy, and against that we must direct every force at our command.

We are held in bonds of $500 each to appear for trial on the second Monday of April, 1888, in the United States District Court at Topeka. N. H. Harman, of Valley Falls, and J. B. Johnson and N. J. Holum, of Topeka, are our bondsmen.

It is a square fight for Free Press. We flatly deny the charge of obscenity. Lucifer has never contained an obscene word, even when judged by the anti-natural standards of the dominant religion and sociology. We ask the comradeship and substantial help of the Freethinkers and Humanitarians of the country. To defend in the United States courts against such a charge as this is costly, and the publication of a radical paper such as ours brings in money in a very slow and intermittent stream. To pay current expenses out of our weekly receipts is all that we are able to do, and so, in a crisis like this, we must appeal to our co-workers to help us in our defensiv struggle with the powers of intolerance and proscription, a struggle upon whose final issue hangs the liberty to speak and write and print, of every man and woman in our land.

Valley Falls, Kan. Oct. 31, 1887.

Note.—In The Truth Seeker of Oct. 29th is an editorial note that embodies an error regarding our case. Touching our departure from Leavenworth before our case had been given to the grand jury I wrote and Lucifer printed it as I wrote, that we were allowed to go upon "our old recognizances." It appears in The Truth Seeker as "our own recognizances," quite an important difference.—E. C. W.

TWO THINGS WANTED.

First. We want some money from every friend who owes on his subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The balance in the bank from which to draw to satisfy the paper manufacturers and the printer is very small, and we must increase it, or run in debt. There are many hundreds of dollars owing us by subscribers, and we desire to kindly but firmly call their attention to the matter. We need the money, and it is not right for them to keep it from us. We would also respectfully suggest to those whose subscriptions expire during the present month that now is the time to renew. We would call attention, too, to our club rates. Get a new subscriber, and so get your own paper cheaper.

Second. We once more ask our friends to send us the names of all the Infidels of their acquaintance who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER. The intention is to send them sample copies of the paper with the hope that they may subscribe.

Church Establishment.

The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Anarchist cases draws attention to a court interpretation of the Constitution of great interest to Freethinkers. The court holds that the first ten amendments to the Constitution are limitations upon the power of the United States, but not upon the power of the several states. This has been the view of the court for a half-century, and many decisions hav been rendered in accordance therewith. If this be the case, it removes all restrictions upon the states as to the establishment of religion except their own constitutions. Every state can, if it chooses, establish by law any religion or any sect, and support such religion or sect from the state treasury. Many of the states hav provided against this, but not all. Alabama, to begin alphabetically, cannot hav a state religion without changing its present constitution. Arizona territory can, provided it is established by the territorial legislature and not by Congress. Arkansas may hav an established religion, and its present constitution virtually legalizes the Christian religion by providing that any person who denies the being of God shall be incompetent to hold civil office or testify in court. California is safe. So is Colorado. Connecticut cannot giv preference to any Christian sect, but it has established the Christian religion by enacting blasphemy laws. Dakota is in the same boat with Arizona, and has in addition a blasphemy law. Delaware believes it to be the duty of all men to worship the "author of the universe," but no man can be compelled to support places of worship. Delaware, of course, has a blasphemy law, which makes the Christian religion the legal superstition. Florida could establish a state church if it chose. So could Georgia and Idaho territory. Illinois, Iowa, Indiana, Kansas, and Kentucky could not without first changing their constitutions. But Indiana has a blasphemy law, though the others hav not. Louisiana could, as there are no constitutional provisions touching the matter. Maine cannot establish a sectarian religion, though Infidels can easily be reached through its blasphemy laws. Maryland is prohibited from compelling its citizens to maintain worship, though blasphemers may be punished by imprisonment. Massachusetts has once disestablished the Congregational church, but she could easily reëstablish it, and her blasphemy law is a relic of puritanical times. Michigan is safe from church establishment, though she can punish blasphemers. Minnesota could establish a church, though she cannot punish blasphemers. Mississippi can hav no state church, though anyone denying the existence of a supreme being can hold no office in the state. Missouri could establish a church. Montana is subject to Congress and her territorial legislature. Nebraska can hav no state religion. Nevada could. New Hampshire has established evangelical Protestantism, and provides that towns and cities may hire the preachers of their choice, and pay them, but no person of any one particular sect shall be compelled to support preachers of another sect. However, this does not affect contracts made before this constitution was passed. New Jersey cannot establish a church, but she can and does punish blasphemy against Christianity. New Mexico must treat all sects equally. New York could not establish a church. North Carolina could. Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, Wisconsin, cannot establish religion in any form. Washington and Wyoming territories are under jurisdiction of their legislatures and Congress, and under the decision of the Supreme Court we see no reason why the legislature may not establish a religion, though Congress may not. The District of Columbia is under immediate Congressional authority, and can, of course, hav no Congressional church.

But any or all of the states can by changing their organic laws hav an established church as completely as the Church of England. The reason that we do not hav them is because the sects fight each other and prevent one from obtaining such undue advantage as state establishment would giv. Herein is forcibly illustrated the ancient saw that when thieves fall out honest men get their due.

Mrs. Slenker Free.

Technically Messrs. Chamberlain, and Roland, and Heermans hav defeated the district attorney and the post-office spies who had Mrs. Slenker arrested. The trial began Monday, October 31st, and continued to Friday, November 4th. We print in another place as much of the proceedings as Mr. Parkhurst, the stenographer, could get ready for this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Mrs. Slenker's lawyers were unable to persuade the judge to take the case from the jury, and that body of intelligent gentlemen adjudged Mrs. Slenker guilty after ten minutes' consideration of the case. The sentence was postponed until the next day, at which time Mr. Chamberlain moved for the discharge of his client on the ground that the indictment was faulty. Judge Paul granted the motion, his decision being as follows:

"UNITED STATES vs. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"Motion in arrest of judgment. Allegation of scienter in indictment, when a matter of substance.

"The indictment under section 3,893, United States Revised Statutes, contained two counts, each charging that the defendant 'did unlawfully and knowingly deposit and caused to be deposited in the mail of the United States for mailing and delivery in the post-office of Snowville, Va., certain obscene, lewd, and lascivious writings, papers, prints, and publications.' No other allegation of knowledge appeared in the indictment. After conviction in the district court of the United States for the Western District of Virginia, the defendant moved in arrest of judgment for insufficiency of the indictment. The jury in this case having found a verdict of guilty, the defendant moves the court in arrest of judgment on the ground that it is not alleged in either count of the indictment that the defendant knew the writings, papers, publications, etc., charged to hav been by her deposited in the mail, were of an obscene, lewd, and lascivious character. She is charged in the indictment with unlawfully and knowingly depositing and causing to be deposited in the mail for mailing and delivery certain obscene, lewd, and lascivious writings, papers, etc., but there is no allegation that she knew the papers, writings, etc., to be obscene, lewd, etc. The scienter when necessary to be alleged in an indictment is matter of substance and not of form, and its omission is not cused by section 1,025 of the Revised Statutes.

"The district attorney insists that as the indictment is in the language of the statute it is sufficient. This is the general rule as sufficiently describing the offense, but where something more is necessary, such as the allegation of guilty knowledge, then the language of the statute is not always sufficient. This was the case in United States vs. Carll, 105 U. S., 611, where the indictment alleged in the words of the statute that the defendant feloniously and with intent to defraud did pass, utter, and publish a falsely made, forged, counterfeit, and altered obligation of the United States, but did not further allege that the defendant knew it to be false, forged, counterfeit, and altered. It was held insufficient even after verdict, the Supreme Court saying, 'In an indictment upon a statute it is not sufficient to set forth the offense in the words of the statute unless those words of themselvs fully, directly, and expressly, without any uncertainty or ambiguity, set forth all the elements necessary to constitute the offense to be punished.' To the same effect is the decision of United States vs. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. Supreme Court Reports, 542. The same objection made to this indictment was made and sustained in the case of the Commonwealth vs. Boynton, 12 Cushing's Reports, 499. These authorities are as high as any that can be invoked in the decision of this question.

"A very clear rule as to the sufficiency of an indictment is laid down in Com. vs Young, 15 Grattan, 664. It is this: 'If the indictment may be true and still the accused may not be guilty of the offense described in the statute, the indictment is insufficient.' Let us apply this rule to the case before us. The defendant is charged with knowingly depositing and causing to be deposited in the mail for mailing and delivery certain obscene papers, etc. She may knowingly hav done this. She may knowingly hav caused it to be done and yet be entirely ignorant of the obscene character of the writings, etc., so deposited, and consequently not guilty of the offense described in the statute.

"'Knowingly' in the indictment must be limited to the act of depositing for mailing and delivery the obscene matter in the mail, and cannot be extended to include a guilty knowledge of the character of the writings, papers, etc.

"Suppose the indictment charged that the defendant knowingly deposited and caused to be deposited in the mail for mailing and delivery a certain dangerous and explosiv substance known as dynamite or gunpowder, would this be sufficient allegation that she knew the material to be of a dangerous and explosiv character? The court thinks not. The knowledge alleged in the indictment would be confined to the act of mailing. The adjectivs 'dangerous and explosiv' would intervene between the fact of which she is alleged to hav knowledge and separate it from the subject of which she must be charged with having guilty knowledge, and are descriptiv of that subject. As stated in the case cited from 12 Cushing, the guilty knowledge charged was confined to the act of selling, and did not extend to the character of the meat sold.

"The case chiefly relied upon by counsel for the government to sustain this indictment is United States vs. Bennett, Myers's Federal Decisions, p. 700. An examination of that case will show that the point there raised against the indictment was somewhat different from the one raised here. But granting them to be the same, I cannot think the case of Bennett of more binding authority than the cases I hav cited.

"The court is of the opinion that the indictment does not not set forth the offense with clearness and all necessary certainty so as to apprise the accused of the crime with which she stands charged, and every ingredient of which the offense is composed is not accurately and clearly alleged. It is defectiv because it does not allege that the defendant knew that the writings, papers, etc., which she is charged with having deposited in the mail for mailing and delivery were of an obscene, lewd, and lascivious character. This conclusioa is clearly sustained by principle and precedent, and the motion in arrest of judgment must be sustained."

We heartily congratulate Mrs. Slenker on her escape from the clutches of Comstock's crowd. The judge seems to hav been a fair-minded man, though the jury and community were maliciously vindictiv toward the defendant. This judicial fairness and the efforts of able counsel enable her to return in triumph to her home, where she is respected by all her acquaintances. It would hav been better had the jury recognized her purity of character and motiv and acquitted her on the merit of the defense; but it is too much to expect that a lot of orthodox clodhoppers could understand the object of a sexual science investigator. They saw only the coarse clothing of her work; not its spirit.

But for all that, she is free. Her contemptible prosecution has failed, and the spies hav had their labor for their pains. We do not believe there is a Liberal in the country who will not be overjoyed to know it.

Arkansas Law.

This is the way the Christians manage things in Arkansas, as we learn from the Democrat of Little Rock, that state. Mr. H. B. Flippen is a young farmer living at Cascade Springs, Faulkner county. Recently Mr. Flippin took a portion of his cotton crop to Little Rock to sell. His journey began Sunday, October 16th, and to reach Little Rock he was obliged to pass through Pulaski county. Soon after crossing the county line he was overtaken by Justice of the Peace A. F. Skinner, who gravely informed the young man that there was on the statute book of the state of Arkansas a law inhibiting any species of Sabbath work, and that in his hallidome said law was enforced to the letter. Mr. Flippen at first paid but little attention to this official pronunciamento, but the gentleman clothed in the official robes soon impressed the violator of the Sabbath law that he meant business. He ordered Mr. Flippen into the custody of a constable, then he established his court right there in the road, had the constable bring Mr. Flippen before him, and fined him one dollar. When Mr. Flippen reached Little Rock he showed the editor of the Democrat the following receipt:

"Oct. 16, 1887.

"Received of H. B. Flippin $1, as fine for having on the Sabbath.

"This 16th day of October, 1887.

"A. F. SKINNER, J. P."

This is a verbatim copy, and the editor explains that the word "having" in the receipt should be "hauling," which renders it intelligible, though, perhaps, reflecting somewhat upon the intelligence of the militant justice.

The Christians of Arkansas are evidently alive to the necessity of preserving the holy Sabbath if they would preserve themselvs. But the question will obtrude upon one who ponders the matter, whether Justice Skinner cares the more for his religion or the dollar he extracted from Mr. Flippen's pocket.

The Prohibitionists the Priests' Last Hope.

The Personal Liberty League of the Germans is meeting with very determined opposition from the preachers. The burden of their grief is over the proposed violation of the sanctity of the Sabbath. And along with the saloonists the preachers class the barbers, the bakers, the butchers, the ice-cream venders, the managers of steamboat and railroad excursions, the postmasters who open their offices on Sunday, and the newsdealers. In short, the reverend gentlemen are more concerned for the Sabbath than for the evil effects of beer-drinking.

In their defense of the institution which enables them to keep the people by the throat, the churches are casting about among the political parties. Of the Democratic party they expect nothing, as its policy of individualism furnishes "strong assurances that it will not seriously oppose an attempt to weaken the present Sunday laws." Of the Republican party the churches hav expected much, but now a zealous supporter of Sunday laws has discovered that the Republicans hav for years maintained in their platform a plank against Prohibitory and Sunday laws. The plank was adopted as far back as 1872, and reads as follows:

"The Republican party propose to respect the rights secured by the people to themselvs, as carefully as the powers delegated by them to the state and federal government. It disapproves of the resort to unconstitutional laws for the purpose of removing evils, by interference with the rights not surrendered by the people to either state or national government."

On its face the plank is a shrewd evasion of plain speaking, and a conspicuous example of how words may be utilized to cover up sentiments, but in connection with this letter from a member of the committee which drafted the resolution it is significant. The letter was written to a distiller who had inquired of Mr. Raster just what he meant by his ambiguous plank:

"CHICAGO, ILL., July 10, 1872.

"J. M. MILLER, Dear Sir: In reply to yours of July 8th I hav to say that I hav written the sixteenth resolution of the Philadelphia platform, aud that it was adopted by the platform committee with the full and explicit understanding that its purpose was the discountenancing of all so-called temperance (prohibitory) and Sunday laws. This purpose was meant to be expressed by reference to those rights of the people which hav not been delegated to either national or state governments; it being assumed that the right to drink what one pleases (being responsible for the acts committed under the influence of strong drink), and the right to look upon the day on which Christians hav their prayer-meetings as any other day, were among the rights not delegated by the people, but reserved to themselvs. Whether this explanation of the meaning of the resolution will satisfy you or not, I do not know. But as you want to serve the cause of truth, so do I; and what I hav stated here in regard to the 'true meaning and intent' of the sixteenth resolution of the Philadelphia platform is the truth.

"Very respectfully yours, HERMAN RASTER."

At the last national Republican convention in 1884 the previous declarations of the party were reaffirmed, and this plank stands to-day, to the great consternation and dismay of the ministers, who hav confidently looked to the Republican party to retain for them the chief relic of puritanic times which givs them their living. They now discover, however, that the managers of the party look upon Sunday as only a day on which Christians hav their prayer-meetings, and hav no objections to its being used as any other day. The discovery has shocked the clergy, and they roll their eyes at the Prohibition party as their only hope.

This is well. The Prohibition party, the God-in-the-Constitution party, and the Protestant church are one. Let them consolidate and crystallize upon a platform, and the rest of mankind will know how to meet them. And if the Germans expect to achieve permanent success in repealing the Sunday laws, they must broaden their platform to meet the requirements of justice and American principles, and not restrict it to the capacity of the trousers pockets of the brewers.

A Merciful Religion.

The Buffalo Catholic Union and Times is in no doubt whatever concerning the destination of heretics. A Lutheran celebration in that city two weeks ago induces the reverend Patrick Cronin to remark:

"The Lutherans of Buffalo made Rome howl in trying to glorify their unfrocked monk, last week. But the beery hero of the 'Table Talk' would now rather hav a drop of cold water upon his burning tongue than all the eulogy that German eloquence could pronounce."

That is to say, Martin Luther, for having defied the pope, is now in hell, in burning brimstone, with literal flames roaring and crackling around him, his flesh shriveled and cracked, his eyes singed and sightless, his lips burning and tongue swollen and black, imploring with maniacal shrieks for one drop of water which God will not permit him to hav.

That is indeed a merciful and a blessed religion which comforts men and women with such pictures.

Another Proclamation.

Following in the evil footsteps of President Cleveland, Governor Hill, of this state, has issued his Thanksgiving proclamation. He says:

"The mountains clothed with trees, the valleys filled with corn, the meadows rich with cattle, the streams making the fields green, everywhere speak the goodness of God.

"And he has blessed us beyond all other nations in wide-reaching, fertil farms, with their multitude of contented country homes, and in the busy streets of our many prosperous cities—these all bound together by majestic natural water-courses and by the great highways built by the genius and industry of our people.

"The giver of all good gifts has especially granted us happiness and welfare in the year that is ending. We hav been kept in health, we hav been preserved from strife within our borders, and in peace with foreign states. We hav been given abundant harvests and hav seen great increase in our material wealth."

We think Mr. Hill must hav written that in a Pickwickian, if not in a Pecksniffian, sense. If there is any state in the Union that is not prosperous, whose farmers are overburdened with taxes and underburdened with crops, whose laborers are discontented to the verge of riot, and business men disgusted with an unprofitable year, it is New York.

While we object to all these proclamations as tending to unite church and state, we object especially to the habit the issuers hav of lying about the condition of the country.

Editorial Notes.

The synod of Baltimore, on the 27th ult., directed the presbytery of Washington to record a verdict of not guilty in the case of F. M. Todd, of Manassas, Va. The clergy always stand by each other when they can.

IF Ella Wheeler Wilcox really believes that Colonel Ingersoll is "laying down his arms," she should read his reply to Dr. Field in the North American Review, copious extracts from which were transferred to these columns last week. And if she will talk to Mr. Ingersoll only five minutes on the subject, she will never hav the hardihood, even to fill out space, to again insinuate such a thing.

FOR thirteen years Mrs. Annie Besant has been connected with the National Reformer as co-editor. She now resigns this position because she is a Socialist. She will, however, continue to enrich the Reformer's columns as a contributor. Mrs. Besant "regards Socialism as the necessary and logical outcome of the radicalism which the Reformer teaches," but she has by no means made this proposition clear. The policy of the paper is Atheistic and republican. We do not see that an Atheist is necessarily a Socialist, or how a republican can be.

THE ministers are vigorously fighting the Personal Liberty League. Their organization in this city has the support, of course, of the country clergy, who "view with alarm" the increasing tendency to violate the Sabbath, and do therefore "resolve" that "the Personal Liberty League, which has for its avowed object the lawful opening of the drinking saloons on Sunday, between the hours of 2 and 12 P.M., is subversiv of both law and order, and strikes at the overthrow of the Christian Sabbath, which is one of the main bulwarks of our American free institutions." We fail to see how the Personal Liberty League will be subversiv of law when the law shall permit the saloons to be open as the league desires, and order will probably be as good when men drink beer legally as it is now when they drink it illegally. The "Christian Sabbath" is one of the main bulwarks of the clergy, and the Sunday laws are the main division between them and beggary, but the clerical profession is not synonymous with free institutions by any means.

W. M. SALTER, the pastor of the Ethical Society of Chicago, has kindly devoted a whole sermon to the condemned Anarchists of his city. His conclusion is that three of the men were proven accessories before the fact of the murder of the policeman Degan—Engel, Fischer, and Lingg. These he thinks the state should imprison for life. The other four, Spies, Schwab, Fielden, and Parsons, he believes, after examining all the evidence, not guilty of the crime for which they hav been condemned. They were guilty of sedition and were engaged in a conspiracy against the state. This was their offense, he says, and for this they should be imprisoned for a term of years. The conclusion of Mr. Salter is evidently a compromise with his conscience and his congregation. If Engel, Fischer, and Lingg were really proved to be accessories to murder their sentence to hang is just, if capital punishment is the penalty for that crime, though executiv clemency may well be extended in all such cases. Hanging is a barbarous mode of punishment. And if the others are guilty only of conspiring to change the form of government in Illinois, nothing should be done to them. The people hav the right to change the form of government if they choose. That inherent right is the basis upon which the Revolutionary war is justified. Where would the Democratic and Republican political orators land if denouncing our rulers were an unlawful conspiracy? Treason consists in acts, not talk; and if, as Mr. Salter finds, Fielden, Spies, Parsons, and Schwab did nothing but talk, they should go free like any other stump speaker. If these men conspired to murder and did actually murder Degan and the other policemen, their sentence is just. If they did not so conspire and murder, their execution will be judicial murder.

THE Galveston (Tex.) News, which is permitted by the grace of Judge Gustave Cook to violate the Sunday laws on condition that it support them, says in its Sunday issue of the 30th ult.: "The North American Review for November opens with the promised reply of Robert G. Ingersoll to the Rev. Henry M. Field, who wrote an open letter to Ingersoll in a recent number of the Review. On that occasion the Rev. Henry Field was rash enough to advance some puny arguments in support of the tottering tower of religion, and opposed to the sweeping onslaughts on a popular fallacy by the eloquent Atheist. It was predicted that Mr. Ingersoll would reply in due time. He has done so. And what is the result? As well may the average mortal attempt to stay the rush of the tempest as to successfully cope with Ingersoll, whose control of language, power of reason, force of argument, and eloquence of utterance combined, are so overwhelmingly great, that he crushes his opponents with their logical weight. As the scythe levels the grain to earth, so he, with a resolution that never falters, and a mind that never weakens, hurls his shafts of logic and reason into the serried ranks of ignorance, superstition, and fanaticism, sweeping them out of existence. For pure eloquence, ingenuity, and clearness of argument, beauty of construction, and facility of expression, the present article of Mr. Ingersoll in the North American Review almost surpasses his previous efforts. Step by step he takes up the points advanced by the Rev. Henry Field, carefully analyzes them, makes all due allowances, and finally leaves them bare like a plucked chicken. He gently, yet firmly, dethrones his opponent from his self-imposed position. He is generous and willing to concede certain points for the sake of argument, but never loses hold of his object, and that object is to destroy his opponent's theories. In one respect it is the most radical essay that Colonel Ingersoll has ever written, as he conceals nothing, withholds nothing, but reveals his innermost thoughts and unshaken convictions in the interest of progress and enlightenment. In thirty pages of the North American Review he sweeps away the arguments of the Rev. Henry Field as effectually as though carried away by a whirlwind." Mr. Belo should be careful. If he tells the truth in this frank fashion Judge Cook may repent.

Business.

MRS. S. L. CLARK, of Newport, Me., daughter of Seward Mitchell, has a large number of her father's papers on hand which she will send to anyone who desires them sufficiently to send stamps to pay postage.

ATTENTION is called to the advertisment, in its appropriate column, of the steel engraving of Alexander von Humboldt. The picture is a fine one of the great naturalist, of whom Ingersoll said, "He left a legacy of glory to every human being."

CHARLES WATTS will lecture at West Union, Ia., November 20th and 21st; at Maynard, the 22d; at Oelwin, the 23d.

A Cosmopolitan Nation.

From Tidbits.

The court: "Mr. Clerk, is this Thursday afternoon?"

Clerk: "Yes, your honor."

The court: "To-morrow is the Turkish Sabbath, Saturday the Hebrew, and Sunday the Christian. We adjourn until Monday."

Clerk: "But that is Labor Day; Tuesday is the anniversary of Irish independence; and Wednesday of the founding of the German empire."

The court: "Then we are closed for the week."

Letters from Friends.

GOLDTHWAIT, TEXAS, Oct. 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I send money to renew my subscription and for one new subscriber. I hav the promis of another subscriber. I shall send on his name soon. Freethought is growing in this place and country. A. LEWIS.

ST. CHARLES, MINN., Oct. 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The lectures of Mr. Remsburg, delivered two years ago in this place, hav not been without effect. The present shepherds of the fold are beginning to complain that the well-bedewed pasture fields show unmistakable signs of approaching barrenness, and they are on the outlook for fields more congenial for pastoral prosperity. C. LAUTH.

PAULINE, ARK., Oct. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find postal note for $3 for a new subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. A few of us here about Pauline keep in the harness and expect to continue the fight for freedom against spiritual tyranny. I organized a Liberal League at Pauline two weeks ago on twelve members. We need a good liberal lecturer through this part of Arkansas (Northwest), but it seems we cannot arouse the timid Freethinkers enough to get one here. I hav made several efforts to get J. E. Remsburg, who would hav come, but I could not be sure of the means. W. R. BACHELOR.

GALT, ONT., Oct. 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, which please credit, and send THE TRUTH SEEKER for balance of amount. I will not take up your time by giving you "taffy," but will merely say that your management of THE TRUTH SEEKER meets my views of Liberalism. It seems to me that several of your correspondents misapprehend the true idea of a Liberal.

Your explanations and replies to such meet with my hearty approval, and THE TRUTH SEEKER, pictures and all, is a welcome weekly visitor to our household. With best wishes for your success, GEO. LAIRD.

MOUNT ALTON, PA., Oct. 20, 1887.

Mr. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 to pay subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER, the friend of the Liberals—yes, I will say the greatest friend and companion of Liberals. Your correspondents are doing a great work, and the lecturers that are traveling through the country are doing a great work also. Watson Heston is a host; his mind must be loaded equivalent to a Gatling gun. I am certain that the shots that he fires into the ranks of the enemy are telling. I liv in a small village; the people are all, or nearly all, of the old superstitious class. Those who would like to be Freethinkers dare not for fear that it will not suit their neighbors. I say, as the great Patrick Henry said: "Giv me liberty or giv me death." I say, Hang your banner on the outer wall, and let your cry be, Freedom, and long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER. E. N. FAIRCHILD.

MURRAY, IDAHO, Oct. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Thanking you kindly for past favors, you will find inclosed $3, which you will please place to my credit for the best paper in the land. My paper is read by dozens of miners every week. We hav about three hundred inhabitants in and around Murray. We hav no church, but the priest makes his regular round-up once a month, and calls for $5 from each of his flock. I think, as a rule, three-quarters of the men in mining-camps are Freethinkers. A Methodist minister came here from Montana to giv the boys a talk, but he had only about five men to hear him, though I think all the ladies in camp went to hear—no, went to see the new style of dress. When he got on the stage the next day he said he had not collected enough to pay his fare to the railroad—$5. We hav not been troubled with any such since. If he comes again we will sit down on him.

FRANK REED.

SALISBURY, MO., Oct. 25, 287.

MR. EDITOR: In your paper of Oct. 1st is a letter signed "Alhaza." Of course the name is feminin, and "Alhaza" will pardon me for saying she.

She says: "With regard to the Constitution, it seems that Alexander Hamilton was the first who suggested the idea, and from the life of Patrick Henry, and other prominent men of that period, we learn how wise men pondered hours and days, as did the people also, over that mighty subject. I do not think clerical minds helped to frame that instrument. If they did, will some wiseacre come out and produce the necessary information?" If "Alhaza" will write to M. D. Leahy, of Liberal, Mo., and get a copy of the American Idea of the date of Aug. 13, 287, she will see an article written by me, headed, "When will Wonders Cease?" and signed, "Lucifer," which will giv her the necessary information. In any event, I wish to compliment you, "Alhaza;" your article certainly has many great merits and fine suggestions. JOHN TRUEBLOOD.

ADRIAN, MICH., Oct. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav to herald a mighty event—the great Agnostic, Robert G. Ingersoll, knocked into smithereens. His arguments are shivered, and his castle has been demolished and has tumbled about his ears. He can no more mount the rostrum and hurl his shafts of Infidelity against orthodox belief. He is squelched forever. Gen. George A. Sheridan is lecturing at the Opera House in this city. The Adrian Daily Times says of it: "Colonel Ingersoll was handled with his own weapons. The shafts of eloquence, sarcasm, and ridicule with which he attacks the Christian religion were hurled back at him by a man who is fully his equal in their mastery." How hav the mighty been demolished! Greatness has received a blow that it can never recover from. Agnosticism is dead. Sheridan may be a very nice man, but I do not think him very profound. His altitude is short, but he makes up in thickness. His stomach and head are too near together. The heat engendered in the stomach probably keeps his brain warm. Robert ought to know better than to set up an argument to be torn down by smarter men. O. S. BARRETT.

SILVERTON, COL., Oct. 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I received Mr. Eckhard's "Nine Demands," and am well pleased with it. It is now being framed, and will occupy a choice place in the parlor. We like your paper very much, and I don't think I will ever be found without it again. MRS. PERRY FISHER.

CAWKER CITY, KAN., Oct. 25, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I giv you herewith an item of religious news, thinking that perhaps you might get it incorrectly from the papers. It was thusly: Some men in the garb of Jesus came here three weeks since, and pitched their tent and commenced preaching and denouncing other sects as Antichrist. They taught, however, some good things, as temperance; and the tobbaco habit was denounced, and the use of fine dress, and the wearing of watches and jewelry. They taught that people should liv sinless lives. They made great noise, about like the ranting Methodists long years ago; so much so that the people living near the tent were greatly annoyed by night. They made numerous converts, mostly from other churches; denounced secret societies, and I know of one Oddfellow who left the society. Last night, Sunday, some men, with the authority of the city fathers, attended the meeting, denounced the preachers as scoundrels, took down the tent nicely, and told the clerical rogues to leave early next morning or worse things would happen. As usual, the converts were mostly women, but there were a considerable number of men. I may add that, as I hav learned it from attendants, they were exposing the other sects with terrible effect, and if not stopped it would hav been much greater. All is quiet now, and I expect it will remain so, as it would be useless to go to law about it. The rogues made great professions of humility, taking up no collections, and receiving only such money as was given them. One man took the dominie to the clothing house, and rigged him out with a new suit. What others did I am not advised, however. GEO. W. CHAPMAN, M.D.

Oct. 29, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I see in your issue of to-day a Mr. Ben Smead takes exception to my remarks of September 23d. He is of the opinion that I was not there when the bomb was thrown, nor had I heard the speeches made there, or read articles published in their papers. He is right. I had not; but I hav yet to find in the Constitution of the United States any clause that says a man shall be hung for making speeches or publishing unpopular articles. If such is the fact, I certainly need posting. Mr. Smead says he knows what oppression means, but he thinks that is justice. He thinks it all right for a brutal police to attack a peaceable meeting, and that to resist is all wrong, although free speech and a free press are guaranteed to us. He says violent speeches do no good. I think that sometimes they may set other people to thinking, and I do not think any man deserves hanging for making one; and there is no pretense that either of these men threw the bomb. Therefore, they are condemned to death for speaking and printing unpopular ideas.

Mr. Ben Smead advises me to let these men and all breakers of the Constitution hang, and not raise my voice against it. Has he any idea of the multitude that would hang if that was the case, from presidents and judges down to Chicago police? He also has an idea that millionaires and monopolists keep millions from starving by keeping the wheels turning, but if the wheels did not turn, where would they get their millions? He also thinks it is no use for the mules to kick—namely, the workers—because they thereby hurt themselvs; and yet this wiseacre quotes, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." He says the people will suffer, for they are at fault in not selecting better representativs. But how are they to instruct their representativs if they are not allowed free speech and press—if they are not allowed to meet and discuss any question they please, let it be never so unpopular, without the risk of being hung? I assure Mr. Smead that I can see the subtle workings of the Catholic church, and know that if they get the power it would be a sorry day for such as he and I. We would be hung or worse for bloodthirsty Infidels, which in Christian parlance means all the crimes in the calendar, including Anarchy, Socialism, etc. J. DOWNES.

LEHIGH, IA., Oct. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I take the pleasure of gratifying your two wants which appeared at the head of the editorial department in THE TRUTH SEEKER; and I most heartily claim that you are justly entitled to all that is asked.

Among all the papers that we subscribe for, THE TRUTH SEEKER ranks foremost. It is our family paper, and has become a necessity in our household. Its management is fully abreast of the times, which keeps us well posted on all subjects appertaining to the welfare of the human race. And what we hold you in our highest esteem for is that you show no partiality in giving each and all the right of expressing their sentiments upon all subjects which come within the bounds of decency. I liked the stand which you took in regard to the Chicago Anarchists, not because I think you one, nor because I sympathize with their theory, not in the least; but because I think it is each and every true American citizen's duty to protect and defend the liberty of speech and to protest against the intolerant spirit which is clamoring for the abolishment of free speech, press, and mail. Let this spirit of suppression get into power and where will the line of demarcation be drawn? Not until they hav closed the mouths of our best thinkers and reformers, and then Freethought will become as offensiv to the "Unco Guid" as Anarchism is at present.

But suffice at present, and I must before I close show our appreciation of Mr. Heston's work. And to do this it is only necessary to say that we think his pictures splendid, and that we think he is engaged in a grand work, in showing up by illustrations the true likeness of Christian orthodoxy. Pictures are plainer than words, and we must confess that, so far that Mr. Heston has gone, he has unveiled the tiger in plainer light than any other who has taken up the subject. The very children laugh and hoot at the imposition which the pictures portray. Words can easily be forgotten, but these cartoons will leave an impression upon both the young and old alike that will enable them to utterly cut loose from ignorance, which breeds superstition, and seek that which leads to truth, liberty, which result in happiness.

There is no wonder that the weak-kneed are squealing about the horridness of these cartoons, simply because they hav never become fully convinced of the absurdity of the Christian religion. I sincerely trust that success will crown the efforts of Mr. Heston's work, and that he will be able to wield his pencil long. ROBT. FLEMING.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 30, 1887.

Mr. EDITOR: The right of private ownership has never been assumed on any other pretense than the action called labor by which possession is acquired. The right to exclusiv private ownership of product cannot be secured except by conceding the same right of possession to the ground, which will be equivalent to private ownership of the ground. Hence no distinction, however finely and elaborately drawn, can make a practical difference between private ownership of product and of the ground upon which the product grows, nor separate them. Therefore, if human labor should confer the right to private ownership of any product, it should confer the right to private ownership of all products. Moreover, private ownership of flocks and herds should logically imply an exclusiv right of possession to as much land as will be required for pasturage and forage, which will secure private ownership of the product without the labor of cultivation.

The right to private ownership of products, assumed on the pretense that human labor produces them, will hardly stand the test of a logical analysis, unless it can be proven that human labor and nature are synonymous. I think it will be unanimously conceded that anthracite and bituminous coals are products of nature unaided by human labor; yet if a man bring a quantity of coals out of the mines he is awarded an exclusiv right of ownership on the pretense that his labor produced them. Moreover, the ground and the seeds we plant in it, the material of which the plow is constructed and the team which draws it, and man himself, are products of nature unaided by human labor. The products grow while men sleep, and when matured, man claims the right of private ownership on the pretense that his labor has produced them. Nevertheless, I shall fail to see that human labor does anything more than to appropriate the products of nature and adapt them to human need, greed, and caprice, which tends to consume them. Therefore, unless man appropriates that which is not the fruits of his own labor, he will hav no fruits of his own labor that he can appropriate. Therefore, if it is not just for us to appropriate natural things, and take from others what might otherwise hav been theirs, the right of private ownership cannot be just nor justified on any pretense whatever. Furthermore, the right of private ownership has filled the world with violence, fraud, and oppression; with war, robbery, and rapine; and drenched the earth with human blood, and givs no reasonable hope of our realizing anything better from it in the future. Yet it is the fundamental principle of so-called "Labor Reform." Therefore I think it obvious that none need to be reformed more than do Labor Reformers themselvs. J. A. TUTTLE.

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.50, for which forward me your paper for six months. After upward of seventy years, I hav decided to change my mental diet. A good friend in Oakland, by loaning me some of the papers, has made me a victim, and I think that at the expiration of six months I can understand if it agrees with my constitution. In my youth I was brought up to the true orthodox faith, and used to attend the Methodist camp-meetings at Eastham, Cape Cod. But I never got it bad—only a slight touch, a sort of a religious varioloid, I might say, not as bad as the measles, which I had about the same time. I used to note those converted after their return to Boston and I could never find much improvement in their conduct in trade and communication with their fellow-men. At this time I was a boy in a store. I used often to take packages to a gentleman's house. He was a tall, fine-looking gentleman, with a mild, benevolent face. He seemed to fancy me, and I am sure I did him. I would often receive a fourpence at his hand. This man was Abner Kneeland. Well, you know the sequel. He was put in jail for being honest. This noble, high-minded, good man was sent to prison for daring to say and believe what to-day one-half the preachers believe. This caused my religious ardor to flag, and thenceforth I began to think and watch for myself, and the longer I liv the more I am disgusted with these shams. This age seems to be made up of shams. Our daily papers are all shams. When you read an article you can't tell whether it is the writer's honest convictions or not. And we all know, and the church folk themselvs know, the church is a grand sham from the Catholic down. Martin Luther did a good thing. He builded better than he knew; he gave the people independence, though he would hav liked to make a religious despotism equal to the pope's. But he didn't start right—though the Protestants hav done some pretty good work in comparison. I hav seen the Catholic church in all its beauty and deformity forty years ago in Mexico. I can assure you that for seventy odd years my eyes, ears, and brain hav not been idle. J. F.

BERLIN, N. J., Oct. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Another error of Henry George is this: "As man did not make the land, therefore he does not own it." But our Declaration of Independence tells a very different story. It says that all men hav certain unalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Now, if a man has a right to life, as he cannot liv without food, it legitimately follows that he has the same natural right to land enough to raise his food on that he has to life itself. This great fact is so plain that a fool ought to see it. But according to George, as a man did not make land, he has no right to it, and so we must all join together and steal it from some unseen power and each other, and let it to those who want it to cultivate. If the man who wants land to raise food on has no right to it, whence do all others derive their right to claim and let it?

Let us try George's logic on the other elements. Man did not make air, therefore he does not own it; so when a child is born it must not breathe till it is old enough to earn money and hunt up a government officer and hire the right to use the air. It did not make sunlight or the water; therefore it must not open its eyes to the light or ask for a drink till it has earned money enough to pay for it. The fact is, every man has just the same natural right to land enough to make a home and raise his food on that he has to sunlight, air, water, or to life itself, and any man, company, or government that robs any other man of his right to land is as guilty as the highwayman that robs him of his money, and should be treated the same—and will be in the years to come. The same men who rob others of their birthright to land would, if they could, bottle up all the sunlight, air, and water, and make others pay for them. And the sooner the world is rid of such men the better. See THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 28th. More anon. J. HACKER.

MINNESOTA VALLEY, Oct. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In the Roman republic they said, "Consuleo videant ne quid res publica capiat detrimenti"—i. e., the consuls had to take care that the republic should suffer no damage. In our republic we hav no such consuls, but our consuls hav been so far the press of the country. The press had, and has, the high office to look and take care that the republic suffers not. The press of the country filled this office to our satisfaction until of late.

Whether the Constitution of the United States says in simple, unmistakable words that every citizen has the right of free expression of his opinion upon any subject or not, we will not dispute about here, but certain and absolutely certain it is, and was, that the citizens of the United States thought and acted so, as if the Constitution of the United States had warranted us perfect freedom of speech and press. Juries, courts, and judges acted under the same impression. In short, we enjoyed freedom of speech and press; if not by the Constitution of the United States, we had it in fact; if not de jure, we had it de facto. This was so, or we thought it was so. When it came to a proving, it was not so. Our consul, i. e., the press, did not see to it that the republic should not suffer. When C. B. Reynolds was persecuted and fined in Morristown, N. J., the press (Freethought press always excepted in this article) clung to the old state law of New Jersey about blasphemy, and in some of them you could read easily enough between the lines: "Serves him right; why did he not keep his mouth shut?" Others belittled Mr. Reynolds, called him a pulpit renegade; others silenced the whole affair; others found fault with Colonel Ingersoll and belittled him and his way of defending Reynolds. That freedom of expression of opinion was interfered with, none of these papers—and I keep sixteen papers in the English as well as in the German language—had a word to say about; not one word that Reynolds suffered, instead of did, wrong. The case was more important and apparent because Mr. Reynolds spoke in his own tent-house.

The same course our press has taken, and takes, in the Chicago Anarchist case. Our consuls—i. e., the press—cling to the state law of Illinois, which punishes the instigator with the same rod as the perpetrator, a law which was abolished long ago in every European state. If you read these papers, you will and must get the impression as if freedom of speech and press had nothing whatever to do with the Anarchist trial in Chicago. This press acts precisely as the man acts who sits on a branch of a tree and quietly looks on while somebody is sawing at his branch before his own face.

What did our great men then at the helm of this republic when this nation was fighting for its very existence during the Rebellion? What did Lincoln, Seward, Stanton, General Grant, do to suppress the Copperhead press of the North? Did they put those copperheads, the Chicago Times, Pomeroy's Democrat, the Milwaukee Teebote, in jail and let them be condemned to be hung? Everybody who was of age and intelligent enough to reason then will readily admit that the Anarchists did child's-play in comparison with what those Copperheads did, in speech and press. The Anarchists hav seven lives on their conscience; those Copperheads at least one hundred and seventy thousand. The people of the North, we soldiers and those great men in Washington, knew full well what great harm these Copperheads did to the country, and the army in especial. Our great men did not interfere with them, much less cause them to be hung, which would hav been a very easy matter then. Why did they not interfere? Because they were great men and did not want to interfere with the generally admitted liberty and freedom of speech and press. They were great men; the framers of that monstrous Illinois law are not great men—hat settles the question. For the sake of freedom of speech and press I therefore ask for pardon to the seven Anarchists, not out of sympathy with their principles or their doings. I will never be a Socialist or an Anarchist, and wish that every enemy of our government and Constitution should be made harmless, but not by means of cutting the liberties of the people, but by an open fight and hand-to-hand fight. The Anarchists want fighting; let them hav it. Repel at the next occasion force by force and accept their challenge and let us see who wins; but the liberties of the people must under no circumstances be interfered with. The Anarchists of the whole world are not worth that prize.

What a beautiful chance for all our would-be Jay Goulds, of whom every large city has an abundance, to face the Anarchists at the next-given occasion and fight them hand to hand! The more dead on each side, the better for the country—on one side the bodies of the Anarchists, enemies of the country; on the other side the bodies of those who hav made Anarchists. O. T.

PASCO, W. T., Oct. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for one new subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. This subscriber is our school teacher, and a very strong Liberal. We are very fortunate to secure a teacher like him. Since Mr. Putnam was here, and gave us two lectures on the "New God" and "Universal Mental Liberty," our othodox friends hav raised a great war-cry, and are trying to force the Bible into the school, but as luck is always with the Infidels here, we got the best of them. As I am myself a school director yet for one year, I will fight them to the bitter end. The majority of the people here are strong Liberals, and some of them the very strongest Infidels. We are intending to build a Liberal hall here, and form a Secular Union. If Mr. Putnam or some other Liberal speaker should come this way next year, he can speak in our new hall, which will be dedicated to Freethought and science. How glorious to see the name in our little burg—the Pasco Freethinkers' Hall of Science for the welfare of mankind! FRANK SCHUNEMANN.

LEXINGTON, KY., Oct. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: This country is governed now by an oligarchy as treacherous and tyrannical as was Athens, when Thrasybulus came and laid siege to his own city, and Alcibiades felt burning in his bosom the soul of a patriot. When they are slain, who will feed the sacred fire of liberty or light so fearlessly the torch of reason? Taxation is indeed slavery, and the custom-house a den of outrage. A man who works for his living should never pay taxes, but claim a small pension from the government. We need now a standing army to rivet our chains, when our brains will be under martial law, and a reign of terror will succeed. Our best editors tremble for the interests of capital, fearing an interregnum which will cause the laborer to become a monopolist, as he will not want a precedent in that respect.

The time was when bishops preached to large audiences, but it is not so now, though some of them say plainly that they do not want the name of God in the Constitution. There is an Ariel in the air, and a strange jangling of sweet sounds. People languish for the truth; the flimsy subterfuge will not much longer prosper, though the wording may be as magnificent as the book of Job, who screens poor God from blame, though horrible punishments are expected to fall upon the head of the man who offends him. All this is shrouded in mystery, which has power to sustain anything that belongs to religion. The way people worship now is, "to hunt a crowd, and when they find one, they will listen with some patience, if the lecture sounds like Beecher's sermons." They say they love God, though they know nothing about him. Their idol must resemble nothing—for he never casts a shadow, has no center or circumference, animates everything—so that at times he must be inconceivably disgusting. Which makes nonentity, contradiction, and a fiend. One reason why twenty-four clergymen wanted him left out of the Constitution was because people would then be sure to rend that instrument with regard to the "nature of God and the origin of evil." We remember how vivid was St. Augustine's idea that the father and son were consubstantial, and Tertullian's luminous thought that Christ was being born from all eternity and to eternity (bedlam lucubrations).

> Strange that difference there should be > 'Twixt tweedledum and tweedledee!

And Mr. J. Fiske givs it as his opinion that the seeds of modern Infidelity were already planted in the minds of these dear clergymen.

There is a God who can be traced through cycles or ages, working in volumes of atoms at one period, responding in another in improved masses, animals almost lost in Nature's convulsions arising with greater vigor under purer skies and amid better surroundings—Evolution. The mind which consumes at "white heat" will crave a broader scope of thought. Pity will charm the soul, instead of luxurious emotions—

MR. EDITOR: M. E. Lazarus seems to want an explanation from me. He does not lay down any alternativ, as was once the style in such cases. But he can see no inconsistency in his writings, and so lays it to my ignorance and ill-will. Well, the first part of his fling is often made to act as a boomerang, but I am too well aware of my defects to return such compliments; and the second part, that I can hav any ill-will toward a person whom I hav never seen, nor had any transactions with, is just too rich even to amuse me. To satisfy my mind upon the point, that I had not forgotten anything, I hav looked over the back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and read over Mr. Lazarus's letter in reply to one of mine, in which I find more ignorance and inconsistency than in the letter of Aug. 20, 1887, to the Editor. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 20, 1886, Mr. Edgeworth starts off with: "A Political Aladdin." "In resting from your labor, your imagination, under the same sort of inaction from the facts which spread sumptuous banquets in the dreams of starving men, assumes the helm of that power to which it is enslaved, and wielding the ballot as a talisman, creates money by fiat. [What a grand piece of rhetoric for some school boy! How full of consistency!] During a flush of currency the business mind is excited, capital flows out more freely into enterprise, more labor is employed, and, as to wages, it must be the fault of contract if their sum does not rise to more than compensate for their lesser purchasing power." Well, if there is not both ignorance galore and inconsistency here I must be a numskull. Mr. Edgeworth is perfectly ignorant of money and of the meaning of fiat. No man ever knew a dollar of fiat money to be worth less than one hundred cents, and no money that ever was made yet had any power to purchase even a ticket for soup. Again he says: "These temporary phenomena own a moral force distinct from the material basis of the currency. They will be the same whether this is flushed by an immigration of capital, or by the discovery of treasures, or by fiatism." No man has yet ever informed the world what the thing called capital is, and Mr. Edgeworth talks Hindoo when he makes such expressions. "The difference," he says, "between these motivs of activity is felt at ulterior periods, when collapse and bankruptcy reveal the spurious." My friend is about as well-informed as to the causes of collapse and bankruptcy as he is of the purchasing power of money. He evidently has read various and numerous of the party organs and financial reports, and has swallowed them all without sorting them out, and he givs them forth just as he has received them. And this he does with all subjects so far as I hav read his letters—see his letter to the Editor Aug. 20, 1887. Again he says: "Is a fiat currency without other basis than faith on the part of its receivers? That depends on the nature of its investments [more ignorance], on the continuance of the government that issues it, and on taxation which may liquidate it." Now as no man is ever obliged to take any money by the law of any land, it is quite silly to talk this way; and as it is utterly wrong for any government to tax its people at all, of course the money should never be liquidated, except in payment of debt—the first, last, and only, object of money is to pay debts. Let Mr. Edgeworth learn this now, and keep it separate where he can find it, and make no more such silly expressions as the purchasing power of money. Again he continues: "When the Confederate government first issued fiat money [the Confederate government never issue a dollar of fiat money] one of my neighbors had recently purchased a farm on credit. . . By the sale of his supplies then [to the Southern armies making a great demand] the first season the purchaser paid for his farm with money not at par with gold or silver (specie), and which soon became worthless."

Now I hav before me a fifty and a twenty dollar bill of this same money which Mr. Edgeworth calls fiat; on each of them is a simple promis that in the possible contingency, in the very dim future, two years after the ratification of a treaty of peace (and separation) between the Northern states and the Southern confederated states, they will pay on demand fifty and twenty dollars. It is not stated on either what is the substance or kind of coin which will pay these promises. There is not the least allusion to any fiat on them at all, and our national bank bills are as much a fiat as are any of the bills of the Confederate states, and Mr. Edgeworth's neighbor did not purchase his farm with fiat or any other money, but used whatever his creditor would take in payment of debt. Mr. Edgeworth says the war debt, whose burden of interest is crushing us, is largely held abroad. The war debt has never been but a spoonful to the amount of other debts in this country, which amount to about fifteen times as much as the war debt. My friend says he favors repudiation. Of course you might expect just such an impossible and impracticable remedy. It agrees with the other inconsistencies. "To lend," he says, "a people funds for the purpose of injuring a neighbor people is as bad as to put weapons in the hands of a maniac or of a hired assassin." Now as no people loaned any funds to this government, but only bought the enslaving bonds of our enslaving government, my friend seems to be mixed again. But I must hurry along. He says further on: "Mr. Wood, who shows a laudable animosity against the great blood-sucker interest, makes the strange accusation against me of 'proposing that all go into the banking business and all speculate on each other's neccssities, which is just as sensible as the idea of co-operation.'"

"Well," says Mr. Edgeworth, "it is difficult to imagin anything more sensible than co-operation;" which shows how deeply my friend has studied the question. It is true that to a superficial observation co-operation seems very good and sensible, especially to those who are inside the ring. So does every other enterprise if successful, to those who are in it. But all co-operation is in the direction of monopoly, and is an injury to all outside in just the ratio of its success. There should be no necessity for co-operation for the purpose of enriching anyone. There should be no taxation; then there would be no debt, and no interest to pay, and real money would be created by the right power, the government of the people, and paid out to the people for the expenses of government, and when the people were enabled to pay all debts with this real money they would be free and liv under a government that would protect the freedom of the people. When this natural consequence of the right use of the power of government should be reached, the expenses of the government would become merely nominal in comparison with what they hav been for twenty years past. I advise our friend to think more of facts and seek more earnestly after truth, and he will find less need of rhetoric and foreign idioms and language; and no man ever put his intellect to better use than to study the how and why all governments hav forever enslaved the people. J. H. WOOD.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Bravest of Battles.

The bravest battle that ever was fought,
Shall I tell you where and when?
On the maps of the world you'll find it not;
'Twas fought by the mothers of men.

Nay, not with cannon or battle shot,
With sword, or nobler pen;
Nay. not with eloquent word or thought
From mouth of wonderful men;

But deep in a walled-up woman's heart,
Of woman that would not yield,
But bravely, silently bore her part—
Lo! there is that battle-field,

No marshaling troop, no bivouac song,
No banner to gleam and wave;
But, oh, these battles, they last so long,
From babyhood to the grave!

—Joaquin Miller.

Help One Another.

"Help one another," the snowflake said,
As they cuddled down in their fleecy bed;
"One of us here would not be felt;
One of here would quickly melt:
But I'll help you and you help me,
And then what a big white drift we'll see!"

"Help one another," the maple spray
Said to its fellow-leaves one day;
"The sun would wither me here alone
Long enough ere the day is gone;
But I'll help you and you help me.
And then what a splendid shade there'll be!"

"Help one another," the dewdrop cried,
Seeing another drop close to its side;
"This warm south breeze would drive me away,
And I should be gone ere noon to-day;
And I'll help you and you help me,
And we'll make a brook and run to sea."

"Help one another," a grain of sand
Said to another grain just at hand;
"The wind may carry me over the sea,
And then, oh, what will become of me?
But come, my brother, giv me your hand,
We'll build a mountain and there we'll stand."

—Chambers' Journal.

Peppercorn Stories.

ALL ABOUT MUSCLES.

There were two newcomers at Polly Peppercorn's receptions, as she lately had beguu to call her little gatherings. One day she was walking out to gather wild flowers, daisies, columbine, buttercups, and the like, and she met a boy just gliding along slowly, and busily engaged with something that he carried in his hand.

"What's that you hav?" inquired Polly—"a lady-bug?"

"No—grasshopper," said the boy, without looking up.

"What are you doing to it?"

"Trying to find his heart," replied the boy.

"Well, you just let the grasshopper's vital organs alone, and come along with me."

So the boy dropped the grasshopper and followed Polly, who gave him a lecture going along on cruelty to insects.

She invited him to come to her reception that evening, and dubbed him Grasshopper Sammy.

They were deeply engaged in conversation, when a timid knock on the door, which was opened by Harry Coalskuttle, revealed a little midget of a creature biting a corner of her ragged apron.

"May I come in and be one of yous?" she asked in a whisper.

"Certainly," said Polly. "Harry, admit the stranger, and everyone giv her the right hand of fellowship. This is Little Thimbleweed, I take it."

She was given a seat beside Peggy Primrose and Pussy Whitefoot, who sat watching a bumble-bee that had come in unannounced, and was buzzing around the room at a great rate.

"Muscles! does anybody know anything about muscles?" and Polly gazed at the upturned faces.

All were silent.

"Little know-nothings! Johnny Gotobed, wipe your nose, and open that basket."

Johnny did as he was told, and revealed a bullock's heart, at which they all stared curiously.

"There! that's a big muscle," said Polly; "biggest one in the body. You've all got hearts, not so big as this one, of course, and every heart is a muscle. This big muscle does a good deal of hard work, and keeps the rest of the machinery of your bodies in operation. Some other time we will talk about its work more particularly.

"There are about five hundred muscles in the human body," she continued, "and all are useful and beautiful. You know we talked about the bones, but they wouldn't be a penny's worth of good without muscles.

"The muscles distributed about the human body and all bodies of animals, are formed of bundles, little and big, of fleshy fibers, and the fibers are like bits of very fine thread, and each fiber is composed of a string of little cells. By changing the form and making them a little more round, the parts to which they are attached are drawn closer together, and this is muscular contraction that we often read about. Understand? See how I raise my arm, bend it, straighten it—this is muscular contraction.

"The muscles are not a bit in the way, and it is next to impossible to tell where one begins or where it ends. We could not talk were it not for the muscles. In fact, we should be quite powerless.

"Some of our motions are voluntary, others involuntary; hence some muscles are called voluntary, others involuntary. Now, the heart acts involuntarily—that is, without our will or control; so does the stomach."

The children were getting deeply interested, and so was Polly, when a terrific shriek from Grasshopper Sammy brought every one upon his and her feet.

"What is the matter now?" inquired Polly. No anwer but shriek, shriek, shriek.

"He caught the bumble-bee," said Molly Mulleinleaf.

"I guess he was trying to find his muscles," said Frankie Muttonchops, laughing.

"No ma'am!" sobbed the boy. "I was not doing any such a thing!"

"What were you doing?" and Polly looked very grave.

"I was—was looking at his toe-nails, and—and the old fool bit me!" screamed Grasshopper Sammy, wringing his hand.

"That will teach you not to examin the toe-nails of bumble-bees unless they are under the influence of chloroform."

They all laughed so—all except Grasshopper Sammy—that the reception had to break up for that time.

Little Thimbleweed said that fine salt would take the pain away, and Daisy Dewdrop recommended plaintain. Sammy Stripedgrass ran and got a big plaintain leaf, and Tommy Clovertop got the salt, and Pussy Whitefoot marched off with the bumble-bee in her mouth—dead.

Historic Pets.

Semiramis, queen of Assyria, had a pet vulture.

Virgil, the poet, was fond of feeding a butterfly.

Emperor Nero loved a starling as well as a fiddle.

Frederick the great was a great dog-fancier.

Commodus, the Roman emperor, found congenial fellowship with an ape.

Heliogabalus, Roman emperor, conversed familiarly with a sparrow.

Mohammed's dove is one of the most famous of pets.

The Emperor Dominican occupied his leisure in catching flies.

Cardinal Richelieu amused himself with his collection of cats.

Cowper was at no time so happy as when feeding his tame hares.

Cardinal Mazarin employed his leisure in playing with an ape.

Alfieri, the Italian poet, was proud of his horses, and took great delight in fondling and caressing them.

Emperor Augustus was exceedingly fond of a parrot, but still more so of a quail, the loss of which made him sad.

Charles I., of England, was very fond of spaniels, and the breed of his dogs is still famous in this country.

Tiberius, Roman emperor, made an intimate companion of a serpent, which he trained to take food out of his hand.

Henry III., of France, was so fond of spaniels that he used to carry a litter of them in a basket suspended round his neck when giving his audiences.

Louis XI., when ill in Plessis-le-Tours, only found pleasure in an exhibition of dancing pigs, oddly dressed up, which were trained for his special entertainment.

Honorius, Roman emperor, was so grieved at the loss of a favorit hen named Roma that he would willingly hav given Rome itself to bring it back, but Alaric had taken Rome.

The Marquis de Montespan amused himelf with mice when occupying the gilded apartments of Versailles. The mice were white, and had been brought to him all the way from Siberia.

Latude, confined in the Bastile, made companions of six-and-twenty rats who inhabited his cell. He gave each of them a name, and they learned to come to him at his call. He fed them, played with them, and they thus greatly relieved the ennui of his captivity.

Pelissen, confined in the Bastile, made a friend of spider, which he tamed. The jailer, one day, seeing Pelissen take pleasure in contemplating the insect, crushed it under his foot, and left the prisoner distressed and melancholy at the loss of his friend.

Sam Patch's Last Leap.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, who describes himself as an eyewitness of Sam Patch's two last jumps, writes as follows: "Sam Patch, the famous cataract-jumper, who asserted that 'some things could be done as well as others,' took his 'final, eternal, and life's fatal leap,' as a local poet expressed it at the time, on a gloomy day in November, in the year 1829. He had 'jumped' the Genesee Falls at Rochester, their natural hight, one week before, and was induced by the gamblers and roughs who were grooming and managing and living off him to repeat the feat on the fatal occasion. They erected a sort of scaffold on the jutting rock whence he had taken his departure on the previous occasion, making it twenty-five feet above the rock, or one hundred and twenty feet in all from the scaffold floor to the surface of the river at the foot of the falls. Ascending to the scaffold with some difficulty, considerably inebriated, and by a steep ladder, the unfortunate demonstrator straightened up with a jerk, bowed awkwardly on all sides to the witnessing thousands, then pushed off a pet bear he had with him, and instantly leaped forward himself. His person 'canted over' on the left side and struck the water forcibly, no doubt bruising him and forcing the breath from his body. Nothing more was seen of him till the next March, when his corpse was discovered among some bushes at the mouth of the river, seven miles below, very much mutilated, but recognizable by a handkerchief tied around the body."

Correspondence.

CARROLTON, Mo., Oct. 25, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines for the Corner. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and thinks it a good paper. I like to read the little letters in the Corner. My sister Bessie and I are about the same size. We hav lots of fun, but we fuss a little sometimes. I am twelve years old to-day. I remain

Your little Liberal friend, SUSIE ISAACS.

CHICAGO, ILL., Oct. 26, 1887.

TO THE CHILDREN: I hope that you are all working for that prize I offered a few weeks ago, viz.: first prize, $3; second prize, $2; third prize, $1, for the best essay on "Why I Am a Liberal." You can hav the money or books to the value of the prize awarded you, just as you wish. Now I hope you will all try and win one of the three prizes. This is an easy subject to write upon. Do not fear that other writers will do better, or that you are too young. Simply write a nice, easy letter, and tell us why you are a Liberal, using one side of the paper only. Miss Wixon will correct any little mistake that may occur, and will publish all letters received. Competition open until the 24th of November.

Now, do your best, and believe me to be
Your friend, B. H. MARLETT.

MURRAY, IDA., Oct. 27, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you another letter and tell you about Cœur d'Alene. There are lots of rich mines here. One of the placer claims at the edge of the town took out a nugget that weighed 33 ounces three weeks ago. There are also some very rich quartz mines here, gold and silver both. I am going to school now. There is a very good school here, and about fifty pupils. We hav very good school laws in this territory. Children between the ages of eight and fourteen are compelled to go to school twelve weeks in each year, and section 39 of the school law reads as follows: "No books, papers, tracts, or documents of a political, sectarian, or denominational character shall be used or introduced in any school established under the provisions of this act, and any and every political, sectarian, or denominational doctrin is hereby expressly forbidden to be taught therein; nor shall any teacher nor any district receive any of the public school moneys in which the schools hav not been taught in accordance with the provisions of this act."

My letter is long enough for this time.

Yours truly, THERESA ERVIN (aged 11).

CARROLTON, Mo., Oct. 26, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Our family feel very sorry for you in your trouble. We don't like to lose good people as they are very few. There seem to be very few here. We are passed by, because we do our own thinking and speak honestly. I think I am a good girl, and trying to do what is right. I hav a sister 12 years old to-day; we are kind of lonesome, only when we are at school. I am 14 years old, and I should like to hear from some of my good sisters of Freedom. Seeing a letter in the Children's Corner from Miss Minnie D. Taylor, of Kansas, of my own age, caused me to write. I used to liv in Carbondale, Kansas.

With due respect to all, BESSIE ISAACS.

REDUCED TO $1.00.

THE STORY HOUR.

A Book for Children and Youth.

BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

Over a hundred fine illustrations.

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

Apples of Gold. A Story-Book for the Young Folks. By Miss Susan H. Wixon. Second edition. Price, $1.25. This very excellent work for young masters and misses, has passed through a very large edition, and a second has been issued at a reduced price of $1.25, free of postage. This new edition has a photograph of the author which adds very much to the value of the volume.

Bible Inquirer. A Key to Bible Investigation. Revised Edition. This pamphlet refers specifically to 148 Bible propositions, with numerous references and citations, that are contradicted in terms by the same number of other propositions in the same book. Price 25 cents.

The Story Hour. For Children and Youth. By Susan H. Wixon. Without Superstition. The Only Illustrated Freethinkers' Children's Story-Book ever issued. 66 full-page and 25 smaller illustrations; large type, heavy toned paper, broad margins, illuminated covers; 4to. 224 pp., bds., $1.

Two Little Red Mittens. A Story of the Rightway Almshouse. By Jennie Butler Browne. Price 10 cents. For sale at this office.

The Youth's Liberal Guide. By Prof. H. M. Kottinger, A.M. Price; $1.00. This volume aims at the education of youth in the principles of Freethought, at the same time that it inculcates moral duties and human rights from a standpoint of pure reason and common sense. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

REPLY
TO REV. L. A. LAMBERT'S
"NOTES ON INGERSOLL."
By B. W. Lacy.

A thorough exposure of the Catholic priest's Historical misstatements.

Printed in colors on board, beveled edges. Price 50 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

THE CONFESSIONAL:
ROMISH AND ANGLICAN.
An Exposé.
By SALADIN. Price, 30 cents.
Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A SHORT LESSON IN HISTORY

A double-page picture contrasting science and theology, showing how the one has labored for human advancement, and how the other has always opposed it.

Price, six copies, 30 cents; one dozen, 50 cents twenty-five copies for $1; one hundred copies for $3. We wish that the friends of Freethought would distribute thousands of these telling pictures.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

TRUTH SEEKER Office,

FREETHOUGHT NOVELS.

The Heathens of the Heath. A finely written Radical romance. By Wm. McDonnell, author of Exeter Hall, Family Creeds, Day of Rest, etc. 500 pages. Price reduced. Paper, 90 cents; cloth, 1.25.

All in a Lifetime. A Romance. By Miss Susan H. Wixon. "The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks." Price, 1.50. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Outcast. A deep, finely written Radical story. From the London edition. By Winwood Reade, author of Martyrdom of Man. 30 cents.

Ingersoll's Works.

The Gods. Paper, 50 cts; cloth, $1.
In five lectures, comprising, "The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," and "Heretics and Heresies."

The Ghosts. Paper, 50 cts; cloth, 1.25.
Contents: "The Ghosts," "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child," "The Declaration of Independence," "About Farming in Illinois," "The Grant Banquet," "The Rev. Alexander Clark," "The Past Rises before Me Like a Dream," and "A Tribute to Ebon C. Ingersoll."

Some Mistakes of Moses. Paper, 50cts; cloth, $1.25.

Interviews on Talmage. Paper, 50cts; plain cloth, $1.25.

What Must We Do to Be Saved? Paper, 25 cents.

The Christian Religion. By R. G. Ingersoll, Judge Jeremiah S. Black, and Prof. George F. Fisher. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

Orthodoxy. 56 pages, 12mo, paper, 10 cents. $1.00 per doz. post paid. Printed in large, clear type, and containing as much as could be delivered in two ordinary lectures. This makes a grand missionary document. Liberals should scatter it generously.

Ingersoll Catechised: His Answers to a Number of Vital Questions Propounded by the editor of the San Franciscan. 5 cents; 50 cents per dozen; 25 copies, $1; 100 copies, $3. Millions of these should be circulated.

Vindication of Thomas Paine from the attacks of the New York Observer, by Robert G. Ingersoll. Price, 15 cents.

Address on the Civil Rights Bill. Large size octavo, paper, 10 cents.

Ingersoll's Lectures Complete.
Bound in one volume. To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the three will be forwarded to any address, for 50 cts, or either one for 15 cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, 4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, 7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

A Political Parson.

Austin, Texas, Correspondence of the St. Louis Republican.

There is one thing definitly settled, and that is that an overwhelming majority of the people of Texas are opposed to Prohibition. They will hav none of it in any guise; nor do they want any of its priests and prophets and evangelists for public servants. Perhaps no class suffered more in public estimation because of the Prohibition campaign than the ministers of the gospel. They are held responsible for the whole row. Friends of a lifetime became enemies, and the estrangement is charged to the preachers. Brothers became estranged and husbands and wives quarreled, and the preachers are blamed for it. And it must be admitted that there is some cause for the detestation in which a certain class of preachers are held. The ministers of the Methodist church took a very activ part. In nineteen cases out of twenty they made political platforms out of their pulpits, and turned their churches into political meeting-places. This kind of thing does not go down in Texas. The people do not want political preachers, and there is some probability that the next legislature will be asked to take some emphatic action. It is on the boards that a sensation may be created by the next legislature, if hints thrown out by some of the Democratic leaders pan out. At the present time the preachers are by law a privileged class. They are exempt from jury duty, service on the roads, and other ills that the ordinary citizen is heir to.

It is quietly given out that an effort will be made when the next legislature convenes to remove the preachers' exemptions, and in addition place them under the burden of an occupation tax the same as the members of other professions. This will raise a howl from the preachers, but the more they howl in the present temper of the people, the better the people will like it. The preachers themselvs are feeling somewhat nervous. They feel that they overstepped the bounds of wisdom and propriety and tempted public patience too much. The real chief of the brigade of political preachers is a young Methodist minister named George Waverly Briggs. He is a nativ of Alabama, and moved to Texas about eight or nine years ago. He is a very brilliant young man, dashing, impetuous, and ambitious. He became the pastor of the leading Methodist church in Galveston soon after his arrival in the state, and immediately began to lay wires to capture the editorship of the Christian Advocate, the organ of the church. The editor of the organ at that time was Rev. Dr. John, an old conservativ minister, plodding and sincere, but not very brilliant either as an orator or preacher. The Christian Advocate is owned and published by an enterprising firm of job printers. The word job might be printed in capital letters. The publishers rake in all the revenue from the publication, but the four Methodist conferences of the state hav the appointment of the editor. Dr. John, the old editor, and the publishers of the paper did not always get on harmoniously. The publishers wanted a dashing editor who would make sensations, take a hand in politics, and increase the sale of the paper. It did not take the publishers long to determin that Briggs was the very man they wanted.

So a campaign was inaugurated to make the brilliant young preacher editor of the church organ. It took five years' hard work and some very questionable campaign methods before John was ousted and Briggs installed. When Briggs was finally installed he took the earliest occasion of proving to his publishers that he was the right man in the right place. He made a very hot paper. He was open for a fight on the slightest provocation. He carried a chip around on his shoulders, and invited the editors of the state, religious and secular, to knock it off. His valor often exceeded his discretion. He got into many journalistic rows, in which he got badly mauled, and retreated badly disfigured. But he was game and kept on fighting. It was a question for a long time whether Briggs was a candidate for governor of Texas or for a bishopric in the Methodist church. It was conceded by everybody that he had some kind of a bee in his bonnet. If the Prohibition fight turned his way he would probably aspire for the governorship, but now it is likely that he will hav to fall back on the bishopric. Well, Briggs started the Prohibition fight in good earnest. He whooped up the ministers and the brethren, denounced the rum power, and set the agitation a-going. He came very near overdoing it. Some of the old Methodists revolted. They didn't care to be driven around by a young carpet-bagger like Briggs. But modesty and Briggs were never intimately acquainted. He kept right on laying down the law to old men who had grown gray in the ministry. At last the agitation reached such a stage that many politicians began to waver and make preparations to flop at the right time. The legislature submitted the question of Prohibition to the people; it was defeated, and now Briggs is cussed by the politicians and condemned by the preachers. If the legislature should levy an occupation tax on the preachers, and subject them to jury service, work on the roads, etc., it would be the hight of discretion for Briggs to pull out of the state without ceremony. He would hav captured the chief glory if Prohibition won, and now he must stand all the odium of defeat. But Briggs is not downcast; he is as cocky as ever, and urges that the fight be commenced anew. The preachers, however, hav lost their influence in this state. Their engagement in politics spoiled their usefulness, and Briggs, as the apostle of the new idea, is the chief sufferer. It is reported that the Methodist brethren even will find it expedient to procure a new editor for the Christian Advocate at the next general conference.

Book Notice.

ROSA, THE EDUCATING MOTHER. By Prof. H. M. Cottinger, A.M., author of "Method of Teaching in High Schools of Switzerland," "Medieval Plays of Jacob Rueff," "Guide for Sunday-schools of Free German Congregations," "Elements of Universal History," etc.

"Rosa" is a good book, written by a life-long teacher in the public schools of the old country and America. This work is, very likely, the last in a literary way that the author will giv to the public, as this dear friend of youth and education is now in his 85th year. The first part of "Rosa, the Educating Mother," treats of biography, and contains brief sketches of the mothers of celebrated men and women, notably the mothers of George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, Phebe and Alice Cary, Victor Hugo, Schiller and Goethe, Napoleon I. and others, including a sketch of the author's mother, and of Rosa, the mother of the author's children. The second part contains a number of letters purporting to be written by Rosa on proper education, intellectual culture, and touching upon nearly all subjects relating to the physical, moral, and mental culture of children, various maxims being illustrated by examples drawn from the experience of the author as well as the best English, French, and German writers.

The book contains many sensible and valuable ideas, much sound philosophy, and offers several fine suggestions to all who hav the interest of children and youth at heart. It is adorned with a portrait of Mary Washington, contains 300 pages, is printed on good paper and is neatly bound. It is sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER office in New York, also at the Investigator book store in Boston, and by the author at San Jose, Cal. Price, $1.25. Our venerable friend has written several excellent books in the interest of youth and the cause of true education, all of which hav been duly appreciated, and, certainly, this crowning effort of his long and useful life should, and doubtless will, meet with a warm welcome from his many friends on both sides of the Atlantic. SUSAN H. WIXON.

FREETHOUGHT NOVELS.

All in a Lifetime. A Romance. By Miss Susan H. Wixon. "The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks." Price, 1.50. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Outcast. A deep, finely written Radical story. From the London edition. By Winwood Reade, author of Martyrdom of Man. 30 cents.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS THE LAMP OF THE MIND.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW.
AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE
TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY;
TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

In Tuesday's elections the Democrats carried New York city, electing Fellows district-attorney; and the state, electing Cook secretary. In this city Henry George polled about 37,000 votes, 30,000 less than last year. The Prohibition and Progressiv Labor votes were very small.

John L. Sullivan and Jay Gould hav landed in England.

Third avenue in this city is to hav a cable road to replace the horse cars.

Mr. O'Brien, the editor of United Ireland, has been finally placed in jail to serve his sentence of three months for the crime of talking to the Irishmen.

The Methodist Book Concern has bought the property at 152 Fifth avenue for $439,000. Peddling superstition seems to pay.

A deputation from Great Britain who desire to secure a treaty between that country and this which shall provide for the amicable settlement of all disputes, called on the president last week.

Mayor Hewitt has asked the federal government to ask the Italian government to take steps to prevent any more people from cholera-infected districts coming to this city.

Several women in Auburn, N. Y., are on the registry as voters, having taken the oath required by law of challenged persons.

Dr. McGlynn thinks he will soon be reinstated in priestly orders. The archbishop is not of the same opinion.

Secretary of the Navy Whitney is in a fair way to recover his health, impaired by too close application to his duties.

The recent strike of the printers left 250 men out of work in this city. Those who are at work will assess themselvs 5 per cent on all their wages to support the 250 until they can get situations.

A coal-laden schooner ran down the United States sloop-of-war Portsmouth, carrying away her main and mizzen topmasts, three boats, and port bulwark. The government vessel had the right of way, and the schooner must pay damages.

The Metropolitan Transit Co. is after Broadway on which to build an elevated railroad. Judge Donohue has granted the application of the company for the appointment of commissioners to ascertain and declare what compensation should be paid the city for the franchise.

The United States troops and the Crow Indians hav had a fight, to the disadvantage of the Indians. The cause of the fight was the firing into the agency building, Fort Custer, Montana, by seven Indians, and the refusal of the Crow tribe to surrender the culprits. Several Indians and one soldier were killed in the skirmish.

The election campaign during the past week has been one of slander and buncombe. No principles whatever were involved between the two old parties, the fight being a personal one between politicians of opposit parties, with a few editors taking a hand in that they might hav officials of use to themselvs. Henry George had ideas, and the Progressiv Labor party also; but ideas stand no chance in New York's political cesspool.

The police searched the cells of the Chicago Anarchists last Sunday, and report four bombs "of the gas-pipe variety" found in Lingg's cell. It is thought the police put them in the room and then found them in order to stop the public sentiment in favor of commutation of the condemned men's sentences. The press of Chicago and the people are now in favor of clemency, and Governor Oglesby is inundated with letters and petitions urging him to commute the punishment to imprisonment. What effect these hav had is not known as we go to press.

A BIBLICAL EPISODE.

Subject for Sunday-school Discussion.—Gen. xxxviii.

Odds and Ends.

Sarah Bernhardt has written a play that she calls "The Pin." She doesn't believe that any of the critics will dare to "sit down on it."

Helen: "Mamma, what is a casus belli?" Mother: "My child, never speak of anything so indelicate. It is the Latin for stomach-ache."

A toy balloon sent up from a town in Kentucky a month ago was found the other day in a field in Connecticut, where it had just alighted, and the farmer's wife at once decided that providence had sent her a new bustle.

A Pittsburgh judge has decided that selling soda water on Sunday is illegal. This decision is calculated to raise a side-door issue in Pittsburgh. Inability to procure a glass of soda water on Sunday may drive some persons to rum.

Mr. Hayseed (to wife who is returned from church): "What was the sermon about?" Mrs. Hayseed: "Suthin' about Joseph goin' daun to Egypt to buy corn." Mr. Hayseed: "Did the dominie say what corn's wu'th down there?"

Presiding elder (to Dakota merchant): "Can you tell me where Rev. Mr. Masher livs?" "He livs two blocks up this street, but he ain't at home now." "Not at home?" "No, he's away on a vacation." "Did he take his wife?" "No, he took mine."

Natural history note.—The Graham boys report a huge swallowing. They say two king snakes undertook to swallow a ground rattle. One commenced at his head and the other at his tail. They swallowed until they met, and then swallowed each other.—Jesup (Ga.) Sentinel.

Some woman-hating editor expressed the opinion recently that women are never so successful as men in their callings; whereupon a Pueblo paper, with true Western gallantry, came to the rescue of the fair sex with a bold denial of the assertion, and instanced one lady in the neighborhood whose voice could be heard a mile.

A writer deserves the respectful sympathy of all gentlemen who giv out their washing. He says: "It is awful annoying to hav some other fellow's clothes left in one's room by the washerwoman. Saturday we put on another fellow's shirt, but couldn't wear it. Although it was ruffled around the bottom, the sleeves were too short to button cuffs on, and there was no place for a collar."

A colored Agnostic.—Aunt Susan: "I wants yer ter talk to dis chile, Parson Baxter." Parson Whangdoodle Baxter: "What's de matter wid de chile?" Aunt Susan: "I'se afeard he am gwinter be an acrostic. He says he don't bleeve hit tuck Jonah free days ter swaller de whale." Parson Baxter: "I'se afeard I ain't equal ter dis emergency, Aunt Susan. Dis heah am a case for Sam Jones."

A Germantown patron of the line tells a fair one about his little boy. They hav long desired sending him to Sunday-school, but postponed the event until they thought he was large enough to understand the teachings there. When they finally sent the little shaver, the teacher asked, "Winnie, do you know who the dear savior is?" "No, ma'am; we've just moved to Germantown an' we hain't got very well acquainted yet," was the startling reply.

His nerves were weak—a clergyman, sad,
Whom every sound would annoy;
He came for rest, but it drove him mad—
The shrieks of the whistling buoy.

"The mountain air is better for me;
I must flee this dizzy whirl"—
He is settled now, away from the sea,
But he married a whistling girl.

The church was all crowded by women so gay,
A-watching a pair being married;
"Who giveth this beautiful damsel away?"
The preacher exclaimed as he tarried.

By the door sat a youth interested to hear,
But looking pale, sober, and wilted;
No wonder. He'd courted that damsel a year
By the stove and, alas! had been jilted.

"Who givs her away?" Ah, his heaven was sweet
Before his fair visions were routed.
"Who givs her away?" Up he jumped on the seat.
"I can—if I want to," he shouted.

After all, there is nothing more admirable in a public man than the courage of his religious convictions and practices. There was an excellent alderman from East Boston, for instance—now, unfortunately, an alderman no more—who remarked once, in the presence of some of his fellow-members of the city government, "Every night I get down on my knees and say my little prayer, and I don't care a —— who sees me."

Gems of Thought.

As our religious beliefs fade away we become civilized, and should Christianity recede as fast in the coming twenty-five years as it has in the quarter-century just past, the earth will stand a fair chance of becoming a habitable place.—D. M. Bennett.

The fact that errata should frequently giv a book very great value is as curious as it is true. Pope Sextus's Bible owes its high price to its 1,600 errata. A wealthy man, possessed of humor, might well giv some guineas for an "infallible" work with 1,600 mistakes, and which, moreover, contains a delicious preface excommunicating all who should henceforth alter the text. Of similar high value is a little work called, "The Anatomy of the Mass," in which there are 172 pages of matter and 15 pages of errata. The pious writer, in apologizing for this, states that Satan in person interested himself in balking his devout aim.—St. James Magazine.

God, though always present everywhere, came down specially, we are told, in some concentrated form on the top of Mount Sinai, and the existence of Mount Sinai, occupying so much space between the horns of the Red Sea, is still affected as if it could testify to the fact, and, without mouth or tongue, spoke the Ten Commandments audibly through Moses to the awe-stricken Israelites. He then added three chapters of other moral and immoral laws and six chapters on the elaborate upholstery and fittings and ceremonies, for a large tent, with colored curtains, and with candlesticks, tongs, snuff-dishes, fire-pans, shovels, etc., all fully described by divine wisdom.—The Ten Commandments, by W. P. Ball. [Note.—Let no one too readily imagin that Mr. Ball has shot off a poisoned arrow when he uses the epithet "immoral" as applied to many of the laws and precepts announced in the three chapters referred to. The chapters still hold a place in our Bibles, and no possible "revision" will conceal and still wash away the offense. Some apology may be made for them as the work of ignorant barbarians, but to attribute them to the "judge of all the earth" is outrageously vile.—Hylax.]

Nothing is surer than that by seeking the fulfilment of his own desires a man contributes largely to the stock of general well-being. Indeed, it has been argued, and I think successfully, that men's largest contribution to the general good is not through their direct efforts to this end, but through the legitimate fulfilment of their own desires. But so, too, on the other hand, much of a man's best happiness comes through his endeavors to make others happy, and promote the general welfare. That is the true life in which the two motions—the centripetal and the centrifugal—balance and assist each other; in which, seeking the body's good according to the body's law, the mind's good according to the mind's law, and the good of the affections according to their law, ever on our guard lest our own gain be others' loss, our joy their pain, we at the same time endeavor earnestly and prudently to help others to fulfil the law of their being.—Chadwick's Conduct of Life.

Virtue consists in a uniform and settled affection of mind, making those persons praiseworthy who are possessed of her; she herself also, independent of anything else, without regard to any advantage, must be praiseworthy; for from her proceed good inclinations, opinions, actions, and the whole of right reason; though virtue may be defined to be right reason itself.—Cicero's Tusculan Disputations.

Instead of stretching the severity of justice by an inference, we may rather venture to stretch the mercy of God, since that is the attribute which, of all other attributes, is the most magnificently spoken of in the scriptures; so that we ought to think of it in the largest and most comprehensiv manner. God is pleased often to appeal to men for the justice of his ways: and, therefore, no such doctrin [as that of eternal damnation] ought to be admitted that carries in it an idea of cruelty beyond what the blackest tyrants hav ever invented.—Bishop Burnett's XXXIX. Articles.

LOVE'S ERRAND.

Swift through the ocean of silence go,
Sprite unseen!
Dive to the echoless realms below;
Kindle the depths with a radiance keen.
Then, like an arrowy pulse of fire,
Throb to the quivering stars and higher
Into the vault serene!

Glide through the mystical orb of sleep;
Pause to see,
Born of the amorous twilight deep,
Dreams, from their chrysalis slumber free,
Thronging the shadowy close of day
Wed with the loveliest, steal away,
Speeding again to me!

—John B. Tabb.

Not to be born is much the best, but having seen the light, the next best is to go as soon as may be whence one came.—Sophocles (495 B.C.).

THE American Board of Missions has decided that the heathen who has never heard of hell will go there. As he has never heard of heaven, why shouldn't he go there occasionally, too?—Norristown Herald.

THE New York Sun inquires: "What do Protestant Episcopalians think of the statement, by the Rev. Dr. Norton, that the average yearly contributions to the cause of missions by converted heathens is $1.50, and the average contribution of Episcopalians in the United States 7¼ cents?"

THE Thanksgiving proclamation of Governor Lounsbury, of Connecticut, is one of the most remarkable productions of its kind on record. It opens as follows: "There is now no special reason for thanks more than that which has marked the years that are gone; but of all of heaven's gifts to men life's common blessings are always the sweetest and the best, and so, in accordance with a custom that is hallowed by all the ties that bind us to the past, and which reaches on to the future in universal expectation, I hereby appoint," etc. It seems too bad that Governor Lounsbury will not accept a renomination.—World.

"LITTLE boy," said a country minister, who was on his way to church, "what do you suppose your father would say if he should find you here fishing on the Sabbath day?" "He'd ask me wot luck I was havin'," replied the boy.

A HARTFORD youngster goes to church where the concluding Amen of the parson's prayer is sung by the choir. The other night, after he had said his prayers, he produced a harmonica from beneath his pillow and astonished his mother by blowing a blast where the Amen came in, remarking, "That's the way we do in church."

HOUSE OWNER: "How many children hav you, madam?" House hunter: "Five." House owner: "That alters the case. I can't let you hav the house." A RESIDENT of one of the Prohibition counties of Georgia sent to Atlanta for a jug of whisky, to be delivered C. O. D. The firm replied that the money must accompany all orders for whisky from "dry" counties, as debts of that character could not be collected. The return mail brought the money and this:

BY the improved method of welding by electricity, a broken bar of metal can be easily reunited, or bars of different metals welded together, and those metals which previously resisted welding most strenuously are now joined with ease, while those previously easily welded remain the same by the new process.

THIS is from the Sun: Minister's wife: "I think these church dissensions are awful, my dear, and so unnecessary." Minister: "They are not pleasant, but Deacon Jones has gone too far. If my influence, as pastor, isn't great enough to bring about his expulsion, I shall resign." Wife: "I would, indeed. What is your text for to-day?" Minister: "'Whosover shall smite thee on thy right cheek turn to him the other also.'"

A FEW years ago, a pious church-member in the western part of this state arose in an experience meeting and gave a review of his life. When he came to the declaration, "I thank God that I owe no man anything," a quiet man in a remote corner jumped up and said: "I hav a little account against you, brother, that you must hav forgotten." "Ah, Brother C.," said the speaker, unctuously, "that debt was outlawed a good while ago."—Kingston Freeman.

SPEAKING of anthems (says a writer in the Nautical Gazette) reminds me of the story of two old British sailors who were talking over their shore experience. One had been to a cathedral and had heard some very fine music, and was descanting particularly upon an anthem which gave him much pleasure. His shipmate listened for a while and then said. "I say, Bill, what's a hanthem?" "What," replied Bill, "do you mean to say you don't know what a hanthem is?" "Not me." "Well, then, I'll tell yer. If I was to tell yer 'ere Bill, giv me that 'andspike,' that wouldn't be a hanthem; but was I to say, 'Bill, Bill, Bill, giv, giv, giv me, giv me that, Bill, giv me, giv me that hand, giv me that hand, handspike, spike, spike. Bill, giv, giv me that, that, hand, handspike, hand, handspike, spike, spike, spike, spike, ah-men, ah-men. Billgivmethathandspike, spike, ah-men!' Why, that would be a hanthem."

SAM SMALL, the evangelist, spoke to a large audience in Cooper Union on the 13th, his subject being Prohibition. Defining the object of the Prohibition party, he said: "What we mean to do is to marshal our forces, and carry on the conflict until we shall put this country where it belongs—under the protection of God, making love of God the law of the state."

RALPH BEAUMONT in his address on Labor Day told the following rather good one: "In the New England town where I was raised there was a man named Bill Jones. Bill was very much of a sot, and when he got so full he couldn't navigate he made a bed just where he was. One night Bill laid his feverish head in the gutter. Three young wags of the town out for a lark happened along and determined to hav some fun. Now, one of these chaps was a clerk in an undertaker's establishment, so Bill was taken into the shop and placed in a pine box. He was then carted off to the graveyard and the box placed amid the tombs in the silent city of the dead. The jokers secreted themselvs in an obscure but overlooking spot and awaited developments. Just as the gray dawn of morning burst forth, off went the lid of the box and up popped Bill. Looking around at the tombs for a moment, he straightened up and said: 'Well, here we are on the morning of the resurrection, and Bill Jones is the first man on deck, by ——!'"

The Trial of Mrs. Slenker.

A second paper from the letter was handed witness, and read by him. This was headed by a preposition followed by various extracts with references relating to it.

The third paper defended the nomenclature used in the correspondence, and traced its derivation.

After the reading of two other disconnected leaflets, the district attorney proposed to read no more.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: We hav endeavored from the outset to keep this matter out. It is now in, contrary to our desire. We hav not invoked this. We do not think it is fair to shut out part of the matter.

THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY: I hav not myself read these writings; I do not care to read them. It is dreary, monotonous, and repetition of vulgarity. But if these gentlemen insist upon its going before the jury, I hav no objection so far as I am concerned.

THE COURT: You are responsible for the conduct of your case. If you choose to stop your case, you can do so, upon such papers as you please.

Another paper was read, being a long extract cut from a periodical, the matter on the back also being read.

The district attorney rested upon the six papers ead.

MR. HEERMANS: To stop at this point seems likely to result in injustice. As the matter is started, the jury ought to hav all of it. If the prosecution will not read them, we shall hav to read them on cross-examination. The first two or three pieces were of course shocking to people who never before heard anything of that kind; but when they hav heard all of them, they will find that it is a very different case. We hoped that after the prosecution began, they would go on, and not force us to put the matter before the public.

The district attorney declined to read further papers, and proceeded with the direct examination of Mr. Barclay.

Q. Do you know who mailed that envelope? A. She acknowledged in my presence that she had mailed it. (Objected to as in the nature of a confession and inadmissible.)

Q. (by the court). Was it after she was under arrest, or before? A. Before she was under arrest.

Q. (by the court). Did you hold out any promis or inducement to her to make the statement? A. No, sir.

The testimony was admitted under exception.

Q. Had you had any correspondence with her before you received this letter? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was this received in reply to any letter you wrote to her? A. Yes, sir.

Q. State what she said about mailing this letter. State the circumstances. A. This case had been in my hands a number of months for investigation. After I had concluded my examination, as far as I could go without visiting her, Mr. McAfee, post-office inspector, and Mr. Jordan, United States marshal, and myself, visited the house together; and Mr. McAfee, being more familiar with this business than I, was made the spokesman of the occasion. My name was not given. We began to talk to her about these papers.

Q. (by the court). The same papers you read? A. Yes, sir. These papers were produced after other conversation had occurred. She was asked the question whether she had had any correspondence with a man by the name of Barclay. She said she had frequently corresponded with him, had received letters from him, and had written letters to him. She was asked if she had ever mailed anything of this character to him, and she said she thought not. Finally, this envelope was produced. She was asked if she recognized that, as having sent that. She said she did; that she recognized it as her writing, and that she had sent it to me. She claimed that she did not know what was in it. Afterward the inner envelope was produced, and she was asked if that was her writing. She said that it was, and that she had caused that to be mailed. She said she knew it had inclosures, but did not know what they were. She sent out so many, she did not know what she sent to each individual; and each correspondent had a private mark which was put upon the articles that had been sent, so as not to send them the same articles a second time. Some of the contents were produced, and she recognized them as some of hers, but did not think she had sent anything she considered illegal.

Q. Did you ever read in her presence any of this literature? A. That was before the commissioner. The "Girl and the Dog" was read, and she acknowledged that she had mailed it to me. There were quite a number of papers read at that time.

Q. The one defining the meaning of different terms? A. Yes, sir; that was read.

Q. Was this paper read there? (the one headed with a preposition.) A. I think it was.

Q. That was among the papers she stated she had sent? A. Yes, sir. And the first part of this one was read and handed to the commissioner. The commissioner was there, and Judge Allen (the district attorney) was there.

Q. What did she state about sending them? A. She said she had mailed all these to me. She made quite a lengthy statement before the commissioner, justifying the sending of these matters. She was asked specially about the dog stories, if she had many of them. She said, yes, she had received a good many.

Q. What did she say as to her view in sending them out? A. She stated that she was working for the benefit of humanity; that in order to go thoroughly into any matter she must hear both sides of it, and that she had taken these means of getting the information she wanted, to get information from all quarters; that she was getting up experiences of different kinds—all kinds of sexual experiences—for the purpose of forwarding them to the author of "Diana," and getting up information to be used by him in writing "Diana" and such other works; that she considered that she was doing a pure and good work; that she considered that none of these "words of four letters," as she calls them, were vulgar; that they were plain Anglo-Saxon, and that they were not vulgar except to those who made them so. The conversation covered an hour, I suppose, and that was the substance of a portion of the statement. I asked with reference to the dog story; she said she had received a good many, and went into a description of one she had received previously, and the reply which she had sent to the inquiries by that lady, giving her reasons why she had made that reply.

Q. When and where was that letter mailed? A. At Snowville, Pulaski Co.; postmarked March 15. I received the letter about the 18th.

Q. You are a post-office inspector? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know the Snowville postmark? A. By seeing it. It is the same-shaped stamp used by all post-offices pretty much.

Q. Were there other papers read before the commissioner besides those in evidence? A. I think there were other papers. When we were at her house she gave us the papers. She said she had some, and was asked if she would not giv them to us. She said: "Well, I will burn them up in your presence." I spoke up and said: "That would be rather an admission of guilt on your part, if you wish to destroy them; but if, as you say, there is nothing wrong about these matters, and all was done from pure motivs and pure intent, you should not attempt to conceal, but you should rather publish them to the world than to hide or burn them." She says, "All right; I will giv them to you;" and she went and produced a lot of other papers, and gave us quite a lot of them. I do not know what papers were read before the commissioner, but I presume some of those were read before him. There was no special mark upon them.

Q. You manifested a desire to get the papers? A. That was what I was after, and I got them.

Q. When did this occur? before she knew she was under arrest, or after? A. It was before. We told her when we first went in. Mr. McAfee was the spokesman. He said: "This is Mrs. Slenker. I am a post-office inspector, and came here to look after this matter of charges brought against you of sending obscene matter sent through the mails." She said the matter had been frequently brought up before and investigated, and another inspector had been there; I do not know whether it was more than one, but she knew a government officer was there.

Q. At that time there had been no exhibition of the warrant? A. No, sir.

Q. Did she know that these three parties were all officers? A. No, sir. She said very soon afterward that she expected it, and had been expecting it a good while, and was ready to meet it. She treated us very kindly and courteously indeed, and I think she may say the same of us. She was kind and courteous and polite.

Q. Why was it necessary for three of you to go there together? A. I don't know; because Mr. McAfee had one set of papers upon which he wanted to base charges, and I had another, and the marshal was the law officer.

Q. Would it not hav answered every purpose if the marshal had gone there without you? A. No, sir.

Q. Would it not hav answered every purpose if you and the marshal had gone there without Mr. McAfee? A. Not every purpose; no sir.

Q. What purpose would not hav been answered by such an arrangement as that? A. Simply because I had one batch of papers, and she had another.

Q. Was not one batch sufficient? A. No, sir; we wanted two indictments, we wanted whatever indictments would come of it.

C. How long had you been in correspondence with Mrs. Slenker? A. Over a year; I do not know how long exactly.

Q, During all this correspondence of a year, you only got matter sufficient for one indictment? A. That is all; only got that kind of matter once from her.

Q. Is this your first experience under the statute? A. No sir; I hav had others, but not so extended a case, not so important a case as this; I hav had numbers under the same statute, one in Richmond last week.

Q. Hav you ever made use of false names in your correspondence? A. Never, sir,

Q. Were you in communication with Mr. McAfee with regard to this matter throughout all the time of this correspondence? A. No, sir.

Q. How long had you been in communication with him? A. Several months; it had been in the hands of our inspectors, I think four of them, and was put into my hand soon after I was appointed.

Q. By your superior officer? A. Yes, sir; the chief inspector, the inspector in charge of our division. I set to work on the case and was working on it in my own way when I learned that Mr. AcAfee was coming to Virginia from St. Louis on this case, and I immediatly notified him to hav nothing to do with that case until he saw me, and could tell him more about it than he knew. He went to Washington then, and there he was ordered to go and visit the attorney at Woodstock; they telegraphed me—I was then at Liberty, Virginia - to meet Mr. McAfee at Woodstock and the district attorney. I went to Woodstock and laid the matter before both of them.

Q. What time was this? A. I think nearly a year ago; eight or ten months ago—about last January. I met these two gentlemen and they said I was conducting the case all right, to go ahead and when ready for action to telegraph to Mr. McAfee and he would meet me, which was done and we met at Lynchburg, and came from there to Snowville.

Q. What do you mean by conducting the case? A. I was in correspondence with Mrs. Slenker.

Q. Endeavoring to get from her such matters as these? A. Yes, sir.

Q. (by Mr. Ronald,) Where do you reside? A. My headquarters are at Washington.

Q. I undersand you to say you hav had some correspondence with Mrs. Slenker? A. Yes, sir.

Q. For how long previous to her arrest? A. More than a year.

Q. Was that correspondence confidential between you and Mrs. Slenker? A. Not more so than others.

Q. What was the nature of the correspondence? A. I was ordering from her books and papers and everything of that kind she had to dispose of.

Q. Did you know the character of those books at the time? A. I did.

Q. While corresponding with her, did you express your sympathy with her in her enterprise? A. No, sir.

Q. Why did you order those books? A. Because I wanted to know what kind of literature she dealt in.

Q. Was that the only purpose? A. No, sir; I wanted to see what obscene matter she dealt in.

Q. Had you ever been able to find out that Mrs. Slenker had been sending obscene matter through the mail to your own knowledge? A. No, sir; if I had I would not hav corresponded with her.

Q. Did you correspond with Mrs. Slenker for the purpose of betraying her? A. I corresponded with her for the purpose of vindicating the law.

Q. Did you correspond with her under the guise of friendship? A. No, sir.

Q. As an enemy? A. Not as an enemy either.

Q. But for the purpose of exposing her? A. For the purpose of finding out what she was sending through the mails.

Q. What did you intend to do after you found that out? A. Arrest her, which I did.

Q. How did she come to send the story named in the indictment? A. Because I asked her for it; not for that special one, but asked for some of the leaflets which I had known about for a long time.

Q. When you received her communication from the post-office did you know what it contained? A. No, sir.

Q. Did you know what you had written for? A. I knew I had written for some leaflets which I had every reason to believe she had sent through the mail.

Q. And you received it with the idea of what it contained? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you familiar with the statute relating to this subject? A. Fairly so.

Q. Does not the statute say that he who receives it knowingly is as bad as he who sends it? A. No, sir; I do not read it so.

Q. Are you a detectiv? A. I do very little detectiv work.

Q. You belong to what company? A. No company.

Q. Are you not connected with the Court Detectiv System? A. No, sir; I am not.

Q. Did you do this as a detectiv or as a United States officer? A. As a United States officer.

Q. If you did not suppose Mrs. Slenker was a lady, would you hav written to her? A. Yes, I would.

Q. Did you recognize her as a lady? A. I did not, until I had some intercourse with her, and I found that she is a lady in certain ways, but not in this way. I say she is a kind, good, considerate neighbor, very kind and generous in her disposition, and well spoken of in the community; that on this point I beg leave to differ from her.

Q. You received a private letter from Mrs. Slenker, did you not? A. Yes.

Q. Was the postage paid? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was it sealed? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there anything on the envelope to indicate the character of its contents? A. No, sir.

Q. If anybody, other than yourself, had seen it in the post-office, even the postmaster, would his suspicions hav been awakened as to the contraband character of the letter? A. No, sir.

Q. So far as the letter itself was concerned that you received, it was directly within the law? A. Yes, sir; the outside of it was.

Q. Then Mrs. Slenker has only been betrayed by a United States officer by writing to her and inviting her to corrupt the mail? A. Yes, sir, according to law.

Q. If you had not written to Mrs. Slenker and invited this thing—— A. I never would hav received it.

Q. Did she know that you were a United States officer? A. No, sir; I never would hav got it if she had.

Q. Why did you not disclose your purpose? A. Because I would not hav got what I was after.

Q. Your ambition was to feed itself upon a victim? A. I had been fully convinced before that she had sent such matter through the mail, that it was emanating from her and passing through the mail, and I then took these means to find out the absolute fact.

Q. Then you were fully convinced upon a rumor? A. And upon what we had in the post-office department.

Q. You cannot refer to those documents. (By the court) The witness can state the reason why he pursued this course. A. That was my reason from knowledge obtained in the department which had never been made public.

Q. You were authorized to write to her? A. Not only authorized to write to her, but directed to.

Q. Where is the letter? A. I hav no letters from the department; I was ordered by the department to do it—by my superiors.

Q. To write to Mrs. Slenker for this story? A. For anything she had of that kind.

Q. Then a warrant was issued to the marshal for her arrest? A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the necessity of your and McAfee's going with Marshal Jordan? A. Because we wanted to get all we could.

Q. Did the warrant authorize it? A. No.

Q. What did the warrant authorize? A. Only the arrest.

Q. When you got there, you concealed your name? A. She did not ask it.

Q. A conversation ensued between you, and she yielded very readily, frightened, seeing the United States government officers there? A. I do not think she was frightened at all.

Q. You asked her if she had some other papers, and she offered to burn them up. "Oh! no," you said, "don't burn them up, but giv them to me;" did you not say that as a persuasiv reason to induce her to giv them to you in order that you might possess yourself of the papers? A. No, sir; I proposed not to violate my oath.

Q. Did you not make that remark in a persuasiv way for the purpose of getting possession of the papers? What right had you to demand those papers? A. I did not demand them.

Q. Suppose her house had been filled with obscene papers, was it any of your business as a government officer? A. Yes, sir.

Q. How? A. She acknowledged she kept them there for the purpose of sending them out.

Q If I hav obscene literature in my house—I hav a copy of Shakspere there—if you were in my house and saw it there— A. I should let it stay there.

Q. Would you be acting in accordance with your duty? A. Fully.

Q. Is it not obscene? A. Shakspere is not on trial.

Q. Had you any right to take the papers out of her house? A. None in the world.

Q. Then how dared you take those papers from Mrs. Slenker? A. Because she gave them to me.

Q. Did you scatter these papers or read them to anybody? A. Nobody.

Q. Then your reason for writing to this old lady was for the purpose of betraying her? A. For the purpose of vindicating the law.

Q. Was it not your intention, when you wrote that letter sending for obscene matter, that she should send obscene matter to you for which you intended to hav her prosecuted? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then you played the Judas to win your victim? A. I did not.

Robert W. McAfee sworn and examined by the district attorney.

Q. What is your business? A. I am a post-office inspector and general agent of the Western division of the Society for the Suppression of Vice.

Q. State whether you know Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker? A. I hav seen the lady. This is Mrs. Slenker.

Q. State whether this is a letter received from her? A. This is a communication I received from my drawer in St. Louis. The address is R. M. William, Drawer D, 6, St. Louis, Mo.

All objections to the former testimony were considered as applicable to the testimony of this witness.

A. (continued) Inside the outer envelope is one marked "private," and to "return to Elmina," indorsed in purple ink.

Q. Read some of the papers that you identify as papers that you received in that inclosure? (Witness read one of the papers marked No. 1.)

Q. Did you get that envelope, and if so, how, and under what circumstances? A. I got it from the post-office at St. Louis, out of my box drawer D 6.

Q. How did you happen to get it? A. I had answered a public notice under that address, and received this in response. It was in answer or response to a letter to Mrs. Slenker.

Q. Did you ever hav any conversation with Mrs. Slenker in regard to that letter or the inclosure in that envelope? A. I did not.

Q. Were you present at any conversation between her and Mr. Barclay with regard to that inclosure? A. I was present at a conversation between Mrs. Slenker and Mr. Barclay in which the letter sent to Mr. Barclay was presented to her; but this was not.

Q. What occurred when that letter was presented? A. We went to Snowville to interview Mrs. Slenker, and on going in I told her my name and that I was post-office inspector, and had been sent there to investigate a number of complaints with regard to her use of the mails for the dissemination of indecent literature; and said I would like to hav her make a statement to me, if she desired, concerning her dealings in this matter; and we had a conversation, I suppose, lasting nearly an hour, in which I presented the letter; after asking her if she corresponded with Mr. Barclay, I presented the envelope and the contents, and she spoke of having sent them. But she said, "I don't know what I put in there; I send so many letters and send to so many people, I don't know what I send; and I ask each to put a private mark upon them so that I shall not send them a second time." I called her attention to the private marks upon some of the papers in that envelope. She admitted the mailing of that particular letter to Mr. Barclay.

Q. Were you present in Lynchburg when she was examined before the commissioner? A. I was, sir.

Q. Did you hear her statement there? A. Yes, sir. It was a very long statement. I do not think I could repeat all of it. She stated practically what she had the day before. She said she was gathering these facts for a gentleman in New York who had written a certain book, or had received them from him and was circulating them back and forward to get additional experiences for his use.

Q. Did she tell who the gentleman was? A. She refused to tell who he was. She said he was the author of a book, but she had promised not to giv his name or address to anybody, and would not do it without his consent.

Q. Did she tell you the name of the book? A. Yes, sir. It was a book called "Diana." She stated about the correspodence she had received from other people

Q. You heard her state there about mailing these? A. Yes. She stated that she had mailed them to Mr. Barclay, and a great many others, and a great many others were concerned in similar matters. In our conversation at the house I asked her if she had any of this matter in her possession, and she said she had; and she went and got some and gave them to each of us who were present, and said it was the first time she had given it to anybody to read in her presence, and she felt a little embarrassed in doing so. I suggested that there were complaints about mailing them, and she said she would hav to quit it and would burn what she had, and Inspector Barclay said, "Better not burn it, but let all the explanations go together;" to make whatever explanations about the matter she saw fit before the commissioner. She consented to do that, and turned over to me a package of papers.

Q. Why did you write to her? A. In response to a public notice in the paper referred to me by the post-office official, E. S. Tooley, assistant postmaster at Louisville, Ky.

Cross-examined by Mr. Chamberlain.

Q. How long hav you been post-office inspector? A. About five years.

Q. How long hav you been agent for the Society for the Suppression of Vice? A. This is my tenth year.

Q. Where do you liv? A. My residence is Collinsville, Ill.; my office is in St. Louis, Mo.

Q. How long hav you resided in Collinsville, Ill.? A. Ten or eleven years.

Q. Where did you reside previous to that? A. I was at school a year before that, and just before that in St. Joseph, Mo., and just later in St. Louis. I was in St. Joseph traveling from there, and in the city probably nine months after leaving school.

Q. How old are you? A. I am 39.

Q. At what age did you leave school? A. I graduated in 1872.

Q. What business were you in previous to engaging as post-office inspector? A. I was agent for the Society for the Suppression of Vice, and several years post-office inspector.

Q. Hav you ever engaged in any other business or occupation? A. I was in the newspaper business prior to that. I was correspondent and editor for awhile of the St. Joseph Gazette.

Q. What salary do you receive as agent of the society? A. I receive a salary, a very good salary, and my expenses.

Q. Do you decline to state what the salary is? A. I do, unless the court desires to know what it is.

Q. How do you receive your expenses? A. From the society.

Q. Do you also receive mileage from the United States Government as a post-office inspector? A. I receive mileage as a witness. I do not receive it; I collect it, and it is turned in to the treasury of the society; I hav no profit in it whatever, or benefit from it.

Q. Do you receive any emolument other than from your society? A. Not the slightest.

Q. Are you in the habit of using fictitious names in the communications that you send out? A. I frequently use addresses in the prosecution and investigation of cases. Having been in the service as long as I hav, I may be somewhat known, and for that reason I do not use my own name in the investigation of post-office cases, but I never use it except in connection with a post-office box, where I make provision to receive my correspondence.

Q. Did you write that letter? [Shown witness.] A. I did, sir.

Q. Is that the letter of which you hav spoken? A. This is the letter of which I spoke. I wrote what is on this side. [The letter read in evidence and marked "A."]

Q. Hav you been in the habit of using the name William before? A. I do not know that I hav; possibly I may hav.

Q. Do you keep a record of proceedings in courts in your cases? A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. Do you furnish them to attorneys for the prosecution of cases? A. Sometimes.

Q. Is it not usual for you to do so? A. When requested to do so, I do.

Q. You may hav used a name otherwise than in connection with that box? A. Certainly.

Q. I call your attention to a case in the "Nineteenth Federal Reporter," where the name R. M. William is mentioned. A. I think it very probable I used that name, as it is my first name, and I may hav used it a number of times.

Q. Do you ever use the name of Nettie G. Harlan? A. Yes, sir, I think I hav.

Q. You hav very good cause to remember that name? A. Nothing special. I do not remember in what case I used it now.

Q. Hav you forgotten the case of the United States against Whittier? A. No, sir; I hav not forgotten the case.

Q. Do you not remember that in that case the court administered to you a rebuke for the use of such names? A. I do not. If you mean by a rebuke that the court decided that the answer in that case was not in violation of the statute, I remember that.

Q. Can you remember what the turning-point in that decision was? A. As I understand it, because the defendant did not bring himself within the meaning of the statute in responding to that letter.

Q. Did you not write a decoy letter in that case? A. I wrote a test letter in that case. You may call it a decoy if you like; I make a distinction. A decoy, I understand, is to offer an inducement to some one to do something which he is not in the habit of doing or intending to do. A test is to furnish an opportunity, or to ascertain what a party is sending by mail, as in this case.

Q. Do you remember that in that case the letter was not mailed as post-marked, but was mailed in St. Louis, Mo.? A. I remember that there was an agreed statement of facts presented to the court. I do not remember that being a fact in the case.

Q. Do you mean to say that the agreed statement was not true? A. I mean to say it may be very incomplete.

Q. Is not that substantially true as stated? A. Substantially. It was not an exact statement of the facts.

Q. In what respect does it fail to be exact? A. It omitted to state that the test letter did not go from Butler, Ga., to St. Louis, but was furnished by the post-office inspectors at St. Louis, and passed into the mail at St. Louis, instead of coming direct from Georgia. That would be the fact in the case; in other words, the inspection office is supplied with envelopes which bear the post-mark at times without the date, and the date is supplied by the post-office inspector.

Q. That is the usual practice is it? A. Not very usual. No, sir; it was done in that case.

Q. As an inspector of the department, is it your duty to know the law? A. As far as I may be able. That was done prior to my being post-office inspector.

Q. Do you remember the court animadverting upon a letter written to a person that had no existence? A. I remember something of that kind. I hav been instructed by other courts that it was my duty to do so.

Q. This letter you found in your drawer; how did you dispose of it? A. I took it to my office and opened it. I kept it in my possession for the time being and reported the matter to the chief inspector at Washington.

Q. Did you show it to the chief inspector at Washington? A. Yes, sir; after he called me East to see about the matter.

Q. Do you not know that the taking of such a letter from the office for the purpose of showing it to the chief inspector at Washington, or any other person, is a violation of the law? A. I do not regard it as a violation of the law; all my legal teaching has been in direct opposition to that.

Q. Did you ever read this law? A. I hav.

Q. How many times? A. A thousand times, possibly.

Q. You never discovered that such a course of conduct is in violation of the law? A. No, sir; and I do not think any other man can. The law says, for the purpose of distribution or aiding in the distribution.

Q. (by Mr. Ronald). Who was Miss Nettie G. Harlan? A. I did not say there was such a person.

Q. You signed her name? A. I do not know that is a name signed.

Q. Where was Miss Nettie Harlan living at that time? A. I do not understand that there was such a person.

Q. Where were you when you wrote that letter? A. In St. Louis.

Q. Is that in accordance with the purpose of the Society for the Suppression of Vice? A. The principle of the Society is for me to investigate the case the best I know how.

Q. Hav you been termed a detectiv? A. Sometimes the lawyers for the defense jump on me for a detectiv. I hav to do some detectiv work once in a while.

Q. Why did you address her as Mr. William? A. I asked her to send it to me as R. M. William, Drawer D 6.

Q. When you wrote to Mrs. Slenker as you did, you thought it was for the good of the great cause, were you writing the truth or a falsehood? A. Writing the truth.

Q. What great cause? A. The great cause of public morals—the suppression of vice.

Q. Was it not your purpose in writing this letter about the great cause to win the confidence of this woman and get her to send you under an assumed name, to the end that you might thereafter go and report her to the grand jury? A. I will hav to make an explanation. Yes, sir; with this exception—there had been a number of stories marked, "Return to Elmina," passed through my hands as post-office inspector in the West, and I was at a loss to know where they came from until receiving this paper spoken of, with this public notice in reference to it, and I wrote that letter for the purpose of ascertaining if this was the fountainhead of this stuff, not expecting to appear as a witness in this case, as it was out of my territory.

Q. Then you were honest, and conscientious, and actuated by a laudable desire to accomplish good? A. Most decidedly.

Q. Then why did you not sign Mr. McAfee's name to the letter? A. Because she might hav heard of my name.

Q. Why did you not write to Mrs. Slenker and admonish her of her course, that she might desist? A. I would hav been afraid that the postmaster-general would revoke my commission.

Q. Then for a mercenary object you played the part? A. No, sir; not by any means.

Q. What salary do you get? A. I get $2,400 a year and my actual necessary expenses.

Q. Is that dependent upon the number of convictions you secure? A. Not at all.

Q. What do you get as government post-office inspector? A. Nothing whatever; the society furnishes the post-office department with my services.

Q. What position does Mr. Comstock hold in relation to this society? A. Mr. Comstock has no connection with our society whatever.

Q. Hav you corresponded with Mr. Comstock? A. I hav.

Q. How much? A. In the investigation of this matter, I found a letter from Mr. Comstock, in which there had been an application to him to investigate it a year and a half before, and he asked to be excused as he was so busy.

Plaintiff rested.

Dr. Martin, called on behalf of defendant, testified that he had lived in Snowville eleven years; that he was practising medicin; that he had known Mrs. Slenker ever since living there; that she had always been looked upon as a very virtuous woman of high standing, a good moral woman and a good citizen; that until her arrest he had heard nothing said against her reputation as a lady.

On cross-examination the witness stated that he had known nothing about these publications.

Mr. Smith testified that he had lived in Snowville twenty-two years and owned property there, that he was a general merchant; that he had known Mrs. Slenker for twelve or fifteen years; that he never knew anything against her character as a lady; that he always considered her a very kind, hospitable woman, chaste and virtuous; that she visited in the community with the other families.

On cross-examination he stated that he had never heard of these publications before.

Rev. D. Bullard testified that he had lived in Snowville ever since it was a village forty years ago; that he was a minister of the gospel; that he had known Mrs. Slenker ever since she came to the place some fifteen years ago; that her standing and reputation was that of a virtuous, chaste, good, and kind woman up to the time of the indictment; that he thought that her husband had as little cause to distrust the fidelity of his wife as any man in the place; that he had known her to be benevolent and truthful.

On cross-examination the witness stated that he had known nothing about the publications until the indictment. When she first came to the neighborhood there was a rumor that she was a freelover, and he written to her upon the subject, and she positivly denied its being so.

Mr. Winston testified that he had lived in Snowville twenty-eight years, and had known Mrs. Slenker since she first came there; that he had never heard anything in the world alleged against her as a lady until the time of this indictment; that everybody was sociable with her; she was always recognized, and moved in the best circles in the place.

On cross-examination the witness stated that he had never heard of these publications until the arrest.

Mr. Jordan, the marshal, testified:

When we went in there Mr. McAfee told her that he was a post-office inspector, and was there to investigate this case. It was discussed with Mrs. Slenker freely; and she got out these papers. I did not ask her for them. She handed me several and some to Mr. Barclay and some to Mr. McAfee. She suggested burning some of the papers, and Mr. Barclay suggested that it might be said on the trial that she was trying to conceal something. I suppose she had half a bushel of them there. She had them in a cupboard, and behind the curtain, and got them down herself and handed them to us, and after talking an hour or so Mr. McAfee told me he was through. I told her I had a warrant for her arrest, and I would hav to take her with me, and in order to reach the train I told her I should hav to go in half an hour.

Cross-examination by Mr. Ronald.

She handed me the papers of her own will and accord; I took and read a great many of them and a great many of them I did not read.

Q. After she gave up the papers you told her you had a warrant for her arrest. A. Yes, sir. I remember Mr. McAfee asked her if she recognized that paper and envelope and she said she did; she could not tell what papers were in them, but she recognized them by her own private mark upon them.

Q. After the papers had been presented to you by Mrs. Slenker, you told her you had a warrant for her arrest? A. I did, sir.

No cross-examination. Adjourned until Wednesday.

NOVEMBER 2D.

Mr. Chamberlain read in evidence the letter from Mr. McAfee, under the name of R. M. William, to Mrs. Slenker. Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker, defendant, was called to the stand. The district attorney proposed to propound the preliminary questions that had been asked of Mr. Barclay with regard to her religious belief.

THE COURT: It is unnecessary to propound those questions.

THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY: Very well.

Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker affirmed and examined by Mr. Chamberlain:

Q. Hav you ever consulted with anyone or been advised as to the legality of send ng such letters as these through the mail? (Objected to as incompetent.)

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: It goes directly to the intent; that there was no intent to violate the law.

THE COURT: The intention is presumed, in a prosecution, from the criminal act itself.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: If a law has been violated, intention is presumed; it is prima facie evidence, and a presumption which it is our privilege to rebut. (Objection overruled.)

A. Yes, sir; I hav asked several persons. I was never sure whether it was safe or not to send them. It was right and proper; and they told me they supposed one part was material to the other, if there was any objection to one part going by itself. It would be like the plates in a work on obstetrics, which would not be understood if sent alone, but if sent with the context that explains it.

Q. Was anything said as to the likelihood of a successful prosecution? A. It has been talked over. I hav been told that I might be prosecuted.

Q. Had you been advised that your conduct was illegal? A. I never hav been assured that it was illegal by anyone that was competent, I suppose, to judge, before the arrest. I supposed it was legal, or I would not hav done it.

Q. Did you suppose that one of these papers would explain another, and show its legality? A. Certainly.

Q. Please state in your own language, what occurred at the time that Barclay, McAfee, and Jordan came to your house to make the arrest. A. I was sitting and writing; I never saw them until they were at the door. As they entered the door, the thought struck me what they might hav come for; not to arrest me, but to see what I had been doing. I had no idea of being arrested that day. I supposed they had come to inquire into the matter. I welcomed them to the room, and treated them as I would any other visitors. They soon commenced talking; and I was told that one of them was a post-office inspector. They commenced by asking me why I had been circulating these documents, and writing on the subject on which I had been writing. I endeavored to tell them, as nearly as I could, the doctrins I was endeavoring to disseminate. I told them I did not suppose I had ever mailed anything but what could be lawfully mailed. We talked a long time. I read to them some articles I had written.

Q. Did you read to them any of your articles on "Sexual Intemperance?" A. I do not know exactly whether I did or not. I explained my ideas on that subject, and showed them plainly that my work was intended as a real reform; that although I had circulated articles that looked objectionable to those not accustomed to them, the ideas themselvs were pure and clean; that words in themselvs are always clean; and I explained my ideas as far as I could. They wanted to see some more of the papers, and asked me for them. I asked if I might not burn them up before their eyes, as they said I ought not to hav them in my possession. They told me No; it would be better, if I came to trial, that they should hav the documents. They assured me it would be better for my case to give them the papers, it I was brought to trial.

Q. Was that the first thing that was said of a trial? A. As nearly as I recollect. Then I commenced gathering up the papers, one after another, indiscriminately. They read some of them, and I read some of them. I gave most of them, I think, to Mr. McAfee. I do not recollect particularly. My position on the subject of sexual intemperance has been growing ever since I was a child, almost. I was brought up a Quaker. My father was a Quaker preacher, and my mother a school-teacher; both of them were teachers, and I hav tried to be a teacher all my life. I taught school fourteen years, and after I quit teaching school, I commenced to write for the newspapers. I could not talk plainly. I suppose it is difficult for you to understand what I say, but I will speak as plainly as I can. If I could hav talked plainly, I should hav been a public teacher, as my father was. He preached. I could not preach; for when I had all my teeth I could not talk as plainly as now. Therefore I wrote; I used my pen instead of my voice. Whenever I learned anything, I tried to tell some one else; and I always tried to tell them to do what was right every way—morally, physically, and intellectually. I spoke of intemperance during the great Washingtonian movement, when I was a girl. Afterward I got to thinking of other intemperance. I found there was an intemperance worse than alcoholic intemperance, and that was sexual intemperance. No one has a right to bring a child into the world, unless he can be brought in strong, mentally and physically. This is what I am trying to teach all the while.

I commenced about eight years ago to write for a paper in New York on this great subject. I wrote for it perhaps twenty or more articles. Finally the people got so stirred up and afraid of it that they forced and compelled the editor to stop my writing. I continued to write for four or five other papers. In the mean time a book came out entitled, "Diana."

Q. Is this a reproduction of one of those articles? A. Yes, sir. I would like to hav you read it to the jury.

THE DISTRICT-ATTORNEY: I object to it as irrelevant.

THE COURT: You introduced the subject yourself yesterday, in asking your witness whether she gave any reasons for sending out this matter.

Objection withdrawn, and the paper handed to the jury.

As I was saying, a book came out entitled, "Diana," and a copy was sent to me. I read it rather with indifference at first. It was above me, and I could not comprehend it. The man that wrote the book—I did not know then that it was a man—was educated far more scientifically on the subject of sex than I was. The book was as high above me as I was above a person who had not studied the subject at all. I could not understand it. But I grew to understand it. I commenced a correspondence with the writer, and gradually came to understand that the principle of the book was precisely the same as the doctrin I had been teaching with regard to sexual intemperance, but went a little further, and explained why people had become sexually intemperate, and how they might be educated out of it. As I studied the book, I found some points I could not understand, but I finally concluded to send it out; and he sent me a large package, and told me to sell all I could and giv away the rest. I gave away almost the entire first edition, and to every person gave permission to write me and ask me any question they chose; and a great many wrote me, arguing the why and wherefore of the book, and asked how the author got up his ideas, and if he was sure they were correct. I could not answer all the questions, and finally a batch of the little leaflets and documents were sent to me, showing upon what the theory was founded. He had gathered these together, and from them evolved the theory of "Diana," non-intercourse save for reproduction, and living in accordance with natural laws. It taught that a man should treat his wife as an equal, respect and love her, but let his attraction turn into other lines than sexual intemperance. It would save himself, and save her. The world would be a great deal purer and better. There would be no houses of prostitution; there would be no prostitutes. There would never be an unwelcome child; every child would be wanted, and purposely created. This was the doctrin of the book, and it was my own doctrin. Of course, in the study of truth it was necessary to hear all sides. He was still collecting papers and revising them, to be made use of if possible. He wanted me to collect what I could, as a friend, of experiences; and I did, from everybody I could, asking them to write out an account of their own lives, and of other lives which they knew about. This set me to studying the subject of hybrids; and of course, the study branching out into an entirely different line, and into something I had never heard about, I studied it out. Correspondents finally commenced to send me accounts which were called the dog letters.

Q. Hav you been interested in this question of hybrids, and the crossing of various species? A. I studied botany in childhood, when I went to school, and learned about the sexual union of flowers, which is the same thing precisely. The male and the female unite the same in a flower as in a human being. I studied floriculture and horticulture, and there we always bring in the subject of hybrids, and try to improve the flower. We know that if we want to make a superior flower or fruit, we must not allow it to hav too many flowers on it, or to bear too much fruit. If a man wants to do well he wants to save himself. This question of hybrids applies as well to plants as to people. I hav studied hybrids always, more or less, but lately I have been intesested in it in relation to the human family. I hav written to several papers on the subject and hav consulted doctors on the subject of hybrids, upon the union of different races; the Chinese and whites; the blacks and the whites. I hav studied it as well as I knew how. I hav studied it to know whether the human race could propagate with any other race; and I do not think it can, except that the lowest anthropoid ape might possibly unite with savage races. That is the only union that could ever take place. That I hav studied a great deal.

Q. Hav you found others to sympathize with you on this question? A. Since I hav been arrested I hav had nearly two thousand letters, from scientists, doctors, women, and men, in every class of society, lawyers—and every letter but one or two has been in commendation of the work in which I was engaged. A few hav condemned my methods; they did not understand the methods; they thought they were obscene. These were scientific, honest expressions, by honest men and women, just as honest as you or I.

Q. Will you explain something of the nature of the correspondence you hav been engaged in previous to your arrest, which was spoken of by Mr. McAfee? A. I received a great many letters, and I answered those letters honestly and fairly. There was a circle of us. Most of us were doctors, lady physicians, gentlemen physicians; there were writers for various papers. Nearly all were editors or writers, men and women of some no e. We commenced the correspondence. I found I could not answer each one individually. I always did my own housework, and never neglected home for anything else. So in writing I told them to pass the letters from one to another, and keep on passing them. I did indorse on one letter "copy whoever pleases." That was for the private ring; no outsider was to see them. These were educated; but an outsider might take it up and laugh at it, as they laugh at it here in court. It was just as pure as anything could be; but they did not understand it. They had not been educated; so I said the ring might copy. I stamped my name on the outside, "Please order them of Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Pulaski County, Virginia;" and the reason I did that was this: My handwriting is very hard to read, and I stamped it for the sake of giving my name and address plain, so that they should not make a mistake and address letters wrongly. In sending out books and papers I circulate advertisments and other papers; and they sometimes sent me a pile of their advertisments, so I would stamp on them "Please order them of Elmina D. Slenker," etc. I had but the one stamp and I used it on all letters. It seemed to imply that they were to order those documents of me, but it was only intended to stamp my name and address. I wanted no one to order those who did not understand the subject they were talking of.

Q. Prior to your examination before the commissioner, did the commissioner caution you? A. Not at all. I was perfectly free, as I am here, to say what I pleased.

Q. Did he caution you that what you said might be used against you on your trial? A. Not that I remember.

Q. You may make any further statement that you see fit. A. If I hav omitted explaining anything, or if any of the jury hav any questions to ask, I should like to hav them ask them.

By Mr. Heerman:

Q. What is your age? A. Near sixty.

Q. What is and has been your occupation? A. The first years of my life was spent in a small country farm-house. I went to a district school, and got a tolerably decent school education.

Q. How long hav you been in literary work? A. More or less, ever since the war mainly; I did a little literary work before the war.

Q. Hav you ever written for publication, or ever had published, a line or word that was obscene? A. No, sir. I defy anyone to find an obscene or immoral expression in anything I hav had published.

Q. Did you ever sell these leaflets? A. No, sir. People would send me money and postage-stamps, but I always sent the full value for everything they sent. I demanded that they should pay the postage, for Mr. Slenker was not willing that I should furnish the time and postage.

Q. You never sold these for a profit? A. There was no profit in it. It has been a loss to me all my life. All my work was a financial loss.

Q. Did you write these leaflets yourself? A. No, sir.

Q. To how many people do you suppose you sent leaflets? A. I hav no idea. I sent them to everyone who asked for them, that I thought would understand the principle, and make a good use of them. I never forced them on anybody. They may hav asked indirectly for such information which I could not write out in full, and then I sometimes sent leaflets, such as I supposed would be least obnoxious, to explain what I had not time to write. I never used them indiscriminately.

Q. I understand that you sold books, and that you used this stamp for the purpose of asking your correspondents, if they needed books or papers, to order them from you? A. Certainly.

Q. Not for the leaflets? A. No; it had no reference to the leaflets at all. I wish to say one word more—that I considered all these leaflets as parts of private letters. They were all copies of letters, or letters themselvs, everyone of them; they were written as letters, and sent as letters. If I write a letter, and take a piece of paper and paste it in, it forms part of the letter. I had not time to paste these in, and so I put them in separately. They are all parts of private letters, everyone of them.

Q. Those leaflets hav figures or marks on them at different paragraphs; will you explain to the jury what they mean? A. Our friend will hav to explain that; I did not understand that. It was beyond me; I never tried to understand that.

Q. You understand those leaflets as the basis of the book "Diana?" A. They had been used for that purpose, and were handed over because they were of no further use to him.

By Mr. Chamberlain:

Q. How long hav you known me personally? A. The first time I hav known you personally is since coming here.

Q. How long hav you known me as a correspondent? A. That I could not tell; I hav so many correspondents. May be two or three years; I hav no idea at all.

Q. Hav we not been correspondents ever since the time of Bennett's arrest eight years ago? A. Yes, I suppose so.

Q. Did you ever send to me any of this matter upon sexual subjects? A. No. Our correspondence did not run in that line; I only sent it to those interested in that subject. You never broached the subject, and of course I did not.

Cross-examined by the district attorney.

Q. You state that you were advised by attorneys and others that you had a right to mail this matter? A. I do not say they told me I had a full right, but they supposed to the best of their judgment it was mailable under the statute.

Q. Is that a letter of yours? Look at the handwriting. (Letter shown to witness.)

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I object, and I now instruct this witness that she is not obliged to answer any questions which may by any possibility tend to criminate her, or which may furnish a link in a process by which she may be criminated. If she admits the handwriting upon this letter, it will giv the prosecution an opportunity to introduce a vast number of other letters. I do not know what they hav in their possession, but they may perhaps appear as damaging to her as the statement of Mr. Barclay, which I think has been entirely explained away. If these are introduced, it will necessitate more explanation, and prolong the case. These letters may be proved in any other way than by her admission. I do not make any point as to the contents of the letter. Your honor understands the ruling of the United States Court upon the subject of the comparison of handwritings.

MR. HUTTON: When the witness went on the stand, she went there voluntarily, and she went there for every purpose.

THE COURT: That raises the point whether you can ask her a question on cross-examination which will criminate her. It is the duty of the court to inform the witness that she need not answer any questions criminating herself.

MR. HUTTON: If she had remained off the stand, we could not even hav referred to the fact that she did not go upon the stand; but if she goes upon the stand it is for every purpose.

THE COURT: If the rule did not apply in this case, there never would be any occasion for applying the rule. It would exclude a witness from the stand entirely; no matter what he might hav to say in exculpation, you could violate the rule by compelling him to state something else.

The court called upon Mr. Barclay to identify the handwriting.

MR. BARCLAY: That is her handwriting. It is a letter addressed to myself.

Mr. Jordan identified his writing upon the letter.

The letter was read in evidence.

Q. You hav spoken of a correspondence with a man by the name of Heywood. Is he the editor of the Word? A. Yes, sir.

Q. You spoke of his having inserted some communication of yours in his paper. Is this the communication? A. Yes, that is the article; he published it without any knowledge of mine. (The article from the Word read in evidence.)

Henry M. Parkhurst, affirmed, and examined by Mr. Chamberlain.

Q. What is your business? A. I am a law stenographer.

Q. What do you know of the papers referred to in this indictment? A. To giv the liberal construction to the term "knowledge" would require an answer too long to spread upon the record, but I know that I wrote as author or editor probably all this type-written matter. I recognize a portion of the written matter; but there are two or three written papers I hav never seen before. (Testimony objected to as irrelevant. Objection sustained.)

Mr. Chamberlain asked that the testimony should be received as from an expert. The court excluded expert testimony.

Q. Are these papers intelligible as read to the jury? A. I do not believe the jury could possibly understand them as they were read, although the witnesses appeared to intend to read them fairly. They would not only be unintelligible, but would convey a false impression, as read.

Q. Did Mrs. Slenker know the character of this matter? Objection offered and sustained. (No cross-examination.)

Albert Chavannes was called to testify with regard to the correspondence, but his testimony was excluded. Testimony closed.

F. B. Hutton, Esq., addressed the jury on behalf of the prosecution.

Charles A. Heerman, Esq., addressed the jury on behalf of defendant.

Edward W. Chamberlain, Esq., followed on behalf of the defendant.

Charles A. Ronald, Esq., closed the argument for the defendant.

THE JUDGE'S CHARGE.

GENTLEMEN OF THE JURY: The court givs you these instructions, and it will be your duty to be guided by the instructions the court gives you.

The court instructs you that the questions you are to determin are:

1. Are the writings, papers, printings, and publications alleged in the indictment to hav been knowingly deposited in the mail, for mailing and delivery, by the defendant, of an obscene, lewd, or lascivious character.

2. Did the defendant deposit or cause to be deposited in the mail, for mailing and delivery, such obscene, lewd, and lascivious writings, papers, printings, and publications.

The test of obscenity within the meaning of the statute under which this prosecution is had, is whether the tendency of the matter sent through the mail is to deprave or corrupt the morals of those whose minds are open to such influences and into whose hands writings, papers, prints, and publications of this kind may fall; and "lewd" means having a tendency to excite lustful thoughts.

You are further instructed that if you believe from the evidence that the said writings, papers, and publications were sent through the mail by the defendant as charged in the indictment, and were of an obscene, lewd, or lascivious character, then the object or purpose for which they were sent is not a matter for your consideration. No matter what the motiv or purp se for which they were sent, whether in the real or supposed interest of science, philosophy, or morality, if they are of an obscene character, you should find the defendant guilty.

The defendant is presumed to know the character of the matter proved by the government to hav been mailed by her to Barclay and McAfee, the government's witnesses.

You are instructed that the detection of crime by means of test or decoy letters is allowable under the law; that the witnesses Barclay and McAfee were justified in resorting to this means to discover the violations of the postal laws, and their testimony is not to be discredited because they hav resorted to this frequent, and frequently indispensable, mode of detecting crime. Their testimony is entitled to the same weight as that of other witnesses, subjected, of course, to the same tests as to its truthfulness.

If on the whole of the evidence you believe that the writings, papers, and publications charged in the indictment to hav been deposited in the mail, for mailing and delivery, by the defendant, were so deposited by her and were of an obscene, lewd, or lascivious character, it will be your duty to find her guilty. If, however, on the consideration of the whole evidence in the case, you hav a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, you must find her not guilty.

The jury retired, and shortly afterward returned and rendered a verdict of guilty.

NOVEMBER 3D.

Mr. Ronald moved in arrest of judgment on the ground of the misjoinder of the two counts in the indictment.

Mr. Chamberlain also moved in arrest of judgment upon the ground that the indictment alleges in the form of the statute that the defendant did unlawfully and knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited in the mail, etc., certain lewd and lascivious writings, etc., and that the indictment is fatally defectiv in containing no allegation that the defendant knew that the matter so deposited was obscene.

Mr. Chamberlain cited authorities, especially that of the Commonwealth vs. Boynton in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, and the case of Carll in the Supreme Court of the United States, reported in 15 Otto.

After a long debate and citations of authority, the court adjourned until Friday.

NOVEMBER 4TH.

The court granted the motion in arrest of judgment, delivering the opinion printed last week, and discharging Mrs. Slenker from custody.

Infidels Only Are on the Safe Side.

Our Christian friends are terribly exercised in our behalf because we hav no faith or hope of heaven, and they tell us that if our future is assured, they are doubly secure. They are on the safe side. But, like nearly all the assertions of Christians in regard to their religion, this is not true. They labor under a grave error, a fatal mistake; in the language of Jesus, they "do err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God" (Matt. xxii, 29). For if Christ's own declarations are reliable, if his most solemn and positiv assurances can be depended on, then it is the Infidels, and not the professors of Christianity, who are sure of heaven, who are on the safe side. Not Christian profession of faith, but Liberals' good lives are the passport to heaven. Read his own words (Matt. xxv, 31–41):

When the son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats: and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the king say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: for I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungered, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? Or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? And the king shall answer and say unto them, Verily, I say unto you, inasmuch as ye hav done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye hav done it unto me. Come, ye blessed of my father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.

Christ here declares that the test of a right to dwell forever in heaven is not faith, not, Did you believe the Bible? did you keep the Sabbath or Sunday? did you believe in the trinity? were you sprinkled poured, or immersed? did you believe in total depravity and the immaculate conception? in apostolic succession and the literal six days' theory of creation? did you believe in purgatory and eternal burning in hell-fire of all, however good, true, noble, useful lives they led, who disbelieve any of these things?

No; strange, but true, Christ says not one word of "What did you believe?" but

"What did you do?"

Did you do justice, love mercy, make all around you happy?

Yes!

Then come, ye blessed of my father.

But, alas! for the Christian professors, how sad, how terrible their doom. Hear Christ's own words:

Not everyone that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my father which is in heaven. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, hav we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity (Matt. vii, 21, 22, 23).

Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels (Matt. xxv, 41).

O Christian friends, be warned in time! Make haste to flee the wrath—the dreadful doom your savior has decreed against you. Oh, come! Come, while yet you hav time! Come on the right side! Come on the Infidel rock of truth—the only safe side! Unite with us in the endeavor to inspire mankind with love of right, love of truth, love to each other, and with a spirit of fidelity to duty. Learn what is right, here and now, and do it! Giv liberally of your means to diffuse the light of science and positiv knowledge, and thus help dispel the dark mists of error, ignorance, and superstition. Soothe the sorrows of the afflicted, help the needy, and afford means of employment for the body and cultivation of the mind.

Liv lives of love, instead of making loud professions of faith; practice justice and mercy in lieu of forms and ceremonies; and, above all, constantly endeavor to promote the happiness and the welfare of those around you, instead of loudly praying to a God to do it for you. Do this, and in this world or any other you will be on the right, THE ONLY SAFE SIDE.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Retribution.

MAY 4, 1886.

I.

An empty cart in a public square,
A throng of the discontented there;
Orators tell of a class oppressed,
Of a wrong and a grievance to be redressed.

II.

A charge and a hundred-throated curse:
"In the name of the law, disperse, disperse!"
A dozen guiltless victims fall
'Neath brutal club and pistol-ball.

III.

A flash, a boom! and a cloud of smoke;
The aggressors stagger before the stroke;
Dead and dying, are borne away.—
Who'll hang for the murder done this day?

NOVEMBER 11, 1887.

I.

Tried and convicted. The rabble cry,
"A life for a life! Lo, crucify!"
The true assassin eludes their fangs,
But what is the odds so some one hangs?

II.

Four men stand under the gallows high;
All are Anarchists, let them die.
Four corpses swing in the morning breeze:
Engel and Parsons, Fischer and Spies.

III.

"A life for a life" the rabble cried;
'Tis done, and the rabble are satisfied,
Blood for blood! But who can say
Who'll hang for the murder done this day?

Unity, Harmony, Action.

Wishing to tender thanks to many noble friends who hav assured me of their earnest coöperation—the mail daily bringing words of hearty commendation—I take this opportunity to acknowledge their kind encouragement. Old disagreements appear forgotten, the hatchet buried, the pipe of peace passed round, our ranks closing up rapidly with sincere workers, willing to march forward, even to the unequal combat with established error, that our standard of reason, truth, and justice may find a firmer resting-place. This is as it should be. Everywhere throughout the length and breadth of the land Liberals should arouse to the importance of our demands, and organize for united action. We want the help of all. None should stand aloof. The Nine Demands are the basis of work; but their supporters may hav a number of other articles in their creed. They may believe in a variety of methods; all the American Secular Union asks is that they subscribe to these plain, simple Jeffersonian demands, forming the very sustructure upon which our republic is founded, the true American idea.

Every man and woman who believes in intellectual liberty should aid us; all who believe in a government of the people, as against that of the gods; everyone who aspires to establish human happiness, should unite with us in overthrowing the reign of bigotry and superstition in the state.

With our enemies (the National Reform Association) persistently and insidiously working, thoroughly organized, ever unscrupulous in methods, it behooves us to lay aside all trivial disagreements, and unflinchingly formulate our demands and carry into execution the work we hav outlined. This can only be accomplished by a concerted, concentrated, homogeneous alliance.

We do not lack talent for this achievement, for the Liberal legions are ablaze with brilliancy and genius; poets and philosophers, orators and authors, statesmen and scientists, lending luster to our cause and stamping it preëminently the intellectual movement of the nineteenth century.

Shall a cause so noble of purpose, so richly endowed, so ably equipped, so gallantly led as this has been, be permitted to suffer defeat for need of a few dollars or through the disintegration of disunity? Rather, shall it not attain a power that thrills the body politic, molding the masses to a conception of the justice and arousing them to a speedy enforcement of our demands?

Our Liberal papers hav nobly responded to the work of the recent Congress. They are conducted by self-sacrificing men, of marked ability, who could hav grown rich in simulating hypocrisy, or powerful in forging intellectual chains. They stand as mentors of our movement. Their indorsement is a certain precursor of success.

Our Liberal lecturers—the pioneers of freedom—are proposing plans for the future, and I hav received assurances of their coöperation:

Let me congratulate you upon your election as secretary to the Union. The right man in the right place. I trust Secularism will make rapid progress during the coming year. I shall do all I can for the Union.

Yours always, CHAS. WATTS.

Prof. W. S. Bell, of this city, has personally given his assurance of hearty coöperation and good-will.

C. B. Reynolds writes:

We want every live worker to feel an interest in the parent society. . . . If in any way I can be of use to further the interests of the American Secular Union, command me. Let us all pull together for the greatest good to the greatest number.

In another letter:

Believe me ever ready and glad to do anything in my power to help you in your arduous and unthankful position, relying on your courage and devotion to carry you through.

Mr. Green, of the Freethinkers' Magazine, says:

The resolutions I like very much. They are right to the point. Just what I hav always claimed, that we should confine ourselvs to the Nine Demands. For the years I worked for the League, I said, "I don't care what hobby you hav on hand, only leave it outside the League movement." . . . You ask if I will aid in the work. I answer, Yes, if you will work for Secularization, pure and simple. If you honestly adopt that course, you will deserve the coöperation of everyone who believes that church and state should be forever separate in this country.

Let our lecturers never forget that the fundamental basis of all Liberal propaganda is separation of church and state. If they do not work for this end, their seed will be sown on barren ground. With this all scientific progressiv issues may be combined, but the real, necessary, honest, vital work is that which tends to secularize the government. In every community enthusiasm should be aroused and interest created. With every step gained the field broadens, intelligence is disseminated, and the demand for Liberal speakers increased, so that practically in aiding the American Secular Union each lecturer is more effectivly working for himself. Wherever he takes the trouble to organize a Secular Union, there he will ever hav a friendly fortress. If Liberals were better organized; if Freethinkers were united; if everyone who recognizes the justice of our Demands were enrolled under the Union, there would be plenty of profitable employment for every lecturer in the field. This, then, my friends, is what I wish you Liberal lectures would do. Plant our standard in the shape of a new Union in every place that you visit. At least, prevail on all to become members, if not of a local organization, at least by an annual membership in the national organization. Let those who propose to aid in furthering the Nine Demands stand up like men and be counted.

Your secretary is willing and eager to work. You must sustain him, for it will take the united, harmonious efforts of all to crown with success the labors we hav laid out for the year.

Assured of the Liberal lecturers' moral support and sympathy, shall we count on the generous financial aid of the great Liberal host?

However much we may hav disagreed in the past, let us determin that in the present one grand, inspiring purpose shall animate us to push forward to victory the cause of universal mental liberty.

E. A. STEVENS, Secretary A. S. U.

The Bible of Nature; or, The Principles of Secularism.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Secret of the East," etc.

IV.—Objective Maxims.

CHAPTER XVII.—RECREATION.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

The indoor occupations of civilized life imply the necessity of providing artificial substitutes for the opportunities of physical exercise, which men in a state of nature can find abundantly in the course of such healthful pursuits as hunting, fishing, and primitive agriculture. For similar reasons civilization ought to compensate the lost chance of outdoor sports which only the favorites of fortune can afford to combine with the exigencies of city life. To the children of nature life is a festival; outdoor recreations, exciting sports, offer themselves freely and frequently enough to dispense with artificial supplements; but the dreariness of workshop life makes those substitutes a moral as well as physical necessity. Under the influence of unalloyed drudgery the human soul withers like a plant in a sunless cave, and weariness of heart reacts on the body in a way analogous to the health-undermining effect of sorrow and repeated disappointment. To the unbiased judgment of our pagan forefathers the necessity of providing city dwellers with opportunities for public recreation appeared, indeed, as evident as the necessity of counteracting the rigors of the higher latitudes with contrivances for a supply of artificial warmth. The cities of ancient Greece had weekly and monthly festivals, besides the yearly reunions of competing athletes and artists, and once in four years the champions of the land met to contest the prize of national supremacy in the presence of assembled millions. Hostilities, even during the crisis of civil war, were suspended to insure free access to the plains of Corinth, where the Olympic Games were celebrated with a regularity that made their period the basis of chronological computation for a space of nearly eight hundred years. When Rome became the capital of the world, the yearly disbursements for the subvention of free public recreations equaled the tribute of a wealthy province. There were free race courses, gymnasia, music halls, and wrestling-ring; free public baths and magnificent amphitheaters for the exhibition of free dramatic performances, gladiatorial combats, and curiosities of art and natural history. Every proconsul of a foreign province was instructed to collect wild animals and specimens of rare birds and reptiles; every triumphator devoted a portion of his spoils to a celebration of free circenses—"circus games"—by no means limited to the mutual slaughter of prize fighters, but including horse races, concerts, trials of skill, and new arts. It would be a mistake to suppose that the liberality of such establishments offered a premium on idleness. The immense increase of the metropolitan population justified the constant extension of that liberality, but even after the erection of permanent amphitheaters the vigilance of public censors discouraged mendicancy; the complaints of wives, creditors, and landlords against habitual idlers were made the basis of penal proceedings, and from the total appropriations for the support of free municipal institutions, the overseers of the poor deducted considerable sums for purposes of public charity.

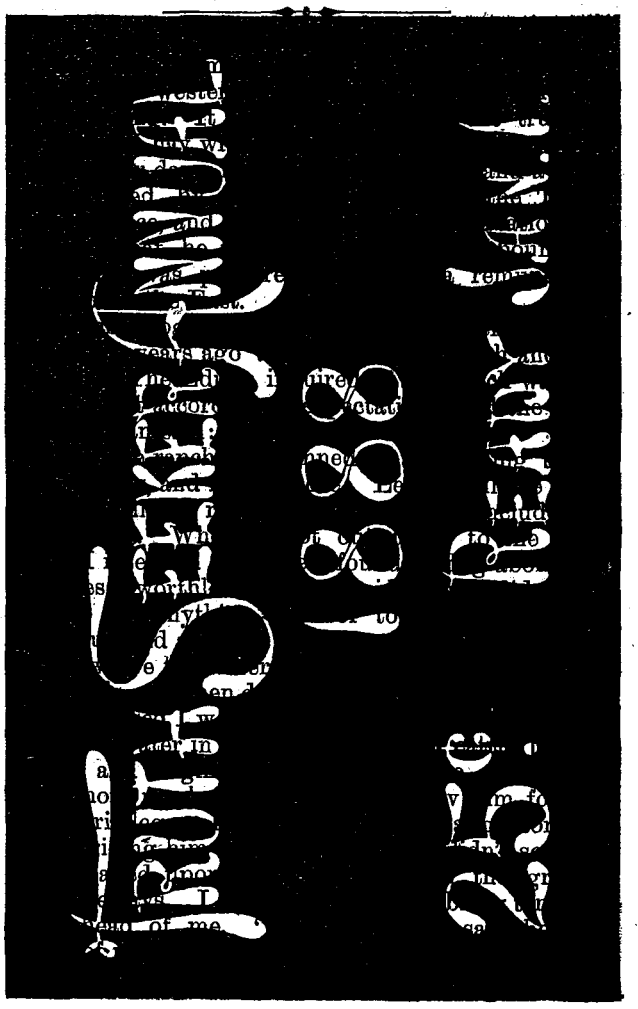
Nor did the citizens of the metropolis monopolize the privilege of free public amusements. At the time of the Antonines not less than fifty cities of Italy alone had amphitheaters of their own, and the smallest hamlet had at least a palaestra, where the local champions met every evening for a trial of strength and skill.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

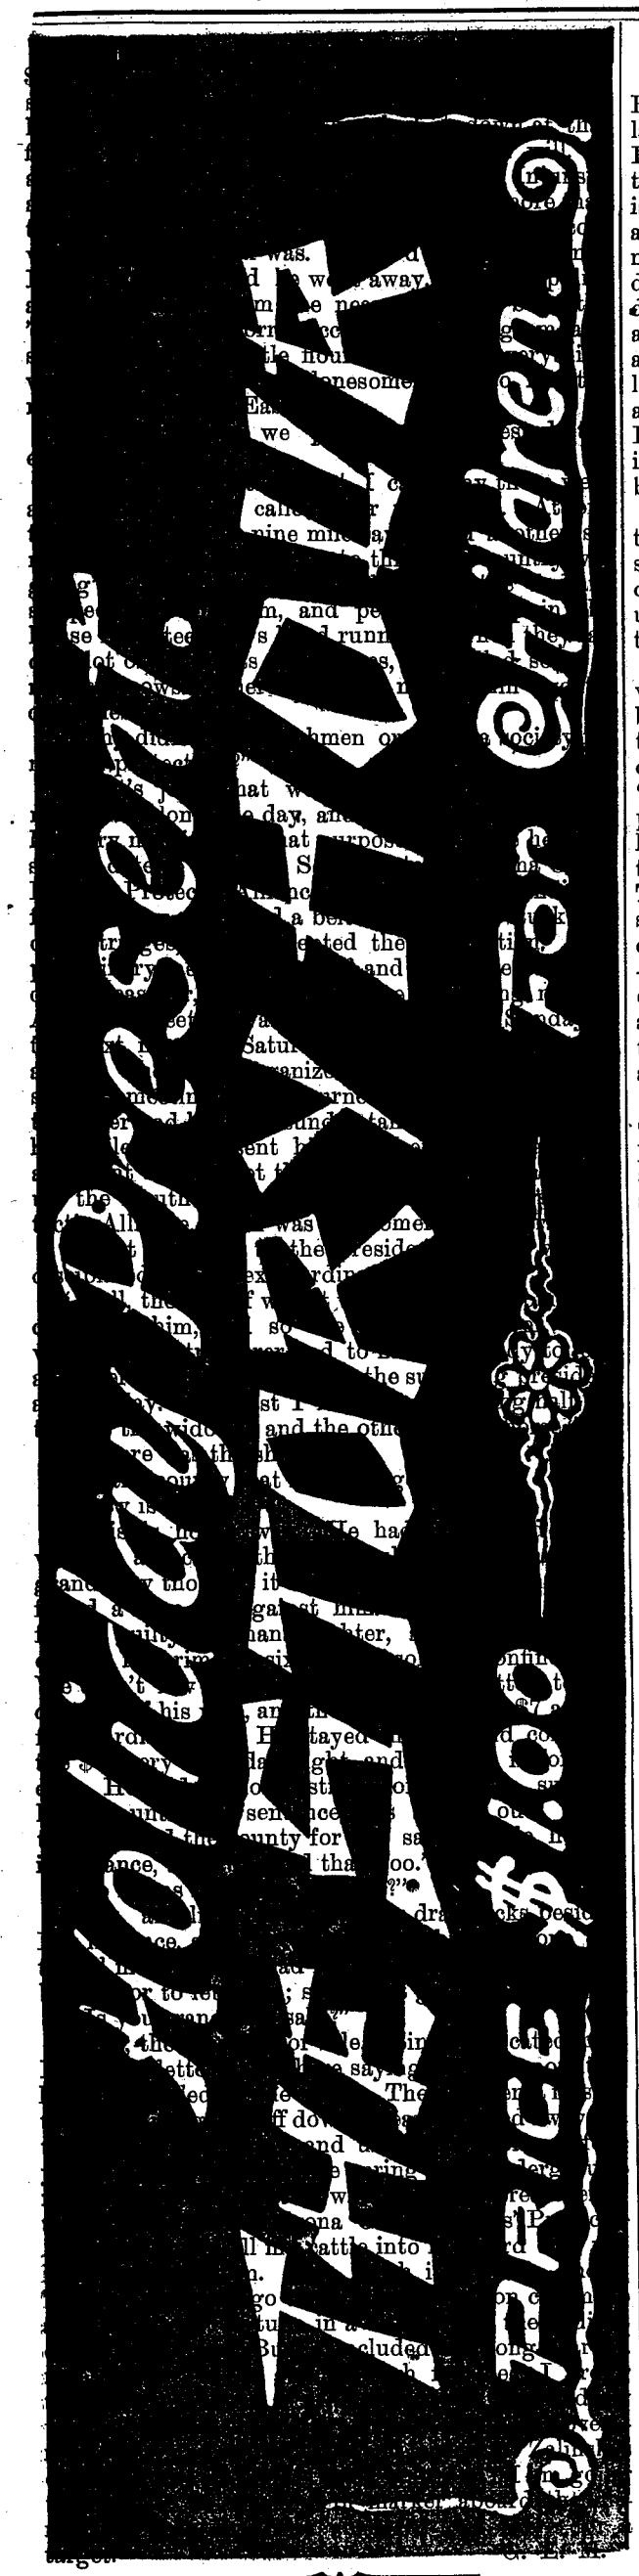
The alternation of day and night should reveal the truth that nature is averse to permanent gloom. Sunlight is a primary condition of all nobler life, and only ignorance or basest selfishness can doom a child of earth to the misery of toil uncheered by the sunrays of recreation. For even enlightened selfishness would recognize the advantages of the pagan plan. The passions of personal ambition burnt then as fiercely as now, but the Roman world-conquerors thought it wiser, as well as nobler, to share their spoils with the soldiers who had fought their battles, with the workmen who had reared their castles, with the neighbors who had witnessed their triumphs. The very slaves of Greece and Rome were indulged in periodic enjoyments of all the luxuries fortune had bestowed upon their masters; at the end of the working-day menials and artisans forgot their toil amidst the wonders of the amphitheater, and neither their work nor their work-givers were the worse for it. The promise of the evening cheered the labors of the day; minds frequently unbent by the relaxation of diverting pastimes were less apt to break under the strain of toil, less liable to yield to the temptation of despondency, envy, and despair.

During the last four weeks of his Egyptian campaign Napoleon relieved the tedium of camp-life by a series of athletic games and horse-races, and thus succeeded in sustaining the spirit of his troops under hardships which at first threatened to demoralize even his veterans. For similar purposes and with similar success, Marshal Saxe indulged his men in a variety of exciting sports, and Captain Kane found dramatic entertainments the best prophylactic against the influence of a monotonous diet combined with an average temperature of fifty degrees below zero. Captain Burton ascribes the longevity of the nomadic Arabs to their habit of passing their evenings as cheerfully as their stock of provisions and anecdotes will permit, and it is a suggestive circumstance that the joy-loving aristocracy of medieval France could boast a surprising number of octogenarians, and that the gay capitals of modern Europe, with all their vices, enjoy a better chance of longevity than the dull provincial towns.

C.—PERVERSION.



The suprstition which dooms its votaries to a worship of sorrow has for centuries treated pleasure and sin as synonymous terms. In the era of the Cæsars the licentious passions of a large metropolis gave that asceticism a specious pretext; but its true purpose was soon after revealed by the suppression of rustic pastimes, of athletic sports, and at last, even of the classic festival which for centuries had assembled the champions of the Mediterranean nations on the isthmus of Corinth. With a similar rancor of bigoted intolerance the Puritans suppressed the sports of "merry old England," and their fanatical protests against the most harmless amusements would be utterly incomprehensible if the secret of Christian asceticism had not been unriddled by the study of the Buddhistic parent-dogma. The doctrine which the apostle of Galilee thought it wisest to veil in parables and metaphors, the Indian messiah of anti-naturalism reveals in its ghastly nakedness as an attempt to wean the hearts of mankind from their earth-born loves and reconcile them to the alternative of annihilation—"Nirvana"—the only refuge from the delusions of a life outweighing a single joy by a hundred sorrows. Not life only, but the very instincts of life were to be suppressed, to prevent their revival in new forms of re-birth; and in pursuit of that plan the prophet of Nepaul does not hesitate to warn his disciples against sleeping twice under the same tree, to lessen the chance of undue fondness for any earthly object whatever. The indulgements of life-endearing desires, that creed denounced as the height of folly and recommended absolute abstinence from physical enjoyments as the shortest path to the goal of redemption. In its practical consequences, if not in its theoretical significances, the same principle asserts itself in the doctrine of the New Testament, and justified the dread of the life-loving pagans in realizing the stealthy growth of the Galilean church, and anticipating the ultimate consequences of that gospel of renunciation whose ideal of perfection was the other-worldliness of an earth-despising fanatic. More or less consciously, the suppression of earthly desires has always been pursued as the chief aim of Christian dogmatism; the "world" has ever been the antithesis of the Christian kingdom of God, the "flesh" the irreconcilable antagonist of the regenerate soul. Hence that rancorous fury against the "worldliness" of naturalism, against the pagan worship of joy, against the modern revivals of that worship. Hence the grief of those "whining saints who groaned in spirit at the sight of Jack in the Green;" hence the crusade against Easter-fires, May-poles, foot-races, country excursions, round-dances, and picnics; hence the anathemas against the athletic sports of ancient Greece and the entertainments of the modern theater.



D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

Wherever the fanatics of the Galilean church have trampled the flowers of earth, the wasted gardens have been covered with a rank thicket of weeds. Outlawed freedom has given way to the caprice of despots and the license of crime; outraged common sense has yielded to the vagaries of superstition; the suppression of healthful recreation has avenged itself in the riots of secret vice. The history of alcoholism proves that every revival of asceticism has been followed by an increase of intemperance, as inevitably as the obstruction of a natural river-bed would be followed by an inundation. When the convent-slaves of the Middle Ages had been deprived of every chance of devoting a leisure hour to more healthful recreations, neither the rigor of their vows nor the bigotry of their creed could prevent them from drowning their misery in wine. When the Puritans of the seventeenth century had turned Scotland into an ecclesiastic penitentiary, the burghers of the Sabbath-stricken towns sought refuge in the dreamland of intoxication. The experience of many centuries has, indeed, forced the priesthood of southern Europe to tolerate Sunday recreations as a minor evil. In Spain the bull-rings of the larger cities open every Sunday at 2 P.M. In Italy the patronage of Sunday excursions and Sunday theaters is limited only by the financial resources of their patrons. In France Sunday is by large odds the gayest day in the week. In the large cities of Islam the muftis connive at Sunday dances and Sunday horse-races; and as a consequence a much less pardonable abuse of holidays is far rarer in southern Europe than in the cities of the Sabbatarian north, the consumption of Sunday intoxicants being larger in Great Britain than in France, Austria, Spain, Portugal, and Italy taken together. Climatic causes may have their share in effecting that difference; another cause was revealed when the followers of Ibn Hanbal attempted to enforce the asceticism of their master upon the citizens of Bagdad. Ibn Hanbal, the Mohammedan Hudibras, used to travel from village to village, with a horde of bigots, breaking up dance-houses, upsetting the tables of the confectionery pedlers, pelting flower-girls, and thrashing musicians, and when the revolt of a provincial city resulted in the death of the "reformer," his fanatical followers assembled their fellow-converts from all parts of the country, and raided town after town, till they at last forced their way into the capital of the caliphate. The recklessness of their zeal overcame all resistance, but the completeness of their triumph led to a rather unexpected result. Every play-house of the metropolis was not only closed, but utterly demolished; musicians were jailed; dance-girls were left to choose between instant flight and crucifixion; showmen were banished from all public streets; but the dwellings of private citizens were less easy to control, and those private citizens before long evinced a passionate and ever-increasing fondness for intoxicating drinks. Elders of the mosque were seen wallowing in their gutters, howling blasphemies that would have appalled the heart of the toughest Giaour; dignitaries of the green turban staggered along under the weight of a wine-skin, or waltzed about in imitation of the exiled ballet performers. The Hanbalites convoked tri-weekly, and at last daily, prayer-meetings, but things went from bad to worse, till a counter-revolution finally restored the authority of the old city government, and the flight of the fanatics was attended with a prompt decrease both of spiritual and spirituous excesses.

E.—REFORM.

The predictions of our latter-day augurs would seem to indicate that the civilization of the Caucasian race is drifting toward Socialism; but a modern philosopher reminds us that "a reform, however great, is apt to come out in a different shape from that predicted by the reformers." The citizens of the coming republic will probably waive their claim to free government lunch-houses and similar "establishments for preventing the natural penalties of idleness," but they will most decidedly protest against government interference with the legitimate rewards of industry. Even now, few sane persons can realize the degree of ignorance that enabled the clergy of the Middle Ages to fatten on the proceeds of witchcraft trials and heretic hunts, and the time may be near when our children will find it difficult to conceive the degree of infatuation that could induce their forefathers to sacrifice their weekly leisure-day at the bidding of brainless and heartless bigots. Drudgery will perhaps continue the hard task-master of the working-week; but the Sundays of the future will be as free as the light of their sun.

Lexicography.

GOODY-GOODY.—Having never seen a definition of this word, I suggest the following: A goody-goody is a man who has no faults of his own to worry about, and so is able to devote his time and thoughts to the faults of others.

W. H. BENSON.

The Land Question.

The world is in commotion. The nations of Europe are armed for war, and men in all civilized lands are combining to secure greater advantages. Property is the cause of all the strife. The rulers covet territory, the people covet land and wealth. How is it that one has come to possess so much more than another, that a few hav property and multitudes hav none? The history of land ownership shows that development in all countries has proceeded in the direction of ownership by the tribe, village, family, and individual. Rome began with allotments of one and one-fourth acres to each family, and ended with large estates which corrupted the owners, enslaved and degraded the people, and caused the downfall of Rome. The natural right of all to participation in the soil, always recognized at first, has been lost by conquest and tyranny and competition.

In Switzerland, France, Germany, and other countries where communal systems or occupying ownership prevail, there is a marked superiority in the condition of the people compared with those who under otherwise simular conditions labor on land that they do not own or securely control.

Henry George, in 1871, published a pamphlet in which he advocated views about the land that had been proposed, among others, by Quesnay, physician to the king of France in the middle of the eighteenth century. In 1879 George brought out his book, "Progress and Poverty," expanding the ideas of his pamphlet; at the same time A. R. Wallace, in England, was writing his work on "Land Nationalization." These representativ men agree substantially. Their contention in the main is that private ownership in land is unjust and inexpedient, and the remedy is to substitute collectiv ownership by the state—the whole people—and secure virtual occupying ownership to those who desire to use land. The arguments on the injustice of private ownership are that productiv labor is the only title to property, and that land is limited in quantity.

The value of land is created by society. Private ownership is opposed to equal rights. It leads to poverty. If one hundred people were on an island, and one owned the land, ninety-nine would be his slaves in fact, if not in name. To secure this change George approves of confiscation. The land has been stolen, and may be taken back, and the robbers may be grateful that they do not hav to restore past profits. But he only proposes confiscation of rent, taxing lands to the full value of their annual rental. Wallace favors giving annuities to landowners and heirs through three lines. Others say let no unborn child inherit anything. Mineral lands might yield part profit to present owners and half as much to the next heir.

All agree that taxation should be placed wholly on the land, and that if the state secured rent no other taxes would be needed; the curse of custom-house and excise would be abolished. Landowners would not lose the results of their labor. The quit-rent would be paid to the state, but the tenant-right would be paid for to the owner, and he would be fairly compensated for all buildings and improvements. The Socialists approve of all these ideas and plans, but say they are only the beginning and would not cure evils alone. As rents fall wages fall. They say all property is robbery, and poverty will not be remedied save by the nationalization of all wealth—capital, land, and the means of production and distribution.

Catholic Schools in Wisconsin.

Your comment on the case of Catholic tyranny at Barton, Wis., contains some good suggestions so far as it calls attention to the dangers that threaten our public school system. But as a teacher, and one who is acquainted with the school system in several states, I fail to see any advantage in giving the management of the schools into the hands of town officers instead of a district board. I see no reason why a town board might not fail in their trust just as well as a district board; and the penalties for neglect of duty might be just as severe for school officers as for town officers,

You ask: "Shall the people of Barton right their wrongs under the present law?" To which I answer, Yes. The legislature of this state has made ample provision for such cases.

The School Laws of Wisconsin for 1885, Section 437, say:

> If any district shall not, at its annual meeting, or at a subsequent special meeting prior to the third Monday of November following, vote a tax sufficient to maintain a school in said district for the term of six months during the ensuing year, the district board shall then, on or before the Wednesday next following said third Monday of November, estimate and determin the sum necessary to be raised to maintain such school, and the district clerk shall forthwith certify to the town clerk the amount so fixed, who shall assess the same as other district taxes are assessed, and all school money received from the school fund income shall be applied exclusivly to the payment of teachers' wages.

In commenting upon this the state superintendent says: "Not to provide for at least this amount (six months) is a wrong to the children deprived, and an injury to the public good. The district board are, therefore, charged with the duty of making this provision, if it is not done by the district. The neglect to do this is punishable by fine, or removal from office, on complaint of such neglect."

The manner in which the board may be removed from office is to make a complaint to the county judge, as provided for in section 507.

Certainly, someone from Barton should know this, and apply the remedy. I think that if the case should be laid before the state superintendent there would be no difficulty in securing a secular school.

News and Notes.

Farmdale, or Kinsman, O., was settled over half a century ago by Connecticut Puritans, and it displays the somewhat elegant stupidity of this ancient orthodox community. It is a beautiful country, with noble farm buildings, broad, fruitful fields, and magnificent groves. It is well known that the Connecticut pilgrim has a good deal of unction in the making of money, especially when Nature smiles upon him; and he has succeeded admirably amid these fertil lands. Forty years ago they imported a couple of carpenters from the Nutmeg state in order to build a meeting-house in the exact Puritanic style. There was no deviation from the saintly pattern; and when I looked upon the cumbrous structure, with its white wall and green blinds and massiv steeple, I thought I was on the hills of New England, where the quaint village church is mingled with my earliest associations. The ghost of my father's faith haunted the atmosphere.

However, there are bright spirits in this orthodox land, and the breath of progress beats upon the old meeting-house. Our workers are few in this community, but they are intelligent and enthusiastic. Friend Brockway is one of those who always keep in the harness, and he is bound to do his part to keep the world a-moving. He has the gift of persistency, and an unqualified faith in Freethought.

Daniel Burns, veteran, yet still youthful in his feeling, took me over the wide hills to the home of Emery Thompson, who also, for years, and almost alone at times, has been the representativ of our cause. He is on a vast eminence, and for miles around beautiful views can be seen of the well cultivated and richly producing harvest lands, now luminous in the atmosphere of the first days of the Indian Summer. His wife and children are all ardent Liberals, and it was a delight to gather about this fireside where the Promethean flame is mingling.

In the evening shade I came to the hospitable home of Daniel Burns, hewn by himself out of the forest primeval. Friend Burns is the architect of his fortune. His wife and children, and grandchildren too, are stanch allies in the grand army of humanity. I had the pleasure of meeting here Mr. and Mrs. Addison Eberhart, of Greenville, who are also in our pioneer ranks. F. F. Root, Henry Root, and Dewitt Root are young men engaged in extensiv business, but not afraid to take an open and prominent stand for Freethought. It was in their hall that I delivered the lectures, one of the finest and largest in the state.

C. S. Darrell studied for the Unitarian ministry, but was too radical for that and went into business. He had brought up a large family of boys and girls, who are lawyers and school-teachers in influential positions, and are bright representativs of their father's advanced and cultivated thought.

Besides these are Mrs. Mary Clisbe, Secretary of the Secular Union; Miss Martha Brockway and Wendell Brockway, of Jamestown; Marvin Dean, of Wayne, who came with a whole wagon-load of Freethinkers; David Matson, of Lindenville; E. York and wife, Wm. Coe, George Cole, O. E. Henry, Sanford Terrell, Edward Brocket, Miss Susie Thompson, C. W. Burns, W. D. Cady, Mrs. Nora Ferrell, Mrs. Cora Payne, D. F. Barber, I. N. Payne, Peter Bethune, Merle Clisbe, E. D. Fenkell, of Andover, and others.

So it will be seen that even in the midst of orthodoxy we hav our "merrie companie," and the banners of liberty sweep the air with hope and promis.

I gave three lectures, and there was good attendance at all. The Sunday dawned cold and gray, and I feared that my ten months' campaign would close amid stormy weather, but the sky-king soon came forth in all his splendors. The afternoon was golden and glorious. Over the Western slope the chariot of flaming day departed amid magnificent pavilions of cloud, and over the wide scene rose the splendid moon, and its silvery radiance made hope and joy for my heart.

I spent Hallowe'en with Pittsburgh friends. The boys, with their little torchlight procession and various sorts of musical instruments, make a joyous racket on the streets. The nuts and candies and dainties were spread out for us at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Abel, and all too soon I had to take the Atlantic express for New York.

So the year's work is ended, and memory now makes hope brighter than ever; and the work of the future will always be ennobled by the recollections of the many friends we hav met during these eventful labors.

TWO THINGS WANTED.

First. We want some money from every friend who owes on his subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The balance in the bank from which to draw to satisfy the paper manufacturers and the printer is very small, and we must increase it, or run in debt. There are many hundreds of dollars owing us by subscribers, and we desire to kindly but firmly call their attention to the matter. We need the money, and it is not right for them to keep it from us. We would also respectfully suggest to those whose subscriptions expire during the present month that now is the time to renew. We would call attention, too, to our club rates. Get a new subscriber, and so get your own paper cheaper.

Second. We once more ask our friends to send us the names of all the Infidels of their acquaintance who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER. The intention is to send them sample copies of the paper with the hope that they may subscribe.

A Leaf from History.

Supplementary to our recent account of the persecutions of the sects which did not accept Calvinism, by the Puritans of New England. Mr. Heston this week recalls the cruel treatment by the New England churches of Roger Williams, who in the middle of January, 1636, was driven from Salem to wander in the wilderness of snow and ice between that town and Sowams, R. I., now Warren, where he was received by the Indian King Massasoit. One of Roger Williams's worst heresies was the denial of the right of the magistrates to punish a breaker of the Sabbath, or other "offenses against God." From a Church of England preacher Mr. Williams gradually evoluted to a true defender of liberty, and maintained, with the help of his Indian friends, a refuge for the oppressed of the Massachusetts Colony.

A Suggestion.

The elections are over, and there is opportunity for a discussion of matters other than politics.

We hope Freethinkers everywhere will put their brains at work devising the best means of advancing their cause. One of the best ways is by distributing Freethought literature and obtaining subscribers to Freethought journals. There are also other methods of great importance, and none should be neglected.

Let us make a strong and a long pull all together this winter, and see if something practical cannot be accomplished—some one of the Nine Demands enforced in some one of the states.

Honest by Force of Law.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 11th last, we summarized the history of the attempt of the Congregationalists of Greenwich, Mass., to steal a building belonging to the town. The attempt was made because the town authorities rented the structure to Spiritualists and Infidels, though the Congregationalists never, we believe, allowed these citizens to use the house, preventing the occupation by force and a sheriff. The facts are, briefly, these: In colonial times church and state were very solidly united in Massachusetts. The inhabitants were taxed to support the preacher, and fined if they did not listen to him upon Sunday. Greenwich is a portion of the ancient territory of Quabbin, in the Connecticut valley, and was incorporated in 1754. In 1816 the town settled up with the parish of Quabbin, which until that time had attended to ecclesiastical affairs, and all the records and papers were transferred to the selectmen of Greenwich. This wiped out the parish. In 1823, ten years before Massachusetts separated church and state, Greenwich voted to "build a new house, to be used as town-house and a place for public worship." The house has been used, in accordance with this vote, by Calvinists, Methodists, Universalists, and Unitarians. The town has always paid the bills of the house, appointed committees to look after it, sold the seats therein, apportioned its use between the different sects, and on one occasion appointed a committee to "effect a compromise and a more harmonious state of feeling among them." In 1865 the Congregationalists became incorporated. In 1880 the meeting-house needed extensiv repairs, and an offer was made openly in town-meeting to giv the house to the Congregationalists if they would repair it. They declined to receive it. The pew-rents were then used to repair the house, which, with private subscriptions and an additional $1,000 raised by taxation, put it once more in substantial order. Afterward the town shingled it at an expense of between one and two hundred dollars.

In 1883 the Spiritualists desired the use of the house for a Spiritualistic lecture. This was granted by the selectmen, but the Congregationalists blustered and threatened, and the lecture was delivered elsewhere. In 1885 the selectmen granted the use of the house for a Freethought lecture. Again the Calvinists interfered. They garrisoned the building and employed the sheriff to patrol the grounds, and the lecture had to be held in the town hall.

Immediately after this the legal fight began, the Congregationalists suing the town, and attaching its property to the amount of a thousand dollars, for granting the use of the house. The town had to respond, a meeting was called, and the Congregationalists rallied their members to vote against the town defending itself! They were defeated, and the case finally landed in the supreme court, which appointed a master to take testimony. The matter has just been settled by the supreme court giving the orthodox leave to withdraw their petition. This is a mild way of throwing the case out of court, and leaves the building in exclusiv possession of the town, and subject to its order and disposal alone. The Congregationalists, therefore, are forced to keep their hands off this property, and to be as honest as the nature of their religion will let them.

The Chicago Tragedy.

The Chicago tragedy is over. Oscar Neebe is serving his fifteen years' sentence in Joliet penitentiary; Samuel Fielden and Michael Schwab hav been sentenced by the governor to life imprisonment instead of death; Louis Lingg is dead by his own hand; August Spies, Albert R. Parsons, Adolph Fischer, and George Engel were hanged on Friday, the 11th instant, as commanded by law. Lingg's death was tragical indeed. On Thursday he placed a dynamite bomb in his mouth and exploded it, tearing his face and head in a frightful manner. He lived but a very few hours. The sentences of Fielden and Schwab were commuted by Governor Oglesby on the same day, Judge Gary, District-Attorney Grinnell, and others connected with the prosecution concurring.

The efforts made in behalf of these men were almost unparalleled, and such as one who was merely a criminal could never hope to hav made in his favor. This case developed from a trial for conspiracy to murder to a contest between Society and Anarchy, a battle between Conservatism and Revolution. By superior physical force Conservatism has won. It is not putting it too strongly to say these men were sacrificed to public clamor, led by an unscrupulous press, against "Anarchy." On one side were arrayed wealth, religion, "respectability;" on the other, the dissatisfied workingmen of the country. The real issue of whether these men were guilty of murder was lost sight of. The courts had decided—on what everyone five years from now will consider wholly insufficient evidence—that they were, and that decision was enough for the side that had force with it. Wealth said, Hang them, that our property may be secure. Religion said, Hang them; they are Infidels! Respectability said, Hang them, that we may be quiet and untroubled with agitation. So they were hanged.

It has been interesting and painful to read the utterances on this case of the followers of the meek and lowly Christ, who was himself crucified for sedition, as an Anarchist and revolutionist. The message of the Methodist ministers of Cleveland to Governor Oglesby may stand for all, as, with the exception of some Unitarians, no voice pleading for mercy has been heard from Christianity. These worshipers of the Judean Anarchist said: "The Methodist ministers of Cleveland, twenty-nine in number, in behalf of justice and in the protection of all the interests of our land, pray you in the case of the convicted Anarchists to let the law take its course, severe though it be, and invite divine blessing and protection upon yourself and your household." Divine blessing and protection is an appropriate prayer from chief priests for an official surrendering victims to a mob. There is precedent for it: "And the chief priests, and all the council sought for witness against Jesus, to put him to death. For many bare false witness against him, but their witness agreed not together. We heard him say, I will destroy this temple made with hands. And he said, Ye shall see the son of man sitting on the right hand of power. Then the high priest saith, What need ye any further witness? Ye hav heard the blasphemy: what think ye? And they all condemned him to be guilty of death. And he was bound and delivered to Pilate. And the multitude crying aloud, began to desire Pilate to do as he had ever done unto them. But Pilate answered them saying, Will ye that I release unto you the king of the Jews (for he knew that the chief priests had delivered him for envy). But the chief priests moved the people that he should rather release Barabbas unto them. And Pilate answered, and said again unto them, What will ye then that I shall do unto him whom ye call the king of the Jews? And they cried out again, Crucify him! Then Pilate said unto them, Why, what evil hath he done? And they cried out the more exceedingly, Crucify him! And so Pilate, willing to content the people, delivered Jesus, when he had scourged him, to be crucified. And the scripture was fulfilled, which saith, And he was numbered with the transgressors." No doubt the chief priests invoked divine blessings upon Pilate and his household, and replied to their rebukers as the Christian lady of Chicago replied to Captain Black's wife when asked to sign a petition for pardon, "Even if they were not guilty of the crimes charged, they were Infidels, and moreover they had not shown the least sign of repentance." Torquemada used to cut out his victims' tongues that they might not shock the religious feelings of the multitudes witnessing the execution; the witches of Scotland were hung to slow prayers; the Quakers of New England were whipped with pious exhortations for their souls' salvation.

The execution of the Chicago Anarchists was a mistake, from whatever point it be viewed. So long as there is reasonable doubt existing in the minds of hundreds of thousands of honest people and good lawyers that these men knew aught of the bomb-throwing, the death penalty should not hav been enforced. Their death is revenge, not justice. The safety of society would hav been as well conserved by imprisonment, and Anarchy would hav been repressed more effectivly than now. In jail they would be felons; in the grave they are martyrs. And from the catacombs of Rome to the gallows of Chicago, the blood of the martyrs has been the seed of the church. Are there fewer Christians now than there would hav been without the Roman emperors? Are there fewer Protestants now than there would hav been without the Inquisition? Are there fewer Baptists because the Puritans persecuted them? Is heresy less rife because it has been put down with fire, and sword, and prison? Everyone knows that these persecutions but increased the transgressors. Right or wrong, when people honestly believe themselvs persecuted, when other people believe them unjustly treated, their cause, good or bad, is certain to spread, and adherents are certain to flock to their standard. This truth it is that makes the words of the Chicago Conservator, "Let the Anarchists liv that their cause may die," the wisest advice given in this case.

The effect of this execution is hard to determin. It may and it may not serve to teach the dissatisfied workingman that the ballot is better than bombs with which to redress real or fancied grievances. But it can scarcely do less than leave a sullen and bitter feeling in his heart toward those whom he regards as capitalistic enemies of the workingmen, who hav hanged his friends solely because they were striving to help him. Those who hav studied well the known facts in the case, and taken into careful consideration the unknown facts, can but regard it as one of those cases, which history reminds us are ever recurring, in which justice has completely miscarried and mistaken men hav thereby been lifted to the elevation of martyrs.

What Mr. George May Learn.

Mr. Henry George has clinched with the church of Rome, and been thrown. From over sixty-eight thousand votes, his following has been reduced to something like half that number. Mr. Corrigan, of Madison avenue, has come out ahead.

The trouble in this matter is that while Mr. George has told his Catholic land philosophers that the hierarchy is a bad political power, he has told them also that Catholicism itself is all right. This, to the whilom Tammany Hall voter, is a distinction too fine to be seen, or at least acted upon, for if the faith be all right, the church administration must be. So reason most Catholics, and consequently they hav stuck to their church instead of to Mr. George.

But if the bald-headed prophet and the pot-bellied priest, as John Swinton facetiously dubs Messrs. George and McGlynn, had shown, as they easily could, that the Catholic religion is the shield of tyranny, that the Catholic hierarchy is a vicious slaveholding power, and that its votaries obtain nothing but slavery for their allegiance to it, then the church could not hav forced its emancipated followers back into the ranks. However, from his defeat Mr. George can learn one valuable lesson, and that is, to destroy the power of the priesthood the reformer must remove the faith of the people in their superstition.

The Episcopal Cathedral.

The project of a new Episcopal cathedral, to be bigger and more magnificent than the St. Patrick's Roman Catholic cathedral, is well under way. The site is picked out, bought, and paid for. The cathedral is to be located away up town—Morningside Park, 110th to 123d streets, west side—on the ground now occupied by the Leake and Watts orphan asylum, a moribund charity institution which exists principally to obtain state and municipal gratuities and hold on to land acquired by gift, now worth nearly a million dollars.

The story of the Leake and Watts Orphan House runs far back in colonial times. Gen. Robt. Leake was a commissary of stores for the English in the French and Indian wars. He was one in the expedition against Fort Duquesne, but came back to New York City, accumulated a fortune, and died in December, 1773, and was buried in Trinity churchyard. He left one son, John George Leake, who lived to be the only one of his name. He was a bachelor, and his feeling of loneliness became so oppressiv that he left his fortune to a son of his friend John Watts, provided the young man would take the name of Leake. Before the intention was carried out the legatee died, and the elder Watts carried out the alternativ of the Leake will in founding an orphan house. Seven ex-officio trustees were named, including the mayor, the recorder, the rector and wardens of Trinity, and the senior ministers of the Dutch and Presbyterian churches of the city. The asylum was opened in 1843, since which time it has cared for only an average of thirty-four orphans annually. The Board of Education givs the institution hundreds of dollars a year, it pays no taxes, and is a land speculating corporation, with a few orphans as a basis for begging. The Leake and Watts asylum is a good sample of the pious thrift of charity managers, and the evils of exemption of such institutions. The land which it held is exceedingly valuable, and the value increases every year. By preserving the skeleton of a charity corporation, this land was held untaxed, and the managers could sit back in their easy-chairs and see the passing years pile up thousands and thousands of dollars to their credit. Now their time has come, and they can sell out for a million, put a few thousands into another building up in the country, still remain untaxed, and enjoy the fruits of their speculation. So much for fraud No. 1.

Next is fraud No. 2—the Episcopal cathedral. This is to be a great, massiv, magnificent structure, of no earthly use but to please the esthetic tastes of a few millionaires. A ten-thousand-dollar house would do just as well to worship in, and the worship would hav just as much effect upon God. Such a house, however, will not suit our friends of the high church. They must rival the Catholics, and hav a cathedral. This they will be enabled to do by having only the first cost of the structure to provide for. Does anyone suppose that if they had the taxes to pay on that million-dollar lot, they would hav bought it? Or do you imagin that if the six-million-dollar structure they intend to put on the lot had to bear its share of the cost of protecting itself, it would ever be built? The Episcopalians could not afford it, and it is only because they can swindle the general public through the state, county, and municipal officers that they are enabled to gratify their tastes in public worship. Is this fair, or right, or honest? No one objects to any sect buying as much ground as it can pay for and putting thereon as gorgeous a structure as their pockets can stand, providing they pay their taxes on land and building like anybody else. And if their religion is not worth what it costs to be honest, they should find one that is worth paying taxes on.

And further, what is the real good of a six-million-dollar cathedral? Does it prove the truth of Christianity that New York Episcopalians can spend that amount on a luxury? Will it get a single additional soul to heaven, or keep one poor Christian from starving here? Does a marble building and a spire three hundred feet high enable us to follow Christ in his resurrection, or make the vicarious atonement scheme less unjust? With raggedness, and hunger, and cold, and pinching want turning thousands of human beings into criminals yearly; with official knavery of Christians filling our penitentiaries and populating a foreign country; with discontent, and unrest, and injustice pervading the people everywhere, and society sitting on a volcano, it seems like a strain from Nero's fiddle to hear a sect talk about building a splendid cathedral to unite all Christians, and thereby bring peace and brotherhood into the world. It is a useless and a wicked waste of money. If the Episcopalians desire to build something that shall be an honor to them and a boon to New York, let them put the six million dollars into improvements on Trinity's rotten tenement houses, and giv the inmates comfortable places to liv and grow moral in.

The Soapboiler's Agent.

Mr. Anthony Comstock has popped up again, just as he does every year a few weeks before his society holds its annual meeting. This time his victim is the firm of Knoedler & Co., art dealers at Fifth avenue and Twenty-second street. The offending works of art consist of photographs of the paintings exhibited in the Paris Salon. It is needless to say that the seized pictures are not in the slightest degree immoral or obscene, unless every statue and painting of the nude is immoral and obscene.

A hopeful sign in this case is that the daily papers are condemning the vice agent with vigor, and protesting that the law under which he operates was never meant to be so abused. It may be that public sentiment will compel the soapboiler's Man Friday to keep his smutty hands off works of art hereafter.

That is the superficial view. Those who go deeper into the merits of things will not be satisfied until the Vice Society itself shall be abolished and its agent and his spies deprived of all their power to annoy honest merchants.

Open the Museums on Sundays.

In this city on election day, which was a holiday and a free day at the Metropolitan Museum, fifteen thousand people thronged that large building erected with the city's money. Three weeks ago we visited that institution on a free day, but a working day, and two hundred would hav been a large estimate of the attendance. These facts show that Sunday opening is imperativly needed if the museums are for the people, which is the plea in response to which the money was given for the buildings.

Holidays are the only days these institutions are accessible to the vast population of the city, and Sundays are the only holidays of sufficient frequency to be of much use.

In the whole wide world there is no greater swindle upon a municipality than the two museums of New York, and for this swindle the hypocritical, tyrannical, and puritanic religion called Christianity is directly responsible.

The trustees should open the doors on Sundays or giv back the money gained by confidence operations from the city, and cease begging for annual appropriations. If the religious folks desire to run the museums, let them pay for them, and then do what they like with their own.

Editorial Notes.

THE North American Review, containing Colonel Ingersoll's reply to Rev. Mr. Field, has run rapidly through five large editions, so great is the demand to read Ingersoll. We never heard that Mr. Field's open letter to the Colonel strained the presses any.

THE steamship Germanic, which arrived last Sunday, brought as a steerage passenger a Salvation Army preacher, who announced his mission to an officer of the ship to be the conversion of Colonel R. G. Ingersoll to Christianity. We await the result with interest, but without anxiety.

MR. P. H. FOSTER, who runs a nursery at Babylon, Long Island, is entitled to thanks for a donation of five dollars to the treasury of THE TRUTH SEEKER. This generosity is prompted by admiration of the pictures which weekly illume these pages. May the caterpillars and worms always let Mr. Foster's trees alone.

THE Rev. Joseph O'Connell has been appointed by the Roman Catholic church authorities "defender of the matrimonial bond." The church decree which he must enforce is in relation to mixed marriages, and enjoins the agreement of the non-Catholic party to a contract that the marriage bond is indissoluble except by death, and that the children must be educated in the Catholic faith, even in the event of the edath of the Catholic parent.

MR. TUCKER, in Liberty, comes to the defense of the Galveston News against THE TRUTH SEEKER. Like nearly all of Mr. Tucker's arguments, the defense is weak. We did not blame Judge Cook for enforcing the law, for it is the tiger's nature to tear flesh and drink blood, and if the people will insist in arming Christians with laws against their liberty, they must expect tyranny. Neither did we blame the News for publishing a paper on Sunday. What we criticise the News for is that while it upheld Sunday laws per se as just and right, and denounced Sunday labor as against religion and the interests of man, it forced its own employees to work on Sunday morning to finish the production of its Sunday issue and all day Sunday to collect the news and print the Monday morning edition. In other words, Mr. Belo, the owner, preached one thing and practiced another. This conduct has a time-honored definition, and in applying it to the News we are justified by the facts. It is not true, as Mr. Tucker intimates, that the News clamored only for impartial enforcement of the law; it took the ground of the Sabbatarians that Sunday laws are righteous laws because religious. How, in the face of this advocacy by the News of Sunday laws, Mr. Tucker can say that "if the political gospel which it [the News] preaches, day in and day out, with marvelous ability, were to be accepted by the people of Texas, the statute books of that state would soon be clear, not only of Sunday laws, but of almost all other laws," we can explain only on the ground that an Anarchist editor considers himself absolved as completely from allegiance to truth and facts as he would like to be from law and government. But if the News had been consistent, as its defender avers, in asking for the impartial enforcement of the law, why did it go into court when the law applied to itself? Texas law permits the sale of papers on Sunday, but not their manufacture. It also provides penalties for an editor who forces his employees to labor on Sunday. If the cry of the News for "impartial enforcement of the law" was sincere, why, we may again inquire, did it resist the action of the officers who impartially enforced it? We heartily agree with our Boston friend that the News is "one of the most liberal papers in the world"—for a daily paper; but that should not prevent us from pointing out an inconsistency between its editorials and its action. We judge a man more by his works than by his words, and both the works and the words of the News in this Sunday controversy are not such as a straightforward twenty-four-hours-in-the-day advocate of liberty can indorse. And Liberty should not mislead its readers by concealing the fact that the News is an advocate of Sunday laws, as well as a clamorer for their "impartial enforcement"—on everybody but the News.

A CONGREGATIONALIST minister in the neighborhood of Jamestown boasted in a local paper "that there was not one member of his church influenced by or in sympathy with the doctrins of the new theology." This led Dr. Townsend to ask, in print, of this confident pastor, some searching questions, among which are the following: "Can this be true? Do the good Congregationalists of Frewsburg all believe that the heathen, who hav never heard of Christ, perish everlastingly; that all the people who listen to me will burn alive forever in a literal or spiritual fire; that the mother who looks into the eyes of her little baby sees a total depravity which came from the fall of the first man and woman tempted by a learned snake; that God made the earth in six literal days, about six thousand years ago; that the man-made Augustinian and Calvinistic theology is good enough for them? Ask the mother who has laid under the flowers the form of her child who, though of accountable years, sealed her lips and made no sign—ask her if that child has gone down to the bottomless hell! Ask your more thoughtful people if they wonder why the latest criticism upon the Bible is withheld from them; that Dorner is not put in their hand who, though greatest of orthodox scholars, says that the endless hell cannot be built upon the New Testamen word everlasting;"

Letters from Friends.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., Oct. 31, 287.

MR. EDITOR: It is with regret that we record the death (Oct. 18th) of Brother John V. Arnold, an old-time subscriber to your valuable paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. Doubtless you remember his genial face at White Sulphur Springs. His last hours were peaceful, and he died in the same belief in which he lived (an avowed Atheist), having no fear of an angry God or his hell. Shortly before his death he told his wife that he did not want any parson to come and send him to hell after he was dead. So a gentleman, a Spiritualist, from Saratoga Springs, made the address. He spoke from the words, "As the tree falleth so it lieth," and made a very fine address. So another good Infidel and co-worker in the cause of humanity has gone to his long sleep. May he rest in peace. MRS. AND MR. WM. THORPE.

REDDIOK, ILL., Oct. 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: If it were left to a vote of the people of the entire world, whether we would let the Christian religion stand, or abolish it, and lacked one vote of casting it over the railing of forgetfulness, I would cast that one vote, if I was beheaded forthwith. What is the church doing now? Warring with the elements of science and truth. Even in our present day the bigots hav arraigned one of our best workers and light-bearers—Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker. What for? Simply because she is working for the interest of humanity.

The question is often asked, "What can we do to prevent such outrages on the human family?"

This is what you must do: take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and get all of your friends to take and read, that they may be posted, then act accordingly. C. B. HUNTER.

BURLINGTON, KAN., Oct. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: To my surprise the local papers say that Mr. Remsburg's three lectures here "were scholarly, full of thought, and masterly."

The opera house was packed, and a well-behaved and intelligent audience cheered Mr. Remsburg to the echo. I believe that he made a hundred converts to Liberalism, and the high-priests here say "the lectures hav done much injury, for they will cause all the young people who heard them to lose faith in their mothers' Bibles." A splendid tribute.

I confess that as a graduate of theology I did not before know that the Bible was such a beastly, brutal volume as it is. Mr. Remsburg showed and proved to his vast audience that it commanded and taught everything from murder down to lying.

This place is shaken up, for it was something entirely new to the people, for eight high-priests hav heretofore had their own way here, and they used the gag for argument. Reynolds and Watts and Putnam are to follow.

GEO H. BETHARD.

"IN GOD WE TRUST."

LINOOLN, ILL., Nov. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The American twenty-dollar gold-piece has the above inscription. We wonder how many pious hypocrits who are anxious about "God in the Constitution" are willing to trust God in the payment of debts, and whether the grains of gold are not much better security to get a sack of flour with than "God's promis" if you will only trust him and hav a little faith. It appears to me that the above inscription is the sum of silliness. Is it expected that God will redeem our money that is defaced by such a foolish sentence? What can be the sense in tacking on to absolute money—a symbol that means cash down, no trust—so absurd a sentiment as "In God we trust?" If the sentiment was blazoned on all gold and silver money thus, "In Thee we trust," it would be exactly the bottom sentiment of priest and church. History is replete with the ravages and crimes committed by Christian idolaters in their rapacity for money. The inscription is a disgrace to an enlightened age. What would be the use of gold if we could all get of God on trust what we want?

Ever yours, WINTERSET.

ORIENT, L. I., Oct. 26, 1887.

DEAR T. S.: You continue to put in your weekly appearance regardless of the fact that my subscription has not been renewed. This is very kind of you, but I'm afraid you do yourself an injustice, as I cannot repay you in the customary way. The Anti-Poverty movement claims all the $3 I hav to spare. I do not admire your treatment of that movement. Honest opposition is always welcome. It polishes truth. But you don't fight fair. You distort and falsify and misrepresent. I had almost said you lie about it. You at least circulate the lies of others. Besides, you are inconsistent to oppose it at all. It is your natural ally. "Poverty," says Mr. Putnam, "is the curse of humanity and the supreme problem of the day." True and more. It is the mother of ignorance and superstition, the pillars of the church. You claim to fight the church. Why not begin at the beginning? You waste your time and superb talents in showing the world her error, hypocrisy, and vice. That was sufficiently done long since, yet new steeples rise all over the land. Why? Throned Injustice finds her useful to protect the wrongs of property and teach obedience to the powers that be. The church has long since lost all credit with the sagacious; as Emerson says: "They detect the falsehood of its preaching, but when they say so all good citizens cry: 'Hush; do not weaken the state, do not take the straitjacket off dangerous persons. Every honest fellow must keep up the hoax as best he can, and whenever he sees anything that will keep men amused—schools or churches, or poetry or music, or what not—he must cry, Hist-a-boy, and urge the game on.'" Suppose George did make a blunder in not answering your letter, you should not make the cause of humanity suffer. Anyway, notwithstanding that George is working the religious racket, his main object is directly in your line, and, therefore, your letter was uncalled for and impolitic. The Nine Demands stand no chance whatever so long as the church retains the powerful support of the beneficiaries of the unjust and unnatural institution of Private Proverty in Land.

Commend me to G. E. M., to whose pen I am indebted for much amusement. Wishing you were on our side, I am,

Yours truly, P. AITKEN.

MOUND CITY, MINN., Oct. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I feel as though I owe some apology to the Editor of the good old paper.

I hav, for some time, been a little "miffed" at the small amount of sympathy you seemed to feel for the Labor party, but I hav just found out that you know more about it than I. A day or two ago a friend placed in my hand a number of Henry George's paper, and I saw in a moment that the principles of the Labor party, as expounded to-day, rest upon a foundation of goody-good piety. I suppose you knew that all the time.

In the paper aforesaid was a speech by McGlynn, which could be slowly recited in twenty minutes, and in that speech the name God and its appositivs and pronouns occurs just forty-five times.

I hav nothing to say about George's or McGlynn's individual god business, but I hav an actual prejudice against God as a stepping-stone to power; and it is perfectly clear to me that if that party goes into power it will sail in aboard the "Old Ship of Zion." I prefer a "birch-bark" myself.

Seeing that I hav not bothered you for so long, I would like to mention another thing. It may please some of my old antagonists to hear that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union persecutions all over the country hav cured me of my Prohibition foolishness. I hav reference to the crusade against Sunday recreation. It is now clear to me that the average Prohibitionist cares more for the man who called a sorrowing mother a dog than for the suffering families of drunkards. Yours in reconciliation, DR. SHUOK.

WEST POINT, PA., Oct. 29, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Your notice came duly to hand, for which accept my thanks. You will find inclosed a check for $5—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, $1 for the defense fund of Elmina Drake Slenker, 50 cents for "Life: a Prose Poem," by Ingersoll, and for the balance you will please send me the address of Robert G. Ingersoll to the jurymen of Morristown. I hav been looking for that address ever since it was delivered, and felt very sorry when I was told in THE TRUTH SEEKER office, some time ago, that it might never be published, and am well pleased now to know that it will be. Long may Robert G. Ingersoll liv that humanity may enjoy the golden thoughts he is so capable of expressing.

I like THE TRUTH SEEKER and all there is in it, although I cannot agree with all; and the pictures are a very pood feature, as the people generally look at them, and they cannot help getting an idea with a second's glance. Some good Christians will look at the pictures and laugh and then say, "Oh! but ain't they wicked?" A large number of people, I find, will look at the pictures that would not read the paper. After they hav seen some of the pictures they will start to read and so become interested.

This is a pleasant country village, noted for not having a church and for the average good character of its citizens, but the parsons of the adjoining towns hav started a Golden Hour Circle here, and the scanty means of the ignorant and deluded are being taxed to build a church.

D. C. WISMER.

ADRIAN, MICH., Oct. 23, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: A copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER is before me. It is refreshing to me to look over its contents; although I do not indorse all that is said in its columns, yet I am in unison with the general teachings of the paper. The great champion of Freethought, who is now no more of earth, D. M. Bennett, in my opinion, was the best adapted to portray the absurdity of the Bible doctrin, especially that part relating to the orthodox future punishment. He was the most capable man living in his time, or any other period. I own the four volumes, "A Truth Seeker Around the World." I hav read and re-read them, and still they are likely to be perused again by me. I always gain a little more information every time I look into the volumes. His persecution by Comstock, that dwarfed nondescript in mind—I boil over every time I think of it.

The illustration on the last page of THE TRUTH SEEKER of Joseph, with his coat of many colors, is certainly well drawn. Heston must hav a stupendous imagination, for he has made Jo look very gaudy. The picture excites admiration mingled with awe for the character in the middle-ground. The two ladies at back of the tent certainly express either contempt or mischief. The elderly lady stands with her hands on her hips, with poor fool expressed in her face. The younger lady is more coy, and is apparently full of admiration for Jo. Joseph was of a financial turn of mind. He tried to cheat those who put confidence in him, and I think from his appearance he was something of a fop. He carries a dude's cane under his arm. But the nude condition of his legs and the cut of his garments would spoil him for a modern dude. The picture on the front page will speak for itself. Of all despicable objects, a priest is the worst. Their physiognomies, with hardly an exception, show a low and cruel cunning. They should one and all be banished from the face of the earth.

I will not attempt to measure the depravity of the so-called saints of our present time. The essence of meanness is disseminated here every day. Should one of the so-called world's people use a dissenting word contrary to the present teachings of the orthodox creeds, as taught in our churches, he is immediately accused of blasphemy, and is threatened with arrest. If you do not hold your tongue or do not conform to the ideas of your neighbor, a deacon in the church around the corner, you are boycotted at your place of business; or if you be a day laborer, or trade at a store on credit, you are told you are a heretic and not entitled to credit. Thus it is with those who dare to think and act for themselvs. Thanks to our great father, Nature, this arbitrary and ignorant feeling is growing less at every revolution of our planet. O. S. BARRETT.

NAUVOO, ILL., Nov. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Departed this life from La Junta, Col., Oct. 24, 1887, Mr. James S. Kelly, aged 21 years 8 months 17 days. Deceased was born and raised at a country dwelling three miles east of Nauvoo, Ill.

At the age of 17, on a bright April morning, he left his home to shirk for himself. He remained away for seven months, when he returned, where he assisted in home duties till the 22d March, this year. Being of age in February, full of life and hope for the future, he went West resolved to make a name and fortune, hoping soon to return to the home of his birth to be welcomed by loved ones there. But alas! he has fallen asleep now—the sleep that knows no waking. The book is closed before the story of life was finished. The bough is broken off before the blossom is turned to fruit. He was a true Liberal. He believed in human kindness, and that he who doeth wrong shall suffer for the wrong that he doeth. He believed that no good thing is failure, and no evil thing success. He sent for and read a great many Liberal works, which opened a vista that expanded his thoughts and ideas, and he had the faculty to express them without giving offense. Strong in his convictions and tenacious of his opinions, he was, nevertheless, tolerant of spirit, respectful to all, and died as he had lived. By using the words of Thomas Paine, I can express his sentiments clearly: "The world is my country; to do good my religion."

His remains were expressed to Nauvoo, Ill., and were interred in the city cemetery. As he had often requested, no minister was present at his funeral, but our friend, Mr. M. M. Morrill, delivered an appropriate address. J. I. C.

MONTE VISTA, COL., Nov. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I see that friend W. F. Jamieson's answer in THE TRUTH SEEKER to inquirers is that Liberals are scarce in the San Luis valley. Now, he is not posted, else we are disagreed as to what constitutes a Liberal. What I mean by Liberal is Infidel. Like most other places where there hav been no Liberal lectures, full-fledged and outspoken Liberals are scarce. Being outspoken and a resident here for four years, I find them here (counting all grades collectivly) almost as thick as jack-rabbits; and I think any grade is better to begin with than a mossback, stuck-in-the-mud, orthodox Christian. So I must differ with friend Jamieson; for I hav sounded them. I am as anxious to see this valley settled up with Liberals as any man, and I guess Professor Jamieson is not less so; and if he had been posted as well as his friend he would hav said yes. We intend having him lecture here soon, and are delighted with the idea of having the honor and pleasure of listening to one of our representativ Freethought lecturers. Then I feel certain that he will find that I know what I am talking about, and also learn something about these vapid Liberals, as he terms them.

Being anxious to advance our cause, with little effort I hav obtained two subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER and two to the Boston Investigator. Andrew Monson takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, I take the Boston Investigator, and we exchange. I had you send THE TRUTH SEEKER on four months' trial to my son J. N. Powell, and he renewed with two years in advance and $2 for the Slenker Defense Fund. Nothing like getting them started, and on the heels of the lecture we will strike while the iron is hot. Getting Liberals interested is the rub. If they will read they will support the cause. If we can hav lectures they will read. This valley merits all the praise that has been said of it, and, like Jamieson, I don't want Christians to get too much of it.

I will just say to all Liberals who favor the idea of forming a Liberal colony here, come right along, or correspond with W. F. Jamieson, and he will help fix things up all O. K.

T. L. POWELL.

COVINGTON, GA., Oct. 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It is with pleasure I inclose $2 for the renewal of my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I must say there is no paper I take the reading of which affords me more pleasure. I cannot conceive how any Liberal who desires to keep abreast of the times, and who wishes to be renewed occasionally with the unction of the spirit that fired the hearts of Voltaire, Paine, Hume, Jefferson, and the Patriot Emmet, as well as the hero of Ticonderoga, to declare for the right of mental liberty, to think, and to express the pent-up thought of the mind, can do without the weekly visits of the fearless TRUTH SEEKER.

The battle for mental liberty is not won in its entirety, and never will be as long as such gross ignorance of nature exists, which is the mother of superstition, and as long as the dogmas of the church tether the minds of the young, and stupefy the intellect of man in his meridian, making him mentally color-blind to manly reason.

Liberals are daily rebuked for expressing their doubts, although philosophers tell us doubt is the beginning of wisdom. It was the doubts of Luther and of philosophers that brought on the Reformation. Doubts made the liberty of America. Old foundations are not always built on a rock.

I cannot forbear saying a good word for the cartoons. I see occasionally, now and then, a subscriber objects to them. Of course, and it is true, there are individuals who hav no "music in their souls." The beauties in poetry make no impression on their senses. So it is with pictures. But few really take in a proper conception of the illustrations. Picture writing, and representations through such methods, was the most ancient way of expressing ideas, and picture delineations are becoming more prominent every day. Every cartoon is a chapter within itself. Let the reader study them, and he will be anxious to see them rather than hav them discontinued. Let the good work go on, and let every subscriber help to make THE TRUTH SEEKER a terror to tyrants, bigots, and hypocrits, and to clear away superstition that clouds the minds of so many, as amaurosis obscures the vision.

Let humanity usurp the place of oppression. Let knowledge take the place of ignorance. Let benevolence take the place of malevolence. Let charity dictate the conduct of all. THEN SING.

KENT, O., Sept. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The editorial in your TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 24th, headed "Bloodthirsty Chicago," is being read by many of our citizens besides our Liberals, and all agree that it is a shame. The Anarchists now in jail at Chicago, who made the bombs, and advocated the using of them, who also taught and helped to put in force the breaking of the laws, the taking the lives of our officers who had been chosen to protect our property and our lives, should be hung for murder. Better hav hung them for treason before they had a chance to carry their pernicious teachings into effect. We hav not forgotten the many battles and years of suffering that were necessary to make this land of ours "the land of the free and the home of the brave." Neither hav we forgotten the strife and sufferings in our late war, when the South only wished to withdraw themselvs, with their own property, from the North, that they might make laws for themselvs better suited to their wishes. Now that we see those in our midst who advocate no law, no government, and the taking of both life and property which is not their own, are we to sit with our hands folded while our lives are being threatened, and our possessions being confiscated for the use and benefit of others? The mechanics and laborers, as well as they of better means, who hav earned for themselvs a home in which they can sit with their wives and little ones, and feel that they hav something to protect them from the storms of winter, something they can call their own, and that in a land where there are laws to protect them in their rights, will not sit quiet while their rights are being undermined by those who wish to bring others down to a level with themselvs.

I am a poor man, with but one shirt on my back, and that one supports a paper collar, but I hav no desire to compel those who hav been more fortunate in business, or more economical in saving, to divide their earnings with me. No; I love to see them enjoy what is theirs. I see many things in religion and politics that, to my mind, are wrong, and I believe in educating the people as fast as possible to remedy such wrongs, but never will I sanction force until all peaceable and honorable means shall hav failed. I cannot concede to any the right to destroy by force the individuality of any American citizen, or to contaminate the morals of society or the public welfare of our land. I am opposed to large monopolies, the "cornering" of articles of consumption, and many other things allowed to be done in our country, but we hav redress by peaceable means, and not by force.

Why all this cry about land when Uncle Sam has millions of acres, and any citizen can secure one hundred and sixty acres by merely paying for making out the papers which giv them the ownership in fee simple, and the protection by law in the peaceable possession of the same? But one says we must pay taxes on it and we don't want it. Why not ask our government to work it for them, and giv them the benefit? To such agitators I say, If our laws are too obnoxious to you, go and liv by yourselvs where there is no law, where the stronger can liv off the weaker. Go liv with the savages, where those who kill the most game and pull the most roots hav the most to eat. But, hark ye! you will there find a chief whose word is law, and must be obeyed.

A. D. SWAN.

DES MOINES, IA., Nov. 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. C. B. Reynolds has just closed a series of lectures in this city on Liberalism. His theme was divided into four principal topics, the subject of his first lecture being, "Why I let the Pulpit." Passing by the entrance of the hall, I overheard a mild supposition of an elderly lady, as she read the words of announcement—"Guess it was 'cause he wern't good enough to stay in ter it." I saw the interest the old lady seemed to take in me as I started upstairs to the lecture.

"Better come up and hear Mr. Reynolds, madam."

"See heare—youngster," she said, urgingly, as she motioned for me to come back. I retreated a few steps toward her, when she proceeded with pointed finger:

"Don't yer know that he's the devil's agent? Now jist take my advice: don't yer go ter heare that thar Infidel. Bless your soul, I saw yer at church the other Sunday, and yer ought jist to say now, 'Git thee behind me, Satan!' Come, youngster, don't yer go up there."

"Oh," said I, in a reasoning attitude, "if one Liberal lecturer can knock all the religious stuffin' out o' me that the preachers hav put in during the past ten years, why, there must be some truth in it. But now it is time for the lecture. Come up and hear him; it won't hurt you."

Just then her son came by, and as the old lady had yielded to my persuasion, we all walked up to the lecture. I managed to get a seat nearly facing the elderly Christian, so that I could watch her religious nervousness. But the lecture was not half over until my fun was spoiled. She arose, plucked the coat-sleeve of her son, and followed by one of her acquaintances, the three pranced out just as Mr. Reynolds was telling his opinion of the "rib story," and said that there wasn't enough jaw in a rib to make a woman.

The second lecture was concerning the origin of the Bible, in which was shown in logical arguments, well flavored with wit and ridicule, the stampede of hollow-mindedness, and the probable "divinity of kings."

His third lecture was "The Teachings of Liberalism," being a logical discourse upon the issues involved in Liberal movements, the scientific inventions it had brought about, the freedom from bondage it had planted in the world, a brief sketch of its past heroism, a comparison of that with the present, and the hope for the future.

And during his third lecture, lo and behold! there was a happening which I will chronicle as a most divine revelation of God's wisdom and sympathy. Something was wrong with the electric lights, and utter darkness reigned, until a few of the faithful brought some lamps (for, "let your lights so shine," etc., etc.). So we had a lecture just the same. And in about the middle of his discourse, Mr. Reynolds raised his hand to make a biblical quotation from the Bible, and was saying: "God said (lo and behold! the electric lights were turned on), Let there be light, and there was light."

The fourth and last lecture of Mr. Reynolds was upon the theme of "The Bible in the Public Schools." The ruinous teachings of the Bible was portrayed in such a manner as to convince the most superstitious as to its poisoning effects on the minds of the young. This, in brief, is an account of the good work at the hands of our able representativ of Liberalism. Mr. Reynolds needs no eulogy, but his best eulogy is the opinions of his hearers. As a speaker, Mr. Reynolds is not only an orator, but a dramatist. His delivery is entertaining, even if he had nothing to say. Full of enthusiasm for the right, his efforts in the cause of humanity and mental freedom are appreciated, and will at every instance inspire him to renewed energies, endeavors, and courage in the work. Mr. Reynolds made many friends by his visit to Des Moines, and we shall feel that it is a treat of intellectual refreshment if at any future time we hav the privilege of hearing him.

Remember your Des Moines friends, Mr. Reynolds, and come again. WARNER LOVELL.

PURDY'S STATION, N. Y., Oct. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: What is Christianity, divine inspiration or a mental disease? If it is divine inspiration, why should Christians hate disbelievers? Why shouldn't a Christian treat an Infidel with kindness if the Infidel is kind to him? Why shouldn't honesty shake hands with honesty, independent of any religion or theory? Who is to be blamed for this awful "man's inhumanity to man?" Did God giv a gospel of hatred and malice? Certainly for such a God we should hav nothing but contempt. But if Christianity is a mental disease, we ought to hav pity for our Christian neighbors. Surely a man is not to be condemned for having a mental disease any more than he would be for having a physical disease. We Freethinkers ought to do our best to cure the suffering brain of the people, to free the mind, to break the chains of superstition. "And God said, Let there be light, and there was light." Let us follow the god of humanity and science; light, more light, that is what we need.

But we should remember ex nihilo nihil fit. We shouldn't expect to create a world out of nothing. If we really desire to see more light in the world, we ought not to be idle ourselvs. We ought to be activ, not passiv, Liberals. Above all, let us be kind; if we want to get the role of teachers, we should instruct, not ridicule, our pupils. If our antagonists hav power and might, we hav something more precious than that. Our weapons are right and reason, and I hope the rule of might will not last forever.

The other day I had an interview with Rev. B. N. Lewis, Methodist preacher of Purdy's, on the Christian religion. The cause of our conversation was a letter which I wrote to him a few weeks ago after hearing his sermon on the goodness of God. I always considered Mr. Lewis a pleasant talker and a kind man, "with malice for none." But how often are we disappointed in our life! I expected to hear some new arguments in defense of Christianity, but, alas! nothing is new under the sun. The Christians' arguments in favor of their religion are almost as old as Christianity itself. "We hav no right to dictate God what to do; God's ways are not our ways." "The prophecies of the Old Testament hav been fulfilled in the New Testament." "By disbelieving God's word I commit a terrible crime. I rob God of his rights." (Think of a mortal being robbing the rights of infinit power.) "God can't save me unless I want to be saved." (He can't? Then his power is limited.) In answer to my inquiry, if a son can be happy in heaven while his father is in hell, "Yes, such is the justice of God; there will be no earthly relations." But after all, hell is not so terrible as I thought it to be; it doesn't mean a real fire-and-brimstone hell, but conscience. (Well, if hell doesn't mean hell, what is the meaning of heaven?) At last, when the pastor exhausted all his arguments, he got excited and said: "Well, if you reject the Bible, I can't help you. Stick to Infidelity and Tom Paine. If Tom Paine was a better man than Jesus Christ [And certainly he was. Jesus Christ said, "He that believeth not shall be damned." "If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother, he can not be his disciple." Thomas Paine said: "The world is my country; to do good my religion."], follow him. But ——"

There is nothing new or interesting in all these statements. But I call your attention to his following declaration: "A Christian isn't obliged to hav any respect for an Infidel." "Even if the Infidel is a good man?" I asked. "Yes, even if he is the best and the greatest man in the world. All the Infidel lecturers and speakers ought to be imprisoned. There ought to be a law against blasphemy in every state." One thing more: we are indebted to Christianity for our free government, public schools, and good institutions, and he who denies that is a big fool. Now, Brother Macdonald, let us shake. Do you hav any doubt as to the correctness of the above statement? Do you think Christianity has nothing to do with civilization? Do you believe we are indebted for our liberty to the Infidels Paine, Jefferson, Franklin, and others? If so, then, according to Rev. Lewis, you are a fool, and don't you forget it. But take courage, big fool that you are, and accept my consolation. After all, you are only a fool, but Robert G. Ingersoll is a big rascal; he is trying to destroy the liberty of our country! Why? Because Christianity is the foundation of liberty and civilization: they must stand or fall together. Poor wretched Bob! Our "Christian" forefathers by the grace of God established a free government, and thou art willing to fight God and men, and kill our dear innocent Miss Liberty. Alas for human freedom! What will become of Uncle Sam's dominion if the people will be converted to thy infamous views? There will be no freedom of speech, no freedom of press, and probably no freedom of thought, and our beautiful world will become an Infidel hell!

My conversation with the reverend gentleman lasted about two hours and a half. It is unnecessary to giv further particulars, but I wish to ask you, Mr Editor, what do you think of such a parson? Do you believe him to be in a perfect state of mind? I don't. I think there is something wrong about his brain, and the same can be said of all honest preachers and believers in the Christian superstition.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is getting better and better every week. Mr. Oswald's papers on the Religion of the Future are excellent. Also I find delight in reading the articles of Messrs. Putnam, Peck, Denslow, and others. Success to your grand paper! May it liv long and spread the gospel of humanity.

Yours, CLEMENS P. BERYLSON.

The following is the letter mentioned above:

REV. B. N. LEWIS, Dear Sir: I had the honor of hearing your sermon last Sunday, and I wish to make a few remarks. The subject of your sermon was the love of God toward men. Now, I believe that you are an honest man, and hate hypocrisy; I wish to believe that there is no conflict between your thinking and saying. Being an honest man myself, I hav the highest affection and respect for every honest man, even if he doesn't share my opinions. I hope you are candid enough to hear both sides, and for that reason I write to you this letter. I am not willing to deceive you, and right here I tell you I am not a Christian nor a religionist in any sense of this word. But I am not an Atheist. I neither affirm nor deny the existene of God. I am an Agnostic; I say, "I don't know." All I claim, all I want, is the right of doing my own thinking and giving to the world the results of my thinking, if I desire to do so, without being punished, even if the majority of the people are against me. "Why?" You say: "We liv in a free country, and everybody here has the right to express his opinion. Nobody will hang or imprison you for disbelieving in Christianity." All right! But suppose our government would hang Atheists and Infidels. Wouldn't that be an outrage? Wouldn't you say the government has no right to punish a man for opinion's sake? I hope you would. But you are a preacher of "the gospel," and the Bible says, "He that believeth not shall be damned." Now I don't believe in Jesus Christ; I don't know if there ever was such a man—if Christ was a real person or a myth; I hav no faith in miracles. Admitting the Bible to be true, I will suffer eternal pain. But why? What wrong hav I done? I never committed any crime, never caused any human being to suffer; I am doing my best to liv an honest and useful life. Why, then, should I be punished for disbelieving something which I can't believe? If persecution for religious opinion is an outrage here, why shouldn't it be an outrage in heaven? Or is man better than God? If so, why should we worship such a God? I am not an emeny of God, if there is such a being, but I fail to see his goodness if he will treat me worse than I treat my fellow-men. I am in earnest, Mr. Lewis; if in order to be saved I must believe in God's "only begotten son," I wish to do so. But I can't; my reason tells me that such a thing is impossible. If God wanted me to believe in his son, why didn't he giv me power to believe? If he is the creator of my brain, who is to blame for my "Infidelity?" I can't help thinking; I am not able to control my brain. The Christian religion seems to be a religion of fear: "believe or be damned." You may be the best man in the world, and still suffer everlasting punishment for being true to your honest opinion. Is that what you call the love of God? If there is in the world such a thing as blasphemy, your doctrin, according to my opinion, is real blasphemy.

You say God so loved the world that he gave his only son, etc. Suppose that is true. Then our only hope is that God will be merciful to us in the next world if we will believe in Christ. But is he merciful to us here in this world? The Bible tells us that God is the creator of the universe. On the contrary, science tells that the universe has never been created; it has no beginning and no end. But we must believe the Bible or be damned. Now if God is the creator of the world, why did he make volcanoes, earthquakes, all kind of diseases etc? Do you see God's goodness in all these things? I don't. Is the whole human race happy? Did you ever see an honest man who was happy all his life? For my part, I don't believe that a real honest man with a tender heart can be happy while millions of human beings are unhappy. Do you know that in many countries—even here in the United States—millions of laborers are working for starvation wages? Do the rich men—in America as well as in Europe—"expose themselvs to feel what wretches feel?" You say they are wicked people. Good! But our "good and benevolent" God is their creator. What did he create wicked people for? If I could help a sufferer, and wilfully wouldn't do it, I would be ashamed of myself. God is able to help; why doesn't he? Where then is your God's love? I tell you there is something wrong about it. Away with such a love! It is better to say there is no god at all, than to say our God is so good that he pays no attention to his children's sufferings. That is my doctrin, and "upon that rock I stand." Now if I am mistaken I want to be corrected, and I will be very thankful to you, if you will correct me.

Hoping to receive from you a plain and candid answer, I remain, Yours for truth and justice,

CLEMENS P. BERYLSON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

To a Mountain Bluebell.

Little flower of bonny blue
Welcome is thy tender hue,
Tinted like an ocean shell,
Dainty little mountain bell;
Blooming o'er the murky mines,
'Neath the moaning of the pines,
And the aromatic fir,
Neighbor of the juniper;
In the music of thy bells
Tell me of the mountain dells,
And the mountain breezes blown
In thy plaintiv undertone.

With the song of mountain rills
Hurrying to the hungry mills,
Whisper low and true to me
Of a prehistoric sea;
Of the Vulcan hand that brought
Order from the ruin wrought.
Where the mountain chain was born,
In that dim chaotic morn,
Slowly rose each hill and lea—
Islands in a golden sea,
Blue as are thy bonny bells
Singing of the ocean shells.

Canst thou tell the low, sweet words
Murmured by the strangest birds,
Where the brown-nun* sits and sings,
Crooning by the mountain springs.
Flower of the tender hue
Like the eyes that once I knew,
Eyes that haunt me yet afar
Where thy blue-robed sisters are;
Eyes like some sweet placid water
Had my little mountain daughter,
And I dream of her at night
In her lonely bed of white,
Sleeping near the Western mountains,
By the bluebells and the fountains.

The Weight of a Word.

Hav you ever thought of the weight of a word
That falls in the heart like the song of a bird,
That gladdens the springtime of memory and youth
And garlands with cedar the banner of truth;
That moistens the harvesting spot of the brain
Like dewdrops that fall on a meadow of grain;
Or that shrivels the germ and destroys the fruit,
And lies like a worm at the lifeless root?

Words! Words! They are little, yet mighty and brave;
They rescue a nation, an empire save—
They close up the gaps in a fresh bleeding heart
That sickness and sorrow hav severed apart.
They fall on the path, like a ray of the sun,
Where the shadows of death lay so heavy upon;
They lighten the earth over our blessed dead,
A word that will comfort, oh! leave not unsaid.

Agassiz's Happiest Day.

The great naturalist received his early education from his mother, a woman of unusual intelligence. When a mere child he began to collect insects and to study plants. The following story shows how he won his father's approval:

Monsieur Agassiz destined him for a commercial life, and was impatient at his devotion to frogs, snakes, and fishes. The last, especially, were objects of the boy's attention. His vacations he spent in making journeys on foot through Europe, examining the different species of fresh-water fishes. He came to London with letters of introduction to Sir Roderick Murchison.

"You hav been studying nature," said the great man, bluntly. "What hav you learned?"

The lad was timid—not sure at that moment that he had learned anything.

"I think," he said, at last, "I know a little about fishes."

"Very well. There will be a meeting of the Royal Society to-night; I will take you with me there."

All of the great scientific men of England belong to this society. That evening, toward its close, Sir Roderick rose and said:

"I hav a young friend here from Switzerland, who thinks he knows something about fishes; how much, I hav a fancy to try. There is under this cloth a perfect skeleton of a fish which existed long before man."

He then gave the precise locality in which it had been found, with one or two other facts concerning it. The species to which the specimen belonged was, of course, extinct.

"Can you sketch for me on the blackboard your idea of this fish?" said Sir Roderick.

Agassiz took up the chalk, hesitated a moment, and then sketched rapidly a skeleton fish. Sir Roderick held up the specimen; the portrait was correct in every bone and line. The grave old doctors burst into loud applause.

"Sir," Agassiz, said, on telling the story, "that was the proudest moment of my life, and the happiest; for I knew, now, my father would consent that I should giv my life to science."—Our Youth.

The Crow and the Fox.

A master crow, perched on a tree one day,
Was holding in his beak a cheese;
A master fox, by the odor drawn that way,
Spake unto him in words like these:
"Oh, good-morning, my Lord Crow!
How well you look; how handsome you do grow!
'Pon my honor, if you note
Bears a resemblance to your coat,
You are the Phœnix of the dwellers in these woods."

At these words does the crow exceedingly rejoice;
And, to display his beauteous voice,
He opens a wide beak, lets fall his stolen goods,
The fox seized on't, and said: "My good monsieur,
Learn that every flatterer
Livs at the expense of him who hears him out;
This lesson is well worth a cheese, no doubt."

The crow, ashamed and much in pain,
Swore—but a little late—they'd not catch him so again. —La Fontaine.

A Plain Lesson.

Chief-Justice Marshall was once at market, and heard a well-dressed stranger complaining that he could get no one to carry home a turkey for him. Marshall offered to carry it for him, and did so, going with him to his house, when the stranger proposed to pay him, but he declined and walked on. Something about him seemed to excite the suspicion of the stranger, and he said to a person passing:

"Who is that old fellow who brought home my turkey?" The reply was:

"He is the chief justice of the United States, and he brought home your turkey to teach you to attend to your own business."

A New York Street Incident.

A reporter called to a little boot-black near the City Hall to giv him a shine yesterday. The little fellow came rather slowly for one of his lively guild, and planted his box down under the reporter's foot. Before he could get his brushes out another larger boy ran up and calmly pushing the little one aside, said: "Here, you sit down, Jimmy." The reporter at once became indignant at what he took to be a piece of outrageous bullying, and sharply told the new comer to clear out. "Oh, dat's all right, boss," was the reply, "I'm only goin' to do it fur him. You see he's been sick in the hospital for mor'n a month, and can't do much work yet, so us boys all turn in and giv him a lift when we can, savy?" "Is that so, Jimmy?" asked the reporter, turning to the smaller boy. "Yes, sir," wearily replied the boy, and as he looked up the pallid, pinched face could be discerned even through the grime that covered it. "He does it fur me, if you'll let him." "Certainly, go ahead," and as the boot-black plied the brush, the reporter plied him with questions.

"You say all the boys help him in this way?" "Yes, sir. When they ain't got no jobs themselvs, and Jimmy gets one, they turns in and helps him, 'cause he ain't very strong yet, ye see." "What percentage do you charge him on a job?" "Hey!" queried the youngster, "I don't know what you mean?" "I mean, what part of the money do you giv Jimmy, and how much do you keep out of it?" "You bet your life I don't keep none; I ain't no such sneak as that." "So you giv it all to him, do you?" "Yes, I do. All the boys giv up what they gets on his job. I'd like to catch any feller sneaking it on a sick boy, I would." The shine being completed, the reporter handed the urchin a quarter, saying, "I guess you're a pretty good fellow, so you keep 10 cents and giv the rest to Jimmy there." "Can't do it, sir; it's his customer. Here, Jim." He threw him the coin and was off like a shot after a customer for himself, a veritable rough diamond. In this big city there are a good many such lads, with warm and generous hearts under their ragged coats.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—WHAT IS THIS?

I dwell in ocean, lake, and sea,
And in the foaming tide,
And in the little streamlets
On the mountain side;
In the flower in the meadow,
In the leaf on the tree,
In the murmur of the river
That flows on to the sea,
I roam here and there
Happy and free. C. ROOKER.

2.—DIAMOND.

1. A letter.
2. To impair.
3. A plant and its fruit.
4. A kind of ribbon for binding.
5. A perch.
6. A word that expresses denial.
7. A letter. WARREN B. ORCHARD.

Correspondence.

BRUNSWICK, GA.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: I should like you to giv short notice in your paper (Children's Corner) that Fred L. Hoffmann, from St. Louis, Mo., now in Brunswick, Ga., would like to communicate with Miss Alma V. Wineman, of Chicago, as her letter to him had been delivered to the wrong person. This way, I think, will be the only one to find her.

Very truly yours,
FRED L. HOFFMANN.

COLON, MICH., NOV. 6, 1887.

MISS WIXON, Dear Madam: It has been a long time since I wrote to you, so I thought I would write again. When I first read of your mother's death in THE TRUTH SEEKER I intended to write you right off, but put it by from time to time, because I felt to mourn with you and for you, because I took it home to myself and thought how badly I should feel if it was my own dear mother—because I think a boy's best friend is his mother. I suppose we all hav got to die sometime, but we like to hav our friends stay by us as long as they can. But when we hav them laid away we know they are at rest.

I saw in THE TRUTH SEEKER a few weeks ago a prize offered for the best essay, "Why I am a Liberal." I am but a school-boy eleven years old, so I thought I would try for the prize, but I do not expect to get it.

I am going to send you one of our little town papers, that I write up locals for; you may wonder why I send you a back number, but it is because it has my little temperance pledge in it. I send my love to all of THE TRUTH SEEKER friends. With lots of love to you, I sign myself, Yours truly,

FRANCIS B. CORNWALL.

[We thank our friend for his kind and thoughtful letter. The paper containing the pledge has been received, and we believe Francis one of the bright and intelligent boys destined to do much good in the world.—ED. C. C.]

MOODY, TEX., Oct. 20, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I see there are not many writing to the Children's Corner at present, and I thought I would write again. Here in Texas the Christian holds God to be love (1 John iv. 8), and that he is the very seat of love. Ezek. ix, 5, 6: "Go ye after him through the city and smite; let not your eyes spare, neither hav ye pity. Slay utterly old and young, both maids and little children and women." Jer. vii, 20: "Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, mine anger and my fury shall be poured out upon this place, upon man and beast, and upon the trees of the fields and upon the fruit of the ground, and it shall burn, and it shall not be quenched." "God is love!" We are to be like this heavenly father! We must pour our anger out upon the trees of the field, and so on. My dear Christian friend, how can you say God is love when you read such as is set forth in Isa. xiii, 16, and Hos. xiii, 16?

My dear friends, how can you hold the Infidel to scorn for disbelieving such bloodthirsty cruelty as this, and say if you do disbelieve you shall roast in hell forever, amen? It is about 4,000 miles to the middle of the earth, where the supposed hell must be where 99 per cent of the human family is diving, leaping, and swimming in fire and brimstone that shall burn forever and ever!

How does a God feel when he smells the smoke of such men as Paine and Jefferson? How does he feel when he hears the whoops and yells and groans of the "lost and ruined?" I must confess that I do pity this God who is said to fill all space. This God must get rather cool when the wind is blowing from the north in the winter-time. Christians say, just at the word, God could speak worlds into existence. How could he when he fills all space? I will close for this time, for fear I shall worry your patience. Yours for Freethought, JOHN M. SIMMONS.

SALEM, ILL., Oct. 26, 287.

TO MISS WIXON AND THE CHILDREN OF THE CORNER: As I hav not written you for some considerable length of time, I will try once more. I am in school to-day. We hav the same old fogy for a teacher that we had last winter, one Mr. C. C. McMackin; he pretends to be quite strict in his religious views, although he says that it is quite strange that there was so much religious intolerance in the early history of the New England colonies. Then I told him that it was not strange at all—that it was taught to them in the Old World—that it was inherited—that religious persecution was something which could be traced back to as far as the beginning of religion.

I went with my father to Centralia to hear Mr. Reynolds' lectures. I heard him deliver his lectures: "Why I left the Pulpit," and "The Bible, whence it Came and What it Teaches," and I liked them well.

I can well sympathize with you for the loss of a mother, for I hav lost one of my twin brothers, though a brother is hardly as much as a mother.

We hav not the pleasure that Christians claim to hav of meeting the beloved deceased beyond the grave, although, if there is such a thing, we hope to liv that we may reach the gates of the soul's immortal home.

I now tender my thanks to those persons who were so kind and obliging as to send me the ballad mentioned before.

I will now close asking for a correspondence between some of the Children of the Corner of about my own age, which is 17 years.

Yours as before,
RUFUS O. WILLIAMS.

[We thank all our friends for their kind words and sympathy.—Ed. C. C.]

REDUCED TO $1.00.

THE STORY HOUR.

A Book for Children and Youth.

BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

Over a hundred fine illustrations.

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

Apples of Gold. A Story-Book for the Young Folks. By Miss Susan H. Wixon. Second edition. Price, $1.25. This very excellent work for young masters and misses, has passed through a very large edition, and a second has been issued at a reduced price of $1.25, free of postage. This new edition has a photograph of the author which adds very much to the value of the volume.

Bible Inquirer. A Key to Bible Investigation. Revised Edition. This pamphlet refers specifically to 148 Bible propositions, with numerous references and citations, that are contradicted in terms by the same number of other propositions in the same book. Price 25 cents.

The Story Hour. For Children and Youth. By Susan H. Wixon. Without Superstition. The Only Illustrated Freethinkers' Children's Story-Book ever issued. 66 full-page and 25 smaller illustrations; large type, heavy toned paper, broad margins, illuminated covers; 4to. 224 pp., bds., $1.

FREETHOUGHT NOVELS.

The Heathens of the Heath. A finely written Radical romance. By Wm. McDonnell, author of Exeter Hall, Family Creeds, Day of Rest, etc. 500 pages. Price reduced. Paper, 90 cents; cloth, 1.25.

All in a Lifetime. A Romance. By Miss Susan H. Wixon. "The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks." Price, 1.50. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Outcast. A deep, finely written Radical story. From the London edition. By Winwood Reade, author of Martyrdom of Man. 30 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL:
ROMISH AND ANGLICAN.
An Exposé.
By SALADIN. Price, 30 cents.
Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A SHORT LESSON IN HISTORY

A double-page picture contrasting science and theology, showing how the one has labored for human advancement, and how the other has always opposed it.

Price, six copies, 30 cents; one dozen, 50 cents twenty-five copies for $1; one hundred copies for $3. We wish that the friends of Freethought would distribute thousands of these telling pictures.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

Address on the Civil Rights Bill.
Large size octavo, paper, 10 cents.

Ingersoll's Lectures Complete.
Bound in one volume. To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the three will be forwarded to any address, for 50 cts, or either one for 15 cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, 4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, 7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

What Other Heretical Papers are Saying.

From Lucifer, Valley Falls, Kansas.

The wave of Puritanism which is sweeping over the country presages the submersion of every monument, landmark, and temple of Liberty, and foretells the early triumph of the coming theocracy. Scarcely a day passes that does not witness some new eneroachment of the death-ladened tide of poisonous paternalism.

Kansas is given over to the meddlers and sabbatarian hypocrits. Lawrence has closed down on the Sunday papers, and in Topeka everything, except the papers and hotels, are to feel the heavy hand of the law on Sunday. The spirits of the Covenanter and Puritan bind us with the chains of law, and we, as a people, sit humbly at the feet of the Protestant priest, who is the power on the throne in "free" Kansas to-day. Free Kansas! Bah! we are not free, and we never shall be free until we tear from our throats and our pockets the suffocating, thieving hands of the bigots, and assert and maintain our right to attend to our own business on all days of the week.

It should not for a moment be forgotten that all Sunday legislation is, at the bottom, in the interest of a class, of a class which does nearly all its work on that day. The preachers want a monopoly of one day in the week; their guild must be "protected" from competition. If they could they would gladly compel the people, by positiv statutes, to attend church services, but, as they dare not, as yet, propose so long a step backward, they content themselvs with the enactment of Sunday laws which, by making it practically impossible for the people to go anywhere else on Sunday, force them to attend church, and, consequently, support the ministry. This is the whole matter in a nutshell, and it is only folly to attempt to blink the facts, and an utterly mistaken policy to speak softly about the miserable outrage.

This, then, is the situation exactly: the minister's trade and working-day is Sunday; then his store or shop is open for business, and he clamors for Sunday-laws, because any rivalry cuts down his receipts. He must be "protected?" But, as his work is one neither of "necessity" nor "charity," he is himself the most flagrant and persistent violater of his own favorit statute, and, if magistrates were not, as a class, invertebrates and dependent for their positions upon the votes of church people and those under their thumbs, the clerical meddler would soon get enough of Sunday-laws and be content to take his place among ordinary people, no longer trying to force everybody to come up and trade at his counter.

The Ignorance of Pious Editors.

From the Kansas Blade, Concordia.

The Rev. Henry M. Field, D.D., in an open letter to Bob Ingersoll, says:

You are waging a hopeless war—a war of which you are certain only of defeat. The Christian religion began to be nearly two thousand years before you and I were born, and it will liv two thousand years after we are dead. Why is it that it livs on and on, while nations and kingdoms perish? Is not this "the survival of the fittest?" Contend against it with all your wit and eloquence, you will fail, as all hav failed before you. You cannot fight against the instincts of humanity. It is as natural for a man to look to a higher power as it is to look up to the stars. Tell them that there is no God! You might as well tell them that there is no sun in the heavens, even while on that central light and heat all life on earth depends.

We clipped the above from the Walnut City Gazette, and as we did it we wondered if the editor of that paper ever read one of Ingersoll's lectures. Probably he never did, and more likely still he never will.

When speaking so confidently of the perpetuity of the Christian religion we wonder if the writer took time to think that there are other religions much older and stronger, so far as numbers make them stronger, than the Christian religion. Yet they are melting away before the crucible of reason as the snow melts before a summer's sun.

We wonder if it occurred to him that the promoters and defenders of the Christian religion found it necessary at one time to murder all who would not embrace it that it might not perish itself.

We wonder if he is aware that there are in this country now millions of outspoken Infidels to his religion, when a quarter of a century ago there were not a thousand in the United States.

We wonder if he knows that many of the ablest presses of the land are to-day controled by Infidels to his religion.

We wonder if he knows that his religion has so changed in the last twenty-five years that IT is as Infidel to-day to what it was then as Paine, Washington, Franklin, and Jefferson were a century ago. The only difference between Paine and the promoters of the Christian religion of to-day is that Paine did not believe the Bible was inspired and so wrote, while they profess to believe it, yet put a construction upon it that proves they don't believe it. The undeniable truth is, what is preached to-day for religion by the leading preachers outside of the Catholic church would hav been downright Infidelity less than one hundred years ago. The man who writes as does Mr. Field is totally ignorant of the laws of evolution and the "survival of the fittest." There may be religion or religions two thousand years hence, but they will materially differ from the religions of to-day. As they hav changed for the better in the past, so will they change for the better in the future, and as the Voltaires, Paines, and Ingersolls hav caused the change in the past, so will they continue to work changes in the future, and until a reasonable universal religion takes the place of the present unreasonable, uncouth, superstitious concerns. It is unnecessary to say that it will be a "Scientific religion," for every one who has watched the drift of public thought has seen it moving rapidly, and with an almost volcanic force, in that direction.

Materialistic Spiritualism Corrected.

From Bliss's Axe, Cincinnati, O.

Whither are we drifting? We are led to ask this question after a careful perusal of a volume published by Colby & Rich, Boston, entitled "Life and Labor in the Spirit World," the authors of which claim to be the "spirit band of Miss M. T. Shelhamer, medium of the Banner of Light public free circle." The object of the work is to Teach mortals that which it is impossible for them to obtain from any other source, but of which they are supremely desirous of being informed—the conditions and surroundings, and the pleasures and pursuits of, and influence exerted upon the denizens of earth by the inhabitants of the spirit world; it will reveal somewhat of the life their departed relativs and friends liv, and to which they themselvs are rapidly approaching; it will show that that life is a tangible reality—that it is, in fact, the substance, this being but the shadow.

We hav quoted the exact words of the authoress-medium, Miss M. T. Shelhamer, as found in the preface of the book, for the express purpose of showing that she thoroughly believes—

1. That the book contains information that it was impossible for mortals to obtain from any other source.

2. That it contains correct statements of localities, surroundings, and pursuits of our departed spirit friends.

Now, if Miss Shelhamer really believes the records of her inspired book, it will be well for us to consider what can be found in that book, and the very position of Miss Shelhamer, as the "Banner message medium," will hav great weight with many people who peruse the book, and many will regard her writings as infallible, as Christians do the Bible.

Let us see. In looking over the contents we find, under the heading of Chapter IV, "Zencollia City and its Surroundings." A city in the spirit world? Well, here is something remarkable. Let us turn to page 54 and see what we can find out about Zencollia city. Here it is. A spirit seems to be relating the following:

Shall I speak of my surroundings in the summer-land? Shall I tell you of the beautiful city that we in the eternal world call Zencollia—meaning really "city of light," so called from the brilliant rays which are reflected back from its towers-minarets, and gleaming walls when the sunlight falls upon them? The spires and towers of this city gleam in the distance as I am seated by my eastern window. Its white walls, glistening with alabaster-like spotlessness, seem to tell of purity and peace.

Our space forbids but a limited notice of this material spirit city, and we will simply giv a condensed statement of the kinds of material used to make up this, to us, imaginary city. In it we find a "brazen temple," which is spoken of by the spirit as being the "most massiv building I hav ever beheld." It is said to be "surrounded by an open space paved with delicate pink and white tiles of shining translucent stone. A flight of variegated marble steps lead to the vestibule, which is also paved with pink and white tiles."

Great heavens! what an improvement this is upon the gold-paved streets of the Christian's New Jerusalem!

The halls of this temple are "furnished with roomy seats for the accommodation of the audience; a raised platform at the farther end, upon which stands a marble table and a cushioned seat, something like a capacious sofa." Materialistic Spiritualism run wild, is the best comment we can offer right here. The floors (says our spirit friend) "are all paved with variegated marble, white, streaked with delicate pink and sea-green; the pillars are of carved ivory." Is that so? Who did the carving, pray? But wait. This is not all, for paint-shops are in existence in the spirit world, for our spirit friend informs us that "the lofty ceilings are frescoed in the faintest azure, white, and gold." Confound such Spiritualistic-materialistic nonsense, and this coming as it does through the organism of such a well-known medium as Miss M. T. Shelhamer. This is sent forth to a skeptical world as bona-fide truth; and no wonder that true Spiritualists will turn away and ask the question, "Whither are we drifting?"

The theory that cities in the spirit world are built up as cities are built in this material world won't go down with the true Spiritualist of this century. In fact, the theory advanced by materialistic Spiritualists that there is a material spirit world, and that our spirit friends draw from their dying material bodies another material body, must soon go to the wall, as we are taught by advanced Spiritualistic spirits.

These spirits laugh at the idea that there is a refined-matter-spirit world surrounding this world; they all say that this material world is the real spirit world, and that spirits never leave this world to go to another world. They inform us that the man-made doctrin of the spheres is the rankest humbug, and that it will not bear the slightest scientific criticism. They claim that they are now in a disembodied condition—that they are dependent upon our mortal bodies for means of making themselvs known to mortals. They are dependent upon conditions which surround us, whether they are able to enter into our bodies and take the complete possession of us or not.

The idea that just above us there is a tangible world of matter is so absurd that none but the imaginativ can conceive of such a thing. The idea that there is such a material city as Zencollia, with its temple of brass, which reflects back the sunlight, its white walls, its marble pavements, its marble tables, its capacious sofas, etc., is simply imagination, and should be looked upon in the same light as the absurd tales in the "Arabian Nights" or the fairy tales which charmed our childhood, and not put before the world as absolute truth. We can only regard the spirit or band of spirits who hav been the authors of such romantic nonsense as enemies of truth, and that they can obtain possession of a medium in such a high position as Miss Shelhamer is, to say the least, lamentable.

We claim the only way this can be arrived at is:

1. That we understand ourselvs that we are not composed of matter, and that we dwell in matter, and that we exist at the hour of the death of our bodies entirely independent of matter.

2. That we are dependent upon the charity of mediums, the very moment we leave our bodies, for a way and means of making ourselvs known to our mortal friends, by taking possession of the bodies and spirits of said mediums. If this is true, are we not doing a most important work in urging all mediumistic persons to place themselvs under proper conditions for the development of their mediumistic gifts, so that returning spirits may hav a means to make themselvs known to their friends who remain in the mortal form?

Work for the Fool-Killer.

From New Thought, Des Moines, Iowa.

If Spiritualism should be proved false, the fool-killer would hav to employ a large force of deputies, for it seems as though a majority of people now-a-days believe in it.—Signs of the Times.

Whether Spiritualism is "proved false" or not, the fool-killer will hav more work per capita among the Seventh Day Adventists than among any other class of people outside the idiot asylums.

Adventism originated in the Miller movement tbat 1843 would put an eternal quietus to all things mundane. The time went by and the fool-killer failed to come to time, so many of the Adventists went into the lunatic asylums.

In 1844 the general collapse was coming sure, but that failed; that is, the year came, but not so the event "spoken of by all the holy prophets." They next set 1848, then 1853, then 1854, then 1856, then 1868, then 1873, and so on. In 1853 the Adventists went around singing:

I looked for him in forty-three,
For so I read his word;
I looked again in forty-four,
But hope was long deferred.
'Tis eighteen hundred, fifty-three,
I'm looking for him still;
In eighteen hundred, fifty-four,
His purpose he'll fulfil.

These fanatical movements were followed with other worse fanaticism still. The Seventh Day Adventists got "the holy rolls," in which they would lie down and roll over the floor, sometimes in a nude state. They preached "the shut door"—no more salvation for sinners. They soon attached feet-washing, Seventh Day Sabbathism, Ellen White's visions, and a hundred other things which made them act more like slobbering idiots than like sane men. We are glad, however, to recognize that their best men are leaving them and the balance are dropping out some of the most idiotic part of their religion. Still their best men ignore the facts of science and hold on to many of their former follies. There is still much work for the fool-killer among the Adventists.

Queer Liberals.

From the Progressive Age, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Mr. J. D. Hazen, one of Kent county's foremost farmers, and a Liberalist, was requested by his niece at Dundee, N. Y., to donate toward a Baptist church debt at that place, of which she is a member. Mr. Hazen declined doing so for the sole reason that he disapproves of the teaching of the orthodox religion. This shows consistency. There are some Infidels who largely contribute toward orthodox churches and then procure the best of talented orators to break down again what they aided to erect.

Preaching in Boston.

From the Investigator, Boston, Mass.

The preaching business is not what it was, nor is it to continue just what it is now. It cannot resist being pushed ahead and improved by the prevailing Liberalism of the age; so that now, even in orthodox churches, one hears so little of "hell" and the "devil," that he is almost ready to conclude that they hav faded out, and are known only as "lost arts." This change has been accomplished by Liberalism, which will eventually revolutionize religion and transform the teachers of superstition into teachers of reason and common sense. Meanwhile, it is interesting to look into the churches occasionally, and, by contrasting their present sentiments with those of other days, mark the improvement that is taking place almost everywhere in the preaching business.

Mr. Eckhard's Picture.

From the Sunday Gazetteer, Denison, Texas.

The editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER will please accept the thanks of the Gazetteer for a copy of a beautiful specimen of artistic work, recently published by Mr. Charles Eckhard, entitled the Nine Demands. It is an engraving, 24 by 19 inches, on heavy plate paper. At the head of the sheet are cabinet-sized likenesses of Jefferson, Washington, and Paine, the fathers of our republic. At the sides are Franklin and John Adams, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are Lafayette, Girard, and Ingersoll, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid, by mail, for $1, by the Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette place, New York. J. M. Lea has placed our copy in a handsome oak frame, and it is now occupying a conspicuous place on the walls of the Gazetteer sanctum.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

THE New York Leader, a Labor daily, suspended publication on the 11th. The editors say that the hanging of the Anarchists made that day appropriate for the death of the paper. George's daily, the Argus, is also suspended.

FIFTY-NINE bartenders were arrested for selling liquor in this city last Sunday.

THE pastorship of Beecher's church has been offered to an English preacher named Berry.

THE doctors hav decided that the crown prince of Germany has incurable cancer of the throat.

WILLIAM ASTOR, John Jacob Astor's brother, has given $100,000 to the Protestant Episcopal cathedral.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL VILAS reports that the United States postal service is now for the first time self-supporting.

THE steel tubing made in Cleveland for the Lick telescope has reached California. It is 50 feet long and 3 feet in diameter.

THE Independent Presbyterian church of Savannah, Ga., has declined to engage the Rev. Leonard Woolsey Bacon, of Connecticut, for a pastor, because Bacon is an Abolitionist.

IN last week's election in this state the Democratic plurality was 17,333. The total George vote was 69,662; Prohibition, 40,996.

H. P. BLAVATSKY and Mabel Collins, the daughter of Mortimer Collins, hav started a new magazine in London, devoted to matters mystical and theological. They call it Lucifer.

THE Rev. C. W. Millen, pastor of the Washington-street Methodist church, Brooklyn, who gained such pleasant notoriety recently, has gone into the flour business.

THOMAS FODGE, aged 63, of Albany, went to a church in Fourth avenue, this city, last Sunday. He had scarcely seated himself when his head dropped upon his chest and he died.

SIX thousand people followed the dead Anarchists of Chicago to their graves last Sunday. The societies of New York were prevented by the police from holding memorial services.

THE defeat of the George party did not diminish the attendance at the Anti-Poverty Society's meeting Sunday night. Dr. McGlynn spoke and made the statement that 60,000 voters had to be bought to bring about the result of the recent election.

THERE was a riot in London last Sunday. Social, Radical, and Irish societies were forbidden to hold a meeting in Trafalgar square, but persisted in doing so and were resisted by the police. Two hundred citizens and forty policemen are reported to hav been wounded in the fray.

THE personal effects of the late Henry Ward Beecher were sold at auction in this city last week. They included his library and collection of curiosities, paintings, statuary, etc. Many of the articles sold bore evidence of having been gifts to the great preacher. All of the articles sold brought large prices.

FIFTEEN members of the National League were sentenced on the 12th, at Kilrush, Ireland, to one month's imprisonment at hard labor. Their crime was attending unlawful meetings. William O'Brien, the editor-agitator, is in jail at Dublin, and is somewhat recalcitrant, refusing to don the prison uniform.

THE Progressiv Labor party held a mass meeting at Union Square on the evening of October 8th. Without the slightest provocation the police charged upon the assemblage, and some fifty persons were severely clubbed and the meeting broken up. The leaders of the party asked for redress, but the authorities, having "investigated" the affair, report that no censure attaches to the police!

Odds and Ends.

THE report that the heat of forest fires in West Virginia is causing trees to bud will be welcome news to many miserable sinners. There may be shade trees in hades.

"MISS WALDO (of Boston, discussing literary matters): "Hav you read 'Homo Sum.' Mr. Wabash?" Mr. Wabash (of Chicago, who is keeping up his end of the conversation with difficulty): "Well—er—yes, Miss Waldo, I hav read Homo some, but not a great deal."

PROHIBITIONIST (who has been descanting upon the glories of Prohibition): "But, my young friend, you don't look well." Young man: "I'm a little faint, that's all, sir." Prohibitionist: "Can I do anything for you?" Young man: "You might lend me your bottle for a moment, sir."

A BOSTON mother was putting her little one to bed and said: "I think, Flossie, you are old enough to learn an evening prayer. I'm going to say it for you, and you will repeat it after me." "Yeth'm," lisped the little one. "Well, we'll begin. Are you ready?" "Yeth'm. Let 'er go, Gallagher!"

"YES, dear children," said the Sunday-school teacher, "with God nothing is impossible." "Can He make a thing a foot long with only one end to it?" inquired Bobby, who is a small but earnest Christian. "Now, Bobby," said the teacher, with gentle reproof, "you are talking foolishly." "What's the matter with a dog's tail?" asked Bobby.

A CERTAIN Sunday-school superintendent goes to see little Clara's big sister quite often. "Children," said he to the school last Sunday, "we are told in your leaflets to-day to love the Lord. Do you know what 'love' is?" "It's when you hug my sister in the parlor, sir," spoke up Clara from the front row.

CRAMPSON: "Remember that newspaper man who insulted me last week?" Shortpantz: "I remember. You said you were going to hav satisfaction." "Well, I called on him, and he threw me down stairs." "Then you are not satisfied?" "Yes, I am. I've been licked as well as insulted, and so I hav concluded to let the matter drop."

"How do you like the character of St. Paul?" asked a parson of his landlady one day, during a conversation about the old saints and apostles. "Ah, he was a good, clever old soul, I know, for he once said, you know, that we must eat what is set before us, and ask no questions for conscience sake. I always thought I should like him for a boarder."

HE put on his hat, started slowly for the door, hesitated, came back, sighed deeply, and took the lily white hand in his own, and pressed it to his lips. "Katie," he murmurmed, "I hav waited long—oh, how long!—for this opportunity. Will you, Kate, will you, darling, be mine?" "Henry," she replied, with a look half of sorrow and half of determination, "it can never be." "Never be! Oh, why hav you permitted me to hope? Why hav you encouraged me, only to stamp upon my bleeding heart at last?" "I am sorry, Henry, but I can never be yours. I hav other objects in view." "Other objects!" "Yes, Henry; I cannot consent to belong to any man, I intend that you shall be mine."

"FRANKLIN," said the professor, who was about to introduce Professor Morse to the Alumni of a Western college, "Franklin drew the lightning from heaven and controled its power to harm, but it was left to Professor Morse, gentlemen, to—" puzzled to know exactly what he should say. "It was left to Professor Morse, gentlemen, to—reduce it to a horizontal position."

A WESTERN church had been without a pastor for some months, and finally a stranger applied for the honorable position. "Ever preach before?" "Yes, I've worked the evangelist racket." "Hav you any letters of recommendation or indorsement?" "No, but I can prove that I run a poker-joint two years, and served three years in the penitentiary before I reformed."

"YOUNG man," inquired the apostle, "hav you ever experienced religion?" "I came very near it once, sir," was the young man's response. "I used to help a pretty little girl hold up a hymn book every Sunday evening in church, and I was getting so good that I fairly neglected my business. But one night I caught her flirting with an usher. I put a ten-dollar bill in the contrbution box, and havn't been to church since."

THE liquor store on the corner burnt,
And the minister prayed next day,
Telling the Lord he was just and good
In wiping the pest away.

But lightning struck the minister's church
And burnt it to the ground,
And the liquor people thanked the Lord
That he passed such things around!

CHANGE of heart. Omaha man: "My gracious! We'll be late. Get your things on." Wife: "My dear, it's raining pitchforks, and the wind is blowing a hurricane." "We hav strong umbrellas." "My dress will be ruined." "Wear your waterproof." "And you know you hav a cold." "I can wear rubbers; I wouldn't miss that opera for—" "Opera? This is not opera night; its prayer-meeting night." "Oh! I wonder if our preacher thinks people are idiots enough to stir out of the house such a night as this."

A CLERGYMAN foiled. A clerical-looking gentleman, in the hope of obtaining a contribution, entered the office of a Texas newspaper, and, finding the editor at his desk, said: "I am soliciting aid for a high-toned gentleman of refinement and intelligence, who is in need of a little ready money, but is too proud to make known his sufferings." "Why!" exclaimed the editor, "I'm the only man in town that answers that description. What's the gentleman's name?" "I am not at liberty to disclose his name." "It must be me, parson. God bless you and prosper you in your good work," said the editor, wiping away a tear. The editor says that the look the parson gave him will haunt him in his grave.

Gems of Thought.

BE strong in your integrity and resolve to do right at all times, though to do so causes you to be unpopular in the eyes of men.—D. M. Bennett.

IF after a deliberate and impartial use of our best faculties, a professed revelation seems to us plainly to disagree with itself, or to clash with great principles which we cannot question, we ought not to hesitate to withhold from it our belief. I am surer that my rational nature is from God than that any book is the expression of his will.—Dr. Channing.

LOGIC is not satisfied with assertion. It cares nothing for the opinion of the "great," nothing for the opinions of the many, and least of all for the superstitions of the dead. In the world of science a fact is a legal tender. Assertions and miracles are spurious coins. We hav the right to rejudge the justice even of a god. No one should throw away his reason—the fruit of all experience. It is the intellectual capital of the soul, the only light, the only guide, and without it the brain becomes the palace of an idiot king, attended by a retiune of thieves and hypocrits.—Col. R. G. Ingersoll.

IF the question of immortality had the actual imperativness which it ever had, the defenders of the doctrin would not rest until its truth was satisfactorily demonstrated. As matters now stand, there is an almost universal feeling among the more thoughtful that the problem is insoluble, and that we can very comfortably wait for death to settle it without making ourselvs unhappy by present controversy.—M. A. Hardaker.

A CANDID exposition of the Athanasian creed by an orthodox priest.—When we remember how the church has refined upon, and how enormously it has added, to the simple revelation of God, given in the holy scriptures; how it has babbled of the three persons in the one substance of the sacred trinity, of the three incomprehensibles, which are yet one incomprehensible; of the three uncreated, who are yet one uncreated; of the three almighties, who are yet one almighty; when we remember under what awful penalties it has bidden us, "Worship one God in trinity, and trinity in unity, neither confounding the persons nor dividing the substance," we cannot affect much surprise that men who want facts rather than words hav revolted from this terrible cloud of technicalities; we cannot even pronounce their revolt an altogether unreasonable or unhealthy one; we can see, we are bound to admit, that the church is largely to blame for their unbelief; we can see and admit that it was very natural for them to assume that, instead of knowing all about the great unknowable God, as the church affected to do, we really know nothing whatever about him.—Sam Cox's Genesis of Evil

ONE impulse from a vernal wood
May teach you more of man,
Of moral evil, and of good,
Than all the sages can.—Wordsworth.

M.: To be miserable implies an existence, but you just now denied that the dead had any existence; if then they hav not, they can be nothing; and if so, they are not even miserable. A.: Perhaps I do not express what I mean, for I look upon this very circumstance, not to exist after having existed, to be very miserable. M.: What, more so than not to hav existed at all? therefore, those who are not yet born are miserable because they are not; and we ourselvs, if we are to be miserable after death, were miserable before we were born. But I do not remember that I was miserable before I was born, and I should be glad to know, if your memory is better, what you recollect of yourself before you were born.—Cicero's Tusculan Disputations.

IF there is another state of existence beyond our earthly life, it is reasonable to believe that it will be entirely natural, and that we will be adapted to the conditions there, as we are to our surroundings here. If we do not exist after the dissolution of the body—and that we shall we think there is no proof—nothing awaits us worse than an everlasting rest. . . We do not regret that we did not exist in the ages of the past. Why feel sad at the contemplation of unconsciousness in the ages to come? But unpleasant as is this thought to rationalists, who are accustomed to regard as probable a blissful immortality for all mankind, how pleasing the reflection of an eternal sleep in comparison with, or rather in contrast to, the expectation that, while a few will be happy hereafter, the majority of our race will exist forever in excruciating and unremitting torment.—Underwood's Materialism and Christianity.

THEN said one unto him, Lord are there few that be saved? and he said unto them, Strive to enter in at the strait gate, for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able.—Luke xiii, 23, 24.

IN the world's broad field of battle,
In the bivouac of life,
Be not like dumb, driven cattle!
Be a hero in the strife. —Longfellow.

Notes and Clippings.

IT is estimated that the Church of England receives yearly from tithes, which are equivalent to taxes, about $20,000,000. Of this $15,000,000 goes for salaries of clergymen.

IT is reported that detachments of the Salvation Army are in Jerusalem and that "the streets of the holy city resound with their amens and the jingle of their tambourines."

SOME Boston reporters recently attended a seance given by Mrs. Fay, the materializing medium, and grabbed the spirit form of a daughter of one of the auditors. When the lights were turned on the spirit materialized into Mrs. Fay.

THE coroner's inquest into the cause of the death of seven persons kil ed by the fall of a parochial school-building in this city Oct. 17th finds that the priest, Father Kirner, is responsible for the catastrophe and for the deaths which resulted from it. Kirner was among those killed.

PROFESSOR DRUMMOND, the bright young Scotchman, who has been making a visit to some of the leading American colleges, says that to him their most remarkable feature is "their Christian tone." Their general atmosphere, he says, is Christian. "They are religious institutions."

THE Rev. Samuel D. Hindman, missionary to the Indians, some time ago won a verdict of $10,000 against Bishop Hare for defamation of character. To save further litigation the bishop now apologizes. Mr. Hindman expresses himself as satisfied, and Bishop Hare's friends hav paid a portion of the court expenses.

THE Religious Herald (Cong.) says: "Constant vigilance, we are told, is the only safeguard of liberty, and constant watchfulness and decision on the part of all true Americans is demanded for the perpetuation and purity of our common school system." By which the Herald means that Catholicism shall be kept out and Protestantism kept in the schools.

A MINNESOTA office-seeker, after being disappointed by Governor McGill, went home and told his wife about it, and gave his opinion of the governor in unrevised language. His five-year-old boy heard him, and that night the mother cautioned him never to use such language as his father had. "Is it always wicked to swear, mamma?" he asked. "Y-e-s. But God will forgiv sins," she said. Then the boy kneeled and prayed: "Forgiv me for all my sins, keep me while I sleep—and—damn Governor McGill."

THE discussion of the question of the reunion of the Northern and Southern Presbyterian churches is bringing out some plain talk. A Southern writer in a Southern Presbyterian paper says, in the course of an argument in favor of union, particularly as a means of breaking down some prejudices now existing: "It is a fact that very generally in the South any man or woman coming from the North to teach or preach to the negroes will hav to bear the burden of social ostracism. It is a fact that Southern men and women can preach to and teach the negro, and experience no ostracism. Your daughter, young lady though she be, can hang in tender affection about the neck of the old black mammy and nobody think anything of it, but just catch that New England woman trying it."

SAM JONES recently lectured in Hartford, Conn. The original title of his discourse was "Get there, Eli," but he said that he had learned that the people of Hartford objected to slang, and he had, therefore, left off the "Eli," and named his lecture "Get There." He got there to such an extent that some of his audience went away in anger, claiming that Sam Jones was a superfluity in a town sheltering Mark Twain.

OF all the cranky pharisees allowed to run at large, Anthony Comstock is the chief. He is a most unmitigated nuisance and requires most emphatic and summary suppression. It may require a fine eye to distinguish between an old master's painting and the modern photographer's accurate copy from nature of the nude, as to their relativ value as "high art," but there is no excuse for the self-appointed reformer doing the dirty work he is regularly engaged in to entrap people into breaking the law he has had enacted. In the words of the vulgar, Comstock "bit off more than he could chaw" when he attacked the Knoedlers for selling photographic copies of paintings famous the world over as examples of the highest works of art. —Hoboken Evening News.

THE Sabbath issue is becoming more and more prominent in municipal politics, and the brewers and the preachers hav locked horns for the contest. It is suggetsed for the benefit of the latter that if they are consistent they must accept Ocean Grove as a model. There the gates of the city are closed at midnight of Saturday, and no vehicle is allowed to enter until Monday. In that quiet city by the sea no barber wields a razor on Sunday, no newspaper is sold, no milkman vends his mixture, no trains arrive or depart, all stores are closed, and minister and people alike travel on foot. This may be severe in practice, but it is consistent. The authorities recognize the stern logic of modeling one's acts by his doctrin, and no secular vocation or noise is allowed to interrupt the Sunday stillness. If the city clergy propose to hav this sort of a Sunday in New York they hav a big field before them, and to be consistent they cannot aim at less.—Mercury.

THE truth is that nothing needs more judgment and discretion than a crusade against indecent pictures and books, and, as a general rule, such crusades are generally conducted with very little of either. Men like Mr. Comstock ought to be confined to the pursuit and repression of everything like trade in positiv, undeniable unpretentious indecency or obscenity, but they ought to be very careful about going in quest of indecency in fields where the scent is likely to be light, and their opinions disputed. It is not only absurd, but mischievous, to hav them engage in controversy, either in courts of justice or elsewhere, over the line between art and immorality. Their opinions are not worth a cent in such matters, and by airing them in public they always gather a prurient crowd around them, and stimulate the traffic in obscenity by their suggestions and their argumentation. If there is to be a prosecution in this Knoedler case, and these prints should send some one to jail, we, for our part, think Anthony Comstock should be the man.—Evening Post.

Communications.

The Federation of Mankind.

We all hope for a time when the nations will be at permanent peace, when the people will hav a voice in all governments, when thought will circulate from land to land without hindrance from priesthood or police, and when every country will be enabled to exchange, without needless restrictions, whatever it can best spare of its own produce for whatever it can produce only with great difficulty or expense, or cannot produce at all. That this last characteristic of the Golden Age is as essential and necessary as any of the others has been recently shown in the book which furnished my title, and which no one can read without interest and profit, even though he may, like me, condemn some of the author's pet theories as visionary—"Protection or Free Trade," by Henry George.

Never before did the purification of our tariff from the so-called protectiv provisions seem so grand to me, though I hav been in favor of it for more than thirty years, as it does after reading this book. Its concluding proposal, to abolish all revenue duties, whether internal or external, and all taxes except one imposed on land alone, without regard to the value of houses and other improvements, has so little chance of being adopted at present, according to Mr. George's own confession, that it is hardly worth while to say much against it, while his denunciation of private property in land as robbery is likely to excite even more opposition than it deserves. But, however he may err here, he is perfectly right in saying that "trade has ever been the extinguisher of war, the eradicator of prejudice, the diffuser of knowledge," and that "the appointed condition of human progress is evidently that men shall come into closer relations, and become more and more dependent upon each other."

Any reader who doubts this need only remember that among all ancient races the one which rose the highest in political and religious liberty, as well as in art, philosophy, and science, was precisely that which was most successful in foreign commerce. We all know how gloriously the example of Athens has been followed by Venice, Florence, Holland, and Great Britain. So it has been by America, in so far, at least, that we now possess perfectly free trade, wholly unrestricted even by a tariff for revenue only, over a territory equal in longitude to the distance from Ireland to Bengal, and in latitude to the distance from Iceland to the Sahara. We hav proved that free trade can last for a hundred years between all parts of a region as large as Europe, with the addition of Morocco, Egypt, Arabia, Persia, India, Asia Minor, and a portion of Siberia. Everyone knows that our internal free trade has been immensely beneficial. Nobody wants to giv it up.

The best possible thing for all the states is that each should be allowed to exchange what she can produce most profitably for whatever can be produced more profitably in the others. Texas, Georgia, and other Southern states find it best for them to buy their flour, clothes, tools, etc., by selling their cotton. Louisiana exchanges sugar as well as cotton for what her Northern neighbors can grow or manufacture more cheaply than she can. North Carolina devotes herself mainly to tobacco and turpentine; Nevada to silver, and Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, and Minnesota to wheat and corn. Thus the miner in Michigan and Pennsylvania, like the manufacturer in the latter state, or in New York, Ohio, and Massachusetts, finds customers ready to take his wares and giv him food at lower rates than he could raise it for himself. These states and their sisters all liv and thrive on the liberty given to each to trade with all the rest. None of these states tries to raise at home what can be procured more cheaply from other parts of the Union. Even protectionists generally approve of this enjoyment of free trade. Senator Kelly, however, has just been consistent enough to insist that each state should diversify her industries as far as possible. Does he mean that it would be better for Massachusetts to raise her cotton, sugar, and oranges under glass? What can be better than for the inhabitants of each state to keep on concentrating local industry on whatever pays best in that place? Look where we will, we see the people of each state prosper on account of their liberty to buy from people in other states.

Why does not the same principle remain true when stated thus by Henry George: "To attempt to make a nation prosperous by preventing it from buying from other nations is as absurd as it would be to attempt to make a man prosperous by preventing him from buying from other men?" Why would it be a bad thing for New England to be able to buy as freely from Canada as from Alaska, Oregon, and Texas? How can it be that the great manufacturing states of Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania gain by trading with each other, but would lose by trading with England and Germany? Why would not the states which find nothing pay so well as raising wheat, corn, tobacco, cotton, and sugar be able to make these crops even more profitable if there was no tax to pay for exchanging them for French, British, and German cloth and hardware rather than American? In short, why would not free trade work just as well between friendly nations as between federal states? If two men would be able to trade with mutual profit, if they had a common government, would not the bargain still remain a good one for both parties, if their separate governments would only agree not to put a tax on it? What is there about a political boundary to change commerce from a blessing to a curse as soon as she tries to cross it? Is such a supposition any more creditable than that of witches losing their power on crossing a running stream?

These questions are answered, after a fashion, in one of the latest book in favor of our present tariff, "Protection versus Free Trade," by Mr. Henry M. Hoyt, 1886. He argues that "industrial entities should correspond with political entities," because "the nearer the correspondence the stronger the nation."

We all want to hav our nation maintain and increase her strength. Her domestic free trade does much to build her up as an industrial and political entity. The only question is whether she would be any less of an entity, either political or industrial, if her trade were to become more free externally. Great Britain is one of the mightiest of industrial and political entities, and her industrial power has grown enormously since she dropped protection from her tariff. Mr. Hoyt says that the states of our Union gain by free trade because they are "living under the same laws, customs, language, traditions, religion, and ideals," "under the same moral, social, and political forces." Is New England so far off from old England in these respects that it would be ruinous to lower the wall which now stands between our free trade and hers? Admitting that a revenue tariff should be kept by us as it is by her for the maintenance of political entity, why should we not try to outstrip her in the path by which she has carried her industrial entity on to such vast proportions? And her free trade with nations which hav very different institutions from hers, including much higher tariffs, has been so profitable, even where their labor is much cheaper than hers, that it is well worth while for us to strive after a larger share. Henry George illustrates the folly of thinking that we must keep up our tariff because other nations hav high ones by drawing a comparison which may be restated thus: Suppose an island inhabited by ten men, who differ so much in occupation as to keep bartering what they produce among themselvs. Nine of them are in the habit, after every bargain, of burning half of what they get as a sacrifice to their gods; but the tenth does nothing of the sort. He loses by his neighbors' folly, but not nearly as much as he would by imitating it. And as for coming into competition with cheap labor, no one need fear that who considers what England makes by trading with India. Mr. Hoyt has much to say about the danger of sending labor and capital out of the country by suddenly adopting free trade; but the only question at present is about such a gradual reduction as will end in leaving us with a tariff for revenue only. He admits himself that "special kinds of wool, of which there is no expectation of full home supply," may properly come in free of duty, and the same might be said for Scotch iron. Such gains would go far to secure those of our manufacturers who are not also miners or owners of salt-springs, borax-lakes, etc., against any loss, especially as they would gain by freer access to foreign markets. Some monopolists would make less money, but the real manufacturers would be able not only to sell more goods, but to employ more laborers. The change would be most felt, however, by the farmers and planters who are now selling at free-trade prices and buying at protectionist prices. Mr. Hoyt admits that "it might not be difficult to prove that the South, as a geographical section, with her special cotton product, has been a loser by virtue of her membership in this group of free-trading states." The South needs free trade with both of her great customers, and so does the West.

Still more plain is our national need of recovering our merchant marine, which has been legislated almost out of existence by those who insist with Mr. Hoyt on "organizing and conducting our competing industries as if we were the only nation on the planet."

Henry George is perfectly right in saying that this would not be protecting, but boycotting ourselvs. His book on the tariff errs only in taking it for granted that our nation is a very sick man, who cannot be cured except by a new and powerful drug, which has never been tried, and which the patient refuses to take. In fact, Uncle Sam is a strong, healthy man, who will be perfectly well and happy as soon as he gets rid of a quack whom his neighbor, John Bull, turned off long ago, with such good results that he has nearly made up his mind to do likewise. The protectionists are right in saying that our national prosperity is greater and more generally enjoyed, even among the poor, than that of any other people. But our prosperity may all be accounted for by the action of known causes, on whose tendency all agree. Among our plain advantages over other nations are our internal freedom of trade over a vast territory, extending almost from tropic to pole; our cheap and rich land; our ability to grow cotton and wool as well as food; our vast forests; our inexhaustible fisheries; our rich mines of coal, iron, lead, and copper; our yet greater wealth in inventiv skill, commercial enterprise, and general intelligence; our system of universal education, recently made much more practical by the addition of industrial instruction; our freedom from the burden of privileged castes, and our readiness to let every man, of whatever parentage or occupation, take the highest place for which his intelligence, character, and behavior make him fit.

All these insure our prosperity, tariff or no tariff. These peculiar advantages would enable us to hold our own against every other nation in both foreign and domestic markets, if we were not handicapped by that increased price, not only of raw materials but of many necessaries of life, due to what we call protection. If we will only untie the cords which we hav wound around our own hands we shall find ourselvs more successful than ever before in gathering in the choicest fruit of all the world's industry. We cannot act as if we were the only nation on the planet, any more than any man can act as if he were Adam. We can act only as a nation among nations; and the great question is how to adapt ourselvs most fully and widely to all the conditions of international relationship. Nothing is more desirable than the brotherhood of nations; and this is best secured by establishing the broadest possible liberty of commerce. "The spirit of protectionism," as Henry George justly says, "is that of national enmity and strife." "The spirit of free trade is that of fraternity and peace."

The Age of Miracles—Has It Passed Away?

It may be well to admonish the church that she is now, and has been for ages, trading on borrowed or doubtful capital. Old traditions, miracles of the apostolic age and of later times, with all the other paraphernalia belonging to religious systems, are worn completely threadbare; insomuch that her ablest sons are losing heart, and even Dean Stanley admits that "science will be the religion of the future."

There is but one way for the church out of this dilemma, an only chance to avert the threatening catastrophe, and this is a new miracle, even if but one—a fresh manifestation of their ability to propitiate divine favor, which must be indubitably authenticated. With this help, she can confidently enter on a new lease of power, that may last her many centuries. Is not this a consummation devoutly to be wished? Is not this a result worth struggling for? Does the church in its extremity see any other way to avert this impending danger? I confess I do not.

I candidly admit that I hav no faith in prayer, as generally understood and practiced by the Christian church. I must declare in all humility of opinion that she never did, and never can, accomplish the least material or other result by it. Even suppose the great founder of their faith, or his disciples when alive, could achieve these wonders, it only makes it all the more clear that, for some cause or other, not understood, there has been a gradual weakening, until in our day it has dwindled to nothingness. Nor is this strange. In Christ's own time they were as impotent as now, for he said to them, "Verily I say unto you, if ye hav faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you." These are the words of God himself according to the book. If it was true then, it must be true now; and as I am desirous of fairly ascertaining just how much faith there is left in the world, I make the following proposition, in order to help the church out of her extremity, and to absolutely determin the power of prayer.

I waive all minor objections, and shall be willing to accede to any fair alteration of the forms hereinafter stated, not designing to act the part of a quibbler, my object being to do some good, after having waited patiently for years for some abler pen to set this matter forth in order to rid the church of the stigma cast upon her by designing enemies.

I propose that the Christian church shall assemble together, from all quarters of the globe, her most righteous members, to any number not exceeding one thousand, nor less than five hundred; of these numbers, or any proportion of them, at least one-half shall be women; and in any event, a fair proportion to be of the Roman Catholic faith; and I make these stipulations because I am anxious, as they worship the same Christ and the same God, to show a liberality of spirit that reaches and extends to all alike. Some may say that I limit the assembly to fewer numbers than I ought. To these I answer that I hav carefully considered this point, and allowed for the weakening of their power, which I know they will candidly admit; but if one person in Christ's day with faith only as large as a grain of mustard seed could move a mountain, ought not one thousand righteous persons, in our day, be able easily to accomplish the task I shall impose upon them? I pause for a reply. Others may be disposed to ask why I stipulate that one-half of the number shall be women. Honestly entertaining the views I now set forth, I must be allowed to say that, as I am extremely anxious for the entire success of this test, I would consider it destined to be a lamentable failure without the aid of woman. If there is, or ever was, the slightest efficacy in prayer, it must result from the fervent petitions to the most high made by the godly mothers, who in all ages hav been the salt of the earth, and in the prayers and petitions of a single one of whom I hav more faith than in the entreaties of any hundred men that ever lived.

On a momentous occasion like this I must state the whole truth, and I am thus obliged to say, though possibly it is my fault, as one of the unregenerate, that I never yet looked at a man praying but he instantly loomed up before me as an arrant hypocrit, and the words of the psalmist were verified, "They are encased in their own fat; with their mouths they speak proudly." This may arise from my being a man, and knowing them so well; but the book tells us that the "heart of man is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked," and also that "there is none that doeth good, no, not one."

Strong impressions are often received suddenly, cling to us tenaciously, and giv a tinge to our whole lives. I once stood by a casket and heard a cold, heartless Calvinistic minister, who only needed the five-pointed iron collar round his neck to complete his symmetry, con his dull routine of funereal prayer over the remains of a widow's only child and support, a daughter, who died in the sunrise of womanhood; and his icy formality, his unrelenting look, his hard, flinty tones, were far more repulsiv to me than the sound of the frozen clods as they tumbled on her coffin.

I once heard of a good Methodist brother (and I state it for a veritable fact) who found time, during his importunities at the throne of grace, to stop long enough to take a huge quid of tobacco, the better to implore the divine beneficence. These men, recollect, were great lights in their respectiv churches; yet to me both of them were guilty of nothing less than horrid blasphemy; and no woman ever could be guilty of the frigidity of the one nor the boorishness of the other, when prostrated before, and breathing utterances supposed to be winging their way to, the throne of the Most High God.

Whatever opinion I may entertain, as to the power of prayer in the abstract, the saintly petitions of the noble women of every age, in their love for the living and their sorrow for the dead, as they hav floated in tender pathos and melodious cadence to the realms beyond the music of the spheres, whether it be the blessed abodes of the pagan, the paradise of the Mohammedan, or the heaven of the Christian, command a heartfelt and deferential respect. It is not strange, therefore, that, permeated with this feeling, I make it imperativ that an equal number of this assembly be composed of women.

While I limit the number at the place selected, I do not object to all good people throughout the world joining in these exercises, should the church accede to my proposition. The unpremeditated words of the psalmist, spoken in an age of comparativ ignorance, "that their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world," hav a peculiar significance, in these days of the telegraph, that was never known before, nor intended by him.

If my proposition be accepted, it will fly on the wings of the lightning; and as the time approaches for the trial, the feeling will increase in intensity, and the electric currents of the universe throb in unison with the undertaking, and all kindreds, nations, peoples, and tongues join in the services. And at such a time it would not be strange if the so-called "Christian" nations of Europe, even if engaged in bloody conflict, over that horrid political nightmare, diplomatically called the "balance of power," should stay their hands, and for the period allotted to these services, remit their bacchanal of human butchery.

When the church has acceded to the terms heretofore and hereinafter mentioned, which I will do all in my power to make mutually satisfactory, there will be placed a rock weighing at least five tons on the south side of the Alleghany river at or near the city of Oil City, state of Pennsylvania, United States of America; and this praying-band is to assemble at any place to suit themselvs, but not closer than five hundred feet to the first position of said rock; nor are they to be allowed to approach closer than this distance, if the rock should mysteriously move from its original resting-place. They are to devote as much time as suits them of each day, for a period not to exceed one calendar month, in praying for the removal of said rock to a distance not to exceed one mile from its first position to its final resting-place (if success crowns their efforts), on what is known as the "Summit" on the north side of said Alleghany river, below and close to the city aforesaid.

The said rock to be closely watched during this time, day and night, by twelve disinterested persons, six believers and six unbelievers, who are to take portions of the twenty-four hours as may suit them, so that by no possibility can there be any deception or jugglery in the matter.

It may be asked why I refuse to allow them to approach nearer than five hundred feet to said rock. I answer, because I am fully convinced that whatever results can by the remotest possibility be attributed to prayer are simply the product of some form of electricity; and if I were to allow them to go too close, in their fervor they might evolve so much of the subtle fluid as to move the ponderous mass from its position, and thus wrongfully get credit for a miracle which would be the result only of natural causes. If any person or persons think this a whimsical cavil, I beg them to stop and consider while I offer a word of explanation.

During all their great revival meetings, which are generally crowded, they get all those whom they expect to convert in a close circle around the altar, where they can not only be near them, but touch them; and as the leaders of these revivals are generally in good physical health, having an easy living and little to do, while on the other hand those they act upon are, as a rule, inclined to weakness bodily and mentally, it is easy to see the revivalists hav a great advantage. And even if both parties are physically equal, the same theory will hold, as we all know what a tremendous power a great orator will exert, and he but a single person and his audience hundreds or even thousands. If it was the direct result of prayer, a gentle petition, floating silently to the throne of God, its action on an individual would be the same if he was in India and the prayer made in America. But nothing of the kind can be done by our modern prayer mongers. They must hav the individual close to them, and then, with the air surcharged with electricity, they can apparently accomplish inexplicable results, like the Spiritualists and necromancers. It is worthy of remark that Christ always laid on hands—touched the person or the person touched him—and at one time used clay. So we see in every instance a tinge of materiality.

To be sure, they often claim great wonders accomplished by individual prayers, but, like their oft-told miracles, they cannot prove them. If the church will organize this praying-band to my satisfaction and in conformity with the views herein expressed, and on such a basis as shall convince me of their absolute sincerity, then, within fifteen days after being duly notified by a responsible committee, composed of one member from each of the ten leading sects, when they will be in readiness, I agree to deposit, or cause to be deposited, in the Chemical National Bank of the city of New York, the sum of one million of dollars, "good and current coin of the realm;" said sum to be so placed previous to the commencement of said time of prayer for the before mentioned period of thirty days. And in case they are successful, and remove said rock as herein stipulated, then the said sum of one million dollars to be paid to the members of the band, or to such persons as the church shall direct.

Evil disposed persons may feel inclined to ask why I offer this large sum as an inducement for the accomplishment of this miracle, insinuating that the church ought to do all this and more, with an eye simply to the glory of God. To these I answer that as far as I myself am concerned, I hav no faith whatever in the church doing anything without she can see money in it; and although I do not altogether like this pecularity, yet for the sake of the vast good it will do, if successful, I willingly accede to this, her little peccadillo, without venturing any opinion pro or con on the matter.

It is further understood that if this rock is so moved to the said Summit, on a piece of land to be provided by me, of not less than five acres in extent, it is to be under my control, and for my sole use and benefit, for a period not to exceed ten years from the day it is without human agency removed to its final resting-place, where I agree to inclose it in a building abounding in all the magnificence of modern art, resplendent with mosaics, stained glass, marbles of every tint and hue, that nothing may be wanting to do honor to the modern wonder. At the end of ten years, being in as good condition as when first received, it is to be transferred, by a good and sufficient deed of general warranty, in such manner as the church shall direct.

As Oil City is the center of the great oil producing district which now illuminates the world, I hav fixed on it as the most proper site for a miracle which will do more for the spiritual enlightenment of the universe than anything that has occurred in thousands of years. The most of the miracles that we read of in the books were performed in the dusky periods of man's existence, when cunning and deception were the common property of the priesthood; and they were the only historians of their wondrous works. All the accounts we hav are the words of interested parties. And, although Judea was held during the time of Christ by a great Roman proconsul, he does not appear to hav noticed or sent any account to his government of the man, or the wonders he is said to hav performed.

But if any miracle such as I hav indicated can be done in this day of printing-presses, railways, telegraphs, and phonographs, it will be known the world over, and substantiated in such an irrefragable manner as to silence every doubter. Kings and princes of the earth will either come or send representativs to view the mighty wonder, and report to their people, so that every clime will know it to be the truth, and the reality of the Christian system impregnably established.

The church spends vast sums yearly in sending missionaries to China, India, and the ends of the earth; and although they hav been in full blast for over a century, their impression on these pagan millions has been so slight as to be hardly noticeable. It cannot be denied that one miracle like the one in question, which costs them but a trifle even if they fail—and they ought not to fail—and which if successful givs them a round million, is also a much more reasonable and direct way of spreading their faith. One absolute, undoubted, undeniable miracle, in this age of light and knowledge, will do more to bring the world to believe in Christianity than all the church has done in two thousand years.

Let no caviler find fault with the form of miracle selected. After due consideration, I finally concluded that something that could remain for the adoration of future ages would be by far the most likely to giv general satisfaction. I at first thought of suggesting the casting out of devils, but after thinking the matter over, it had its objections. In the first place, we hav no regular class who are known to be possessed of devils, as there were anciently. To be sure, I know many whom I believe to be possessed with one or more, but if I were to suggest this to them, it would go hard with me. For instance, the young clerical graduates who, a year or so ago, made such a row at the great theological nursery at Princeton, New Jersey. I believe they were possessed with devils, but if I were to go to them and ask them to be operated upon, they might use their revolvers on me, as such weapons are now indispensable to the proper education of a clergyman. Your ancient devil was a harmless creature, and not likely to be armed with a six-shooter, but even in devils progress tells as in everything else.

I found seven men who were all willing to aver their wives had each a raging, roaring devil, but when I asked each one in turn as to the likelihood of securing a specimen, they showed the same cowardly fear that I had of the young parsons of Princeton. Some of the clergy might think the writer of this would be a proper person; and I know several of the cloth that are as certainly possessed of one or more devils as that the sun shines at mid-day; but it being our mutual duty to conduct this great and beneficial undertaking, it will be seen that we cannot be spared, and the subjects must come from other quarters. Another thing—the clergy will never believe that a man who offers them a round million could by any possibility hav a devil concealed about his person.

Even if I could produce a legion of them, and get the swine, as I hav the steep place already secured, when they entered them and rushed down headlong that would be their finality, and there could not be produced a tangible evidence of the miracle. Nor could the church preserve it for the benefit of herself and after ages; therefore, on due reflection, I thought best to hold fast to the rock, which I hope will please all concerned.

As the preachers say, "one more remark, and I close." Those of us who keep our eyes open know it is an every-day occurrence for the clergy to hav their pockets full of railway and other passes, since we can hardly go into the offices of our great railway corporations, for the purpose of legitimate business, without being elbowed by a bevy of clergymen interviewing the high officials for special favors whereby they may ride gratis. Our railway magnates are generally Christian men, or at least men high in the church, which is the same thing, and well understand that much good may be done by a judicious distribution of passes among senators, representativs, legislators, (very) common councilmen, and clergymen, so that ordinarily we find no fault with their "good works."

But at a time when so much is pending we can allow of no time-serving; consequently it will require a voucher from three persons of undoubted character that no member of this praying-band shall hav traveled any part of his or her journey on a pass furnished gratis by any railway or other corporation. This is not interpolated here for the purpose of making invidious comparisons; but if the disciples expect to be imbued with the lofty self-abnegation and power of the master, the contrast ought not to be too great between them and the man of Galilee.

He endured contumely, the crown of thorns, the agony of the cross, and the point of the spear. When he went from Capernaum to Tiberias, he sailed in a fishing-smack; when he journeyed from Jerusalem to Jericho, he trudged wearily along on foot; and only on one occasion does he appear to hav traveled in any state, and then he rode on an ass and entered the holy city in the midst of hosannas and palm-branches. What a picture when contrasted with our

IV.—Objective Maxims.

CHAPTER XVIII.—DOMESTIC REFORM.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

In the nest-building propensity of the social insects the biologist can recognize the first germ of the instinctive desire for the establishment of a permanent home. Certain birds, like the weaver-thrush of the tropics, imitate the community life of the ant and bee, but in all higher animals the homestead instinct is associated with the desire for domestic privacy. The eagle will suffer no other bird to approach the rock that shelters his eyrie; the hawk, the heron, and the kingfisher rear their brood at the greatest possible distance from the nesting-place of their next relatives. Each pair of squirrels tries to get a tree all to themselves; and even the social prairie-dog shares its home with strangers (owls and serpents) rather than with another family of its own tribe. The "homestead instinct" of our primitive forefathers formed the first, and perhaps the most potent, stimulus to the acquisition of personal property. There is a period in life when the desire for the possession of a private domicile asserts itself with the power almost of a vital passion; and success in the realization of that desire solves in many respects the chief problems of individual existence. The love of domestic peace, the delight in the improvement of a private homestead, are the best guarantees of staid habits. There was a time when the neglect of husbandry was considered a conclusive proof of profligate habits; and the office of a Roman censor comprised the duty of reproving careless housekeepers. The poorest citizen of the Roman commonwealth had a little patrimonium of his own, a dwelling-house, an orchard, and a small lot of land, which he did his best to improve, and where his children learned their first lesson of personal rights in defense of their private playgrounds.

The ruins of Pompeii show that the civilization of the Mediterranean coast-lands had anticipated the conclusion of our sanitarian reformers, who recommend the advantage of cottage-suburbs as a remedy for the horrors of tenement life. Between the acropolis and the seaside villas the town forms an aggregation of small dwelling-houses, mostly one-story, but each with a private yard (probably a little garden) or a wide portico, with bath-room and private gymnasiums. And though the ancients were well acquainted with the manufacture of glass, their dwelling-houses were lighted by mere lattice-windows, excluding rain and the glare of the sun, but freely admitting every breeze, and thus solving the problem of ventilation in the simplest and most effective manner. The dwellings of our Saxon forefathers, too, resembled the log-cabins of the Kentucky backwoods, and admitted fresh air so freely that the large family-hearth could dispense with a chimney, and vented its smoke through the open eaves of the roof. In the palaces of the Roman patricians there were special winter-rooms, with a smoke-flue resembling a narrow alcove; but even there, ventilation was insured by numerous lattice doors, communicating with as many balconies or terrace roofs.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

The evolution of all hereditary instincts has been explained by the "survival of the fittest," and the instinct of homestead-love has doubtlessly been developed in the same way. The results of its predominance prevailed against the results of its absence. Defensive love of a private "hearth and home" is the basis of patriotism, so unmistakably, indeed, that the fathers of the Roman republic for centuries refused to employ foreign mercenaries, who had no personal interest in the defense of the soil. As a modern humorist has cleverly expressed it: "Few men have been patriotic enough to shoulder a musket in defense of a boarding-house." And the golden age of civic virtues is almost limited to the time when every free citizen of Greece and Rome was a landowner.

Nor would it be easy to overrate the subjective advantages of home-life. Health, happiness, and longevity have no more insidious foe than the canker-worm of vexation; and for the unavoidable disappointments of social life there is no more effective specific than the peace of a prosperous private homestead, soothing the mind with evidences of success in the growth of a promising orchard, in the increase and improvement of domestic animals, in the happiness of merry children and contented dependents. Xenophon, after proving the excitements of an adventurous life by land and sea, found a truer happiness in the solitude of his Arcadian hunting-lodge. Felix Sylla, Fortune's most constant favorite, abandoned the throne of a mighty empire to enjoy the frugal fare of a small hill-farm. Voltaire, worn out by the trials of a fifty years' life-and-death struggle against the rancor of bigots, recovered his health and his peace of mind amidst the pear-tree plantations of Villa Ferney.

In the resources of medicine and scientific surgery the ancients were far behind even the half-civilized nations of modern times, but their children could enjoy their holidays on their own playground, their sleepers could breathe pure air, their worn-out laborers could retire to the peace of a private home; and they enjoyed a degree of health and vigor which our most progressive nations can hope to re-attain only after centuries of sanitary reform.

C.—PERVERSION.

The germ of the ignoble patience which submits to the miseries of modern tenement-life, and learns to prefer the fetor of a crowded slum-alley to the free air of the woods and fields, can be traced to the voluntary prison-life of the first Christian monasteries. With all the gregariousnsss of the African race, the very slaves of our American plantations preferred to avoid quarrels and constraint by building a separate cabin for the use of each family; but the ethics of the Galilean church recognized no privilege of personal rights; the sympathies of family-life were crushed out by the enforcement of celibacy; every symptom of self-assertion was denounced as a revolt against the duty of passive subordination; the very instincts of individuality were systematically suppressed to make each convert a whining, emasculated, self-despising, and world-renouncing "member of the church of Christ." The mortification of the body being the chief object of monastic seclusion, the hygienic architecture of convent buildings was considered a matter of such absolute unimportance that many of the cells (dormitories) had no windows at all, but merely a door communicating with an ill-ventilated gallery, after the plan of our old-style prisons. Eight feet by ten, and eight high, were the usual dimensions of those man-pens; and that utter indifference to the physical health of the inmates was but rarely seconded by a view to the advantages of private meditation is proved by the circumstance that the convent-slaves of the eastern church (in the Byzantine empire, for instance) were not often permitted to enjoy the privacy of their wretched dens; their dormitories were packed like the bunks of a Portuguese slave-ship, and the word Syncellus (cell-mate) is used as a cognomen of numerous ecclesiastics. The abbot, and in less ascetic centuries perhaps the learned clerks (legend-writers, etc.), were the only members of a monastic community who could ever rely on the privacy of a single hour. For the admitted purpose of mortifying their love of physical comforts, the weary sleepers, worn-out with penance and hunger, were summoned to prayer in the middle of the night, or sent out on begging expeditions in the roughest weather. Every vestige of furniture or clothing apt to mitigate the dreariness of discomfort was banished from their cells; they suffered all the hardships without enjoying the peace and security of a hermit's home; novices (on probation), and even the pupils of the convent-schools, were submitted to a similar discipline, and thus monasticism became the training-school of modern tenement-life.

During the latter half of the Middle Ages, feudalism found an additional motive for suppressing the love of domestic independence. The church usurers and aristocrats monopolized real estate, and made it more and more difficult, even for the most industrious of their dependents, to acquire a share of landed property. Every feudal lord secured his control over his serfs by crowding them together in a small village (literally an abode of villains, i.e., of vile pariahs), where his slave-drivers could at any time rally them for an extra job of socage duty. The incessant raids of mail-clad highway-robbers—robber knights and marauding partisans—obliged all peace-loving freemen to congregate for mutual protection and rear their children in the stone prisons of an over-crowded burgh. The suppression of all natural sciences, including the science of health, aggravated the evil by a persistent neglect of such partial remedies as disinfectants and artificial ventilation. The home of a medieval artisan combined all the disadvantages of a jail and a pest-house.

The revolt against feudalism has at last broken the stone-fetters of our larger cities; city walls have been turned into promenades, and convents into store-houses or lunatic asylums; but the spirit of monasticism still survives; indifference to the blessings of health and domestic independence seem to have acquired the strength of a second nature, and thousands of our modern factory slaves actually prefer their slum-prisons to the freedom of a cheaper suburban home.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

Nature rarely fails to avenge the violation of her laws, but it might be doubted if the perversion of any other natural instinct has entailed more numerous or direr penalties than our habitual outrages against the instinct of home-life. The monstrosities of our tenement system, by a moderate estimate, cost on the average every year the lives of 1,500,000 children under ten years of age (in Europe and North America), and of 1,200,000 consumptives, besides thousands of victims to epidemic disorders, aggravated, if not engendered, by the influence of vitiated air. Habitual intemperance, too, has undoubtedly been increased by the dearth of home-comforts. Our factory-laborers, our mechanics, and thousands of students and young clerks, spend their evenings in riot, because the man-trap of the lowest grog-shop is, after all, less unattractive than the dungeon of a stifling tenement home. In many of our larger cities similar causes have led to a constant increase of a manner of existence which a modern reformer calls the "celibacy of vice." But the decreasing demand for independent homes is not the only cause of the decreased supply, and the heartless selfishness of our wealthy land-gluttons has provoked a form of nihilism which threatens to shake, if not to subvert, the very foundations of social life.

E.—REFORM.

That latter danger seems, at last, to have awakened our political economists to the necessity of redressing a many-sided abuse, and the failure of earlier reform projects has at least helped to emphasize the demand for more adequate remedies. The traffic in human life in the floating hells of the African slave-traders hardly called for more stringent repressive measures than the inhumanity of our tenement speculators who fatten on the profits of a system propagating the infallible seeds of pulmonary consumption, and sacrificing the lives of more children than the superstition of the dark ages ever doomed to the altars of Moloch. Even in a country where the jealousy of personal rights would hardly countenance legislative interference with the construction of private dwelling-houses, the license of tenement-owners ought to be circumscribed by the conditions of Dr. Paul Boettger's rule, providing for appropriation of a certain number of cubic feet of breathing space, and square feet of window, front, and garden (or play-ground) room for each tenant or family of tenants. The abuse of sub-renting could be limited by similar provisions, and the adoption of the separate cottage plan should be promoted by the reduction of municipal passenger tariffs and suburban taxes.

The plan of equalizing the burden of taxation and the opportunities of land tenure by a general confiscation and redistribution of real estate might recommend itself as a last resort, though hardly in preference to the project of Fedor Bakunin, the "Russian Mirabeau," who proposed to found new communities under a charter, reserving the tenth part of all building lots for communal purposes, and lease the tenant-right to the highest bidder. The value of those reserve lots would increase with the growth of the town, and by renewing their lease from ten to ten years, the rent could be made to cover the budget of all direct municipal expenses, and leave a fair surplus for charitable and educational purposes. In comparison with the confiscation plan, that project could claim all the advantages which make prevention preferable to a drastic cure.

As a check to the evils of land monopoly the least objectionable plan would seem to be Professor De Graaf's proposition of a graded system of real estate taxation, increasing the rate of tallage with each multiple of a fair homestead lot, and thus taxing a land-shark for the privilege of acquisition, as well as for the actual possession, of an immoderate estate.

The art of making home-life pleasant will yet prove the most effective specific in the list of temperance remedies, and will aid the apostles of Secularism in that work of redemption which the gospel of renunciation has failed to achieve.

Did the Mother of Jesus Think Him Insane?

At the beginning of the ministry of Jesus Christ, after he had cast out many unclean spirits and chosen his twelve disciples, the next event, as recorded in Mark, is as follows:

> And they went into an house. And the multitude cometh together again so that they could not so much as eat bread. And when his friends heard of it they went out to lay hold on him, for they said, He is beside himself. And the scribes which came down from Jerusalem said, He hath Beelzebub, and by the prince of devils casteth he out devils (Mark iii, 19–22).

The Syriac version reads:

> And they came to the house. . . . And his kinsmen heard and went out to take him, for they said, He is out of his reason.

The house was undoubtedly the home of Jesus and his mother, as appears from the same chapter a little further on, to wit:

> There came then his brethren and his mother, and standing without, sent unto him, calling him. And the multitude sat about him, and they said unto him, Behold thy mother and thy brethren seek for thee.

Furthermore, the Revised Version concedes in a note that the "house" was the "home" of Jesus.

This passage has annoyed the commentators. Dr. Doddridge remarks:

> Our manner of rendering these words, "He is beside himself," or "He is mad," is very offensiv. One can hardly think Christ's friends [kinsmen in the Syriac] would speak so contemptibly and impiously of him; and if that sense must necessarily be retained, it would be much more decent to render the clause, "It (that is, the multitude) is mad," thus unseasonably to break in upon him.

Schotengen contends for the samo interpretation—that the multitude, not Christ, was mad; and Adam Clarke says: "This conjecture should not be lightly regarded."

But, alas! the passage is allowed to stand unchanged in the Revised Version, and there is no escape from the plain, literal sense, to wit, that not only the scribes, but the brethren of Jesus, and even his own mother, believed he was mad. She who, according to Matthew and Luke, had conceived him by the Holy Ghost was constrained to admit that he was insane. Multitudes had come not only from Galilee, but from Judea, Idumea, Tyre, and Sidon, to see the wonders he performed. And as the unclean spirits departed at his command, the people fell down, saying, "Thou art the son of God." Jesus modestly charged them not to make him known, and withdrew into a mountain where he chose twelve disciples whom he commissioned to preach and cast out devils. On returning to his home the multitude came again. But his kinsmen, hearing of his performances, came out and said, "He is out of his reason." They agreed with the scribes, only leaving out Beelzebub, the prince of devils. Undoubtedly the mother of Jesus regarded him as insane, for presently when he was told, "Behold thy mother and thy brethren without seek for thee," he answered: "Who is my mother or my brethren?" And looking around upon his chosen disciples he added, "Behold my mother and my brethren."

Mark is consistent in all this, for he ignores the miraculous birth of Jesus, and only once again alludes to his mother, thus:

> Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James. and Joses, and Juda, and Simon? And are not his sisters here with us? (Mark vi, 3.)

Two Marys are mentioned by Mark as distant spectators of the crucifixion, but neither was the mother of Jesus. And the same two Marys bring sweet spices to the sepulcher, but where was the mother of the martyr? Being an unbeliever, and regarding her son as insane, she would be likely to remain at home deploring his sad fate.

It is worthy of note that only the fourth gospel describes the mother of Jesus as present at the crucifixion, and she is not afar off, like the women mentioned in the other gospels, but at the very foot of the cross. Credat Judæus appella!

Religious Delusions.

THEIR STULTIFYING AND DESTRUCTIV POWER, ILLUSTRATED IN THE HISTORY OF THE ECONOMITE SOCIETY, LOCATED ON THE RIGHT BANK OF THE OHIO RIVER, AND TWENTY MILES BELOW PITTSBURGH.

George Rapp, the founder and life-long director of the above named association, was a humble vine-dresser in Wurtemburg, Germany, toward the close of the last century. He was a deeply religious man, after the order of the Pietists; and, disgusted with the worldliness of the clergy and members of the church established by law, gathered around him a number of followers, who, while waiting for the kingdom of God to appear, made a business of cultivating what is called the religious sentiment. The national church, although named after Luther, who broke with Rome and Catholicism by advocating the right of private judgment, persecuted the little handful of Rappites, thus proving that what a churchman, even a Lutheran, means, when he preaches up the right of private judgment, is, that all men hav a right to believe his creed, but not their own. Annoyed by this new sect, which was a silent but standing rebuke to their lack of spirituality, the clergy were determined to crush out of existence Rapp and his followers, although, in point of numbers, they were comparativly insignificant, and although they were without reproach in regard to their moral character. They called them Separatists and Schismatics, and denounced Rapp for preaching without any ordination. They had police officers appointed to watch them on Sundays, and on Mondays these sincere and simple-minded men would be summoned to appear before the magistrates, and be fined for their attendance at unauthorized conventicles; those who were too poor to pay the fine being sent to prison. The clergy, with a malicious bent which only religion can inspire a mortal with, got up a petition to the king, asking him to issue a decree of banishment against Rapp and his followers. The king, who had some ideas of justice and mercy, and whose religion was only perfunctory, on reading the petition, inquired: "Who are these people whom you wish to hav banished? Are they good subjects? Do they pay their taxes?" And on being informed that that they punctually paid their dues of all kinds to both church and state, he tore the document to pieces, like a man of common sense who had a heart in his bosom, and said: "Then, let them believe as they please." But the clergy, notwithstanding the refusal of the king to gratify them by issuing a decree of banishment, continued their opposition by stirring up against them the mayors and burgesses of the neighboring towns; and they kept up their fines, imprisonments, and other cruel oppressions, for several years, until the Rappites could bear it no longer; and so, like the Pilgrims of the Mayflower, they resolved to leave their nativ land and to seek a home in the New World and under a flag that was pledged for the protection of the rights of man as man.

Accordingly, in 1803, at the request of his people, Rapp, accompanied by his son John, and several others, visited this country, and ultimately purchased about five thousand acres of wild land in Butler county, Pa., about twenty-five miles north of Pittsburgh; where, in the following year, more than a hundred families crossed the ocean and joined them. Here they found what they came for but could not find in Germany, freedom of conscience and worship, none either wishing or daring to molest them and make them afraid. Stimulated and strengthened by the spirit of liberty, they immediately went about clearing off the forest, erecting dwellings, factories, hotel, church, and school-house. They remained at this place ten years; but it being away from any navigable river, and having no market for their superabundant productions, and no soil well adapted to the cultivation of the grape, they sold out, at great sacrifice, and purchased a larger tract of land on the Wabash river in the state of Indiana. Here they began, the second time, the work of improvement. Lands were cleared and converted into fruitful fields; houses of all kinds and for all purposes were erected; and their wealth steadily increased. But after ten years' residence in Indiana, finding that the location was not wholesome, and their neighbors not such as they liked, being chiefly settlers from the Southern states, who had brought with them the vices growing out of the slave-holding institution, they concluded to make another change, and return to Pennsylvania. They offered an Englishman named Flower $5,000 to find them a purchaser of their property; and he, going to Scotland, laid the matter before Robert Owen, the eminent philanthropist of New Lanark, and to him sold the property, consisting of the town of New Harmony, with all its houses, mills, factories, etc., etc., 20.000 acres of land, cleared and uncleared, for $150,000.

When they determined on a removal from Indiana at all events, they sent out a commission to select a place, and when the sale of their property to Mr, Owen was consummated they purchased their present lands on the Ohio river, in Beaver county, Pennsylvania, and having built a steamboat for the purpose, they removed in detachments the whole family, then consisting of about a thousand people, to that place. This was in 1825. The new town they here founded they called Economy. It lies high above the level of the river, on a beautiful plain, which extends about four miles up and down the right bank of the Ohio, and slopes gently off to the high grounds in the north, from which it is supplied with water. The town is laid off in streets sixty feet wide, at right angles with each other, lined with trees, and has long been known as one of the most beautiful and wholesome locations in the country.

Being a community, and like the primitiv Christian church, having all things in common; industrious and frugal upon principle; directed by wise and unselfish leaders in all their business affairs, the Economites, under Mr. Rapp as their spiritual guide and his adopted son Frederic as business manager, became very prosperous. Like the fabled Midas, everything they touched turned into gold, till their wealth now runs up into the millions. They hav the reputation, which they well deserve, of being entirely just and honorable in all their dealings. Indeed, if a deep sense of honor and justice, exhibiting itself constantly in the practical duties of life, were allowed to constitute religion, I would hav no hesitation in saying that they hav proved themselvs to be the most religious body of people in the country. During our civil war, while not a drop of American blood flowed in the veins of any one of them, they evinced as much patriotism as our nativ-born people, for they had not forgotten the galling bondage they were subjected to in Germany, and daily contrasted it with the absolute liberty they enjoyed under the American flag; and although they furnished no soldiers for the army, for the best of all reasons, because they had no men young enough to serve, they gave freely of their means to preserve the Republic, and make it forever one and indivisible. They contributed without stint for the equipment of volunteers, for special bounties for the families of absent soldiers, for the fortification of Pittsburgh, for the relief of the freedmen of the South, for the support of soldiers' widows and for the education of their orphan children.

THE SECOND ADVENT VIEWS OF THE ECONOMITES.

There is a wonderful discrepancy of opinion among Christian theologians in regard to what, with singular inappropriatenes, they call "eschatology," or the science of the last times and things, and whoever reads the Bible as he does any other book will see the reason why. There are no less than three hundred passages in the New Testament which allude to this subject, either expressly of incidentally, and to do anything like justice to the matter in hand, it is proper to giv some quotations. The careful reader of the New Testament will find abundant proof that Jesus predicted and his disciples—especially the apostles—firmly believed and expected that, after his death, he would return to the earth to set up his visible kingdom, and that this event would take place during the life-time of the generation then living. In Matt. xvi, 27, 28, Jesus is recorded as saying:

> For the son of man shall come in the glory of his father, with his angels. . . Verily, I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the son of man coming in his kingdom."

In Mark ix, 27, and Luke ix, 26, nearly the same words are repeated. Matt. xxiv, 3, records:

> And as he sat upon the Mount of Olives the disciples came unto him privately, saying, Tell us when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?

Jesus answers this question by dwelling on the preceding events with much circumstance, and then says in the twenty-ninth verse:

> Immediately after the tribulation of these days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not giv her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn; and they shall see the son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory; and he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect, from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. Now, learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh; so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors. Verily, I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away.

When Jesus was asked by his disciples to teach them how to pray, he gave them a model suitable to their circumstances, and remarkable for its brevity. The first and only general petition in it was, "Thy kingdom come," the rest referring merely to the supply of their daily and natural wants, and the condition of mind of those who were brethren and members of a temporary community, looking forward to a great event in the near future. The kingdom they were directed to pray for was this visible kingdom before mentioned, during which he would reign with his saints upon the earth; a kingdom which was to be set up where, according to his repeated promis, he should "be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel."

As the predicted time drew nearer and nearer, and the disciples began to realize their situation, and to become solicitous for the future, Peter (Matt. xix, 27) is reported as saying to Jesus: "Behold, we hav forsaken all and followed thee, what shall we hav therefore?" Jesus comforted him with the assurance that "ye which hav followed me in the great regeneration which is to take place when the son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel," etc.

The mother of Zebedee's children was similarly affected, and believing firmly in the promis of his second coming, came to Jesus with a specific request indicating a proud woman's ambition: "Grant that these my two sons (James and John) may sit, the one on thy right hand and the other on thy left, in thy kingdom."

In reading the epistles of Paul to the Corinthians, Philippians, Colossians, Thessalonians, Timothy, and Titus, we see, in passages too numerous to be quoted in a weekly journal, that he and the primitiv church expected the second coming of Christ to take place in their day with as much confidence as we expect the rising of to-morrow's sun. The Christians were constantly in a condition of waiting, just as a crowd of passengers in a railroad station listen for the whistle of the locomotiv, and the arrival of the cars which are to carry them to the places of their destination. They are there for the purpose of going away, and nothing else. In like manner, the primitiv disciples, expecting, as they did every moment, to hear the sound of the archangel's trump announcing the approach of the son of man in the clouds of heaven, neglected all earthly vocations but what were required to supply their immediate wants. Hence they threw their property into a common fund, to be drawn upon by everyone as he had need. Hence Paul's unworthy definition of marriage, which has been incorporated into the codes of all Christian nations, and which has had so much to do in causing the degradation of woman. Hence, also, that asceticism in morals, and that abstention from everything like pleasure, which he preached, with the rest of the apostles, and which was all proper enough, if the coming of the Lord and the end of the world were at hand, but which was out of place entirely if that expectation was a delusion, and the world and its affairs were to continue indefinitly as they had been.

TWO THINGS WANTED.

First. We want some money from every friend who owes on his subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The balance in the bank from which to draw to satisfy the paper manufacturers and the printer is very small, and we must increase it, or run in debt. There are many hundreds of dollars owing us by subscribers, and we desire to kindly but firmly call their attention to the matter. We need the money, and it is not right for them to keep it from us. We would also respectfully suggest to those whose subscriptions expire during the present month that now is the time to renew. We would call attention, too, to our club rates. Get a new subscriber, and so get your own paper cheaper.

Second. We once more ask our friends to send us the names of all the Infidels of their acquaintance who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER. The intention is to send them sample copies of the paper with the hope that they may subscribe.

Our Good Guardians.

The most fervent want of most Americans is to be let alone. When a male or female arrives at manhood's or womanhoods' estate he or she is very apt, standing up straight in the sun, to say of himself or herself: "I can take care of myself; will you, good folks, kindly keep your hands off my person, and your nose out of my affairs? If I choose to go to church, I shall do so. If I choose to reject the tenets of Christianity, that's my business, and you've no right to make me pay for preaching superstition. If I choose to admire a picture or possess it, that's my affair. If I choose to drink a glass of wine, it's my stomach that is warmed or injured, not yours. If I choose to hold heretical notions, I hav just as good a right to advocate them as you hav to advocate anything else, and I don't want your police to break my head; if they do, I'll strike back. If I choose to go out-doors Sunday and sit down on the damp ground, the cold I catch makes me sneeze, not you, and my nose is my own. You can go to church if you desire, and get your nose filled with dust. If I chance to listen to a brass band on Sunday, my tympanum suffers, but my deafness doesn't prevent your hearing. In short, my dear good people, your business is your own; my business is my own, and so long as I do not tread on your toes, you will please keep off from mine." That is about the way the average American man or woman feels who is neither religious nor a fanatic.

There is, however, a vast distance between this prayer and its realization. Unfortunately religion and fanaticism are not extinct qualities in the human animal, and these are the basis of unlimited tyranny. A great many people, explains Mr. Benson, hav no faults of their own to worry about, and so devote the major portion of their time to worrying over the faults of others. In this way they make themselvs miserable, and as misery loves company, they band together, form societies, congregations, parties, to worry in unison at the wickedness of other folks. From time immemorial we hav had the preachers to worry for us about heaven. Their solicitude for the human race is simply immense in volume. It is also peculiar in kind. They hav made the most minute regulations for the care of the people—to preserve their health, their sanctity, and their reverence for God and fear of the priests. To keep us in health they forbid us to eat meat on a certain day in the week; we must not go fishing on Sunday, because the Lord drowns Sunday fishermen; we must not even go out of town, or play ball, or listen to music, because these are things which corrupt. In days gone by, the priests were so solicitous for the salvation of the people that they built dungeons in which to guard them from contamination. To make them confess Christ they had ingenious machines with which to tear doubters apart. And, having won the skeptic to Christ, they killed him lest he backslide into a worse fire than the one they kindled around his form. The world can never do too much for its priests.

Besides the priests there are other religious folks who deserve consideration. There is the good Anthony Comstock and his society, with our industrious soapmaking friend Colgate at the head, and an "executiv committee" to carefully consider what pictures we may possess or view. In its zeal for the purity of the people, this society has had laws enacted enabling Mr. Comstock to draw four thousand dollars a year as agent, and get his pictures for nothing but the trouble of seizing them. It is a beneficent society, indeed, and it is difficult to see how Mr. Comstock could make a living without it.

Then we hav Mr. Crosby's society to take care of our stomachs on Sunday, and for the suppression of crime generally. Our Prohibition friends, too, are much concerned that on secular days no maddening beer or manufactured wine, nor distilled strong liquids, shall creep into our mouths to steal our brains away. It is so kind of them to regulate in the name of God the living of the world. They ought to go a little further and publish a bill of fare. It would make the people vastly better if no hot biscuits, nor spiced sauces, nor stimulating mince pies were eaten. But we recognize the lofty aims of the pious Prohibitionists, and no doubt the bill of fare will come when strong drink is entirely a thing of the past.

And good Mr. Bergh—what could New York do without him? It is much better, very much better, that the wife and children of a brutal truckman should go hungry while he is in jail than that he should strike his horse. And what a blessing the children's society is! Hundreds of little ones are taken every year from parents who do not love them to be cared for by strange but charitable people who will bring them up in religion and religious ways, until perchance they too shall form societies to worry about others' faults.

Then we hav the association of the ministers who are looking to the regeneration of the world by keeping holy the Sabbath. On that day no desperate German may hearken to the little German band where beer shall flow, and no one else may do aught that shall peril his soul's salvation. 'Tis a mad world, and without this constant unsolicited solicitude on the part of the clergy who shall say what damage might not be done? The managers of our museums, too, are unremitting in restraining the worldly from viewing statuary, pictures, and treasures which might distract their minds from a beatific contemplation of their waistbands, and peril eternity for them. The people do not know what is best for them; some one must guide them, and the trustees of our museums deserve remembrance for their efforts in behalf of this great foolish public, which knows only enough to pay for museums, not when to look at the contents.

All over the country do we see the same efforts made by those called to the work to keep stumbling humanity from falling into pitfalls. Were these efforts rewarded with the success they deserve, these good folks would long ago hav been translated to heaven. In view of their number, moreover, it is surprising that the human race is not ornamented with wings. That they are not angels is due to the wonderful amount of perverseness in the human heart, which rebels at wholesome disciplin and impatiently execrates the sinless ones who are worrying themselvs to death over the depravity of their fellow-creatures.

The next society formed should be one to inculcate the practical precept, "Mind your own business." Mr. Comstock, Mr. Crosby, Mr. Whitney, Mr. Simmons, the Priests, the Prohibitionists, the God in-the-Constitution party, and innumerable other Christians should be invited to join.

The American Party.

A highly esteemed correspondent inquires of us concerning the new "American party," a statement of whose purposes he has seen, which are "to restrict immigration, to fill this country with men who are in favor of American ideas, freedom of speech and action, but within the law and under the Constitution of the United States; to suppress Anarchy, and to enforce the American idea of no public funds for sectarian use."

We cannot answer this inquiry better, perhaps, than by quoting from the documents of the party. The card sent by the "Provisional Committee," which appears to hav charge of the party's affairs, to those it has reason to believe may join, is as follows:

"AMERICA FOR AMERICANS."

The platform of principles adopted by the American Party in convention at Philadelphia, September 16 and 17, 1887, covers, in brief, the following poin'ts:

1. Restriction of immigration.
2. Extension of the time required for naturalization to fourteen years.
3. The protection and promotion of the American Free School System.
4. American lands for American settlers.
5. No public funds for sectarian uses.

If you indorse the above and are willing to act with the American Party for the furtherance of its principles, sign your name and address below, and forward to

"The Provisional Committee,"
157 Broadway, New York.

Accompanying this card is a small four-page circular of arguments in support of these principles. The committee begins by saying that it proscribes no man on account of his color, birthplace, religion, or condition in life, but regards with distrust and fear the large numbers of foreigners landing upon our shores who hav no sympathy with our laws, who would turn liberty into license, and who are unfitted by ignorance to become desirable American citizens. The committee complains that our manufacturing industries and our mercantil business are passing into the hands of foreigners, and that foreign corporations are seizing our public lands and mercilessly evicting American settlers. The committee further asserts that while our public school system is endangered by these foreigners, and our public funds are applied to sectarian uses, neither one of the great political parties dares to enact protecting laws, and that it is useless to look to them for help. The committee demands "an entire separation of church and state, and that every religious denomination should support its institutions." The committee does not intend to reflect upon any particular religion, but includes "each and every denomination that so far forgets itself and the rights of others as to ask and receive material aid from the public treasury."

It will be seen by this that the American party is both broad and narrow, just and unjust, in its principles, and sufficiently vague in its statements of them to leave us in doubt concerning its ultimate object. Its demand that the "Anarchist and Socialist should be inhibited from becoming American citizens" would be difficult of enforcement, and besides is narrow in spirit. Roman Catholics are infinitly more dangerous to our institutions than either Anarchists or Socialists; why not include them in the inhibition, if disfranchisment of dangerous people is to be adopted? The second plank, extending the time required for naturalization, has much to be said for it. In many instances a longer period than five years is not required, but thousands and thousands of ignorant peasants do require at least three times that length of time to become intelligent citizens. This is a question merely of political expediency. The third plank is a good one if the intention of the new party is to exclude religious as well as sectarian teaching from the schools. The fourth plank, "American lands should be reserved for American settlers," is also good if the word American be left out. The public lands should be kept for actual settlers, and no one man, or company of men, should be allowed more than he can use in cultivation. The land already squandered on railroad corporations should be reclaimed wherever the corporation has failed to comply with the requirements of the law granting it. The fifth plank of the new party is "that no public funds or property, or money raised by taxation, shall be applied to sectarian uses." This is all right so far as it goes, and if the party means to go to the length of prohibiting public money from being given to any religious institution, then Freethinkers can support this plank.

We hav been particular in calling attention to the incompleteness of the school and church planks, for the reason that there is in this city another society whose demands on these matters are almost identical in language with the words of the American party, and yet the society is one of the worst enemies of true governmental justice, and a stalwart opponent of real separation of church and state. The name of the other society is the Evangelical Alliance, and it talks seemingly fair in order to keep the schools and state money from falling into the hands of the Roman Catholics. Its pretensions and professions are the hollow hypocrisy of a rogue pleading for plunder taken from a confederate.

The headquarters of the American party are at 157 Broadway, and Andrew Powell is the chairman of the provisional committee. The Evangelical Alliance headquarters are No. 42 Bible House, with James M. King as chairman of the legislativ committee. The headquarters of the American Secular Union, the only party which is just right on these school and church matters, is at 750 West Lake street, Chicago, Ill., with E. A. Stevens as secretary.

The Economites.

Our Pittsburgh correspondent, the first part of whose letter we publish on another page, has evidently been making himself acquainted with the history of the famous Economite Society, which, for the last forty years, has attracted so much attention in Western Pennsylvania, Eastern Ohio, and the oil regions, where they hav great interests, in the state of New York. As the community approaches its destiny, many people are speculating as to what will become of the vast wealth they hav accumulated when the last man of the incorporated society dies. As our correspondent observes, the solution of this question is unknown to all but the party most deeply concerned—or, rather, the least deeply interested—for what can they care for the hereafter of wealth whose bodies are so soon to become the food of worms, and whose names will pass into the shades of eternal forgetfulness?

A dogma has the reputation of being a dry, steril, tasteless piece of worm-eaten hard-tack, constituting the wretched diet on which bigotry feeds. It is the ipse dixit of a churchman who has assumed authority in the world of mind to dictate to all the rest what they shall believe, and how they shall worship. To ask the reason why is deemed an insult and a crime: an insult to the divine authority embodied in the church and priesthood, and a crime against the life of the soul of him who doubts. The dogmas constitute a family. They breed among themselvs, and hence the deformity of their offspring. The mother dogma of all is original sin, or the total depravity that came upon us by reason of Adam's transgression in the imaginary Garden of Eden. It is not strange that so ugly a dam should produce such ugly offspring—eternal hell fire, vicarious atonement, the monster doctrin of a three-headed deity, a God-man savior, reprobation to eternal suffering of the vast majority, and the election to eternal blessedness of a mere handful.

But, as far as we can see, the dogma of the second coming of Christ, which our correspondent calls attention to as giving its death-wound to the Economite Society, stands out disassociated with all the rest; unless, indeed, it is a vamping up, or second growth, of the Jewish notion of a messiah, who was expected to come in the latter times, redeem Israel from bondage, and reëstablish the throne of David at Jerusalem. But be this as it may, this dogma seems to hav a distinction all its own, in that it has shed more blood and made more fools than any other of the dogmas of the church. Its reign of bloodshed, during the time of the Crusades, covered the essential parts of three hundred years; and as to what our Pittsburgh correspondent calls its "stultifying" power—from the Latin word stultus, a fool—it makes fools in our day of as gigantic a size as it did in apostolic times, or during the Crusades. We once personally knew a man who, at the beginning of his career, was one of Mr. Miller's converts, and sat shivering with the rest all of one night in the year 1843 in his ascension robes, waiting to hear the archangel's trump, and to see Jesus coming in the clouds of heaven, when they were to meet him—in the air. But as in apostolic and Crusade times, so it was in 1843; the day set for this event had its calm sunrise, its effulgent noon, and quiet sunset, just like all the other days which hav gone, and helped to make up the past eternity of time, and no Jesus made his appearance. The next morning the idea began to dawn upon the mind of our friend that the Bible had made a fool of him, and a laughing-stock to all his neighbors, who improved the opportunity of cracking jokes at the expense of his credulity. This led him to some free thinking, which, of course, resulted in his redemption from folly, and in his becoming a philosopher, one who understands in some degree what is man's place in the universe. Our friend, when he recovered from his insanity, and who was a reader and supporter of THE TRUTH SEEKER from its beginning to the day of his death, never forgave the church for making a fool of him, and exposing him to the derision of his townsmen. If the old saying be true that a man would rather be considered a sagacious knave than a simple, dull-eyed fool, we cannot wonder at this, for the church struck him in a very sensitiv part of his nature.

But in the hot-bed of the church, whose soil is made rich with the compost of ignorance and credulity, a new crop of fools is annually being raised. The failure of Christ to appear in the first, the eleventh, and in the nineteenth century, when tens of thousands were anxiously expecting his coming, and were disappointed, has had no perceptible effect in curing the Christians of their insane delusion on this subject. The proceedings of the Second Advent camp-meeting at Cleveland last summer show that the five wise virgins are still alive, and keeping their lamps trimmed and burning, waiting hourly for the signal to go out and meet the bridegroom. The prophecies of Daniel are still upon the rack of interpretation, and forced to speak as their tormentors wish. The Revelation of John, which Luther and other authorities hav thrown out of the canon of scripture because of its unintelligible character, and its obvious lack of inspiration by the Holy Ghost, is used by these people like a mass of clay, which the cunning potter puts upon his wheel, and makes into crockery of all shapes and sizes, and for all purposes to suit his own fancy.

Some of our Freethinking brethren, who liv in a world almost exclusivly their own, imagin, and actually say, that Christianity is dead, and, therefore, there is no further need of aggressiv agencies, which, from their very nature, are unpleasant to all who use them. They say, As the ground is not now occupied, we should begin to build up the new system of thought and morals which we propose shall take the place of the church. But these gentlemen would be surprised, if anything in this world could disturb their heavenly equanimity, when they see the Second Advent zealots availing themselvs of the power of organization and coöperation, and raising a thousand dollars every year for propagating purposes, where we Secularists raise ten to spread the light of truth and save the people from victimizing error. The rest of the sects, instead of thousands, raise millions every year for the same purpose.

Our correspondent's remarks on the impracticability of communal life, with all its wealth-producing power, existing longer than a generation or two, as seen in the history of the Shakers and Economites, are worthy of notice. The former are an association a century old; the latter hav not yet run their course of three generations, but both are haunted by the specter of annihilation. Is it not time to inquire whether it is not possible for human society to evolve out of that condition in which, for so many centuries, the large majority hav proved themselvs to be a flock of simple-minded sheep, and the small minority a pack of ravening wolves?

In a Tight Place.

The Galveston Daily News, being argumentativly inclined on the 12th instant, printed this:

"The New York TRUTH SEEKER gets itself into some tight places in argument. A Freethinker named Reynolds was fined in New Jersey under the state blasphemy law, a very hateful law to Freethinkers. The justice appears to hav followed the law. For this THE TRUTH SEEKER denounced him. It was reminded by a critic that, in view of its political creed, it was simply getting its own medicin. THE TRUTH SEEKER, however, says that the supreme law is the Constitution of the United States, and that the justice in New Jersey was going against this. Is it not asking much of a justice to demand that he set aside state laws under his views of the United States Constitution, or under THE TRUTH SEEKER's view of that instrument? Even if that could be done, the Constitution is either perfect or imperfect as a charter of rights. If perfect, it is either authority because it is right or right because it is authority—which? If imperfect, the question which arose about the New Jersey justice would arise about the highest authority under the Constitution. THE TRUTH SEEKER would complain of the judges for enforcing such laws as it does not like. But thus acting it does not greatly honor legal authority as a principle, and might as well sing low about devotion to majority rule."

The Constitution is authority, dear News, because the people hav adopted it as such. In the matter under consideration it happens also to be right, which affords us two reasons for obeying it. If it were wrong we should say, Change it: Our governmental system is all right; the trouble is, the state legislatures and courts, and the general government, pay no attention to the limitations put upon them by the national charter. We do not honor legal authority per se, as the Christians honor a supposed command of God, simply because it is a command of God; but because legal authority is the best means yet devised by imperfect humanity for repressing personal tyranny and securing equal liberty for all. We hav no hesitation whatever in denouncing a bad law, like the blasphemy statute, or the bad administration of a good law, as in the case of the Hoboken man who was fined under a peace ordinance for being clubbed by the police. We go in for justice and hew to the line, let the chips fall where they may. A judge who will do an injustice simply because he can do it under form of law, is not fit to occupy a judicial position. The News is very pious sometimes, and it will no doubt see the force of an ancient remark that the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life.

There is another fact which the Texas ally of the Boston Anarchist journal should not forget. When what we conceived to be a legal injustice was perpetrated upon the Anarchist journal's friends, THE TRUTH SEEKER protested vigorously. When what the Anarchists all admit was a legal injustice was perpetrated upon THE TRUTH SEEKER's friend, Liberty applauded the judge. Which, then, is the true friend of justice, the law-supporting Freethinker or the law-defying Anarchist?

COMSTOCK has added to his reputation for brutality by knocking down a ten-year-old newsboy. The Sun suggests that his delicate sense of the proprieties was offended because the boy was barefooted.

AN evening paper last week printed eleven pictures of the works of art which Comstock and his society condemn. These included Cabanel's Birth of Venus, Blanchard's Juno, Lauren's Ariadne Forsaken, Danton's Taking a Cast from Life, Mazerolle's Psyche at the Spring, Royer's Venus, Benner's At the Waterside, Bernard's Lettres Persanes, Berton's Indian Summer, Edouard's A Spring, and Sevestre's Convolvulus. They all include nude female forms, and each is considered a splendid artistic performance. Copies of them are found everywhere, in nearly all art galleries, and in every home whose inmates hav the wealth to gratify their esthetic taste. The seizure of photographic copies is an outrage on personal liberty, the act of Calvinistic tyrants, and a dangerous precedent. The people of this city should insure next winter the repeal of the law under which Comstock acts. The tyranny of his society is intolerable. If it ever performed any public good, the evil it has worked greatly outweighs it. Comstock asked the district-attorney to prosecute the journal publishing the offending pictures, but Mr. Martine refused.

HOWARD CROSBY, D.D., Presbyterian clergyman, says: "It is time something was done to stop the exhibition of nude figures from the Paris school. They are painted to please the sensuous classes, as they will sell quicker. There is no true artistic merit attached to them. They are lascivious, lewd, and bawdy. The Paris school tries to be as bawdy as it can and yet not be bawdy, but it utterly fails. Fashionable people buy these pictures because they are nasty. They make a pretense of buying them on account of their artistic beauty, but this is all a farce. Fashionable people want to be as nasty as they can and still keep out of prison, and I think that the suppression of all such paintings, or copies of them, is perfectly right, and I hope that all these voluptuous pictures of the last Paris Salon will be among the first to be suppressed." These are sentiments of a Presbyterian, a narrow, bigoted, intolerant follower of John Calvin. Mr. Crosby has about the same appreciation of art as Simeon Stylites had of cleanliness. Mr. Crosby is supported, however, by fashionable people, and it is their fault if his foul slanders upon them go unrebuked.

W. F. JAMIESON will deliver six lectures in Monte Vista, Col., Nov. 30th, Dec. 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th. Mr. Jamieson informs his Pacific coast friends that he cannot fill engagements abroad until after Jan. 1st. If Rev. Campbell, or any other preacher, will contract to hold a sufficient number of debates to pay for the journey, Liberal lecture committees can make arrangements accordingly. Address at Monte Vista, Col.

BABYLON, N. Y., Nov. 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $8—$3 for the paper and $5 for the picture printing for the next year. I hope all the Infidels are prompt. P. H. FOSTER.

BURLINGTON, KAN, Oct. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Brother J. E. Remsburg has been lecturing to large audiences in Burlington on the 24th, 25th, and 26th, and with his fluent oratory, and his logical, unanswerable arguments, he spread consternation among the hosts of King Jesus, for fear of the destruction of their stronghold which they hav held so many years in our little city.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Nov. 5, 1887.

DEAR MR. MACDONALD: For many years THE TRUTH SEEKER has been a welcome visitor in our home. It always comes with a smiling face, wearing upon its breast a badge of Reason, Truth, and Right. Its columns are full of bright, lengthy, and interesting articles from the pens of distinguished people from all over the country, and besides it contains many short articles that are interesting; but oh! those laughable pictures by Watson Heston. They are regular "side-splitters." Mr. Heston must be a smart man, and I thank him for his labors in getting up those pictures, and hope he will continue them.

I hav been reading "The Bible of Bibles," by K. Graves, and request every body to read it, as it is valuable and interesting. Yours truly, GEO. J. REMSBURG.

SHAWSVILLE, VA., Nov. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $5 for your paper from April, 1887, to April, 1889. That will be as long as I shall want it sent to Shawsville, Va., if not longer; and if neither Franklin nor anyone else gets a mail route opened from your office to the New Jerusalem I fear I shall hav to giv up THE TRUTH SEEKER and other religious papers.

Gabriel came after me last April. I got a doctor to fight him off for me. The doctor called it heart disease, but said if I would be careful I might sojourn here for years yet. I hav had another attack, and am rather weak now; hav not been able to get out much to attend to business. This is the reason you hav been kept waiting so long for what I owed you. A young man called on me a short time ago and wanted THE TRUTH SEEKER. A few years ago his father ordered me out of an old Joss-house, out of the yard, and from beneath the shade-trees, because I preached the gospel as I was ordained by S. S. Jones, former editor of R.-P. Journal. Now think of the old Christian's influence on his own sons and family. I hope to be able soon to send you two new subscribers, and I shall want your ANNUALS for 1887 and 1888. J. M. BARNES.

OSCEOLA MILLS, PA., Nov. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: When I think of the noble work done by energetic, philanthropic Freethinkers; when I review the past and see the little army of enthusiastic humanitarians that has marched down the ages, endeavoring with eloquence and logic to arouse the slumbering intellect of a torpid world, I feel ashamed that I hav done so little good myself. My conscience tortures me, and something whispers in my ear, "You owe THE TRUTH SEEKER man." That this torturing fiend of fancy may depart, I now inclose $3, which you will place to my credit. Already this act seems to quench the flames of my little mental hell.

I regret that there are many enlightened men—Freethinkers, too, who know better—that are, for sake of policy, accessories to the crime of teaching superstition. They pay the clergy for vilifying them. They feed and pet the deformed voracious beast—orthodoxy—that would devcur them; but why complain? It will do no good.

Yours truly, WM. SCOTT.

P.S.—I told you before how I want you to "run" the paper—namely, just as you please; and I see that I am the only adviser whom you hav obeyed. I hav thought a good deal about the illustrations, and hav concluded that no one, except a Christian, could object to them. It is strange, indeed, if we are too timid to show a man a picture of his own folly. W. S.

SALEM, NEB., Nov. 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The godly and ungodly people of this town hav been highly entertained by the four nights' discussion which has just closed. If the Campbellites are as well pleased with the efforts their representativ made for their cause as we few Freethinkers here are with Mr. Bell's, then they are happy indeed. But the fact is, Elder Williamson was no match for Mr. Bell. He occupied much of his time in fighting men of straw and in preaching, and in using abusiv language toward his opponent. The funniest part of the whole business was that his friends wanted to hav Mr. Bell bound by a written pledge that he would not use any language that would shock the modesty of the ladies present. I, for one, told them that that was not necessary, and I would hold myself responsible for all our speaker would say?

But the minister had scarcely broken into a full pace on his first speech before he began to use insulting language, and he kept it up on the second night, and to such an extent that I felt like resenting some things he said myself. But Mr. Bell did not share my feelings, and hence allowed his opponent, I thought, to bulldoze him too much without proper resentment.

On the third evening of the debate the elder grew even more personal and insulting; and, as there comes a time when patience ceases to be a virtue, so Mr. Bell thought it had come in this case. He turned upon his heavy-weight opponent—a man who weighs about 250 avoirdupois—and with adroitne·s turned the tables on Jumbo, and made him act through the remainder of the debate like a whipped spaniel. But the distinguishing superiority of Mr. Bell over his oppponent was his gentlemanly manners. He never descends to anything coarse or vulgar. And while we feel to rejoice over the the success of our Bell, yet we are prouder still of him as a gentleman. He would not descend to throwing dirt. He has left us, but the work he has done will remain. And he has made many friends, some of whom, I hope, will become subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The debate is to be published in pamphlet form. Long liv the Bell that rings out the old and rings in the new.

MYRTLE CREEK, OR., Nov. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Being well pleased with the reports of S. P. Putnam and the results of his labors on this coast, I wish to congratulate him and all other earnest workers in our worthy cause. I am sorry that Mr. Putnam did not lecture in Douglas county. We need help here. I am too poor to go from home to lecture; but, if I am oppressed much more by sectarianism and orthodoxy, by the encouragement of the members of the American Secular Union I will go. Will you not turn a little attention in this direction? We ought to organize all over the country, and build mental liberty halls in every precinct. We ought to create greater facilities for circulating our literature. We hav a few Liberals here, namely, Dr. McCarty, Simon Selig, James Bailey, John Hall, Uncle Jim Weaver, and a few others. Many others would be if we would get into the work right. There are a few Liberals in Roseburg, the county-seat of Douglas, and also some Spiritualists, who are partially ostracized by the orthodox parties.

By all means, we should organize, for in union there is strength. Whenever we become fully organized the sects will begin to weep and wail and howl and gnash their teeth. At present they use their influence to prevent others from hearing our lectures or reading our books.

The ice has been broken here for S. P. Putnam on his return to the Pacific states. Let us maintain our dignity, preserve our liberty, and transmit it to our posterity.

L. C. HILL.

OAKLAND, CAL., Oct. 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Having read THE TRUTH SEEKER'S account of the dastardly assault made by Hamilton upon the Secretary of the Secular Union at Ukiah, Cal., I determined to attend the trial. From the evidence I gleaned the following facts. The hall was crowded, that being the last and fourth lecture. Mr. Putnam had finished reading statistics, proving that there were more prostitutes and criminals reared under Christian influences, particularly of the Catholic religion, than among Liberals. At this point Hamilton advanced, talking in a loud bombastic tone; addressed the lecturer with "Say! what do you mean to deduce from all this d—d insulting trash any way?" He then turned, belching out to the audience in dime-novel, heavy-tragedy style, "In ancient Greece when an impostor came among the people they cast shells at the offender, and I cast this at you." As he spoke he grasped a large lighted lamp weighing nine to eleven pounds, containing three pints of oil, and hurled it with great force at the head of Mr. Putnam. The lamp by a miracle missed the speaker, passed out through a window, and exploded outside of the court-house. Several men attempted to hold the assailant, but breaking away he grabbed another lamp, and swinging it around his head started for the door, the dripping oil falling upon and burning many from the platform to the exit. Children screamed in terror; several ladies fainted. Had it not been for the coolness and bravery of Mr. Putnam, many would hav been crushed to death in getting out of the building. After quiet was restored a little he proceeded with the lecture. Mr. Putnam held his ground like a Spartan, and coolly proceeded as soon as the people returned to the hall. The man Hamilton went through the form of being tried before a justice and fined one hundred dollars, which all know can never be collected.

The prosecuting attorney, Mannon, a good judge of the best brands, but of no force at anything else, assisted by one A. Yell, employed by several gentleman to conduct the prosecution of Hamilton at an expense of two hundred dollars, made a pretense only to earn the money. Cooper, one of the defense, attempted to throw the case out on the ground that he had already been tried and once placed in jeopardy for the same offense. The judge ruled differently, and in plain language ordered them to proceed. As Yell failed to emphasize this fact, the jury went to the box believing that he had been already fined one hundred dollars, and that whatever they (the jury) did would not hold, but only subjected the county to more expense needlessly. The jury returned a verdict of not guilty in forty minutes.

W. EVERETT.

NEODESHA, KAN., Nov. 6, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. John E. Remsburg has been here for the last four days, engaged in a discussion with a Dr. Lucas, of the Campbellite persuasion. The questions debated upon were, "The Bible a Human Production," Mr. Remsburg affirming, and "The Divinity of Christ," affirmed by the doctor. Neither men nor parties should ever be considered at the expense of truth, nor would we for a moment attempt it, but those who hav examined those subjects critically can readily see that the strength of the argument lay upon the side chosen by Mr. Remsburg, and knowing him none need be told that he knew well how to make that strength applicable. Absurd assertions and glaring contradictions were so clearly set forth by Mr. Remsburg that even the most obtuse could not fail to see them. How to erase the discrepancies pointed out by Mr. Remsburg has now become the vexing question. This alone can save Christianity from disgraceful defeat; and to do so, without impugning inspiration, is simply an impossibility. Dr. Lucas has heretofore been reckoned quite an expert in debate, but in this case he utterly failed to calculate the magnitude of this task, and it may be safely asserted that his reputation in that line is as one that no longer exists. He undertook an impossibility that Mr. Remsburg found it mere child's play to inform him of, and prudence will certainly dictate to the doctor retirement from the arena of controversy, particularly where reason is the combatant. We learn that his Christian friends foolishly blame their champion for not doing what cannot be done. Of course it is hard to convince those whose favorit dogma is "that with God all things are possible," and for the patient a painful operation, but they certainly found Mr. Remsburg a skilful surgeon, whom if they cannot remember with gratitude they will find it equally hard to forget.

The interest in the discussion was manifested by the large attendance. The holding capacity of the building was altogether insufficient for the assemblage. The attention shown was more than ordinarily good; and Neodesha deserves credit for the regard evinced for objectionable opinions. But here as everywhere else Christianity dies hard, and, it is said, intends making another struggle for existence. They speak of the distinguished Clark Braden, who has been so correctly photographed in THE TRUTH SEEKER by that inimitable artist, Mr. Heston. Securing Mr. Braden suggests to us the proverbial straw which drowning men are said to catch at, and we would want no better indication of the decline of faith than such a recourse. It is a piece of chicanery that would forever demoralize any brain that it enters. One of the many difficulties with which the children of God are now wrestling will be to find an opponent for this delectable gladiator. We are sure Mr. Remsburg will never tarnish his laurels by such an encounter, and we infer by the late attitude of Messrs. Putnam, Reynolds, and Bell that they are equally jealous of their well-earned bays.

Referring to the Remsburg-Lucas discussion, we shall expect both sides, by the religious press and pulpit, to be misrepresented. As is their wont, they will resort to every available method to alleviate their distress. 'Tis a case of life and death, and they will make many an attack upon the white-robed goddess in self-defense, but as they refused to prove their faith by the deadly serpent or arsenical libation, as Mr. Remsburg so kindly suggested, so they will fail to preserve it amid the crush of dogmas and wrecks of superstition. VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

CLEVELAND, O., Nov. 9, 287.

MR. EDITOR: If the current of puissant science in Cleveland may be gaged by the efforts of the clergy to dam (n) it with the straws of presumptiv theology, Freethought is at flood tide. Though we are without Liberal meetings, lectures, or publications—except as the Sunday Sun and Voice occasionally wind a valiant word—yet I daily meet in conversation with people who are bold enough in private to let their light be known to those who will first show a glim of their own. Perhaps the Spiritualists will think that the above does them an injustice, as they fondly boast themselvs as Liberals and Radicals, and sport a Children's Progressive Lyceum, but as they positivly assert that their philosophy begins with the assumption of a creator, an intelligent God, and declares it the hight of presumption to deny that absurdity, nailing it down as nonsense to repudiate the authority of belief—Spiritual belief—to condemn skeptics, prohibiting discussion, I report them as the toughest-chested old fogies I ever found among the churches.

Mr. Merle Smith, in one of the Presbyterian pagodas, has been reading science fairly well, and then tacking on to the end of his lecture a paragraph or two of gush about God and cursings for not believing in Christ. In another Presbyterian pagoda Mr. Spretcher has been periodically banging the Bible to get the dirt out of it, but the more he stirs it the worse it smells. In the course of his discourse last Sunday on the "So-called Immoralities of the Bible" he struck off such stunners as these: "So long as it pleases God to start people from infancy there will be some inconvenience that we shall hav to put up with." This remarkable rocket was aimed at Gail Hamilton for questioning why God did not make all people perfect to begin with. "It is impossible for God to work miracles in mind as he does in sticks and stones." This air-brake he worked on his infinit engineer to justify the slaughter instead of the conversion of the sinful Canaanites, and yet it is an essential dogma of Presbyterian Calvinism that no soul can be saved except by the sovereign election and regeneration of God's miracle of grace. "God placed restrictions on the actions of the Hebrews when he could not hav enforced direct prohibition." This is a pretty tough one on God. Why did he not take less cross-grained timber, or invent a double-iron fore-plane to ross them down? "If the moral progress of the Hebrews was the result of natural evolution, why did not other and better nations thus evolve a character beyond what they hav attained?" I reply: If there were other nations that surpassed the original Hebrew character and became great by natural evolution, why did not God take them in hand and lead them up to even a higher point than he is represented to hav done his stiff-necked people? "The other nations that existed then hav perished." They hav not. The Chinese, whose philosophy was before Moses, are and hav ever been a more decent, comfortable, and substantial people than the Hebrew nation, and comparativ analysis shows that it was from the East and South that the Hebrews obtained the elements of their cult. "In every restriction there seems to be the seed of a higher precept of prohibition to be given at some future time." "God did not command slavery and polygamy, as some skeptics allege, but suffered the existing practice to continue in a modified form." The Holy One winking at sin and modifying injustice must hav been a rich show. And when God told his pious prophet Hosea to liv with two harlots no doubt it was a case of divinely modified immorality. "The slavery of the Bible, as God restricted it, was a blessing as compared to the slavery of surrounding nations." If it is a mark of divinity that its institutions are not so bad as they might be, then authority is given for everybody to be cussed if they are not too cussed. "God regulated slavery out of existence. If he had prohibited it absolutely, then, trying to do too much, he would hav done nothing." If this is not a grand giv-away of God's ability, by one of God's ministers, then there is no use in criticism. God was gaging his appetite for righteousness in dread that he might bite off more than he could chew. Oh! "The conclusion will be found that in God's dealings with his people he acted according to the actual necessity of the case on each occasion, and did the best that could be done under the circumstances."

If the necessity of the case were too much for God's immediatc disposal, then who made the necessity? Did man produce circumstances that were too much for God's power to overcome with a whiff? Then, indeed, man must hav wrought a miracle on God that knocked him out of time.

How can average people be so stupid as to swallow such stuff? How can any one having the least pretension to education hav the effrontery to offer such clatter to a respectable audience? If the Bible was of divine origin, then its filthiness and ignorance and horrors simply proclaim the innate depravity of divinity, against which the better sentiments of the natural man revolt, and muffle his nostrils to cast out.

NEWBURGH, N. Y., Nov. 9., 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed clipping is taken from the Newburgh Daily Register of November 8th:

Rev. J. H. Smyth is pastor of the Second Reformed church, at One Hundred and Twenty-third street and Sixth avenue, New York city. On Sunday last he delivered a forcible and masterly sermon on Infidelity. In the course of the same he gave an illustration of the punishment following Infidelity, and the same was located in Newburgh-on-the-Hudson. He stated that at one time, years ago, thirty-six men residing in this city banded themselvs together as a society of Infidels, recognizing no God, and defying his power if there was any. They baptized a cat, and gave the holy communion to a dog. Within a period of five years each and every one of the thirty-six had met his death in an unnatural manner. Mr. Grant B. Taylor, of this city, who is a member of the choir connected with Dr. Smyth's church, on his return home yesterday investigated the circumstances narrated above, and learned the full facts concerning it. The society was instituted nearly half a century ago. At that time the grounds now occupied by Trinity Methodist Episcopal and Calvary Presbyterian churches were covered with water, being a small-sized pond. Near the entrance to the present Trinity church stood a partially-decayed tree, which was cut down but a few years ago, and the butt used as a meat-block by the late Robert Phillips, the butcher. It was in the hollow trunk of this tree that the immersion of the feline took place He also learned that the statement in regard to the full extermination of the society within five years was true. The entire thirty-six met with unnatural deaths—seven of the number committed suicide, and five were killed in railroad accidents, the others coming to an untimely end in various manners. Many of our older residents remember the circumstances of the institution and extermination of the society quite well. Verily truth is stranger than fiction.

The Rev. J. H. Smyth probably got his idea from Eager's "History of Orange County, N. Y.," where it appears substantially as related by the reverend gentleman. Having a curiosity to learn the real facts in the case, without prejudice either way, I took the trouble to go and interview one of the oldest inhabitants, whose memory extends back sixty-three years. He said he could remember hearing them talk of it when a boy, and knew some of them well, but does not believe there were more than six or eight of them, and none died unnatural deaths that he remembers. He says it was nearly seventy years ago (instead of fifty). From which it seems that the story had some foundation in fact, but is greatly exaggerated (as is usual with the Christians) to make Infidels appear as bad as possible. "Within a period of five years," etc. Now my informant (who is Christian) distinctly remembers three of them—viz., Buckingham, Reeves, and Ledyard—and they did not die until long afterward, and then in old age and not by accident.

And after all what was it but a silly pastime some few learned wits of those days took to amuse themselvs at the spring on a hot summer Sunday afternoon, while the saints amused themselvs in their own way in the church?

H. SPENCER CLARKE.

BURLINGTON, KAN., Oct. 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am certain THE TRUTH SEEKER readers will be edified with a fair and truthful description of one of the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus, who is in good standing and dearly beloved by his flock, and especially the female portion of it. I hav known this man for two years, and hav seen him almost daily, and I propose to do him exact justice, for I regard him as a fair sample of the Christian ministry.

This town is blessed with eight orthodox preachers, and one Campbellite. It has ten churches and one school-house. It has three thousand inhabitants and two hundred and fifty church-members. The two hundred and fifty church-members hav heretofore run the town. But, thanks be to Freethought which giveth us the victory, the sway of orthodoxy is over.

This reverend follower of the dear savior owns two horse and cattle ranches in the state of Texas. He gets $1,000 a year and parsonage free from a poor church of self-sacrficing disciples. He is one of the stockholders in the bank here, and owns a splendid race-horse, besides two carriages and two family horses, while the meek aud lowly Jesus, his lord and master, owned no cattle, stock, or race-horses, and never had but one ride in his life, and that was on a borrowed jack. This saint has his daily ride, and meets and chats with another saint who rides a safety bicycle. They make a fine spectacle. The reverend follower of the adulterous John Wesley has a beautiful servant, and has many sisters domiciled at his home in the parsonage. He dunneth his congregation by letters many, through his deacons, his elders, and his class leaders, and the poor hav the gospel preached to them, but it is not in his church; but, behold! it is in the Opera House, under the trumpet blast of Remsburg, Reynolds, and Watts. The poor get the dunning letters while the preacher is drawing his interest at eighteen per cent from the bank of Shylock. And the ravens in the valley are seeking their prey—which is hard on the prey, but all right for the ravens—and God maketh his sun to shine upon the just and upon the unjust, and thou shalt call and I will answer thee. Amen.

A poor man lay dying south of my office for three weeks. Three days before he climbed the golden stair he bitterly complained that no preacher had been to see him. A rich man died soon after, and this disciple of the adulterous Wesley slobbered all over the coffin and carried the deceased up among the stars, and while there made many astronomical blunders.

He preached lustily to the congregation after Remsburg left, and warned his people, which are few, to remain away from blasphemers. He admired not the picture of Clark Braden in THE TRUTH SEEKER because it looked so much like himself, and said that no good man would paper his walls with such pictures. He visits the sick with the contribution box, and hath his class-leaders wait on the people twice on the Christian Sabbath, wherein the meek and lowly Jesus fed himself, the multitude, and healed the sick. He preaches from a pulpit hanging with laces and silk, while the master had to use an old fish scow on the Sea of Galilee for a pulpit. Behold, he takes the Sunday train to reach his appointment to preach, while Jesus went on foot with wooden shoes. He sitteth down to a table covered with imported food and all the domestic delicacies of the season, while the master took his dinner in the Judean cornfields of roasted ears. He preaches the platitudes of the fifteenth century while Ingersoll is gathering in the sheaves. He prays long and loud in public, while Jesus said prayer in secret. He followeth after the master—but a long way off. He became prosecuting attorney of Coffey Co., Kansas, and indicted all the druggists, and then compromised the cases. He preacheth against the use of wine, while the master made one hundred and twenty-six gallons of the liquid to cheer the marriage feast; but our Wesley's presence at a marriage feast means the big fee from the bridegroom and a kiss from the bride. He rideth around from day to day seeking where he can take up a collection, while the master went about doing good. He loveth his enemies so much as to get them indicted, and then compromises with them for money, while Jesus never had but one lawsuit, and that was when he lost his life at the hands of preachers. He paweth in the valley at the beginning of spring, when the season is coming on of the lilac and the flowers, and the song of the turtle is heard in the land. He preacheth the gospel of charity, but doth not giv his coat or cloak to the poor in winter, but, behold he jeweth down a Jew and all the tailors for a suit of clothes, saying that the ministerial discount was twenty per cent off. He is commanded to speak softly and gently, and behold, he calleth the attorney of record a viper. Behold, he is commanded in the Sermon on the Mount to giv unto the poor, and he continually beggeth from them. He forced himself on the simple people of Burlington after his three years had expired, because he had a soft thing and a simple congregation to preach to, and one that impoverished themselvs to feed the gospel. Dearly beloved, I bid you adieu. He preacheth the gospel of liberty, but useth the gad upon everyone that does not agree with him, that he can reach. Behold, he loveth the loaves and the fishes, and is always fishing for the loaves.

COALTON, KY., Oct. 23, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As I am the only outspoken Freethinker or Infidel in my immediate neighborhood, you will see I am at a loss for kindred associations and fellowship. So if you will grant me space in your paper I would like to spend a little time, for amusement to myself and the readers of your paper, in giving you my experience in the march from religious superstition to the broad and more genial light of rationalism.

I was reared under influence of Bible teaching; as early as twelve or thirteen years of age I began to think of praying and getting what I asked for, but even at that time I had come to the conclusion that there were some very strange things in the Bible. I can recollect asking my mother this question: "If all things are possible with God, as is said in the Bible, why could he not save the world of mankind without the death of his son?"

I never received a satisfactory answer to that question. But I was taught to believe this Bible was my only refuge from eternal damnation. And how vividly the horrors of hell were portrayed to my young mind each Sunday by the ministers in their sermons; also the final ending of the world in fire! All this I must believe; and it so burdened my thoughts that I can call to mind how, after hearing one of those sermons, I dreamed nights of seeing the world on fire and women and children running screaming and praying for relief; and from those dreams I would awake and lie awake for hours studying the reality of such a catastrophe. How can mothers allow their children to be taught such things as will frighten them beyond all reason? When I think of how these beliefs troubled my childish mind I feel as though I ought not to tolerate them in my family, and for the sake of humanity I ought always, when opportunity permits, to giv them reasonable refutation.

About the age of eighteen I joined the church, yet I did not experience what the church-men call religion, not being converted. I remained in the church (Methodist Episcopal) for some six or eight years on probation or trial, and all these years trying to force this unnatural belief on the mind. At about the age of twenty-eight I attended a Methodist revival, and one evening, finding the house crowded, I was forced to take a seat in the amen corner; and as the meeting began to warm up and the members began to pass around in a circle in the old-fashioned hand-shaking, with the "God bless you," I shortly felt that I was affected by some peculiar influence which I afterward thought and ever will think was merely personal magnetism. This influence caused me to think I was converted or on the eve of conversion, and under it I did profess religion, and through this same magnetism, which I possessed, I found that I could hav a wonderful influence myself, insomuch that I often, by taking persons by the hand, and with a gentle grasp and a few kind and loving words, could influence them to join the church. I well remember shaking hands with Mr. M. H. Huston, who is now teller in the Ashland National Bank, Ashland, Ky., during one of those meetings, and when he saw me the next day he said: "Sam, I never experienced such a feeling as when you grasped my hand last night. Can you tell me what causes that?" I told him that I did not know, and at that time I did not know, although several years previous to this time above mentioned I had been told by a friend that he would walk a mile to shake hands with me for the pleasurable feeling he experienced in it. Said he, "There is something in it that I cannot define."

Now, this magnetism which I possessed at this superstitious period in my life caused me to believe that I was especially called by God to his work, and no one ever did work more zealously than I did; and I was conscientious in my work too, and no doubt I was the cause of many joining the church at that time.

After the revival had ceased, I began to read the scriptures, and thought I would make application for license to preach, or exhort; but as I advanced in the study of the scriptures, which I began at the beginning of Genesis, I became somewhat confused just where God breathed the breath of life into Adam's nostrils and he became a living soul. That word "soul" had not been used concerning any of the other creatures which were created; so I began to think more strongly of the holy teaching of the Bible. Man was, then, the direct spiritual offspring of God, and must, to some extent, partake of his attributes. But I soon began to think also of the fall of man through his disobedience in eating the apple. He surely at that time became possessed of that other spirit, the devil. Since man's fall, it was said, all that is born partakes of that wilful spirit. But I reasoned that God had shown his design and willingness to send into the world another son that could withstand all the temptations of this former Adam, come out victorious in the end, and make possible to man the regaining of his original heirship and power, and make him equal to his elder brother, Jesus Christ. Thus, you see, as I had, as I thought, been converted, and had regained my original heirship, and was full brother and son, I ought, according to the teaching of the New Testament, to be able, through prayer and fasting, to do miracles as did Jesus Christ.

The Christians may say it was absurd in me even to think of such, but I thought if one part of this book of God's were true, the other ought certainly to be. For the reason of such a belief, I refer you to Mark xvi, 17 and 18 verses: "And these signs shall follow them that believe; in my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." I might refer to many other passages of scripture as a reason for this belief, as James v, 16.

In my superstitious belief I prayed for everything: for the recovery of friends that were sick, and for the conversion of others. In fact, I prayed for whatever I thought would not be inconsistent with the will of God; but I never realized an answer from those prayers, and began to think that my faith was not strong enough, or that I was acting the hypocrit, or that this scripture was not true.

In fact, this book called the word of God was constantly bearing on my mind and confusing my senses; and I never shall forget the day that my attention was called to the fact by a Christian lady friend of mine, that it was the talk of the neighborhood that I was losing my mind on account of religion. That was the first I had heard of the report, and it shocked me, and I felt ashamed to think that I had allowed my zeal to overrun my judgment.

But again I thought, If I am a Christian, knowing that some of my near friends are in danger of hell, how can I consistently fail to warn them of this awful danger?" and Infidel as I am now, I cannot see how those who profess Christianity fail to speak to their friends concerning their imminent peril. I account for it only by thinking and saying they are hypocrits.

After experiencing the truth of what my lady friend had told me concerning the unbalanced state of my mind, I determined to investigate the truths of the Bible, and concluded to send for Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," a book I had heretofore been afraid to read. But now I reasoned thus: "If the Bible is God's work, it ought to be proof against any theories or reasonings of man's. On the other hand, if man can pick flaws and find faults in it and prove the falsity of it by its own pages, it certainly is not the work of an infallible God."

After I had read the Bible and "Age of Reason" in conjunction, I thought that Paine's fault-finding was not without cause; in fact, I approved of the work, and now think it the ablest refutation of the Bible. I then sent for Ingersoll's "Mistakes of Moses," and shortly found that my mind had been released from one of the greatest burdens, and myself from the greatest danger of my life—the humiliation of an insane asylum.

I hav often wished I could meet Colonel Ingersoll and thank him in person for the good work he has done for me. I sincerely believe him to be one of the greatest benefactors of humanity this century has produced.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Two Glasses.

There were two glasses, filled to the brim,
On the rich man's table, rim to rim.
One was ruddy and red as blood,
And one as clear as the crystal flood.

Said the glass of wine to the paler brother,
"Let us tell the tales of the past to each other.
I can tell of banquet and revel and mirth,
And the proudest and grandest souls on earth
Fell under my touch as though struck by blight,
Where I was king, for I ruled in might.
From the heads of kings I hav torn the crown;
From the hights of fame I hav hurled men down.
I hav blasted many an honored name;
I hav taken virtue and given shame;
I hav tempted youth with a sip, a taste,
That has made his future a barren waste.
Far greater than a king am I,
Or than any army beneath the sky.

I hav made the arm of the driver fail,
And sent the train from the iron rail.
I hav made good ships go down at sea,
And the shrieks of the lost were sweet to me,
For they said: 'Behold, how great you be!
Fame, strength, wealth, genius before you fall,
For your might and power are over all.'
Ho! ho! pale brother," laughed the wine,
"Can you boast of deeds as great as mine?"

Said the water glass: "I cannot boast
Of a king dethroned or a murdered host,
But I can tell of a heart, once sad,
By my crystal drops made light and glad—
Of thirsts I've quenched, of brows I've laved,
Of hands I've cooled, and souls I've saved,
I've leaped through the valley, dashed down the mountain,
Flowed in the river and played in the fountain,
Sept in the sunshine and dropped from the sky,
And everywhere gladdened the landscape and eye.
I hav eased the hot forehead of fever and pain,
I hav made the parched meadow grow fertil with grain.
I can tell of the powerful wheel of the mill
That ground out flour and turned at my will.
I can tell of manhood debased by you
That I lifted up and crowned anew.
I cheer, I help, I strengthen and aid;
I gladden the heart of man and maid;
I set the wine-chained captiv free,
And all are better for knowing me."

These are the tales they told each other—
The glass of wine and its paler brother,
As they sat together, filled to the brim,
On the rich man's table, rim to rim.

Story of a Waif.

Willie Collins was a poor little boy—a ward of the state, i.e., when his papa and mamma died, leaving Willie, their only child, poor, penniless, and alone in the great city of Boston, there was no other place for him but the state almshouse. It gave him food, shelter, clothing, and when he became old enough, he was placed in school along with four hundred other children who knew no father or mother's care, only that afforded by the grand old commonwealth of Massachusetts. Willie was a bright, intelligent lad, quick to learn, full of fun, yet modest and retiring as a girl. When he was seven years old he fell one day, striking upon a sharp stone with such severity that his spine was injured so that he was never able to walk again without the aid of crutches. He never grew like other children any more, after the accident. His little body was dwarfed, his back out of shape, and he was scarcely ever free from pain. Poor little Willie? No father to protect him, no dear mother to soothe and caress his poor, crippled form, no sister, no brother to say, "Dear Willie boy, I am sorry for you," depending always upon strangers, his fate was indeed a severe one, for strangers are not always kind and tender toward helpless little ones. But Willie was patient and uncomplaining, and never resented the thoughtless remarks of his comrades.

"They don't know how their words hurt my heart or they would not say them," he would say, and, brushing back the tears with his coat sleeve, he would pass along quietly.

Willie had a sweet face, and lovely blue eyes that seemed to look deep down into the hearts of those who came near him. One day the gentlemen who hav charge of the state charitable institutions went to visit the school where Willie was a pupil. One of the party was especially attracted to the winsome face of the little crippled boy, and paused to ask his name, and how he became lame, etc. The gentleman thought he had never looked upon so fair and patient a face. The memory of the little boy haunted him after he returned to his home, and he related the incident of meeting with the child to his family. For days afterward that pale face seemed to follow him wherever he went. Finally, in the vacation season, he sent for Willie to come and make a visit at his own handsome home. It was such a wonder to the poor child to be sent for to go visiting! His heart throbbed violently as, with all his worldly goods tied in a red cotton handkerchief, he was met at the depot by the kind gentleman who had noticed him, and now was to receive him into his family as a guest. In that family he was made as welcome as a prince. He sat at the table with his newly found friends and was fed with the best of food. Never within his recollection had he sat at any but a pauper's table, or eaten any other than the coarse food of a pensioner upon the state, for his parents had died when he was but two years old.

Never had his eyes looked upon so many beautiful pictures, so many sweet and fragrant flowers. Never had he heard such kind and tender words of pity, sympathy, and tenderness.

No wonder the child was bewildered, dumb with astonishment. He had come into a new atmosphere, and under its warm and genial influence he blossomed anew.

As he lay in his clean, white bed at night, he thought how could he ever return to his pauper home. "I think this is like being in heaven," he softly thought, "and I wish I might stay here always."

He never uttered or expressed his wish, however, but when the time had come for him to be returned to the institution, what joy was his to know that he was not to go back at all, but was to remain as long as he lived a guest in the dear home that had brought such sunshine to his lonely heart. Everyone was so kind and sympathetic he hardly knew what to make of it. Was he the same boy? Yes, but now living in a home—a real home, such as he had sometimes dreamed of.

Daily he grew more and more beautiful, so that those about him said, "He is preparing to leave the earth," and so he was.

One morning he said, "It seems to me I am going to die very soon." He had not a single fear of death. To him it was a relief from pain and sickness—it was peace and rest. Quietly he disposed of his little effects, gifts, books, and trinkets that had been bestowed upon him by kind friends from time to time, remembering his former playmates and the children in the hospital where he had been formerly, when he was hurt first.

When he came to visit the friends who had cared for him so lovingly, a boy who used to come to the house for the refuse of the kitchen had laughed at his crippled appearance and made fun of his poor clothes and of his deformity.

"I want to giv that boy," said he, "my newspapers, and maybe if he reads the Children's Corner he will not laugh at unfortunate little boys any more."

So he gave that boy his papers, with his love and kind wishes. Soon afterward he fell asleep with the word "happy" on his lips, and did not wake again on earth.

His large and generous nature, his tender, loving, and forgiving spirit, illumined the house in which he had found sweet rest and comfort, and those who knew him forgot his deformed body, and only saw the beautiful jewel of a noble nature in the rough and distorted casket of clay.

His life, so patient and uncomplaining, exhaled sweetness and fragrance, like a lovely flower. He made sunshine and brightness in the home where he was welcomed as a son, and when he died he was mourned for as a son. His comrades remembered him lovingly and mourned for him as if he had been a brother.

Willie's life, poor and humble though it was, was not in vain. Even he contributed to the world's wealth by his cheerfulness in adversity, his patience under severe afflictions, and calm resignation to the will of the inevitable. And the good and gracious friends who took Willie, the helpless little lad, from the poorhouse and made his last days so bright and happy; who wrapped him in the mantle of sweetest sympathy and love, they hav told again by their righteous conduct, that humanity is lovely, self-sacrificing, and unselfish; that the life we liv may, by kindness and devotion to others, be made as bright and glorious as the fair and rosy dawn. The tenderness with which they watched over the little friendless waif, surrounding him with every comfort and luxury, will not be lost, but will be an inspiration to others to go and do likewise. The lesson is obvious. Let us all accept it, and fill life with good and loving deeds, whose unfading luster shall brighten all the pathway of life.

A Bird Song.

A little bonnie bird I know,
With breast more soft than eider down.
A dress she wears of dappled brown,
And sings with sweeter tone, I trow—
Ah, sweeter far this birdie sings
Than all the birds that summer brings;
And yet her song is only this:
"I love you, papa!"—then a kiss.

Not tenderest song of nightingale,
Nor sparkling trills and gurgling gush
Of joy from velvet-throated thrush,
Nor brilliant pipe of mottled quail,
Nor tuneful plaint of whippoorwill,
The measure of her song can fill;
And yet her song is only this:
"I love you, papa!"—then a kiss.

The Code of a Quakeress.

The following is a code of rules which governed the daily life of Elizabeth Fry, the noted Quaker reformer:

1. Never lose any time. I do not think that lost which is spent in amusement or recreation every day; but always be in the habit of being employed.
2. Never err the least in truth.
3. Never say any ill thing of a person when thou canst say a good thing of him. Not only speak charitably, but feel so.
4. Never be irritable or unkind to anybody.
5. Never indulge thyself in luxuries that are not necessary.

Correspondence.

HOOPESTON, ILL., Oct. 7, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a little girl eight years old. I go to school in the first room. I hav reading, spelling, arithmetic, and drawing. We hav so many in school that I can only go half the day. So I cannot learn much. My teacher's name is Miss Lula Willis. She is a Baptist. We hav to repeat the Lord's Prayer and the twenty-third Psalm every morning. Isn't that a nuisance? I used to go to the Universalist Sunday-school. But it took Paul so long to get to Rome that I got tired and stopped going. Mamma sends her love to you, and so do I. I will close for this time. Please publish this.

Your little friend, OLLIE JOHNSTON.

FARLINVILLE, KAN., NOV. 6, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been intending to write to you for some time.

Pa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it was was first printed. I think it is the best paper I hav read. I like the Children's Corner very much. My mother has been dead for five years, and my three older sisters are married, so I am the only girl left to keep house for father and my two brothers. I am thirteen years old. I go to school every day; my teacher's name is Mr. Campbell, and I like him very much.

The Christians are holding protracted meetings here. They are too poor to build a church, so they hold their meetings in the schoolhouse. I went several nights and got tired of it; some would sing, some pray, some shout and talk—I never heard such a noise in my life.

The Christians dislike pa very much, because he picks the Bible to pieces. There are only two Infidel families in this town.

I would like very much to correspond with some of the girls and boys of the Children's Corner.

Wishing success to the Children's Corner, I remain, Your friend,

PEARL DEWEY.

[We hope some of the children who read the Corner will write to the little motherless girl, who must be a "Pearl of great price," to keep house for her father and two brothers, and also to read THE TRUTH SEEKER understandingly.—ED. C. C.]

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper; 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

ITEMS OF NEWS OF INTEREST TO FREETHINKERS.

Arthur B. Moss, whose scientific articles hav won him renown with TRUTH SEEKER readers, has, in connection with H. Witton, also a Freethinker, written a drama which was produced in London last week.

The Sydney Daily Telegraph publishes statistics showing the condition of church and chapel attendance in New South Wales. Since 1883, while the population has increased by 144,222, church attendance has decreased by 19,800.

Once upon a time the newspapers used to comment on "the villainous head" of Mr. Bradlaugh, who was said to be a mixture of prizefighter, burglar, and ape. The London Freethinker notes that a change has come over the scene now. Recently the Pall Mall Gazette wrote: "There is no more remarkable head in the House of Commons than Mr. Gladstone's own—excepting perhaps the dome-of-St.-Paul-like head of Mr. Bradlaugh."

The religious question has cropped up again in the Southampton, England, school board. According to the report in the local paper, the Rev. G. C. White desired to make the religious instruction more systematic, and to hav a periodical examination thereon. This immediately raised the question who should be the examiners, and the motion was stoutly opposed by Mr. Burbage, who thought it best to let sleeping dogs lie, and by Canon Scannell, in behalf of the Catholics, who contended that the Bible could not be taught without teaching something in the shape of doctrin as well. He would propose the Rev. Canon Gunn, of Winchester, a Roman Catholic, as examiner. The Rev. H. H. Pereira appealed to Canon Scannell not to oppose—it was a choice between Agnosticism and some religious instruction. Mr. Domoney frankly declared there was much in the Bible that was unfit for reading by children. His opinion was that as a rule Agnostics understood the Bible better than Christians. The matter was ultimately referred to a committee of the whole board.

The following startling manifesto was recently issued in Michigan: "To all the People of Michigan: Knowledge, wisdom, wealth, purity, patience, prosperity, power, and peace be multiplied unto you. All of these may be secured to all of our cities, to every home, in every heart. The Republican party cannot giv them, neither can the Democratic or any other party. They cannot be purchased with greenbacks or gold. Yet all who desire may hav all of them by asking; asking of him who alone can giv them. The political party that will acknowledge God in all their platforms and in all their ways as the 'author and giver of every good and perfect gift,' that party shall be my party and their God shall be my God. If the Republican party will do this, then I am a Republican, all of me; if they will not do this, and the Democratic party will, then I am a Democrat, through and through. Neither of these parties hav done this; they each seem to be afraid to say that right is right and wrong is wrong; that our father's God is our God. Because neither of them hav done this, and because of the adoption of the following plank by the Prohibition party on July 24, 1884—

"'The Prohibition party in national convention assembled acknowledge Almighty God as the rightful sovereign of all men, from whom the just powers of government are derived, to whose laws human enactments should conform, and that peace, prosperity, and happiness only can come to the people when the laws of the national and state governments are in accord with the divine will.' Therefore, 'with malice toward none, and with charity for all,' their platform shall be my platform, their God, my God; and if I shall be tendered the nomination for governor on this platform, I shall accept it, whether I receive 20 votes or 220,000.

"DAVID PRESTON."

The members of the board of education of New York hav had a very lively debate over the question of appointing a Roman Catholic to be a school trustee. Dr. Lawrence T. McNamara was nominated to be a trustee in the Ninth ward in place of Horne, resigned. Commissioner Sprague jumped up to move that the board go into executiv session upon the consideration of the nomination. His motion was lost by a large majority. Then Commissioner Sprague said that he wanted to know more about Dr. McNamara, and he wanted the committee on nominations to tell him if Dr. McNamara had been nominated for any reason except that he was a doctor and a Roman Catholic. The position of school trustee was one of peculiar honor and of grave responsibility. No class of officers in the public school system had the power to make or mar that the school trustee had. The commissioner went on: "Now, we might as well jump right into this matter and ventilate it. It is a fact perfectly well known to all of us that the Roman church, as a church, is opposed to our public school system. So far as the members of the church are concerned, some of them are opposed to the public schools. Now, I want to know which side Dr. McNamara is on. I don't want to be understood as opposing Roman Catholics. I hav voted for Roman Catholics for trustees in the past, and I expect to do so in the future, but I want to know what a man's opinion of the school system is before I vote for him. Nobody has told us what Dr. McNamara's opinions are. I hav heard it said," he continued, "that McNamara was nominated to represent somebody or something. Now, what does he represent? Is it the church, which is hostil to the public schools? I object to any man's being nominated as a school trustee merely because he represents somebody, and not because he is well fitted in himself. I hav heard that a priest, noted for his hostility to our public schools and for his zeal in establishing parochial schools, lobbied for Dr. McNamara's nomination. This is what the newspapers say, anyway, and I think this board had better look into it." Commissioner Webb strongly supported Commissioner Sprague. He was opposed to this claim on the part of any section of the people that they must be represented on the boards of trustees. It was well known that the Catholic church hated the public school system. After an extended and acrimonious discussion, McNamara was elected.

The following is from the Dunedin, New Zealand, Evening Star of October 1st:

"The supporters of the Bible in the schools are numerous in the new Parliament, and, if an Amending Education bill should be brought down, will be very activ in furtherance of their cause. But, before they can hope to influence the House in the desired direction, they must come to a decision on two points of paramount importance: (1) What portions of the scriptures to be read daily are acceptable to the great mass of the people? (2) If something more than scripture-reading is arrived at, by whom is the religious instruction to be given? The second question is the weightier one, and will, we think, prove the rock on which the Bible-in-schools party will be shipwrecked. Those who wish for the preservation of our national system of education should ponder the answer of Inspector Hepburn, of the Victorian education department, to the demand which has arisen in that colony for religious instruction in the state schools there.

"If the teaching of religion could be successfully introduced into the schools without ruining the present educational system, no one would be more pleased than myself; but the difficulties in the way are, in my opinion, insuperable. Granting (and it is a great concession) that those to whom is deputed the task of choosing these texts agree among themselvs as to what would be suitable ones. are these texts to be explained or not? If they are to be explained, who would undertake the duty? The majority of teachers would refuse. Some, no doubt, would willingly offer to do so; but would their interpretation of these texts giv satisfaction to parents of different creeds? If these texts are to remain unexplained, would the children receive much benefit therefrom? I hold that where children receive religious instruction at home, that given in school is unnecessary; and if the home instruction is wanting, the little received in the schools would not benefit them very much. In one school in this district, after a moral lesson on 'Honesty,' the teacher was consulted by one boy who was in doubt whether he should obey his father, who bade him steal wood from a neighbor's yard, or the command, 'Thou shalt not steal,' as inculcated in the lesson given. He was told that his father's command was nought when opposed to the divine law. From my knowledge of human nature, I can make a very shrewd guess as to what law that boy would hav to obey. Again, if religion were taught in state schools, an inspector's time would be very often frittered away in holding inquiries into differences between parents and teachers—all the outcome of religious teaching. During the last year a parent complained about a teacher trying to pervert his children, because they were asked the feminin of priest; he contending that there could be no feminin. If complaints such as this crop up under the present system, what will happen if religious instruction be introduced? At present an inspector is supposed to hav some acquaintance with a variety of subjects, ranging from military drill to sewing. To settle the differences between parents and teachers, would he require to be posted up in theology? If so, a long farewell to all the harmony that at present characterizes the yearly conferences of inspectors. In teaching morals and inserting in the reading-books lessons calculated to make children obedient, honest, etc., the state, which claims to be secular, has done more than can be expected of it."

Mohammedanism and Christianity.

From the Sun.

The assertion that Mohammedanism is advancing far more rapidly than Christianity in Asia and Africa has often been made of late years, but when it was repeated a short time ago in the English Church Congress, by a dignitary of the church, it was received with surprise and anger.

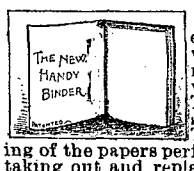
The speaker was the Rev. Isaac Taylor, Canon of York, and his exact declaration was that "in Asia and Africa Islam, as a missionary religion, is more successful than Christianity, and our efforts to convert the Mohammedans hav failed." Having, since the congress, been challenged to prove these statements and produce the facts to sustain his generalizations, Canon Taylor now answers his critics and questioners through the London Times.

He points out that, according to the census returns, the Mohammedan population in India increased 9,239,062 between 1871 and 1881, or about 25 per cent. After making ample allowance for the natural increase of births over deaths, this shows that the conversion of heathens and Christians to Mohammedanism had been going on at the rate of 600,000 a year. During the same period the conversions to Christianity barely amounted to one-tenth of that number.

Yet the Mohammedans hav no paid missionaries and no organized missionary agencies. Their conversions must, therefore, be due to the voluntary efforts of individuals and the intrinsic attractions of their faith. Meanwhile the Christians, on the other hand, hav all the prestige of a Christian governing power, and are expending vast sums on proselytism, for which they hav a long-established and carefully methodized system of missionary effort. Of the total number of conversions to Christianity, too, all, except a comparativly small part, are in the extreme south of the Madras Presidency, where Christianity obtained a firm footing at a very remote period, and the Christians are more numerous than anywhere else in India. Canon Taylor also finds as a "startling result" that four-fifths of the Christian converts are Roman Catholics.

In the northern and central provinces, where Islam is strong, and the conversions to Mohammedanism are at the rate of half a million a year, the conversions to Christianity, to use his words, "are practically nil." The most activ and powerful of the English missionary societies at work in India is the Church Missionary Society, according to whose report 841 missionaries and nativ agents, employed at a cost of toward $250,000, made last year only 297 converts out of a population of 220,000,000 in those provinces, if the number of genuin converts be measured by the number of adult baptisms. Of these converts only seventeen seem to hav been Mohammedans, out of a Mohammedan population of 55,000,000, and some of them were very suspicious, as, in fact, conversions from Islam almost invariably are.

Then he turns to countries distinctivly Mohammedan, and in the four missionary fields of Persia, Palestine, Arabia, and Egypt finds that 109 missionaries and nativ agents, employed by the Church Missionary Society at a cost of $60,000, converted and baptized last year only one adult convert. This solitary convert, according to the report, was "a certain Moslem girl in the orphanage at Jerusalem, whose conversion," Canon Taylor suggests, "is perhaps accounted for by the statement that 'she is easily influenced and requires constant guidance.'" In all Egypt and Arabia the whole number of "nativ Christian adherents" is put at nineteen only, and they, perhaps, as he surmises, are largely made up of the wives and children of the four "nativ lay teachers."



The practical results of Eastern missionary labors, in the way of actual conversions, are not more encouraging elsewhere. In Ceylon last year 374 agents made only 207 converts at a cost of more than $50,000; in mid China 71 agents made 63 converts at a cost of $45,000, and in south China 148 agents made 297 converts at a cost of about $40,000.

These are the facts and statistics with which Canon Taylor meets the challenge of his critics, and they are quite interesting. As to Africa, he will speak in another letter, but the spread of Islam there has been so remarkable within recent years that he will hav no difficulty in proving his point.

From the London Freethinker.

Canon Taylor further cites from the recent book on "Christianity, Islam, and the Negro Race," by Dr. Blyden, who is himself a Christian negro. Dr. Blyden says: "West Africa has been in contact with Christianity for three hundred years, and not one single tribe, as a tribe, has yet become Christian. Nor has any influential chief adopted the religion brought by the European missionary." Of the nativs of Cape Palmas he says: "Upwards of forty years of untiring mission effort has made them to hate rather than to admire Christian civilization." To this may be added the testimony of Mr. Joseph Thomson, that "for every African who is influenced for good by Christianity, a thousand are driven into deeper degradation by the gin trade," which everywhere accompanies the gospel, although denounced by Mohammedanism. Yet over a million a year, some of it extorted from school children, is annually wasted on attempts to introduce Christianity to those who do not want it, while English men and women are starving at home.

TRY-SQUARE;

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

EIGHTY-ONE liquor-sellers were arrested last Sunday for breaking the Sunday law.

PLYMOUTH church has called the Rev. Chas. A. Berry, an English preacher, to Beecher's pulpit.

JOHANN MOST has made another incendiary speech, and has again been arrested.

A FIRE in Memphis, Tenn., on the 17th, destroyed over $750,000 worth of cotton.

A STEAMSHIP has just brought to New York, 367 penniless Jews, whose passage here was paid by their friends.

THE Rev. Thomas Rose, aged 80, of Taylor township, Pa., committed suicide the other day by burning himself up in his barn.

THE United Anti-Music Convention at Xenia, O., condemned the use of organs in church as inimical to the "purity" of divine worship.

HARMAN SPENCE, a mason, tempted Providence by working upon the spire of a Lutheran church in Gettysburg, Pa., and one day last week he fell off the scaffold and was instantly killed.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN has been lecturing in Maine. He declares that he is about to leave American soil forever.

THE friends of the Anarchists hanged at Chicago are raising a fund for the relief of the dead men's families.

THE price of coal has been raised 50 cents per ton without any apparent reason except that people must hav it at any price.

A METHODIST conference at Danville, Va., adopted resolutions condemning theaters and theater-going by professed Christians.

SEVERAL women having voted in the recent election at Newfane, Niagara Co., N. Y., the case will be brought before the grand jury to test the legal issue.

THE steamer W. A. Scholten, from Rotterdam, went down in a collision in the English channel last Sunday. She had 214 persons aboard, more than half of whom were drowned.

DEACON DAVID WRIGHT, a man of intense piety and austerity, and who was the chief support of a Baptist church in Hoboken, N. J., committed suicide on the 17th by cutting his throat with a razor.

BARNUM the showman's winter quarters at Bridgeport, Conn., were burnt last Sunday night, at a loss of $100,000. Nearly all the wild animals were destroyed, together with the tents, chariots, and paraphernalia.

Two light-weight pugilists, Carney of England and McAuliffe of Brooklyn, fought a seventy-three round prize fight at Revere Beach, Mass., last week, resulting in a draw. Unfortunately both are likely to survive the injuries which they inflicted upon each other.

THE wife of Pastor Hooper, of Kingston, N. Y., has left him and gone to California because he treated her so cruelly. The Rev. Mr. Hooper will probably not follow his wife to California, as a church in that state deposed him not long since for prevarication, exaggeration, and being engaged to marry two different women.

SOME youngsters were skylarking near the register's office, this city, one day recently when Anthony Comstock was passing. A boy about ten years old ran near Comstock, and Comstock slapped him a severe blow in the face, knocking him down. A crowd collected, and several policemen were soon present. Among those who witnessed the occurrence were several newspaper reporters, who denounced Comstock's blow as an outrage. Comstock retorted with personal abuse.

JOSEPH'S UNMINISTERIAL CONDUCT PERSISTED IN.

And he left his garment in her hand, and fled, and got him out.—Gen. xxxix, 12.

Odds and Ends.

"TOOK long steps, my cheild," said Solomon Isaacs. "You vont wear out your shoes nearly so qvick."

WHAT is the difference between a High Churchman and a Baptist? The one uses candles, the other dips.

BISMARCK runs a paper mill and a distillery. He also runs the German empire, but the two former bring him the most money.

CUSTOMS inspector: "Is this a tailor's dummy at the bottom of your trunk?" Passenger: "No, sir." C. I.: "What is it, then?" Passenger: "That's a contract clergyman."

MOODY will tackle Louisville this winter. Unless he can convince his hearers that the river of life flows pure old sour mash, his labors in that town, says a Minneapolis paper, will be a dead failure.

WHEN Brown was informed that "idiot" was derived from a Greek word meaning a private citizen, he was ungracious enough to say that the Greeks couldn't hav known much about Congress or state legislatures.

"DON'T hide your talents, young man," said the parson, earnestly. "Indeed and I don't," exclaimed the youth; "I'm a fence-board and barn-roof advertiser, and hav got a two-hundred-mile contract on Glare's Soap and Dryman's Tonic Bitters."

"YOU don't need a ten-cent stamp on that letter, young man," said the post-office official; "it will go for two cents." "This letter won't go for any two cents," replied the young man, tremulously; "it's to my best girl, an' she ain't one of your two-cent kind. Gimme a ten-cent stamp, and I'll slip her in before the mail closes."

WE are not bloodthirsty, as a rule, but we think it only just if the heathen retaliate on the missionaries by boiling them. The missionaries, by a vote of the home board, go to the savages with the avowed intention of initiating them into the mysteries of Sheol, and if the savages hoist them with their own petard, who is to blame?—Life.

MRS. HENDRICKS (to caller): "No, I didn't read the story, Mrs. Hobson. My husband read it and told me that it end-d dreadfully, and I don't like that style of novel." Mrs. Hobson (surprised): "Why, it ended beautifully, and they were married in the last chapter." Mrs. Hendricks (with a set look on her face): "I'll speak to Mr. Hendricks about it again."

STRANGER: "I notice you drove the president over the same street twice." Omaha Man: "Yes, we arranged the route that way. You see, we drove him through that street on his arrival, and then drove him through it when we went back, an hour later." "Exactly. I thought it was an oversight." "We wanted to giv him a chance to see how Western cities grow."—Omaha World.

"IT'S notin' but perlitical parties in my house, Sarah. There's Jimmy, he's a Pro'bishunist; Eddy's a Hinry Georger; Patsy's a Jimmercrat—same as his poor father was, God bless him! Tommy he's jined the Progressiv Labor Party; an', would you believe it, Clemantina, my only gal Clemanti a, come last night an' axed if she might jine the Progressiv Ewker Party just formed in the neighborhood, an', as she said it was no end of favors she was to get, I let her jine."

A LADY, who had recently lost her husband, and a friend were eating dinner together at the residence of the latter. "I sympathize with you from the bottom of my heart in your great sorrow," said the friend. "It must be terrible to lose such a man." "Ah me, yes," sighed the widow. "It is only the hope of soon meeting him in a better land that givs me courage and a desire to liv."—Arkansaw Traveler.

EVEN the life of a newspaper canvasser is not totally devoid of poetry. The unending round of "Times is so hard and money is so scarce that we can't take a paper," and "My husband brings a paper home with him," and all the stock excuses, are sometimes broken by a little incident like this that was told by a man who labors in that ungrateful position: "The delivery boy had gone a little ahead of me," said the canvasser, "and as I stood on the sidewalk a pretty little boy in kilts toddled up and stared at me with pretty blue eyes. I made friends with him at once. He put his hands on my order-book and says he: 'Hot's at?' 'That's my order-book,' I told him. 'Hot does oo do wiv at?' 'Oh, I write down the names of all the bad little boys I know.' He looked at me a minute with his big eyes opened wide. Then, his voice hushed with awe, he asked, 'Is oo Dod?'"

THE ACROBATIC CANDIDATE.

Into the gay saloon he strolled,
With free and easy air,
And quickly for the drinks he called
For everybody there.

The glass he grasped, his hand he raised
And said, "Come up, boys, come;"
Then on the crowd he smiling gazed,
And drank success to rum.

He drained his glass, paid for his treat,
And then the candidate
Went out and met upon the street
A temperance advocate.

"Ha! ha!" he cried, "giv me your fist!
I'm proud to meet a foe
Of rum, a Prohibitionist:
The rum shops, sir, must go!"

Gems of Thought.

SCHOOL-TEACHERS are needed to giv lessons to the uninformed regarding nature and her laws—men who hav made a thorough study of her phenomena and laws, and who correctly place her above all priestly claims and pretensions. These men are called scientists, for science is the sum of all demonstrated knowledge, which is acquired by close observation, accurate tests, and continued study and application. These are the true friends of mankind; these show men what is truth; they point out falsehoods and errors; they prove that everything that takes place is natural, that nothing ever was or ever can be supernatural.—D. M. Bennett.

BY the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life and others foreordained to everlasting death. These angels and men, thus predestinated and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed; and their number is so certain and definit that it cannot be either increased or diminished.—Westminster Confession of Faith.

YOU remember how St. Paul said, speaking even of God's own law, that "the law is good if a man use it lawfully." And, in like manner, we may assuredly say that God's word will always lead us right if we understand it rightly. But men hav often understood it wrongly; and, accordingly, it has come to be that some of the cruelest and wickedest deeds that ever hav been done in this world hav been justified by the authority of the Bible.—Counsel and Comfort, by the Country Parson.

LET us hope that the teacher in the London Board schools may occasionally be permitted to make some amends for the nameless flood of rubbish he is required to teach, by giving an unpretending little secular lesson on kindness, good temper, industry, thrift, temperance, zeal for the common welfare, and so forth, however "godless" such a course may be, or even on such impious Secularism as may be involved in the unselfish practice of human justice, and benevolence, and truth, and honesty, in spite of the penalties that piety, ignorance, and selfishness impose on them. . . . Fortunately for the children, few among English Christians dare or care to believe the Bible as it stands. They mitigate its horrors and absurdities, or they more or less plainly reject them, and do their best to ennoble their religion into a real and practical Secular morality.—Religion in Schools.

THE true basis of morality is utility; that, is the adaptation of our actions to the promotion of the general welfare and happiness; the endeavor so to rule our life that we may serve and bless mankind. Through the scientific method only can the true rules of morality be discovered, and an irrefragable answer returned to all questionings concerning right and wrong. The first step toward building up a science of morality is to collect facts, and, as in other sciences, facts are collected by the observation of surrounding phenomena, so must moral facts be collected by the observation of moral phenomena, facts in sociology, recorded in history. We must find out, by careful analysis, what courses hav tended most to the advancement and ennoblement of society; we must trace the results of various lines of conduct, and see which hav best promoted the general welfare of the race. That which promotes the general happiness is right; that which lessens or undermines the general happiness is wrong. These are the axioms on which a true morality must be grounded.—Mrs. Besant's True Morality.

THEREFORE, putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbor; for we are all members one of another. Be ye angry and sin not: let not the sun go down upon your wrath, neither giv place to the devil. Let him that stole, steal no more; but rather let him labor, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may hav to giv to him that needeth.—Eph. iv, 25-28.

IT is recorded of Alexander the Great that he one day visited Diogenes, the cynic philosopher, who was bathing in his tub in the sunshine. It is stated that Alexander was so impressed with the moderation and simplicity of the cynic that he said to him: "Tell me what I can giv to you. Anything you want, to the third of my kingdom, shall be at your service." What, think you, was the answer of the philosopher? "Please, your majesty, stand from between me and the sun."—Plutarch's Lives.

SELF REVERENCE, self-knowledge, self-control,
These three alone lead him to sovereign power,
Yet not for power (power of herself
Would come uncalled for), but to liv by law,
Acting the law we liv by, without fear;
And because right is right, to follow right
Were wisdom, in the scorn of consequences.
—Tennyson.

MUCH of this world's wisdom is still acquired by necromancy—that is, by consulting the oracular dead.—Guesses at Truth.

Notes and Clippings.

THE salary of the chaplain of the House of Representativs at Washington is $900. Some half dozen clergymen are lobbying for the position.

ANTHONY COMSTOOK'S views of art may be designated as a nude departure.—Cincinnati Enquirer. But Anthony Comstock himself can only be designated as a public nuisance. —Sun.

A FLORIDA paper reports that the liquor sellers of Atlanta, Ga., hav expressed much righteous indignation against "the desecration of the Sabbath" by the holding of Prohibition meetings.

RABBI KOHLER, a Jewish reverend, gave a temperance sermon last Sunday. He advocated self-control instead of Prohibition, and called attention to the fact that the Jews, who hav no temperance societies, are a sober and frugal people.

AN enthusiastic Materialist put a headstone over the grave of his wife in a cemetery at Nievre, France, upon which there is the following inscription: "Deprived of all vitality, here lie the remains of the material that formed Madame Durand. No cards and no prayers."

THE Roman Catholic Board of Missions operating among the North American Indians has now under its control thirty-five boarding and twenty day schools, the first having an attendance of 2,190 scholars, the second of 870. It is reported that these scholars receive $231,880 from the United States government, which also furnishes clothing for 400 boarding pupils at a cost of $30,000. Some of the Protestant papers, says the Sun, claim that this is contrary to the Constitution, which it undoubtedly is, but we never heard of any Protestants saying that the money their churches receive for converting Indians was unconstitutionally donated.

WHEN Plymouth church wanted a eulogy pronounced upon its dead pastor, the late Mr. Beecher, they sent to England for the Rev. Dr. Parker, who professed to be a warm friend of Beecher, to perform that labor of love. When the eulogy was delivered an admission fee was charged for the benefit of the Beecher Monument Fund. It is now the talk that the fund got none of the money, but that the Rev. Dr. Parker claimed a good fat fee out of the proceeds. The reverend gentleman is reputed to be quite worldly-minded when money is concerned, and in addition to $350 for his services as eulogist, he sold the copyright of the sermon for $200.

THE first careful canvass of illiteracy in Massachusetts was undertaken in connection with the census of 1885, and the result is almost ready for publication. The important figures are made public. In a population falling a few thousand short of 2,000,000 the number of illiterates over 10 years old is 122,263, and 45,550 of these are males and 76,713 females. Of the whole number 96,770 are wholly illiterate, that is to say, they can neither read nor write, and this class consists of 37,464 males and 59,306 females. The number who can read but are unable to write is 25.360, and 7,992 of these are males and 17,306 females. There are 133 persons who claim that they can write but cannot read. The number of illiterates in 1885 between the ages of 10 and 13, both inclusiv, was 2,158; between the ages of 14 and 19, 4,303; 20 and 29, 8,747; 30 and 49, 16,544; 50 years and over, 13,774.

THE Dallas Times doesn't like the theology of the cowboy evangelist who is wrestling with the Texas sinners, and takes him to task for saying that "hell is full of Campbellites and Methodists." It says: "Come out of that, cowboy! Come up out of the depths of such barbarism! Preach good will; preach love; preach hope! Put away the instruments of torture; fill up your awful chasm of ever-burning fire! Hush the shrieks of lost souls, and lullaby into quiet the moans of the damned! Preach heaven; preach that there is a place where preachers, cowboys, Campbellites, Methodists, Baptists, all may reach if the great and pleasant road of justice and love and fair play to man is allowed here on earth." What is the good of preaching all this, or anything else, without proving it?

THE pope has an annual income of $625,000, it is said, from the interest on the English bonds left in the treasury by his predecessor. He is also said to be a great speculator, subscribing for the Italian loans, holding them for a rise, and selling them to invest the profits in more English bonds. The Peter's pence is now said to amount to about $415,000 a year. This money and the income of the English bonds goes to pay $5,000 a year to each cardinal living in Rome, and to pay the prelates of the papal court, secretaries, nuncios, guards, and other papal servants. Besides this the pope receives from the apostolic chancery sums for the titles of nobility, papal decorations, benedictions in the article of death, privileges of the altar, private chapels, dispensations, and other things, the total amount being, it is said, $520,000 a year. The pope's annual income, therefore, is about $1,500,000.

THE Rev. R. Heber Newton, in his sermon last Sunday, pointed out several dangers which he thinks menace this republic. The danger to our schools was that they failed to take account of industrial aptitudes. Socially, he said, free divorce threatens the home institution. In public economy disparity of wealth is the danger, and the churches, he thought, are menaced by an absence of free thought and honest utterance.

A ROMAN Catholic temperance society holds a sacred concert every Sunday evening in this city. Last Sunday night's solemnities are thus reported by a morning paper: A sort of an overture on the piano gave all the boys a chance to show their familiarity with the Boulanger march, in which they joined by whistling. There was no address. A cowboy with a crutch sang "Powder Boy Jim,' and then pleased the girls mightily with "I'm the Father of a Little Gossoon." An English singer, after telling the boys in song "Don't Leave Your Mother while there's Fringe on Your Pants," told the girls, "All I Want is a Little Wife to keep Me Nice and Warm." One young singer who rendered "You Know" had his effects spoiled by the whole house, which insisted on joining in the whistle. He got even by doing a trick of spirit-writing and showing a slate inscribed:

> Of all the fish in sea or lake,
> The blooming codfish takes the cake.

Frank Bush, more singers, and some banjo players held the audience till half past 9.

IV.—Objective Maxims.

CHAPTER XIX.—LEGISLATIVE REFORM.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

Progress is a general law of Nature, and the comparative study of Evolution proves that the tendency to improvement increases with the advance to higher planes of development. Among the lowest organisms the rate of progress is hardly appreciable. The sea shells of the Devonian period can scarcely be distinguished from the shells of our present seas. The balls of amber found on the shores of the Baltic often contain the mummies of insects closely resembling certain species of latter-day flies and beetles, while the horse, the zebra, and other modern varieties of the equine genus, have developed from a creature not much larger than a fox. The Neanderthal skull proves that the heads of our early ancestors were almost ape-like in their protruding jaws and flatness of cranium. The lower animals adhere to inherited habits with a persistency that has often proved their ruin by diminishing their ability of adapting themselves to change of circumstances, as in the case of that sea-lizard of the South sea islands, where its ancestors had for ages managed to escape their only enemies by leaving the water and crawling up the beach, and where their modern descendants persist in crawling *land*ward in the hope of escaping from dogs and hunters.

The higher animals, on the other hand, rarely fail to profit by lessons of experience. Trappers know that the contrivances for capturing wild animals have to be changed from time to time, the older methods being apt to lose their efficacy after the fate of a certain number of victims has warned their relatives. Old rats have been seen driving their young from a dish of arsenic-poisoned gruel. Deer, foxes, and wild turkeys learn to avoid the favorite trails of the hunter; monkeys, on their first arrival in a cold climate, impatiently tear off the jackets or shawls furnished by the kindness of their keeper, but soon learn to appreciate the advantage of artificial teguments, and even try to increase their stock of wardrobe by appropriating every stray piece of cloth they can lay their hands on.

The instinct of adaption to the conditions of progress has asserted itself both among modern and very ancient nations, though during the mental bondage of the Middle Ages its manifestations were systematically suppressed by the conservatism of religious bigots. Savages show an almost apish eagerness in adopting the habits, fashions, and foibles of civilization. The political institutions of primitive nations are very elastic. The Grecian republics were not only willing but anxious to improve their laws by abolishing abuses and testing amendments. In ancient Rome every general assembly of freemen exercised the functions of a legislative council; legislative reforms were proposed by private citizens, and were often carried by acclamation, like the edict for the expulsion of the Tarquins, and the resolution revoking the exile of Cicero.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

Legislative reform, the manful renunciation of entangling alliances with the ghosts of the past, is a sword that has more than once cut a Gordian knot of fatal complications. The suppression of monasteries saved four of our Spanish American sister republics from a brood of vampires that had drained the life-blood of Spain for a series of centuries. In England the timely repeal of the corn-laws averted an explosion that might have rent the coherence of the entire British empire. The abolition of slavery with one blow destroyed a hydra that had menaced the safety of the American Union by an endless series of political disputes. By the abolition of serfdom Czar Alexander elevated the Russian empire to the rank of a progressive nation. The very possibility of national progress depends, indeed, on the hope of legislative reform, for the rigor of unalterable laws prevents social development as the clasp of an iron ring prevents the growth of a tree.

C.—PERVERSION.

All the intelligent nations of antiquity were distinguished by a tendency to legislative progress, till the freedom of that progress was checked by the claims of religious infallibility. The founder of the Zendavesta advanced that claim for a pandect of pretended revelations which became the religious code of Central Asia, and as a consequence the intellectual and industrial development of two valiant nations was stunted by legislative conservatism—the proverbially "unalterable laws of the Medes and Persians." The claims of an infallible revelation preclude the necessity of reform. "Should mortals presume to improve the ordinances of a God?"

But the blind hatred of progress which has for so many centuries degraded the Christian hierarchy below the priesthood of all other intolerant creeds, is the earth-renouncing antinaturalism of their founder. The priests of Zoroaster, Moses, and Mohammed claimed the sufficiency of their dogmas for the purposes of national prosperity. The priests of the nature-hating Galilean attempted to suppress the very desire of that prosperity. "The doctrine of renunciation made patriotism an idle dream: the saints, whose 'kingdom was not of this world,' had no business with vanities of that sort; no chieftain could trust his neighbor; cities were pitted against cities and castles against castles; patriotic reformers would vainly have appealed to the sympathies of men who had been taught to reserve their interest for the politics of the New Jerusalem" (Secret of the East, p. 76).

The Rev. Spurgeon, of London, England, recently provoked the protests of his Liberal colleagues by the confession that he "positively hated advanced thought;" but only five centuries ago such protests were silenced with the gag and the fagot. For nearly a thousand years every clergyman who had the courage to lift his voice in favor of secular reforms was fiercely attacked as a traitor to the sacred cause of other-worldliness. To question the authority of the church was a crime which could not in the least be palliated by such pleas as the temporal interests of mankind, and a mere hint at the fallibility of "revealed scriptures" could only be expiated in the blood of the offender. Nay, thousands of scientists, historians, and philosophers who had never expressed a direct doubt of that sort, were doomed to a death of torture merely because the logical inference of their discoveries was at variance with the dogmas of the Galilean miracle-mongers. From the reign of Charlemagne to the outbreak of the Protestant revolt the intolerance of Christian bigots interposed an insuperable dam between the projects and the realization of social reforms.

"I cannot conceive," says Hallam, "of any state of society more adverse to the intellectual improvement of mankind than one which admitted no middle line between dissoluteness and fanatical mortifications."

If it had not been for the exotic civilization of Moorish Spain, it would be strictly true that at the end of the thirteenth century, when the enemies of nature had reached the zenith of their power, "the countries of Europe, without a single exception, were worse governed, more ignorant, more superstitious, poorer, and unhappier than the worst governed provinces of pagan Rome."

In China and India, too, the resistance of religious prejudice has for ages frustrated the hopes of political development, and the civilization of Europe dates only from the time when a more or less complete separation of church and state was effected by the insurrection of the Germanic nations, and where the work of that separation has been left unfinished the march of reform halts at every step. Every claim of dogmatic infallibility has proved a spoke in the wheels of progress.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

The pig-headed conservatism of orthodox nations has never failed to avenge itself in its ultimate results, but its fatuity has, perhaps, been most strikingly illustrated by the practical consequences of legislative non-progressiveness. There was a time when the small value of real estate made it a trifle for an Italian prince to present a favorit prelate with a few square leagues of neglected woodlands; but now, when those woods have been turned into vineyards and building-lots, and over-population makes the monopoly of land a grievous burden, hundreds of industrious peasants are obliged to starve to swell the revenues of a bloated priest, who nevertheless succeeds in silencing all protests by an appeal to the "necessity of respecting time-honored institutions." At a time when agriculture and pastoral pursuits were the chief industries of Scotland, it was no great grievance to sequester the seventh day for the exclusive service of ecclesiastic purposes; but now, when thousands of poor factory children need outdoor recreations as they need sunlight and bread, it has become an infamous outrage on personal rights to enforce a medieval by-law for the suppression of outdoor sports on the day when those who need it most can find their only chance for recreation. Nevertheless, the dread of innovations defeats the urged repeal of a law which for the last hundred years has obliged millions of city dwellers to sacrifice the sunshine of their lives for the benefit of a few clerical vampires. The repeal of the witchcraft laws was preceded by a transition period of at least two hundred years, when the mere dread of an open rupture with the specters of the past cowed intelligent jurists into accepting the charge of an impossible crime, and consigning the victims of superstition to the doom of a hideous death. Their private rationalism might revolt against the absurdity of the proceedings, but there were the witnesses, there were the legal precedents, there were the explicit provisions of the penal code, and with or without the consent of their intellectual conscience they had to pronounce the sentence of death. The penal statutes of medieval England made sheep stealing a capital offense, and the mulish conservatism of British legislators refused to abolish that relic of the Dark Ages till the common sense of the lower classes found means to redress the abuse in a way of their own. Juries agreed to acquit sheep-stealers altogether, rather than vote away their lives for that of a quadruped. It was in vain that the prosecuting attorney established the fact of the offense beyond a shadow of reasonable doubt. It was in vain that the charge of the judge emphatically indorsed the indictment. It was in vain that the defendants themselves completed the evidence of their guilt by a frank confession; they were acquitted amidst the wrathful protests of the court and the plaudits of the audience, till sheep-owners themselves were obliged to petition for the repeal of the time-dishonored law. The idea that the mere antiquity of a legal custom is an argument in its favor is a twin sister of the superstitious veneration of antiquated dogmas.

E.—REFORM.

The superstitious dread of innovation, rather than the want of natural intelligence, has for ages thwarted the hopes of rationalism, and the renunciation of that prejudice promises to rival the blessing of Secular education in promoting the advance of social reforms. Orthodox restiveness, rather than any conceivable degree of ignorance, has, for instance, prevented the repeal of the Religious Disability laws which still disgrace the statutes of so many civilized nations. A chemical inventor would be suspected of insanity for trying to demonstrate his theories by quoting the Bible in preference to a scientific text-book, yet on questions as open to investigation and proof as any problem of chemistry, the courts of numerous intelligent nations still refuse to accept the testimony of a witness who happens to prefer the philosophy of Humboldt and Spencer to the rant of an oriental spook-monger. The proposition to oblige a water-drinker to defray the expense of his neighbor's passion for intoxicating beverages would justly land the proposer in the next lunatic asylum, yet millions upon millions of our Caucasian fellow-men are still taxed to enable their neighbors to enjoy the luxuries of a creed which the conscience of the unwilling tithe-payer rejects as a degrading superstition. In Europe countless Nonconformists have to contribute to the support of a parish-priest or village-rector on pain of having a sheriff sell their household goods at public auction. In America farmers and mechanics have to pay double-taxes in order to enable an association of mythology-mongers to hold their property tax-free. Because the pantheon of the Ammonites included a god with cannibal propensities, helpless infants were for centuries roasted on the consecrated gridiron of that god; and because eighteen hundred years ago the diseased imagination of a world-renouncing bigot conceived the idea of a deity delighting in the self-affliction of his creatures, the gloom of death still broods over the day devoted to the special worship of that God, and the coercive penalties of the law are weekly visited upon all who refuse to sacrifice their health and happiness on the altar of superstition.

But legislative abuses are not confined to religious anachronisms. The inconsistencies of our penal code still betray the influence of medieval prejudices in the unwise leniency, as well as in the disproportionate severity, of their dealings with purely secular offenses. The vice of intemperance was for centuries encouraged by the example of the clergy, while the control, or even the suppression, of the sexual instinct was enforced by barbarous penalties. And while the panders of the alcohol vice are still countenanced by the sanction of legal license and admitted to official positions of honor and influence, the mediators of sexual vice are treated as social outcasts, and punished with a severity out of all proportion to the actual social standards of virtue. The deserted wife, who in a moment of despair has caused the death of an unborn child, is treated as the vilest of criminals, while the crime of a railway shark or tenement-speculator whose selfishness and greed have caused a fatal disaster, is condoned in consideration of "social respectability," i.e., a mask of orthodox sentiments and unctuous cant. A Christian jury will thank a banker for shooting a poor wretch whom extreme distress may have driven to enter a house for predatory purposes, but if that same banker should be convicted of embezzling the hard-earned savings of trusting widows and orphans, his fellow-hypocrites will circulate an eloquent petition for his release from a few years of light imprisonment.

There is need of other reforms, which recommend themselves by such cogent arguments that their adoption seems only a question of time, such as the protection of forests, the recognition of women's rights, the "habitual criminal" law, physical education, and the abolition of the poison-traffic.

It is undoubtedly true that the progress from barbarism to culture is characterized by the growth of a voluntary respect for the authority of legal institutions, but it is equally true that the highest goals of civilization cannot be reached till the degree of that respect shall be measured by the utility, rather than by the antiquity, of special laws.

Religious Delusions.

THEIR STULTIFYING AND DESTRUCTIV POWER, ILLUSTRATED IN THE HISTORY OF THE ECONOMITE SOCIETY, LOCATED ON THE RIGHT BANK OF THE OHIO RIVER, AND TWENTY MILES BELOW PITTSBURGH.

II.

It is internally evident, if we read the second epistle of Peter, that when it was written the faith of the Christian people in the second coming of Christ had begun to waver. "Scoffers," as he called them, had arisen, even in the church, who, comparing the facts in the case with the explicit predictions and assurances of Jesus, said, in a tone of skeptical defiance: "Where is the promis of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep in death all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation." St. Peter rebukes these men, explaining the failure of Christ to appear on the principle that "one day with the Lord is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day;" and then he repeats the old assurance, that:

> The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burned up. Seeing, then, that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be, in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for, and hastening to, the coming of the day of God when the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements melt with fervent heat? Nevertheless, we, according to his promis, look for a new heaven, and a new earth, wherein d velleth righteousness.

But the event, which Paul assured the Christians he had the express authority of God for announcing, although so fervently believed in and expected, never occurred; and we can only imagin the feeling of shame and disappointment, and even incipient, secret Infidelity, which must hav been experienced by the early Christians, most of whom had heard the prediction from Christ's own lips, as year after year passed away, and one after another of the apostles died, and the signs of Christ's coming never appeared! And it is strong circumstantial evidence to prove the second century origin of the fourth gospel, attributed to John, that, unlike Matthew, Mark, and Luke, whose gospels are full of the matter of the second coming, the author of this book is profoundly silent on the whole subject. The reason, no doubt, was that the failure of Christ to appear, according to his solemn promis, proving that he was entirely mistaken as a matter of fact, and could not therefore be the omniscient God manifest in the flesh, militated against the great purpose of the fourth gospel, which was to deify Jesus.

THE MILLENARIAN, OR CHILIASTIC, DOCTRIN OF THE SECOND COMING.

It will be noticed that in all the quotations I hav made from the New Testament, there is no intimation given of the Millenarian idea—that Christ, after his second coming, was to reign with his saints upon the earth for a thousand years. This new phase of the doctrin did not occur to the mind of the church till the close of the tenth century, when the pope of Rome found it was necessary to do something effectual to restore the power and prestige of the church, weakened by causes unnecessary here to mention. A new flood of light suddenly burst upon the twentieth chapter of that enigmatical book in the canon of scripture, called "The Revelation of John," where it is said:

> And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled; and after that he must be loosed a little season. And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them; and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshiped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years, etc.

From this passage it is apparent, first, that the shutting up of the devil in the bottomless pit, and the reign of Christ with the saints, was to last definitivly a thousand years. Hence the names "millenarians," and "chiliasts," the one being the Latin, and the other the Greek term given to and assumed by those who entertain this belief; secondly, that after the thousand years' imprisonment of the devil is ended, "he must be loosed again for a little season, to go out and deceive the nations that are in the four quarters of the earth;" after which, according to the apostle Peter, the conflagration of the entire world, including 150,000,000 of square miles of ocean, will take place.

What questions now arise in the mind of a sincere seeker after truth who hates to be bamboozled? Are the saints, during the millennial reign, to be celibates? If so, before the lapse of the first century and a half of the period, the race of them will become extinct. If they shall propagate, as the prolific saints in Ireland do, their numbers would amount to many millions at the close of that period. Where would these millions stay when one sheet of fire encompassed the earth, dissolving the mountains, and drying up the oceans. and the very elements melting with fervent heat? Would they be colonized on the rainless clouds, and sail through space, and be fed miraculously with manna, as the Israelites were in the wilderness, till the earth sufficiently cooled to allow them to return and take part in inaugurating the new heavens and the new earth? And, as Saint John, the professor of the church science of "eschatology," assures us that in the new earth there will be no sea, the evaporation of whose waters, now collected by the mountain-tops, givs rain, and rivers, and springs of water, how will the saints subsist during the interregnum? When did this period of a thousand years begin? at the close of the tenth century, as the Crusaders believed? or, is it still in the future, as Dr. Cummings, Dr. Seiss, Mr. Miller, and other of our millenarian contemporaries believe? If the "little season," during which the devil was to be loosed out of the bottomless pit, so that he might go forth again to his old vocation of deceiving the nations, is to be interpreted on the principle laid down by Saint Peter, that "one day with the Lord is as a thousand years," might it not include at least some centuries of time, during which, judging from his previous successes, he might regain much of the empire he had lost during his stay in the bottomless pit? These are only samples of unanswerable questions that could be asked.

The world has not ceased to read with amazement the account of that movement, which, under this millenarian delusion, took place in the eleventh century, called the Crusades. The Christians of Europe, who were at that time all Catholics, were taught by their priests that the thousand years mentioned in the Revelation of John had actually begun with the close of the tenth century, and that Christ might appear at any day in the clouds of heaven to fulfil his promis to take his seat and reign upon the throne of his ancestor, David, at Jerusalem. But when they saw that Jerusalem, and the sepulcher of Christ, and all the rest of the holy places in Palestine were in possession of the Saracens, called Infidel, because they believed in Mohammed and the Koran instead of Christ and the New Testament, they blushed with shame and were indignant at the fact. With such a leverage the enthusiastic priests had easy work in rousing up the military spirit of the people and organizing vast armies to march to the Holy Land and rescue it from the contaminating presence of the Infidels. The delusion continued through the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, during which it subordinated all other interests to itself. It raised no less than eight armies, consuming a hundred and seventy-seven years of actual fighting, and slaughtered five millions of men, and the consequent distress of families by death and poverty cannot be calculated or even imagined.

But, after all this destruction of life and treasure in these Quixotic expeditions to Palestine, Jesus never put in an appearance; and the Turk continued to hold, and still holds to this day, possession of the Holy Land! The soldiers who were victimized by this delusion were all honest, and expected to be abundantly compensated for their courage and their sufferings, by seeing with their mortal eyes the triumphant appearance of the son of man to set up his kingdom. But the wily priests, who stayed at home and received the deeds of the Crusaders' lands, the preambles to which began with "propinquante mundi termino"—the end of the world being now come—were not honest. For, if the coming of Christ and the end of the world justified the Crusader in giving up his lands to the church, and his wife and children to poverty, what use could the church make of the property when the world was to be burnt up? It was then that the priesthood, all over Europe, amassed their great landed wealth, which, in England, during the reign of Henry VIII., embraced one-third, if not more, of the whole kingdom!

But, though time and truth had proved the utter unreliableness of the second advent theory in the first century and in the eleventh, they did not, with all their mountain-weight of evidence, shake the faith of the church in a millennium, to take place some time or other; and at this moment, the church, in all its denominations, is looking forward to a thousand years of untold prosperity, when, with the fulness of the Gentiles, the Jews shall be brought back to their nativ land, and become good Christians.

If anyone is tired of reading what I hav written under this head, and says it is incoherent and unintelligible, I admit it; but let him remember that I am giving the scriptural basis, obscure as it is, of one of the most terrible delusions that ever disgraced the Church—a delusion which is sufficient of itself to stamp the whole system of religion as a base fraud practiced by the priesthood upon the ignorance and credulity of mankind.

THE ECONOMITES ALL MILLENARIANS.

George Rapp and his followers were Millenarians. They brought these views with them from Germany, a country which has produced more religious nebulosity than any other in Europe, and in modern times. Rapp, with all his heart, believed, taught, and expected that Christ would come again, personally and visibly, and set up his kingdom on the earth, with his headquarters at Jerusalem; that the living saints, with the resurrected ones, would reign with him for a thousand years, after which the world would be burnt up, and when cooled off sufficiently the New Heavens and the New Earth would be established, to remain permanently. Just as Paul and the early Christians believed, 1800 years ago, that before their death they would witness this event in all its grandeur, so George Rapp believed, without a single doubt, that he would not only see Jesus with his natural eyes, but would hav the unutterable felicity of marching his faithful followers to Palestine, and presenting them in person, and detail, to him as a company of witness-bearers who for half a century had been waiting for his appearing, with their loins girt about, and their lamps trimmed and burning, ready at the first sound of the archangel's trump to take up the line of march for Jerusalem.

In the year 1832 William Miller, an uneducated man who had been a captain in the war of 1812, began to travel as a self-authorized lecturer and expounder of the church's new science of "Eschatology." His plausible interpretations of prophecy, and his calculation as to the time for the end of the world to come, gathered to his standard many thousands of followers, scattered all over the country, and he constituted them into a church upon the sole basis of the expectation of the coming of Christ, giving it the name of "The Second Advent." He set the very day for the fulfilment of Christ's promis, and many of his followers proved their faith by their works, by dressing themselvs up in their ascension robes and waiting for the event. George Rapp, having always been a Millenarian, and although unacquainted personally with Miller, could not but be deeply moved by the discussions on this exciting subject, which, at that time, so occupied the attention of the religious world; and he felt his strong faith strengthening day by day. He therefore ordered all the earnings of the Society, over and above what was requisit to carry on business, to be laid carefully aside, for defraying the necessary expenses of conducting his followers to Jerusalem. Paul, in his epistle to the Hebrews, uses up nearly a whole chapter in setting forth and commanding the faith of the Old Testament saints, mentioning their deeds and names in detail. But the faith of none of them was more astonishing than that of George Rapp. For when, in 1847, he lay dying at Economy, one of his devoted people who was nursing him in his sickness reports that the last night of his life, when he felt, but did not believe, that it was death laying siege to the citadel of life, Rapp observed to him: "If I did not fully believe that the Lord had designed me to place our Society before his presence in the Land of Canaan, I would consider this my last." His people, who for years wrought themselvs up into the belief that Rapp would never taste death, with broken hearts and expectations followed him to his grave "in the orchard," half, if not entirely, believing that when Christ shall actually come, their beloved leader will resurrect, and conduct them to meet their long-expected Lord in the Promised Land. But if Christ should come now and wake up his distinguished servant and believer, who died without the satisfaction of seeing him as he expected, unless he waked up all the rest who had died at the other two places of settlement, the detachment for Jerusalem would not attract much attention, except for their immense wealth; for, in point and numbers, they now amount to less than forty, and all of them old and infirm.

Things Profitable and Things Unprofitable.

E. M. MACDONALD, EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir and Brother: Some kind friend has sent a copy of your September 24th issue. I profoundly agree with you on the comparativ, nay, frightful, unprofitableness of the churches. The question is how best to put them to honest work? Having studied this question for many years I beg to ask through your columns: 1. Is not practical reform the best test, the short road? 2. Are not woman suffrage, prohibition, antisecretism, antimonopoly, antiwar, coöperativ labor reform, true, practical reforms? 3. Ought not Liberals to organize for religious reform, the spiritual, political, and financial emancipation of the race, through kindly, free discussion? 4. Is not mere dogmatic, sectarian discussion following the example set by the church utterly unprofitable? If we Liberals want to win over the churches must we not get right down to organized, earnest, solid, helpful reform work, doing to others in need as we would hav others do to us? Truly, F. K. PHŒNIX.

ELECTRIC light people are indignant at the remark of Professor Wiesner, of Vienna, that that light damages books by discoloring the paper, and is not fit to use in libraries. They say that sunlight does the same thing, and that it is only the arc light that discolors paper, any way. The incandescent light, they claim, is perfectly harmless to books.

The Roll of Honor.

In response to appeals, I hav received already some substantial evidences of earnestness, but they are not so numerous that you, my friend, need fear that your contribution will not be necessary to carry on the campaign this year. So don't delay.

E. M. Davis is a name that has been inseparably associated with every noble work in behalf of Liberalism since I hav had any knowledge of the cause, and he has not grown weary of well-doing either. Could we expect otherwise from a son-in-law of that grand and venerable champion of freedom, Lucretia Mott? Radicalism runs in the family. Mr. Davis writes:

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 11, 1887.

E. A. STEVENS, Dear Sir: I hav read your address in the issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 12th. I believe in the Nine Demands, and send $9 toward proving it. Credit the extra dollar to my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Publish the Demands more frequently in the paper. Keep up your agitation. Systematize it as much as possible, as system is much more likely to lead to success.

Very truly, E. M. DAVIS.

Don't suppose that Hudson, N. Y, is overflowing with Liberals, but those whom we know are of the right metal. Leonard Geiger attended the Congress, paid a Life Membership fee, and pledged in addition $50 for the Campaign Fund this year. Mr. Geiger means business. From the same place Mr. Smith writes with modest brevity:

HUDSON, N. Y., Nov. 14, 1887.

E. A. STEVENS, Dear Sir: Inclose $10 for credit Campaign Fund. in response to your circular letter as recently published in the Liberal papers. Truly, J. A SMITH.

Don't know Mr. Smith, but I'll wager he's a brick, who, so far as orthodoxy is concerned, proposes to carry the war into the domain of the Holy Ghost and his co-conspirators. Wonder if Brother Geiger is doing some missionary work? If so, keep on; you're doing well.

W. A. Girkin, of Bloomington, Ill., is a leading business man and a prominent member of the Turn Verein. It is claimed that the advantage of the fashionable long, narrow pocketbook is, that you can keep your money longer in your pocket. Mr. Girkin is not in fashion on pocket-books, for I only mentioned the necessity of funds when a five-dollar bill was thrust in my hands with such alacrity that it both surprised and embarrassed me. May he liv long and prosper.

Who is next? Don't be bashful about the amount. Make it reflect your enthusiasm in ratio to your desire for a purely American Secular Democracy, where orthodoxy can hav no greater sway than individual opinion; where the laws embody Liberalism and liberty. We havn't the pretentious inducements of our opponents—reserved seats near the great white throne, which in an eternity will not wear out—I mean the seats—but if you hav a manly or womanly ambition to rid this country of the blighting influence of shams and superstitions, which of necessity are breeding hypocrisy, vice, and crime, come to the rescue of Freethought and Secular principles. Help us to publish the facts and arouse the people, who are slumbering, on to a realization of their danger. The way you can help arrest this onward march of orthodox power is to send us the means to scatter the seed of an intelligent opposition. Will you do it?

To-day, November 24th, the country is called on by the high-priests of this insiduous power at the head of the nation and the states to giv thanks that they are still permitted to liv, while drouth, disaster, and disease hav done their deadly work; to render thanks for the superabundant crop of official and unofficial rascality; to giv praise that the pomp of pride and power—the blaze of wealth and popularity—has blinded the eyes of the people and blunted their conceptions of justice.

Cant is enthroned, and leers across-lots at impoverished honesty. Help us crush this monstrosity. To do this you must aid us financially. In days to come it may be your proudest distinction. Whether or no, it is your duty, and now is the time for action. No time to waste. Enroll your name on the Roll of Honor, the vanguard of liberty in this fight, and prepare to knock the God of hosts clean out of the laws of our land. E. A. STEVENS, Sec'y A. S. U.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

BETHANY, Mo, Nov. 13th and 14th.—This is the county-seat of Harrison county, and, like most villages in Missouri, is quite pretentious in its spread over a large extent of territory. Some handsome new brick blocks giv evidence that the more liberal merchants are wrestling with the inertia that orthodox mildew has produced. I was glad to see the churches are no longer the ornaments of the village, but, like their creeds and dogmas, badly dilapidated, decayed, worn-out. There can be no more encouraging evidence of a spirit of enterprise, born of Liberalism, being effectivly at work than the fact that the Bethany public school-house is the best, largest, and most sightly building in the town—a stately, commodious brick building, with two half-acre lots of greensward—one on each side of the building—for playgrounds for the children. The next handsome building is the Masonic Hall, and, opposit and next in rank, the Odd Fellows' Hall. The Emmerson House, a small brick hotel, under its present proprietor, is rapidly attaining a deserved high reputation as a first class, clean, comfortable resting-place for traveling men.

The Liberals of Bethany had little hope for the success of a course of Liberal lectures. The fact is, they hav neglected to subscribe for any Liberal papers, and consequently were ignorant of the sturdy onward march of Freethought. Strange inconsistency! to claim devotion to a cause and yet neglect to aid or sustain it to the extent of less than one cent a day; spend for tobacco more than would pay subscription to every Liberal paper published in the United States. "No, really; I would if I possibly could; but, in justice to my family, I really cannot afford $3 a year for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I want to do all in my power to help on the cause, but really I cannot spare the money." And so saying, they light another ten-cent cigar, which, like their professions of Liberalism, begins in puff and ends in smoke.

Brave young W. H. Allen resides eight miles from the village of Bethany, but, the loyal son of a noble Liberal sire, he would listen to no croakings, be dismayed by no discouragements, and by his persistency he inspired others, and, once awakened from their apathetic slumbers, the friends responded nobly to his appeals. I found a three-weeks' Methodist revival in full blast. The lectures were only advertised by word of mouth and a four or five line notice in local papers. The editors might, in consideration of a few ducats, brave the wrath of God, but never, no never, could they dare brave the dread frown of Mrs. Grundy.

Notice of the lectures in THE TRUTH SEEKER brought many persons from a distance. E M. Giles and wife, W. L. Smith, Ben Baker, and Chas. Frenshum came from Ridgeway, thirteen miles. Some came fifteen miles; a hand-car brought twenty over ten miles. We regret that one good doctor, delaying just a little too long in bidding farewell, missed the hand-car, and had to walk home ten miles on the railroad track. The friends coming so great distance on Sunday, and returning again on Monday, was a most complimentary evidence of their appreciation of the lectures.

On Sunday afternoon the Atheneum Hall was two-thirds filled with ladies and gentlemen, notwithstanding there was a baptism of converts at the river at the same hour. In the evening, the hall was filled—over two hundred and fifty present, and Monday even a larger number crowded in; great interest was manifest. I distributed a large number of Liberal periodicals and sold about $20 worth of books and pamphlets; could hav sold more, but my stock was exhausted.

When, oh when, will that blasphemy-defense speech of Colonel Ingersoll be published? Ye gentle, genial Farrell, thou who holdest its destiny in thy dilatory hands, I beseech thee take compassion on me and on the eager multitude waiting, longing for its distribution. At every place I hav visited the demands for copies are overwhelming. I am so weary of repeating, "It will be out soon." "Why this long delay?" is everywhere the cry. How can I answer? Farrell, to the rescue! Issue it at once, and thine shall be the honor and the glory now and forever. Amen.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Why Misrepresent?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Referring to the Reynolds blasphemy case and my comments thereon in Liberty, you reiterate a charge against me which I hav once denied in your columns and which you hav not yet substantiated by citation of my words. You now say: "When what the Anarchists all admit was a legal injustice was perpetrated upon THE TRUTH SEEKER'S friend, Liberty applauded the judge." This is not true, and you knew it was not true when you wrote it. Your words mean, of course, that I applauded the judge for committing a legal injustice. I did no such thing. I expressly said that in my own opinion the judge's talk was fudge. I did not applaud him, but simply blamed you for pouring special wrath upon his head, when his only offense was the performance with comparativ decency of the dirty work which you, in common with all other supporters of the government, had set him to do. You appoint a judge to enfore the statute laws and to pass upon their constitutionality. In enforcing a law upon one of your friends he decides it constitutional, subject, of course, to the decision of a higher court in case of appeal. You cry about it, and abuse the judge. I submit that this is unbecoming and indecent on your part. The most that you can properly do is to point out his mistake, if he has made one, get it corrected by a higher court, and elect a new judge in his place at the expiration of his term. When he has done the work which you hav assigned to him to the best of his ability and without showing malice, you hav no business to revile him. Taking your own report of his words, he showed a disposition to be as fair as the law, as he understood it, would allow him to be. I, as an Anarchist who denies his authority, hav a right to complain of him for invading Mr. Reynolds, and I do complain of him. Without quoting my words, you tell your readers that I hav applauded the judge. I repeat that you knew you were not telling them the truth. BENJ. R. TUCKER.

A Short Story of an Advertisment.

Persons whose privilege it was to peruse THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 19, 1887, may hav noticed, if they looked attentivly, that a small portion of one column of reading matter and a very large portion of another were obliterated by a dense advertisment. It is owing to the intensity of color in that advertisment that the writer is now alive and in a condition to indite these lines. Some slight explanation may not be out of place to reduce the swollen bump of curiosity raised by the foregoing statement, and also to relieve the Truth Seeker Company from the suspicion of undue enterprise as advertisers. As I am the cause of the trouble, I hav consented to make the explanation.

To be brief, I would say that underneath those murky advertisments of the "The Story Hour" and THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1888 there are printed the observations of a Western cowboy as related to the Editor of this paper and recorded by myself. He was a man who came into the office to pass the time of day, and in answer to questions put to him told some very interesting anecdotes, which I wrote out as well as I could remember them. I do not say that my record was strictly accurate, but I thought he would be pleased to see his story printed, even with my additions. The latter, I supposed, would especially delight him, because I had never heard that the people of the West were at all behind those in the East in their admiration for talented and ingenious prevarication. Sustained and soothed by this trust, I showed our cowboy visitor, the next time he came in, a printer's proof of his narrativ before the edition had been mailed, but after it was printed.

I watched his countenance as he perused the article, in order to observe such emotions of pleasure as it should express, but I failed to detect any. Having read the story twice very carefully, he laid the proof down with the disquieting remark that if that went into print somebody would in all likelihood be shot—it depended merely upon the aim of the shooter. The shooting, he said, might or might not be regarded as desirable, but it would undoubtedly take place shortly after the appearance of THE TRUTH SEEKER of that date. He added that the piece was wrote grammatical, and that he had read many productions of my pen without feeling any desire to slay the author; but he was not in the best of spirits that day, and the present article had produced a contrary effect. I asked if shooting was a pastime common in his vicinage, and he said that going fifty miles before breakfast to shoot somebody excited no remark in the West, and that the pay for time so spent was not deducted from the salary of a cowboy. The knocking of a bootheel from the foot of a stranger was an ordinary method of introduction. Bootheels were regarded as unnecessary, and shooting them off placed the strangers upon an equal footing, so to speak.

An appeal to a nice set of boxing-gloves which the printers keep in the office was not accepted, and so the matter was laid before the Editor upstairs. The Editor was kind enough to say that he did not wish to hav anybody shot on account of matter printed in his paper. He would consult with his valued associate, the business manager. The B. M. coincided with the view that bloodshed was always to be avoided, when convenient, in conducting a paper. It was a question whether the amount of advertising thus gained paid for the delay which such things caused in getting the paper to press. I suggested tearing out the pages containing the offensiv matter; the Editor spoke of reprinting the edition, and the business manager mentioned putting an advertisment in the two columns.

During the discussion which followed, the gentleman from the West preserved the greatest serenity, and maintained the position of editor-in-chief with perfect dignity. He strolled elegantly about the sanctum, singing softly a portion of a hymn, whose burden was that beyond the hights he saw a glim where mansions were prepared for him, and appeared to await the decision of the company with the utmost indifference.

The business manager's way out of the difficulty was adopted. The Western gentleman said he hoped no offense had been given, and went lightly upon his way. The advertisment was prepared as suggested, and in a short time that edition of the paper was rattling through the press again with the results noted. The readers will never know what they missed, but when they remember that a joyous young life has been preserved, with all its infinit possibilities, they will not mourn. I hav never so fully as now realized the profound truth of Brother Shakspere's remark that "sweet are the uses of advertisments." GEO. E. MACNONALN.

The Pagan Origin of Christianity.

Christianity is not a revelation, but it is a development, having its roots in the religious soil of early pagan ideas. Renan says: "Nearly everything in Christianity is mere baggage brought from the pagan Mysteries." Its central idea is that God became man in the person of Jesus Christ; but the dogma of incarnation is common to all nations, and was believed long before the Christian era. The author of "Bible Myths" mentions forty-eight persons born of virgins; and Kersey Graves has written the stories of "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." In India, 900 B.C., Chrishna was born of the virgin Devaki, and, 500 B.C., Buddha was born of the virgin Maya. In Egypt, Horus and his virgin mother, Isis, were worshiped long before the time of Christ; and their black images and pictures were adopted in Romish churches to represent Jesus and Mary. Justin Martyr (A.D. 140), in his apology to the Emperor Adrian, says: "As to his (Jesus Christ) having been born of a virgin, you hav your Perseus to balance that."

The history of the man-gods is very similar. They were usually born on Christmas day, in caves or humble places, when the mother was on a journey. The heavenly bodies gave signs of their birth; they were visited by wise men, pursued by a king, and tempted by the devil. They worked miracles, died and rose again, and were to return and reform the world.

Modern Christians hav claimed that these stories arose after the time of Jesus and were distortions of his true life. But the early Christian Fathers knew better, and claimed that Satan had stolen God's designs and made spurious issues in advance. Hence the saying, "The devil has his Christs." Modern scholarship has demonstrated the priority of many of these stories to the story of Jesus.

The doctrin of the trinity was held by the Brahmans, who worshiped Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, and by the Buddhists, who reverenced "the three pure, precious, and honorable Fo" (Buddha). The term Logos, or Word, was applied to Apollo; and the Holy Ghost is symbolized by the dove of Venus.

The sacrament of bread and wine was observed in honor of Osiris, the risen god of ancient Egypt, and of Mithra, the Persion savior. The Greeks said that Ceres gave flesh to eat and Bacchus blood to drink.

Baptism was a universal custom. Buddhists dipped three times and Brahmans sprinkled. Persians dipped to Mithra and marked adults with the sign of the cross. Confirmation at the age of fifteen was also practiced by the ancient Persians.

The cross is a world-wide symbol of vast antiquity, probably originating as a phallic emblem, a symbol of the male generativ organs. In the museum of London University there is a mummy with a cross on its breast. An ancient race in North Italy reverenced the cross a thousand years before Christ. The sign of the cross that Constantine saw in vision was the monogram of Osiris and Jupiter Ammon. I. H. S. was the monogram of Bacchus.

Festivals to saints and martyrs replaced pagan festivals. Faustus wrote to St. Augustine: "Noth ing distinguishes you from the pagans, except that you hold your assemblies apart from them." St. Gregory, bishop of Neo-Cæsarea A.D. 240, was commended by Gregory of Nyassa for changing the pagan festivals into Christian holidays, the better to draw the heathen to the religion of Christ. The 25th of March, observed by Greeks and Romans in honor of the mother of the gods, is now Lady Day, and the festival of the Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary is held on the day of the festival of the blessed virgin Juno. Christmas was the birthday of the gods, and was the ancient feast of the sun, that then returns after the winter solstice. Our manner of observing it was condemned by Tertullian, A.D. 200, who said it was "rank idolatry" to deck doors with "garlands or flowers on festival days according to the custom of the heathen."

The fish is an emblem of deity. Dag is Hebrew for fish, and Dagon was a fish god. The fish was sacred to Venus, and was eaten on Friday in her honor, as it now is devoted to Jesus.

Good Friday and Easter were observed in honor of Adonis, and Easter takes its name from the Saxon goddess Ostara, whose festival was observed on that day.

All the doctrins that are deemed essential to Christianity are the outgrowth of earlier beliefs. Atonement was made not only by animals, but by men and gods. The title mediator was applied to Mithra in Persia. Regeneration, or being born again, was symbolized by a person passing through clefts in rocks, as though born out of the earth. The end of the world, the day of judgment, and future punishment were matters of belief in remote times.

Religion, beginning, perhaps, with Nature worship or sun worship, has gradually evolved its existing forms; and the evolution of religion is now as clearly established as is the evolution of all other characteristics of life and of the universe. The same laws hav controled the development of all. There has been neither miracle nor revelation, but natural selection and the survival of the fittest hav determined the form of beliefs as well of natural objects.

The Essenes, a sect of advanced Pharisees, were probably the immediate originators of both Christianity and Mohammedanism. A branch called Therapeutæ held similar doctrins to those afterward adopted by Christians. The Rev. Robert Taylor wrote the "Diegesis," showing the origin of the Christian gospels and doctrins from Egyptian and other Oriental sources; and, having been imprisoned in England for it, he said: "Those who offer truth to the Christian community must ever provide for their escape from so doing."

The author of "Bible Myths" says at the close of his voluminous account of the correspondences between Christianity and paganism: "We hav seen. then, that the only difference between Christianity and paganism is that Brahma, Ormuzd, Osiris, Zeus, Jupiter, etc., are called by another name; Chrishna, Buddha, Bacchus, Adonis, Mithras, etc., hav been turned into Jesus; Venus's pigeon into the Holy Ghost; Diana, Isis, Devaki, etc., into the Virgin Mary, and the demigods and heroes into saints. The exploits of the one are represented as the miracles of the other. Pagan festivals became Christian holidays, and pagan temples became Christian churches.

Every Christian doctrin, rite, and symbol can be shown to hav preëxisted in pagan usage. Therefore they cannot hav been revealed at the time of Christ. Christianity is thus proved to be an evolution out of older beliefs, and takes its place in the universal brotherhood of religions made my men. Books in large numbers may be found that tell these things, but the influence of the clergy prevents their being read. People should heed the advice of Buddha, "Do not believe merely on the authority of your teachers and masters, or believe and practice merely because they believed and practiced."

ROBERT C. ADAMS.

They Were Not Guilty.

Having a few moments' leisure, and with THE TRUTH SEEKER before me, in which I find that A. D. Swan, of Kent, O., registers himself as approving the unjust sentence upon the Chicago Anarchists, I am moved to say a word upon this subject. I am now sixty years of age, and hav been allied with the newspaper business for more than forty years, and in all that time I hav never known an instance so important as this, in which human life was involved, where the people were so ignorant of the facts as in this case of the Chicago Anarchists and the Haymarket affair. I read hundreds of different newspapers every week, and it is very rarely that I can find a paper speaking with any degree of accuracy concerning the facts in that case. I was a resident of Chicago for several years, knew Fielden, Spies, and Parsons very well; and although personally familiar with many of the facts, I hav taken pains to accurately inform myself, especially on points involving a question or a doubt. I was a witness on the trial against these unfortunate men, made so because I had met them in debate opposing their methods and their doctrins. I know, from evidence accessible to all, that not one of these condemned men had any knowledge, or even the remotest suspicion, that a bomb was to be thrown at the Haymarket. Those of them who are dead died in utter ignorance of the man who threw the bomb, and devoutly believing that it was thrown at the instance of the capitalists in order to produce precisely the effect which followed. While I do not share in this belief, yet there is no proof existing rendering such a hypothesis impossible. The real crime of these men was sedition, nothing more nor nothing less. They were guilty of nothing more on the night of the Haymarket affair than they had been guilty of all along for two years or more.

If these men were guilty of a conspiracy to throw a bomb at the Haymarket, I find no evidence existing of the fact. Some of these men never met until they met as prisoners before the bar of the court. Fielden had never seen a particle of dynamite until he saw it in court. If there was any conspiracy, it was the same kind of a conspiracy which exists in all organizations. Their meetings were open to the world, and this Haymarket meeting was the first in their history visited by the police. Not a riotous act had disturbed the meeting until the arrival of the po ice. It was in every sense of the word a peaceable meetting, and the truth impels me to say that the police were the aggressors. I am a rigid advocate of the rights of free speech, as all Liberals should be, and I am always willing to hear words or ideas honestly spoken, even if it should be heresy. I hav always revered the sentiment spoken by Thomas Jefferson: "Error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it." I regard even the arrest of Herr Most as cowardly and uncalled for. All I ask of Herr Most is an even chance to combat his error. If he violates a law, then I would hav him pay the full penalty of violated law. I am no Anarchist; hence I denounce all violations of law, and am willing to assist in the rigid execution of the laws. When the prejudice and hate engendered by the Haymarket affair shall hav passed away, and the cooler and calmer judgment shall pass upon that tragedy and its attendant results, there will arise in this country a feeling of regret at the injustice done these men. I remember well the frenzy of the people which demanded the hanging of Mrs. Surratt for conspiracy to murder Mr. Lincoln, but her innocence of that crime is now almost universally conceded, and was admitted by condoning the crime on the son who was guilty.

The commutation to imprisonment of Fielden and Schwab raises new and very important questions in this sad affair. According to the testimony, these two men were the most guilty of all. There were seven policemen testified that they saw Fielden with a pistol shooting at them. With great particularity they stated just where he stood and how he held his pistol and how many times he fired. But no two stories were alike, and they contradicted each other. Then it was testified that when the police arrived Fielden said: "Here come the bloodhounds; you do your duty and I will do mine." One witness testified that he overheard Schwab and Spies discuss the matter of throwing a bomb, and that Schwab gave the bomb to Spies to throw. Now, if this testimony is true, then both Fielden and Schwab were guiltier men than any of the others. But Fielden swears that he never owned a pistol, never carried one, and had none on that occasion; that he never used such language as was attributed to him, or anything like it, and Judge Gary writes a letter indorsing Fielden's honesty. If Fielden is honest, then those seven policemen who tried to swear away his life are guiltier than any of the Anarchists who were condemned, and should be punished accordingly, but they are each and all serving on the police in Chicago to-day. As to Schwab, every word of the testimony against him was false, and hence he was convicted, only upon false testimony, and it was because of this belief that Grinnell wrote a letter to the governor in his behalf. Fielden and Spies were the only men of the eight who were at the Haymarket when the bomb was thrown. It is a general belief, and has been so stated a thousand times in the newspapers, that all of these convicted men were engaged in a conspiracy to throw a bomb at the Haymarket, and that they were so boisterous and riotous that the police were obliged to interfere, when there is not one word of truth in the statement.

These men had no more determined opponent in Chicago than myself. Whenever they invited free discussion, and I had opportunity, I measured strength with them, and often I had the sympathy and support of the crowd with me, and against them. But while their language was seditious, and their proposed methods decidedly objectionable, I never saw a disturbance at any of their meetings, or any occasion for the presence of a policeman. The crowds which usually attended their meetings were not Anarchists. I doubt whether there could hav been found at any time in Chicago two hundred avowed Anarchists. Many followed them as children follow a band wagon, and because they were the friends of the laboring man. They were not bad or bloodthirsty men. As neighbors or friends they were good and kind. Lingg was a stranger in Chicago, as he was to all of the other seven men. Dynamite was his hobby. He was a carpenter, and belonged to the carpenters' union, and this union raised money to buy the ingredients so that he could experiment with the deadly stuff. There was no evidence that the bomb thrown at the Haymarket was of his make, except that some of the material was similar. For my own part, I do not believe that the bomb thrown at the Haymarket was one of Lingg's make. The preponderance of evidence is to the contrary, as the one which did the mischief was scientifically made, and scarcely an atom of it was ever found. Lingg's bomb could never hav accomplished what the Haymarket bomb accomplished.

Lord's Prayer Revised.

Lord, we thank thee for all the good things thou hast sent us; and as we are commanded to "be thankful for all things," to "believe and hope and trust in all things," we thank thee for the evil thou sendest upon us as well as the good. We believe and hope and trust in thee. in the devil, and in "all things"—good, bad, and indifferent.

Forgiv us, Lord, for all the sins we hav committed against thee; and we fervently implore thee to forgiv us for our virtues and "all things" that thou hast seen amiss or aright in all our doings and undoings, in all that we hav committed or omitted, thought of, and forgotten; and, Lord, wilt thou forgiv us for being born into this wicked world, for daring to look up to and acknowledge thee in our low estate? And last, but not least, Lord, forgiv us for asking to be forgiven. BACKWOODS BEN.

Secular Education.

There are four instruments which, wielded by dominant minds, bend and mold the sentiments of the masses to meet the form and spirit of the times: The force of early influence, the school, the platform, and the press.

These are the four grand educators, and education is the strong right arm of progress, that arm which bares its mighty muscles and strikes upon the hewn rock of time the chisel-blows which carve the tablets of an advancing era, there to remain until the surges of the incoming ages shall hav swept them away, leaving a smooth face whereon shall be inscribed the newer thought, the better hope, the fuller life of the millennium.

To underestimate the power of anyone of these four is to commit oneself to an error in judgment which betrays a lack of generalship, since a good general will never underrate the strength of either his own or his enemy's forces; and whether influence, school, press, and platform are ranged on the side of your battalions or against them, they exert a power which it will not do to overlook if you desire to win the conflict.

To the public school system the nation looks, and in a measure has a right to look, for the formation of the character of its youth. I say it has a right to look in a measure. But there is an education which begins before that, an education which is rooted deeper, which reaches farther, which endures longer than that, and might be called the education of early circumstances; the education of parental influence; the education which makes the child of Catholic parents get down upon its knees while yet scarcely able to lisp its mother's name, and make the sign of the cross while that mother repeats: In nomine patris, et filius, et spirituus sanctus; the education which makes the child of Calvinistic parents afraid to be happy on Sunday for fear of offending an all-loving father; the education which should make the child of Secular parents understand that it is better to study how to liv rather than how to die; that it is better to hav a religion of deeds rather than a religion of creeds; that it is better to work for humanity than for God.

Secularism owes this duty to itself—that it instruct its children in their earliest infancy to think—think for themselvs. One of our Secular papers has for its motto, "The agitation of thought is the beginning of wisdom." Once the people begin to understand that; once they begin to appreciate the fact that aroused thought creates questions, that questions provoke answers, and that unsatisfactory answers call forth a denial from reason; once they get waked up to the propriety of asking the clergy questions, you will see the frock-coated gentlemen coming down mightily from their clerical stilts. They'll get down at about the rate the old Scottish minister did with the foxes' tails. I suppose you've all heard of that. A certain Scotch clergyman who, after the manner of ministers in general and particular, was very fond of hearing himself praised, said one day to the sexton, whom he met in the vestibule after service, "Well, Sandy, an' how did ye like the sermon the day?"

"Aweel, meenister, it were vera guid."

This tickled the old gentleman immensely, and he wanted to hear it again, so pretty soon he recommenced,

"An' so, Sandy, ye likit the sermon, did ye?"

"Weel, meenister, I didna say that, but it were better nor usual. I didna see sae mony folk asleep."

"What, Sandy! asleep in the kirk?"

"Aye, meenister. Ye ken that sometimes ye are a wee bit gien to exaggeration an'——"

"Exagger—what?"

"Weel, meenister, I didna mean tae pit it ower strang, but ye ken that—weel, ye sometimes stretch the truth a bit."

"What, Sandy? Me stretch the truth, an' me a meenister! Sandy, I'll tell ye. Ye ken that ye sit in the kirk afornent the pulpit. Weel, the next time that ye hear me exaggeratin' wull ye look up and whustle?"

"I wull."

So the next Sunday our minister had a very carefully-prepared sermon, taking his text from that part of the scripture which tells about Samson catching the three hundred foxes and tying their tails together; and had he but stuck to his notes he would hav been all right. But no; he could not forbear to extemporize; and closing the big Bible he leaned forward upon it, remarking as he did so, "Noo, brethren, this is wi' mony a vera sair pint; how Samson could ha' caught the three hun'erd foxes, and having caught them, tied their tails thegither. For ye ken that, in this country, it taks a grat mony men an' a grat mony houn's to catch one fox, let alone three hun'erd foxes. But, brethren, if ye'll gie me yer attention for a few munits I'll make that a' perfectly plain to ye. We're tauld in the scriptures that Samson was the strongest mon that ever lived; noo, while we're not tauld that he was the gratest runner that ever lived, we're not tauld that he wasn't; and so I infer from that that Samson was the gratest runner that ever lived. But noo we come to a mair sair pint still. Having caught the three hun'erd foxes, how was it that he tied their tails thegither, for ye maun ken that it wad be a vera difficult matter for a mon to tie twa foxes' tails thegither, let alone three hun'erd foxes. But ha' patience wi' me, brethren, and I'll make that plain to ye. Noo, there ha' been mun who ha' na staid on thar farms and dairies like yersel's, who ha' na been to the univarsities like mysel', but ha' been away an' traveled i' foreign countries, i' Palestine and the Holy Land. An' these travelers tell us that thar foxes there are nae like the foxes here, that they are a vera different creetyer; that their tails are vera much longer than they are here; that, in fact, thae foxes there hae tails f-o-r-t-y feet long!"

(A prolonged whistle.)

"Wait a meenit, brethren. Some writers tell us that thae foxes ha' tails forty feet long, but ither writers inform us that this is a grat exaggeration. That thae foxes' tails are nae mair than t-w-e-n-t-y feet long!"

(Another whistle.)

"Wait, brethren! While some writers hae tauld us that thae foxes' tails are forty feet long, and ither writers hae tauld us that thae foxes' tails are twenty feet long, I mysel' hae studied the matter, and I hae come to the conclusion that this is a vera grat exaggeration. That, in fact, the foxes' tails are nae mair than t-e-n feet long!"

(Another prolonged whistle.)

"Sandy McDonald, I'll nae tak' anither inch off thae foxes' tails if ye whustle till ye whustle off the top o' the kirk! Wad ye hae the foxes wi' nae tails at a'?"

Well, if the people will only keep on whistling, they will get the preachers down to within five or ten feet of the truth.

Secularism owes this duty to itself, that it educate its children in the bottom facts of truth, and not leave them exposed to the deceitful allurements of well-masked falsehood.

Oh, it is a power, this early influence! And therein lies the secret strength of the church; therein lies the hidden source of might to that magnificent organization—the finest which this world has ever seen—that teacher of the dark and damnable doctrins of ignorance, the Roman Catholic church. Therein lies the power which enables it to stretch out a long arm under the Atlantic ocean, to reach a hand beneath the people of the United States, to press its fingers down upon our political parties and its thumb upon our political liberties, and when the opportune moment comes, will enable it to drag them all back, back under the iron heel of the Italian despot.

Do you think them unable to do it, simply because a few Freethinkers oppose a feeble remonstrance? You might as well hope to keep out the storm tides of the ocean with a few poor, rotten dykes. It is going to take the barrier of well-educated minds to stem that torrent; and education, to be most effectiv, must begin in childhood. Earliest impressions are most enduring, and earliest superstitions are hardest to be rid of.

Do not deceive yourselvs. If you do not educate your children, the church will do it for you, and with an object.

Think you, when their numbers are grown vast enough, that they will hesitate to roll their car of Juggernaut over the writhing form of mental liberty? Think you that they will pause out of respect to your sentiments; do you suppose they are afraid of hurting your feelings? Oh, no, "they ain't built that way!" Think you that this vast array of falsely instructed minds, fortified with the barrier, "Thou shalt not think," grounded upon ignorance just as firmly as the adamantine rock is grounded upon its base—think you that it will hesitate to work out its nefarious schemes on account of any so poor a barrier as Secularists hav thus far interposed? Ah! you fail to comprehend the power of your enemy's forces.

There are 225 000 000 Catholics in the world, and the United States has its full proportion of them. Do you realize the power of that army of dupes in the hands of pope and cardinal? Do you realize that they multiply like rats, and are daily and hourly making proselytes? Do you realize that they are constantly working in the ditches and sewers and underground cities of thought? Do you realize that the stratum of our liberties has a sub-stratum, and that that sub-stratum is being honeycombed, tunneled through and through by these never-ceasing, never-tiring forces of what Mr. Putuam so aptly styles "organized ignorance?" Do you realize that the sentiment of this overwhelming mass, only waiting to elect a majority in senate and house to establish this government upon a Christian basis, with that high-handed outlaw God upon the throne of the Constitution, with the Catholic church the power behind the throne—do you realize that this vast sentiment, held in check by the one article of the Constitution which guarantees that there shall be no union of church and state, is the sword of Damocles suspended by a hair?

Ah! we hav need of secular education; we hav need of a Secular Union; we hav need to throw ourselvs in the breach; we are standing with our hand on the throttle of the avalanche. And what is true of the Catholic church is true of the Protestant in a less degree. It isn't because they lack the will; it's because they lack the power of organization. Nor does its activity end with the matter of influence. It has wedged itself into our public schools; it has been wrought into the scientific brains of their faculties (yes, and very poor faculties some of them hav, too), until our schools hav become, not institutions devoted to purely secular teaching, but actually Christian places of worship. Yes, indeed, Christian places of worship; where the Protestant God, and the Protestant Jesus, and the Protestant Bible are set up as little idols for Jew, Catholic, and Infidel alike to fall down and worship. The approved text-books of the common schools are in general such as are fraught with reverential nonsense concerning the bounty and goodness of a supreme being in fitting up the beautiful home for man's abode; when everybody possessed with common sense knows that unless he has a lot of rich relations, God won't help him a bit about getting a home. And some of the more advanced works on zoölogy, chemistry, and geology hav spent much valuable space and printers' ink in the silly endeavor to reconcile Darwin, rock literature, and common sense with that snake-apple yarn. It's high time all this foolishness was abandoned. If scientists will continue to make books pandering to the follies of Christian prejudice, it is the duty of Secularists to demand and to earnestly support that demand that religious sentiment be kept entirely out of educational works. It is enough that our schools should teach concerning the here and the now; it is enough that they should deal with known quantities and assured facts. There are quite enough of them to keep any ordinary mind well employed for some time, without speculating concerning the pin-feathers of an angel's wing. It has more to do with the specific gravity of a comet's tail. It is out of the province of a public school system to decide whether the pavements of the New Jerusalem are 18k. fine or weighed by the table of 24 grs. make 1 pwt., 20 pwt. 1 oz,., 12 oz. 1 lb.

It is an inconsistency to declare ourselvs a nation of freemen so long as the precepts of truth are incumbered by religious falsehood, and the whole incorporated into the mental food which is ladled out to our youth by teachers who believe because their salary depends upon the precarious foothold of popular favor. And we, as Secularists, are inconsistent when a religious system is taught in our public schools in any form, and yet we raise no voice of protest. If the faithful want their children instructed in the "mysteries of religion" let them go to those who make that their business; but it were better for them to beware how they endeavor to foist this ism or that upon an institution which must and shall be committed to purely secular teaching.

It is much to be regretted that so-called Liberals and Freethinkers do not seem to appreciate the necessity of colleges which shall be established upon an entirely secular basis, to the exclusion of all chimerical and—yes, parasitical theology. There are certain moneyed Freethinkers in these United States who hav given more or less to the support of various churches which might much better hav been used to found a college of this kind. But no; these gentlemen prefer to see their names in print as the "generous Mr. So-and-so," patron of the Methodist God, or the Presbyterian God, or the Congregationalist God, or some other poor little god who needs patronizing, rather than as founders of secular colleges. Too much laxity in this matter has led to serious backsliding. (I know that is a Methodist term, but, however, it applies.) We hav not only failed to advance, but hav actually lost ground. Girard College, once the stronghold of secular training, has become a religious institution—a soft snap for priests; and though the design of its founder is thwarted, and the original bequest forfeited thereby, yet those who pretend to venerate that great and noble man stand idly by, witnessing the defeat of his life object, watching this rank and sickly growth of superstition springing green over the ashes of Truth's fallen empire. Where are your Secular principles? Where is your enthusiasm for the liberation of mankind from mental slavery, that you do not at least reclaim the gift of Stephen Girard? I know of one but one college in this supposed realm of thought-liberty which is wholly free from superstitious fetters—that is at Liberal, Mo.

Ah! if only our Liberal friends were but half as anxious to propagate truth as our orthodox opponents are to promulgate falsehood. If only they were half as willing to work with mind and heart and pocketbook for the elevation of humanity as to listen to pretty speeches about it. When I see the money that is spent in dotting our cities, towns, villages, and farm lands with church spires, and church colleges, and church institutions of all kinds, even to church gambling houses, and then compare the spectacle with the few, the very, very few, Freethought institutions, I am forced to believe that a little hell-fire doctrin is a pretty good thing to burn holes through pockets. Why, you people who talk so much about elevating humanity are not half as anxious to do something practical in the line as your opponents are about sending us to hell. What is the reason we can't hav secular colleges?

The churches hav theirs, and they've a great big stumbling-block to get over, too, which isn't in our way, because there's nothing about Secularism to provoke theological disputes, simply because there is no theology to dispute about; while a Baptist must draw back from a Presbyterian institution with a shake of his head at the idea of foreordination, and a Presbyterian will look at a Baptist college with a contemptuous, "Take no stock in you, it's too well watered." But pray, what is there to keep anyone out of an exclusivly Secular institution? I fear again that the power of such education is not fully appreciated, and remember it is in the hands of the church to use for the advancement of their objects. And they use it. Here again comes in the power of Rome. They hav sprinkled our country with monastic and conventual institutions which exert a secret, deadly influence which makes itself felt to an extent you are little aware of. I know of what I speak. I spent four years in a convent, and I hav seen the watch-works of their machinations. I hav seen bright intellects, intellects which might hav been brilliant stars in the galaxies of genius, loaded down with chains, made abject, prostrate nonentities. I hav seen frank, generous dispositions made morose, sullen, and deceitful; and I hav seen rose-leaf cheeks turn to a sickly pallor, and glad eyes lose their brightness, and elastic youth lose its vitality and go down to an early grave, murdered—murdered by the church. Can you hesitate to work for secular schools when you recognize the power of this instrument in the hands of the enemy.

Once the minds of the people hav been educated in the principles of truth by a thorough system of early training, they will be enabled to judge better of those matters of interest which are brought before the people by the two other great instruments—platform and press. These work together, and surely the power of eloquence, that subtle, transcendent power, which appeals to both mind and heart, which locks sentiment and reason in each other's arms, should use its every fiber, its every nerve, its every sinew, to draw the rapt and listening soul toward the gate of liberty. And the free press! Ah! that is the grandest of them all! That is the power which penetrates the darkest hovels, the deepest dungeons, the lowest cesspool of humanity. That is the sublime educator of the masses; that is the hand which is stretched out to each and every one. That is the guerdon of our liberties.

And inasmuch as it is the noblest and highest instrument when rightly used, so when perverted and turned from its course does it become the most baneful. A few months since an influential, wide-awake Michigan newspaper made the statement that religion was even more essential than education to the welfare of the state, and if not otherwise provided it would be a necessity for the state to furnish it. That paper had a very poor opinion of itself as an educator; it had a very poor opinion of the press of this country. Unfortunately there seemed to be a little policy in the matter, as the said paper has a large Christian support; but I'm thinking if the worthy editor who wrote the article were asked which the world could do without best, religion or the Detroit Evening News, he would hav reconsidered his decision.

He would hav said as I say, "That is false!" The press and the platform are the vox populi, the call of humanity; the cry for liberty; the cry which goes up from all the weary, struggling, surging sea of life; the cry which catches the ear when we wake and listen and hear the mourning of the desolate homes, laid waste by that rich, grinding, hated, accursed monopoly, the church. VOLTAIRINE DE CLEYRE.

A Letter with Two Postscripts.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: I hav been living over, the last week, the days immediately following the execution of John Brown. That execution occurred something more than a quarter of a century ago; there were then only a few, very few, people that would or could see aught in that execution but a just ending of an old, misguided man's life. He had risen in rebellion against what an American, who had no other blood save white in his veins, was proud to declare the best government on the globe; nothwithstanding there were under that government, protected by that government, men who held in strict bondage over five million slaves. Can anyone compute the number of lives lost, given to atone for the wrong that that "misguided" old man had been trying for many, many years to persuade the government to abolish without the shedding of blood, till at last—"foolishly" if you please, "wickedly" if you like the term better—he almost alone opened the war, which did not end till chattel slavery was abolished?

There has been for a number of years a growing discontent among the laboring population of this country. They are dissatisfied; they see poverty and distress before them; they hav tried to find out a cure; they hav formed societies, named themselvs Internationals, Communists, Socialists, Anarchists, all having this one end in view, viz., "To abolish poverty." They hav among them scholars, scientists, professional men of all degrees and of all persuasions, even divines. Some of these men hav said "foolish" things, some of them, if you please, "wicked" things, and some of them words which are worthy to be recorded as "holy scripture."

Our government has taken the lives of several of them, and others are behind prison bars. The people who by their votes think they make the government (never was a greater mistake) say they were criminals worthy of death, and their deaths were required to keep in subjection the discontented wage-workers.

I cannot hope to liv another quarter of a century, but some one at that time will remember this dreadful November, and will write. "Alas! that political schemes for the obtaining of illegal power, the suppression of free speech, and the sanction of wicked monoplies, were not suppressed twenty-five years ago, and all this bloodshed avoided."

LUCY N. COLMAN.

P.S.—I ought to congratulate Mrs. Slenker that by some means she is cleared. What a farce the whole thing, only the anxiety and suffering that hav been its inevitable attendant. As women are not allowed the ballot, when they demand "free speech" upon a subject which is to them life and death, our government does not know exactly what to giv them to pacify them, but the church is ready with its vice societies, and its help is usually a success. L. N. C.

P.P.S.—If the printing of this will lose you a subscriber, I shall be very sorry, even though it should be not an excellent person morally.

The Law and the Judge Condemned.

Now that the public are fully and thoroughly aroused to a realization of what a nuisance Comstock is, and the conviction has become universal that he is as rank a fraud as any of the hypocrits who hav been backing him up all these years, a few common-sense observations may not be untimely, and may perhaps be appreciated by that meek public that has so long endured his mendacity, deceit, and outrage. These observations will be sufficiently pointed if limited to the range of facts at present immediately before the public.

The arrest of a prominent art dealer has just been made with a great flourish of trumpets, and a positiv assurance comes from the irresponsible star chamber committee in which the arrest was secretly planned, and whose agent is this wretched Comstock, that there can be no mistake about it, inasmuch as "some of the pictures for the sale of which the dealer was arrested hav been legally adjudicated to be 'indecent' and 'obscene,'" and the wiseacres of the general term are quoted as saying, "ordinarily they would be so pronounced," etc. Now, the case of the People vs. Muller, 32 Hun, 209, affirmed in 96 N. Y., 408, is the case relied upon for justification of the present outrage. It was tried in December, 1883, and on the trial Comstock's attention was called to the fact that the very same pictures then and there complained of as "obscene" were published by Goupil, of Paris, whose agent in New York was and still is Mr. Knoedler, the recently arrested art dealer (see case on appeal to Court of Appeals, folio 101). Comstock knew in December, 1883, that Mr. Knoedler was selling these pictures, and he has known it every day since, up to the time of the present outrage, nearly four years. If there was any real ground for the arrest and conviction of Mr. Muller, why was not Mr. Knoedler arrested immediately after Mr. Muller's conviction? The fact is that there was no more ground for the conviction of Mr. Muller than there is to-day for the arrest of Mr. Knoedler. It can hardly hav escaped the attention of this very sharp detectiv, Comstock, that on May 1, 1884, the New York Herald published woodcuts of nude figures from the Paris Salon. These pictures were from the same source, but not of as high artistic merit, as those for selling which Mr. Muller was convicted and Mr. Knoedler is arrested. Why was not the New York Herald prosecuted in its regular turn? Mr. Knoedler's arrest was made just at this time in order that a little gratuitous advertising might be gotten to swell the collections at the forthcoming annual meeting of Comstock's society. There could hav been no other possible object or motiv for the attack upon Mr. Knoedler than to use it as a pretense of activ virtue by means of which to get money out of the credulous and gullible. The effrontery of the attack upon Mr. Knoedler is more glaringly shown by contrasting the charge against him with the pretense made by his accusers in a previous case.

In Mr. Knoedler's case the absence of color, and of the delicate refinements of light and shade, forms the ground of complaint, but in the case of Mr. Conroy the reverse was the claim, Comstock then taking the ground that coloring and the light and shade hightened the lascivious effects of the picture. Nothing can be more contrary to the natural fact, nothing can be more silly and frivolous, than the idea that a viciousness lurks in a photographic reproduction that does not inhere in the original painting. If this crazy notion is established, we throw away all the benefits photography has contributed to our civilization, and limit the enjoyment of art to the few very rich. The photograph now brings the world's art treasures, in some form or other, within the reach of everyone. Shall we banish the photograph, and thus deprive the poor of a very valuable means of education and refinement? Perhaps this is the Comstockian purpose. Comstock is hand and glove with those who hav always shut up education away from the people, as far as they were able. His support is entirely derived from that class who, for the glory of their despicable Joss, shut up the museums and art-galleries on that day when above all other days in the week the poor might derive benefit from them if they were open. His supporters join with him in the piteous whine about the effect of nude pictures upon the morals of children. This is simple nonsense, but the full and complete answer to it, if it is worthy of an answer, is that if the children of such people are not fit to grapple with the natural facts of life, then such people had better stop begetting such children.

I hav no great sympathy for Mr. Knoedler, for he stood by with complacency and saw the outrage upon his rival in trade, Mr. Bonaventure, whose clerk, Muller, was convicted, and having so far acquiesced in that outrage as to remain a silent witness of it, without protest, he deserves all the annoyance that he may be subjected to. But the public hav an interest in this business, and it is about time for the public to demand that Comstock's pranks shall come to an end.

By far the most serious aspect of the matter is the conduct of the courts which fully justifies what Henry George says in the Standard, November 19th instant: "The fact that the idea of law and the idea of justice are already in the minds of thousands so far divorced that those whom the courts condemn . . . are by considerable bodies of our people thought of as martyrs is ominous." Judge Brady, who tried the Muller case, seems to hav had no conception of the requirements and responsibilities of the noble office he has so degraded, nor of his obligations to protect the defendant Muller to the uttermost. His incompetency is clearly shown by the fact that he recommends an art censorship. (See New York Herald, November 13, 1887.) If he were fit for the place he occupies he would know that the American people will not tolerate a censorship of any kind. Let us look a little into the Muller case and we shall readily see how contemptible it is as precedent or authority. The defendant, charged with selling obscene pictures, was on the trial precluded from exhibiting other pictures of a different class for comparison. He was precluded form showing other pictures of the same class for explanation. He was precluded from showing the fact of the public exhibition of the same and similar pictures with general public approval. He was precluded from showing that there was a dividing line between what was generally considered among artists to be pure taste and what was considered to be bad taste. He was precluded from producing experts in art to show what was good taste, and to show that good taste sanctioned the pictures he had sold. All this in the face of the fact that the pictures were brought into court under the condemnation of a pretended expert.

The trial was grossly unfair in every particular. It presented this dilemma: If there was any such thing as a standard of taste, by the application of which, as a test, it might be positivly determined whether these pictures were obscene or not, then the judge was certainly wrong in prohibiting the defendant from producing such evidence as would instruct the jury just what that standard was and define the limits of its application. If there was no standard, then the judge did a wrong of the most atrocious kind in submitting to the jury a mere question of personal taste or preference. In either way of looking at it, the Muller case is worse than worthless as authority. It is misleading. It is one of a class of cases that makes the whole body of the law contemptible. It shows the inapplicability of law to such matters. Another jury, more highly cultivated, might hav acquitted Muller, but no fair judge should ever hav allowed such a case to go to a jury. When, therefore, Judge Brady took $50 as a fine from Mr. Muller, he took it, not by any law which would justify the taking, but he took it lawlessly and as a highwayman takes. It was a clear case of "stand and deliver."

The press, having now thoroughly taken hold of this matter, ought to stick to it with bulldog tenacity until it has succeeded in extracting the sting from the Society for the Suppression of Vice, as was done by the New York Times in February, 1880, in the case of a society organized for similar dishonest purposes. ## Parson Brown.

Among the "Letters from Friends" we print this week one from a Methodist preacher of St. Joseph, Mo., who has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a few months just to see what the Infidels of the country are up to. He now discontinues it from lack of funds, a not very common complaint among the priests, except in backwoods districts.

We certainly can applaud Mr. Brown's motiv in subscribing, and hope his six months' perusal of the scores of splendid articles our contributors hav enabled us to lay before him has broadened his horizon a little, enabled him to see that some of the claims of theologians at least are just a trifle arrogant, and that the church and Christianity are not all his youthful fancy pictured them. And were it not one of the unalterable principles of THE TRUTH SEEKER, that preachers should pay just as much as anybody else—and, indeed, they ought to pay a little more, as money comes easier to them than to a mechanic or farmer—it would giv us pleasure to make him a discount, which should be charged up to the private missionary work we are constantly doing. But we may not violate principle to oblige even a Methodist.

For Mr. Brown's courteous compliments we return the usual editorial thanks. But we should hav been better pleased had he pointed out wherein the premises of Liberalism are false, instead of making a mere assertion, which may or may not be true. If his hoped-for heaven does not exist, why should we invent another falsehood? If his great, good God is a myth, what call hav we to invent a myth to take its place? What money has to do with the pretenses of Christianity, or with either God or heaven, we do not exactly see. Money is an invention of civilization to facilitate exchange of goods. It is not a miracle of Christianity. It was used before Christ was born, where Christ was never heard of, and it will be used, like the steam engin and the telegraph, when Christ has no more reverence from the civilized world than any other alleged savior. That money has much to do with modern Christianity we cannot dispute. Without money, or its substantial equivalent, we imagin that the churches of Methodism, or any other sect, would be few and far between, the preachers scarce, and the desire to win souls to Christ immeasurably fainter. If every professional theologian were debarred from receiving more than his food and clothes and shelter for his services, the thousands now living on the superstition of the people would be reduced to a few fanatics, classed, in the vernacular of the day, as cranks. The period of superstition which produced the ascetics, religiously insane, and monks, and palmers vowed to poverty, has passed away. It is not possible even to reproduce the Protestant reformers. Wesleys and Whitfields, too, are scarce—the climate and soil are not favorable for their growth. The evangelists of today are money-getters, like Moody, Sam Jones, and Sankey. Money has a great deal—a very great deal—to do with the preaching of Christianity, but nothing whatever to do with its truth or falsity. We are surprised that a minister should hav so incautiously revealed the hypocrisy of his religion.

"A hog," says Mr. Brown, "can root up a century plant." This, we may remark, is not a new saying, although, under certain circumstances, it is a true one. But if a century plant reached as high, for instance, as heaven, and its roots went down into the earth as far, for example, as the hell which Mr. Brown thinks will be sometime a mighty sorrow for us, could a razor-backed Texan pig, the most powerful rooter known, dig it up? We trow not, nor a whole drove of them. Their snouts would be burnt to cinders before the plant fell.

But—and we are willing that Mr. Brown's simile shall be applied as he intended—the century plant of Christianity is being rooted up. Christianity as a theological system is being gradually transmuted from the dross and slag of superstition and downright falsehood into the glistening metal of ethics and morality. No sane man can deny that Christianity is changing, is different with every generation, and has lost its grip on the world. Why, even a mossback Presbyterian, like Dr. Field, denies his Confession of Faith, and preaches Unitarianism while pretending to be a Calvinist! Martyrs' fires are extinguished, the dungeons destroyed, and Quakers walk unmolested through the streets of Boston. Some portions of New Jersey tolerate Infidels, and, by and by, in the good time coming, Boonton and Morristown will listen to a heretic without fining him $25 for asking if Christ was ever spanked. Christianity is only a little century plant which comes up slowly but surely. Its top is not hid in heaven, nor do its roots reach down to hell. In fact, hell has been officially closed by the committee of Christians who revised God's unalterable word. Heaven is left, it is true, but a century plant all top and no roots is not a thrifty vegetable. Sometime even the Methodist Church South will see that chattel slavery was wrong, and that mental slavery is hardly less degrading. Evolution will do its perfect work, though its factors be insensible of the change.

We ask Mr. Brown how it can be otherwise than that truth is on our side? We are working for the here and now; he is preaching of the shadowy hereafter about which he knows nothing. We are seeking justice between man and man; he is advocating the justice of one man's bearing all the sins of the world. We are seeking to establish equality; he seeks to establish a kingdom ruled by the dead. He would hav men believe the impossible; we would hav them believe only the true. His theology teaches men to be miserable here that they be happy hereafter; our philosophy teaches us to be happy here and let the hereafter take care of itself. He teaches the selfishness which would get to heaven at the expense of wife or child, if need be; we teach the generosity which will hav no heaven without them, and tries to make it while they are with us. In short, Mr. Brown is all for the other world; we are for this. This world is here; we are moving in and with it; it surrounds us and environs us as the iron woman clasped to her deadly breast the heretic, and we are trying to make the best of it, to improve it, to get joy out of it, and finally to leave it a little better for our children than it is for us. Mr. Brown's religion says: Pooh! let the world alone unless it is convenient to change it; prepare for the other world, where you shall get the cakes and ale denied you in this; think always about death, and the sinfulness of life; put your troubles on the savior; grin and bear the inequalities and hardships of to-day. God wills that you shall be poor and miserable, and it is blasphemy to deny his goodness; therefore be patient, repine not, glorify God, praise his son, support the preachers, and you shall finally hav a harp and crown and a long white robe, and sit on golden battlements and enjoy the bliss of seeing in hell the poor wretches who tried to make you more comfortable on earth.

Is truth on Mr. Brown's side, or on ours?

"Beware of the Dog."

In passing along country highways one frequently meets the sign on the top of posts, in letters of convenient size to be easily read by travelers whose instincts might lead them to trespass, "BEWARE OF THE DOG." On pages 782–783 of this week's issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER we print a good deal of religious news not found in religious newspapers, and which, being interpreted, is a sign to those traveling toward the churches. Indeed, it might not be an altogether useless waste of timber and paint, considering this interpretation, if in front of every church were a conspicuous notice, reading like this:

> To Those Who Enter Here.
> BEWARE OF THE PREACHER.
> ☞ N.B.—Ladies are especially cautioned.

The instances we record of ministerial conduct, more or less reprehensible, are only drops of villainy in an ocean of clerical rascality, but as the scattered drops tell of the coming storm, so these drops may induce some good Christians to come into the heretical ranks out of the wet. We hav picked up those religious pearls during the past month, from a comparatively small exchange list, and we hav more than once tried to figure out, by the rule of three, how many clerical scoundrels hav, in the country, gone undetected. The probabilities in this direction, however, are too great for our mathematical ability, and we giv it up.

Infidelity, say the Christians, may do to liv by, but it won't do to die by. But it is very certain that while preaching the gospel may improve a man's chances when dying, it will not improve his morality when living. It will not do for the church folks to retort that all these sinning preachers were expelled. That has but little to do with the matter. If the expulsion of lustful clergymen from its fold were the ultimate object of Christianity, we might acknowledge its success. But we are told that the object of religion is to enable men to lead good lives and get to heaven. But as a help to morality Christianity in the cases mentioned is a decided failure, though ministers possess an unusual amount of piety. And how far along on the road to heaven the peculiar religion these men of God hav practiced will get them is for the theologians to say. On that subject we are decidedly an Agnostic.

We were led to make this compilation from noticing, about the first of October, that the fall crop of clerical scandals bade fair to be large. Scarcely a paper that we glanced through was free from such reports, and finally we began to cut them out and lay them aside. When a month had elapsed our scissors had become dull and refused to work freely. Nearly half a hundred clerical wolves had been decapitated.

For the good of the sheep, for the honor of our country, for the credit of the human race, we sincerely hope that our list includes all of the clergy who hav fallen. But knowing the liability of man to err, the limited vision of any one of us, and bearing in mind the fact that where a little smoke escapes from a chimney there is likely to be a big fire below, we are afraid that the list is incomplete.

A Christian Missionary Who is Not a Christian.

That was a curious "god-speed" which the Boston Unitarians gave A. M. Knapp, a minister of their denomination who is going to Japan, on Sunday, the 6th ult. The usual formalities were observed, and Mr. Knapp is called a missionary, but, according to Mr. Knapp himself, he relies for success principally upon the fact that he is not a Christian, and will not teach Christianity. He goes, he said, to confer and not to convert. He added: "Mine is no theological embassy, no mission to the 'heathen.' I go to voice the spirit of that faith in the light of which there is neither Jew nor gentile, neither Greek nor barbarian. To this end I hope to enter into the consciousness of the people by a glad willingness to learn as well as to teach. I see that the New York Observer, in speaking of my departure, predicts that in a short time I will be beating a tomtom before a Buddhist temple. I accept the implied criticism, and say that if my object were to make converts, the tables might be turned against me." Another speaker at the farewell meeting was Mr. Stejiro Fukuzawa, a young Japanese gentleman, an inmate of Mr. Knapp's household. He wished his host a pleasant time in these words, which we commend to the serious consideratian of Christians:

"I am often asked whether the missionary work in Japan has been successful or not. If the object of the missionaries is to transform Japan into a Christian nation, I must say that they hav succeeded very poorly indeed. It is true that they hav established some good schools in Japan, and hav otherwise done considerable benefit for the Japanese. But in regard to the propagation of Christianity in our country, their work, so far, is but insignificant. The number of genuin converts they hav made is hopelessly small. Moreover, the majority of those converts are poor, uneducated people. The orthodox Christian is a thing not to be easily found among the upper class of Japan.

"This failure of the missionary work in our country is, I believe, largely due to the fact that the missionaries do not hav enough sympathy with the Japanese people. They consider us, as a people, a degree below them—a swarm of poor heathens. And they never expect to find anything good in the ideas and customs of such degraded people. Therefore they simply want us to throw away all our religion, philosophy, and morals and take up theirs instead. Their disregard of the feelings of our countrymen is sometimes wonderful. For instance, as you know, in Japan great regard is paid to the dead; and you will often see a Japanese bowing humbly before a wooden tablet representing his dead father or mother. But now the missionaries are kindly reminding us of the folly of paying homage to our ancestors, who, they say, are undoubtedly all in hell. The result of such action on the part of missionaries is only to provoke the indignation of the people; for I can hardly imagin how any sensible person could reconcile himself to the belief that his dear parents are doomed to eternal damnation for apparently no reason.

"Another thing I should like to say is that the missionaries in Japan are altogether too pious—that is, at least they appear so to us heathens. Their sole object in life seems to be to convert people to Christianity, and to the most orthodox form of Christianity, too. I hav been told that it is impossible for a Japanese to be in the same room with a missionary for half an hour without being asked to join some church. Whether this is strictly true or not I cannot tell; but I know that conversation with a missionary is not generally considered as a pleasant recreation by educated Japanese. When I was a little boy in Japan I used to consider missionaries as something dreadful, which must be avoided whenever possible.

"The trouble with the missionaries is that for a long time they hav been accustomed to deal with uncivilized people only, and now they try to treat the Japanese in pretty much the same fashion as they hav done Fijians or Hottentots. It is one thing to convert simple-minded barbarians, and it is quite another thing to convert a people whose civilization, though different in character, is, I believe, not far below that of the missionaries themselvs. It is interesting to notice that most of the converts the missionaries hav made in Japan belong to the lowest classes in our society—that is, the least civilized people in Japan. Is not this a proof of the fact that the missionaries' method of propagating their religion is fitted just to this class of people and no other?

"To speak plainly, the educated class of Japan are rather bored by missionaries. What they want is broad-minded Christians, who can hav intercourse with heathens without feeling the necessity of constantly calling their attention to the danger of their future salvation.

"So it givs me great pleasure to learn that Unitarians of this country hav decided to send the Rev. A. M. Knapp to our country as their representativ. For the first time the Japanese at home will be given a chance of seeing what kind of man a true, liberal Christian is. And I know they will find him very, very different from the semi-fanatic missionaries. As a nativ of Japan, I giv him the most hearty welcome to the "Land of the Rising Sun." May God, Buddha, and all the eight million deities of Japan bless him."

That is to say, the further a man gets from Christianity the better missionary he makes! We fail to see why Mr. Knapp should go at all under church auspices. His mission is a civilizing and not a religious one, and he expects, evidently, to learn as much as he teaches. That is not a Christian attitude, by any means, and we should not be at all surprised if Mr. Knapp imbibed as much oriental superstition as he imparts of Western. There is nothing he is likely to achieve except a swap of mistakes.

Editorial Notes.

THE Thanksgiving issue of the Christian Advocate had this queer sentence:

"We congratulate the happy and the miserable—the happy, if grateful because they are happy; the miserable, not because they are miserable, but because a loving father waits to comfort them while they look, 'not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen.'"

When a person has to make everything in this world consist with a good and all-powerful God, he gets in a close corner. A jumble of words is his only resource. If the writer of the quoted sentence read it over after he penned it, we imagin him saying, "What nonsense that is, and what idiots will be those who believe it!"

DETECTIVS regularly attend the Sunday evening meetings of the Chicago Secular Union. "It is only a matter of time," writes a member, "when the police will try to suppress us." Chicago, it seems, like New York, is ruled by Irish Catholics, and the clamor against the Anarchists was caused as much by the hatred Irish Catholics bear toward German Infidels as from any fear that the safety of society was threatened. The Chicago Herald, a daily paper conducted by Catholics, warns all orators with Liberal leanings to beware, and urges the police to be vigilant. It says: "It is well for wise and reasonable men, who may be Liberal in tendencies, to pause and consider the indomitable will of society. In the grasp of the state, the individual, however mighty, is comparativly impotent. Society, in its indignation at the crimes of Lingg and his co-conspirators, has given warning to all individuals to be careful what doctrins they may teach. Society is so deeply moved in this matter that a decided limitation has been put upon the safe bounds of incitement." When King Richard gave Friar Tuck his permission to slay three deer annually in the royal forests, he added: "And I am no true king if that be not a warrant for thee to slay thirty." The state of Illinois has given the Irish Catholic constabulary of Chicago permission to suppress incendiary speakers whose orations may incite to violence, and it will go hard with the police but that they find the law a full license to suppress all speaking not satisfactory to their masters. We hav fallen upon high old times when the gatherings of American citizens are invaded by Roman Catholic spies in the pay of the government!

A GREAT deal has been said by the daily papers about the foreign birth of the Chicago Anarchists. The theme was harped upon to stir up race hatred, and it succeeded. But who has heard a word about the nationality of their jailers? Mrs. Holmes, who, with Mrs. Parsons, was arrested and imprisoned until the execution was over, described her treatment in the station-house to Mrs. Freeman. She said: "There we American women—with the blood of Revolutionary forefathers coursing in our veins—were stripped to the skin and searched by an ignorant Irish matron, under the orders of foreign officers who could not speak the English language correctly. Even the children, weeping with fright, were undressed and searched."

THE New Hampshire legislature at its session just closed passed the following act:

"Whoever on the Lord's day discharges any firearms for sport or in the pursuit of game, and whoever on the Lord's day shall carry any firearm in any field, highway, or private way, while in the pursuit of game, or with intent to discharge the same in sport, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding ten dollars."

It is believed that this act owes its passage to the concealed poetry in it, as witness:

"While in the pursuit of game,
Or with intent to discharge the same."

The legislature also adopted "An act in amendment of section 8, chapter 122, of the General Laws, in relation to the standard weight of beans." This last act is beyond doubt much more adapted to the caliber of the New Hampshire statesman than the abstract one of Sunday liberty.

THIS paragraph appears in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of November 19th: "Rev. J. H. Smyth, pastor of the Second Reformed church, New York city, preached on 'Infidelity' last Sunday week, and illustrated his arguments by telling of the punishments which befell an association of thirty-six Infidels in Newburg, N. Y., a half-century ago. A Newburg lawyer has since investigated the story, and found that the Rev. Mr. Smyth's statement was true, the entire thirty-six having met with unnatural and untimely deaths." In THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 26th we published a communication from a gentleman who resides in Newburg, and he says that none of it is true, except that a half-dozen wild spirits were reported, about seventy years ago, to hav gone through the mummery of baptizing a cat and administering communion to a dog. It takes mighty little raw material to make a good Christian sermon.

J. HERON FOSTER has begun the publication of a semi-monthly paper at Tangerine, Orange county, Florida, called the Industrial Coöperator, which, Mr. Foster declares, shall be to all people glad tidings of great joy. The paper is only forty cents a year, which is cheap enough, considering the great joy about to be spread, a sample of which is here subjoined: "Some fifteen years ago we read the first issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a little four-page affair. It was good. Then it became better. Now it claims to be best. If it isn't, it certainly is superlativly good, and the illustrations are A1, their author being entitled to the 'P. B.' given to all who graduate as perfect bricks. Both the Macdonalds are good writers, and the paper deserves the support of all those who are in earnest in seeking the truth." May Mr. Foster's orange groves thrive marvelously!

IT was bad enough for the Rev. Dr. Bolton, of the First Methodist church of Chicago, abetted by the authorities, to force his unwelcome presence upon the doomed Chicago Anarchists, but his insolence is made immeasurably meaner by his pulpit lying since the execution. The following is taken from the report of his sermon of November 20th:

"He described the Anarchists nervously walking from the door to the back of their cells—walking like caged tigers when all hope of escape is gone. Three of the men called for and received liquors. One declined, but asked for a cup of strong coffee, which was given him. 'Now,' he said, 'I die like Jesus—at the hand of my murderers.' 'Why?' I asked. 'Because I cannot help it.' They move to the scaffold," he continued, "but they move together, looking into each other's face, cheered and sustained from within by stimulants and from without by the cheers of thousands who think as they thought and hav been taught by them. When the caps fall over their eyes light is shut out they see each other no more, and are stimulated no more by the presence of officials and newspaper men, whom they look upon as their enemies. They began to speak, but oh! the last wistful, pale, unearthly look of one to me as the cap fell over his face, and he began, not knowing what he was saying, to talk. Thus they died, unrepentant, recklessly, without hope, and ten thousand will take courage to do their works of violence and die in sin as these men died. But remember, he is a fool who saith there is no God.'"

The facts are that the Anarchists were all Infidels, and did not want a clergyman. They treated Mr. Bolton courteously, but to his religious exhortation on the day before the execution answered jocularly and sarcastically. On the morning of the execution the jail authorities asked the prisoners if they would like some wine. Three of the men accepted a glassful of Rhine wine, one of the mildest species of liquor, and of which a pint would not affect men in their condition. There can be no doubt that they were sustained from without by the sympathy of thousands of friends, but that they were sustained from within by strong drink is a gross libel on their manhood—a libel, too, just worthy of a Methodist minister. The death of these men, said the New York World, a paper bitterly and dishonorably crying for their blood, "added another touch of heroism to the world." They did not die as Christ did, with shrieks of fear upon their lips, but like brave and manly men. Guilty or innocent, right or wrong, they passed away with a composure and fortitude which might set an example for patriots. And the minister who, from his coward's castle, slanders their memories, but adds to the baseness which would take advantage of a prisoner's helplessness to chatter in his ear the magpie idiocy of superstition.

THE subjoined poster tells its own story. We should like to hav a great many more to publish of the same sort:

DEDICATION OF SILVERTON FREETHOUGHT HALL
Friday, Nov. 25. 1887.

Literary exercises, vocal and instrumental music. Address by Prof. T. J. McLeary, of Stayton, Or. Speeches by Hon. C. Beal, Hon. S. R. Harrington, of Portland, Judge J. J. Walton, of Salem, and other prominent citizens. Music by Silverton trombone band, and H. A. C. orchestra, of Salem. Exercises to begin at 1 o'clock P.M. A cordial invitation to all. Musical concert and dance in the evening by the H. A. C. orchestra and Arion Quartet, Salem.

Mrs. Carrie Fitzgerell, E. Wolfard, H. D Mount,
Ex. Com. Silverton Secular Union.

Mr. Putnam, when at Silverton, reported it as one of the most wide-awake towns he visited. It looks as though he was right.

LOOKING out the wide windows of the marble-fronted Lafayette Place see-house, furnished them by Bishop Potter's personal attractivness, the Episcopal ministers saw the modest but heretical quarters of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and at once resolved:

"There is a duty to which churchmen pay too little heed—the duty of standing up for religion and the church in opposition to the Agnostic and other unchristian theories which are not without support in this city among people of literary and scientific attainments, and in all classes of society. The enemies of the church are aggressiv, her friends are passiv, and where her faith and doctrins are assailed by her enemies, whether with argument or with insult, churchmen, sometimes through ignorance, sometimes through indolence, forgetting that it is the part of the soldier of Christ manfully to fight, too often hide themselvs and their convictions out of sight."

We do not know just how the Episcopal ministers can help themselvs, so far as THE TRUTH SEEKER is concerned, but we respectfully suggest that the church stop teaching error, study science, and giv that to the world from her pulpits.

THAT is a very able and energetic scolding which Miss Voltairine de Cleyre gave the Liberals at the last Secular Union Congress, and which is given to a larger audience in THE TRUTH SEEKER of this week. It is pitched on a shrill key, but, perhaps, it will the more readily pierce the apathy which prevails in too many places. To be frank, we rather enjoy Miss de Cleyre's chastisment of those Liberals who, for one reason or another, giv annually more cash to the churches than to Liberalism. Of course, we recognize that a man has a right to spend his money as he pleases, but we submit that if it pleases a man more to help the church than to aid Freethought, he is more a Christian than a Freethinker. Secular education, for which Miss de Cleyre pleads, is the first and most important step toward giving the next generation perfect mental liberty. And we cannot agree with Mr. Bradlaugh that education should be absolutely colorless as to religion. Every child should know upon what unhistorical and shadowy bases all supernaturalism or other-worldliness—which is the very essence of religion—rests. Religion is faith in a fable—Mohammedanism, Buddhism, Christianity, et als.—and no child should be so taught that he could believe what is false. He should be trained to seek truth, historical and scientific, and such training is directly hostil to religion, for that teaches the importance of belief and the wickedness of doubt.

THE Sunday after the death of the Anarchists the Rev. J. C. Kimball, of the Hartford Unity church, preached a sermon from the text, "Crucify him," the alleged cry of the alleged mob before Pilate demanding the deliverance to them of the alleged Christ. Mr. Kimball is reported thus:

"These words were written of an event which occurred more than eighteen hundred years ago, and of a person who is now worshiped throughout a large part of Christendom as another God, and yet how accurately they describe what has occurred the past week with reference to the despised Chicago Anarchists and the state of popular feeling which has led to their death. Their teachings, their acts, and their execution are only the first red-lined chapter of what is to be a whole thousand-page volume of the world's history." He then attempted to answer the question, "What is Anarchy?" He spoke of the general understanding of the meaning of the word, a state of utter confusion, disorder, and violence in society, and said: "But this is not the Anarchy that the Chicago men and their fellow-workers believe in. It is as wide from it as the patriot soldier's shot for liberty is from the murderous blow for money." He then explained that it was a philosophical and Christian principle, and then closed with these words: "If I hav seemed too kind, too sympathetic, too much a defender of its unfortunate exponents, remember the severity and unscrupulousness with which everything has been arraved against them month after month, and consider whether something a little strong the other way may not come appropriately from a pulpit set to proclaim religion of mercy and the higher justice, and from a preacher ordained as the follower of one who met his own death as a breaker of the law, and in response to the popular cry, 'Crucify him! Crucify him!'"

A portion of Mr. Kimball's congregation at once demanded his resignation, and a petition was circulated calling upon the church to dismiss him. The matter was brought to vote soon after, and the congregation sustained Mr. Kimball by a vote of 49 to 38. His supporters were mostly the women and young men of the congregation. Mr. Kimball is also radical on the labor and woman's suffrage questions, and he once offered the Salvation Army the use of his church. He is an able preacher, and almost too heretical for a Unitarian pulpit.

Letters from Friends.

LEMOORE, CAL., Nov. 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the ensuing year. We think the illustrations quite true to life, and if so, what the outcome may prove is almost overwhelming, as ignorance is the lever swaying the multitude, and Reason's voice is hushed as to the mainspring of all evil. But the times are ripe for some significant crisis. What that may be only the future may reveal. That the secular school will be able to cope with this monster superstition will scarcely be realized while they are proud of their laurels. More able competitors, we think, will be called to the rescue. SARAH GREGG FOX.

BASSETT, IA., Nov. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Susie, nine years old, daughter, and Jimmie, eleven years old, son of John and Cyrena Frazee, died the first of last week of diphtheria.

"Life is a railroad train on which every passenger knows he must be killed. To-day or to-morrow, somewhere down the line, we all must meet our final doom."

Our tears to the sacred memory of those loved ones who hav ceased to be, and are with us no more.

The parents of those children were once orthodox, then Universalists, now honestly Agnostic, and are loved and admired by all who know them. They hav the sympathy and condolence of a large circle of friends and relativs. J. H.

BANGOR, Nov. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I will supply your first want by inclosing $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which no Liberal family ought to be without; also, 25 cents for the ANNUAL when it is ready. I move that every subscriber in arrears send in $5 at once, which would giv you a happy New Year and renewed courage to go on with the good work you are engaged in. I heartily congratulate Mrs. Slenker on her freedom. I am glad the country did not bring upon itself the everlasting disgrace of imprisoning an honest woman for simply exchanging a few thoughts through those virtuous mail bags. If those people who hav no good business of their own could only bottle up all of our thoughts and take them to Washington for inspection, they would hav all they could attend to, I guess. The Christians feel that they are losing ground every day, and they are bound to suppress every new idea that conflicts with their Bible and their God. Long liv Elmina! May she go on with the good work she has begun, but look sharp that she keeps out of the clutches of those godly people who are ever ready to seek her ruin.

SARA E. GOULD.

Nov. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Well, the Anarchists are hanged, and the country is safe. Sixty millions of people breathe easier. Those seven men made the country shake in its shoes. The great and mighty press has carried its point and hounded the terrible monsters to death. But with what consistency can this same press keep on eulogizing the Irish, who are committing murder every day among their neighbors who pay their rent; who are holding meetings in spite of law and attacking the police at every opportunity; who openly preach treason to their government, and use dynamite whenever they dare? And the American press, almost without an exception, call that patriotism and the right thing to do, and call the other government most tyrannical because it objects to these proceedings, and to the dismemberment of its empire. Nothing but death for the poor Dutchmen would suit our great American press, but a million Irishmen combined to commit infinitly more crime and murder are eulogized as patriots, although their methods of murder are cowardly in the extreme—waylaying men who honestly pay their rent and shooting them down from ambushes. Verily it makes a great difference whose ox is gored.

By the bye, what has become of Thos. Winter, the Materialist, an old correspondent of yours? I would like to hear from him on this subject. J. DOWNES.

MRS. REYNOLDS ABROAD.

TORONTO, ONT., Nov. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am in Toronto, and I want to say a few things about the Secular Society here. I visited this place a year and a half ago. At that time they had a place of meeting—Science Hall—so nicely fitted up they were not ashamed to invite outsiders to accompany them. They had rented the place and fitted it up at considerable expense. It was an experiment, but a most successful one. I really wish some of our Liberals would come over and see the practical workings of this society; they would learn a valuable lesson.

I would like to impress on the minds of all Liberals: 1st. Liberals cannot make headway without organization and a regular place of meeting. 2d. Liberalism cannot make headway unless the women are interested.

Secular Thought is doing a good work here. At the late convention they organized a joint stock company, with a capital of $10,000, and propose equipping a first-class office. W. M. Scott, an enthusiastic Liberal, is publishing "The Age of Reason." There is a law against Thomas Paine's works crossing the line; so Mr. Scott publishes "The Age of Reason" here in Toronto, and it's being scattered over Canada. I delivered my first lecture here November 6th. Science Hall was filled to its utmost capacity. The following Friday evening I spoke on Robert Burns. I was introduced to the audience by Mr. Gibbs in so happy a vein that it put them in wonderful good humor. Two young girls, Miss Anna Buckland and Miss Allen, played a duet on the piano, keeping perfect time. Following the lecture was a dance. I cannot dance; my early education was neglected in this matter, but I enjoyed the music and the "poetry of motion." A Scotch lassie danced the highland fling in a very modest, graceful manner. The comic song and recitation by Mr. Richmond were enjoyed by all. Refreshments were served by the fair ladies of the society, and the social was a thorough success.

Sunday evening, November 18th, while the church bells were calling Christians to church, the Secularists wended their way to Science Hall. Again the hall was packed with as appreciativ an audience as one could wish. I had intended to return home the next day, but was prevailed on to stay for another week. I speak in Barry, Friday, November 18th—returning here for their regular Sunday lecture, November 20th; after which I shall return to my "rural shades," encouraged at the spread of Liberalism in Canada.

F. C. REYNOLDS.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Nov. 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir and Brother: I subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months. My object in subscribing was to keep posted as to your "Liberal" movement. I make attempt at keeping up with every church, every secular economic move, and hence I hav been receiving the general organ of almost every organization in the United States—religious and otherwise. You write well. THE TRUTH SEEKER is edited, perhaps, with more ability than any Atheist or Agnostic paper in America. Permit me to say, however, that your logic is bad and your conclusions incorrect, from necessity. False premises insure false conclusions. Unless you can invent something better than a hoped-for heaven, a great good God, and money, it strikes me that you had better let the poor dogs of humanity die in their preconceived faith. I still cling to the "cross" and believe that if the world is ever regenerated and saved it will be through the instrumentality and correct application of the principles taught by the Judean peasant, the Son of God and Son of Mary, divine and eternal. A hog can root up a century plant.

I write you as "Brother" though we must be as far divided as the Poles. You think me a deluded fool because I am a Christian. I take you as a deluded brother, not fool. Our teaching has been very different.

But, I wish you success if truth be on your side. The future will tell, and to a mighty sorrow if you are wrong. Look out, brother. Yours truly, JULIEN C. BROWN,
Pastor Francis st. Methodist Ch.-S.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Nov. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The fact that your friends are somewhat profuse in giving their opinion of your paper and its management has suggested the thought that I should apologize for not having done likewise. And I think it best to state the simple truth in my usual plain and straightforward manner. I was early impressed with the impropriety of commenting on a man's virtues to his face or his faults behind his back; not having discovered any faults in THE TRUTH SEEKER worth mentioning, I hav doubted the expediency and propriety of saying anything about it to "Mr. Editor." Nevertheless, I will note the self-evident fact that, probably for want of space to publish all we should think, THE TRUTH SEEKER does the next best thing, if not the very best—"it sets us to thinking and keeps us at it."

Friend Kruger's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 5th inst. suggested some thoughts, of which I will offer a few for his special consideration. He reminds me of my early thought that religion is insanity; on becoming somewhat familiar with Infidel literature, I suspected Infidelity of being but another phase of "religion on the brain." Hence, when I read that friend Kruger has become tired of religious subjects, I had a hope that he was evoluting into a full-fledged Liberal Freethinker. But, on reading further that he is a Spiritualist of necessity, I began to suspect that in leaping from the frying-pan he has dropped into the fire, and relapsed into an old heathen superstition with modern improvements. Religion is but a compound of ethics and Spiritualism. Hence, Spiritualism, pure and simple, is the remains of religion when all that is of practical worth is thoroughly sifted out of it, and is probably Infidelity of a deceptiv as well as pronounced type. Being but a simple-minded, though somewhat skeptical Freethinker, I shall gather up the siftings and therewith be content.

He thinks "Anarchism is utterly at variance with sense itself;" nevertheless, he is probably aware that coming events sometimes cast their shadows before, and the greater the event the further the shadow should reach; and Anarchism will probably be an event of considerable magnitude when it becomes an established fact, which it possibly may do in the somewhat distant future, when the human race shall hav reached such perfection that every man and woman will be equally competent to govern, and hav no need that others should govern then. But if Anarchism should be let loose, with the ideas of just principles that now obtain, even among professional reformers, I think we should find this planet to be a desirable place to get away from. I should then be willing to join friend Higbie in his pilgrimage to the solar and planetary worlds or any other to get away from this.

He thinks "Socialism and Communism hav some fine features in them." That is because he gets a nearer view of them. They should necessarily come first in the order of human progress, and must be established by governments, if at all; if not by those we hav, then by others. The human race being divided into communities or nationalities, they should necessarily take separate and independent action. When Socialism is established by those communities, a universal brotherhood of the human race will be a possibility and an economic necessity. Therefore, had I not become aware that insane people are capable of any inconsistency, I should probably be surprised that anybody should pretend to desire a universal brotherhood of the human race, and reject and revile the only conditions on which such brotherhood is possible. The principle is the same, by whatever name called; and will make every individual perfectly free from the domination of every other individual. Woman will no longer be dependent on any man for the support of herself and offspring, but will be perfectly free to choose the father of her children. Lust and lucre will no longer be the bond of union between the sexes. Matrimony will no longer be a matter of money nor a bread-and-butter question, but simply a question of moral and intellectual adaptation. Those being the fundamental parts of free love, as I understand it, if friend Kruger is unable to estimate the worth of life on such conditions, he should refer the question to his wife, if he has one. J. A. TUTTLE.

WYOMING, ILL., Nov. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Our usually quiet town was roused to a pitch of religious fervor last Sunday evening by a sermon preached by the presiding elder of the Methodist Episcopal church, a man who has fought in the gospel cause with a divinely-tempered blade and heaven-embossed shield for over fifty years. The divine was eloquent—eloquent, as it seemed to me, in the honesty of untruth. His subject was "Infidelity," and he sought to win souls to Christ by abusing Infidels. That was proper if they deserve it. If they do, let the clerical reprobators lay on the thong until graceless skeptics wince, and others profit by their chastisment. And they do, if not for that whereof they are accused. Freethinkers are not half as good as they should be; not half in labor and love what those should be who, inspired by the simple love of truth, are willing, at whatever cost, to be directed by its guidance. Just reprobation is more profitable to the true man than praise, and in a bushel of abuse there are generally found a few grains of just censure. But to the sermon: "These small, little men," quoth the preacher, "who stand around the street corners blaspheming, taking the name of God in vain, insulting people who pass, and boasting of their Infidelity, and think it smart, can do more harm in a given time than a servant of God can do good in double the time. Then let the intelligent man question them and ask: 'Whence sprang this creation with its varied forms of sublimity and beauty, its wonderful adaptations, its unified diversities,' etc.? They don't know. 'Is there a God?' They don't know. 'You are a man?' 'Yes.' 'Whence did you come?' 'Don't know.' Oh, how smart!" Then the reverend elder proceeded to show that all this unbelief springs from the ignorance and depravity of the human heart—"a heart steeped in the vinegar of hell." My "company" whispered, "Where do they grow their apples?" This is as fair an abstract of the sermon, and as nearly in the words of the preacher, as I can giv from memory.

Free from prejudice and passion, let us analyze the above statements, and weigh in logical scales the deductions drawn therefrom.

Preachers are so apt to begin their attacks on skepticism by an attack on the character of skeptics—the class that believes only what enlightened reason teaches, skeptics to nothing else—that we weary of the same old chant, so oft repeated, and long for variations. We care little for general accusations, but are jealous of the character of our town, and solicitous for the good name of its citizens. And here, in the name of all the Liberals of Wyoming, we challenge our reverend friend to show that the Freethinkers of this place are not as respectable and intelligent, in proportion to numbers, as the prayer-making, hymn-singing portion of its inhabitants. But are Freethinkers born of and to ignorance and depravity? What shall we say of Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, of that greatest scientific man of his age, Alexander von Humboldt, and of thousands of other skeptics who are the pioneers of science and of human progress? Are they impeachable of vice and ignorance? When reviled, Infidels revile not again, nor distil, from the ashes of the dead, poison to tip the arrows of irony; but compare the private life of that monster skeptic, Robt. G. Ingersoll, the raw-head and bloody-bones by which modern theologians frighten their credulous children into unquiet slumber, with the private life of the greatest pulpit orator of the age, and say which has furnished us the better example of the charms of domesticity. Alas! many Infidels are unworthy of their high calling—of the glorious principles they profess. But what of the multitude of preachers who hav "gone wrong?" What of our defaulting bank cashiers and presidents, forgers and thieves, members of the Young Men's Christian Association, church officials, and Sunday-school superintendents—what of these? Canada is fast becoming Christianized by an influx of these fugitiv saints reared in the churches, to the support of which the whole nation is compelled to contribute.

But can Infidels solve the mysteries of "creation?" No, they modestly confess they cannot. Can they tell us when we die whither we go? No; we trace the vital spark to the boundary line of life; beyond it, it is lost to our vision. To the mind of the skeptic there be three insolvable problems: Whence came we? What are we? Whither do we go? Regarding the origin of things, are clerical declaimers better informed than we? Let them prove to us the superiority of their knowledge, and we will gratefully avail ourselvs of the light they giv. Hav they solved the mystery of being? Not as yet. Can they unveil to us the secrets of the hereafter? Respecting it, they manifest the assurance of prophets but the knowledge of babes. As to the world's genesis, and the budding forth and development of vegetable and animal life, they know next to nothing. The geneses of nature and of revelation are in flat contradiction to each other. Learned theologians admit this by their efforts to show that the Bible does not mean what it says. If it does not, it must hav been written rather to bewilder than instruct. If it does not it leaves the question where it found it—in the dark. They are loth to admit this, for their livings are at stake. The bread and butter argument is potent and insinuating. Men are often unconsciously swayed by its logic. The church is strong and delightful in its social attractions, for it brings people together; and this is one great source of its strength. It must be upheld, for its advocates aver that morality and social order depend upon it. Persecution can no longer torture or slay, but social ostracism and foul abuse can be resorted to, and when opposed by arguments they cannot overcome, our religious savans vindicate the "truth" and subserve the interests of their benign and peaceful religion by vindictivly assailing the "Infidel." WINDOM, MINN., Nov. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I saw in your paper of October 22d a string of adverse comments, made by "S. F.," of Lebo, Kan., on my communication of September 10th. From the tone of his article, I conjecture that he has been inside of a medical institution, and having seen the human body dissected, his imagination magnifies him into an anthropologist of an advanced type—so far advanced that I fear he can learn nothing more. He appears to be filled with the combined wisdom of the ten members of the Seybert Commission.

After calling me a "crank," "silly," asserting that I am "crazy, probably past redemption," then benevolently holding me up to the public gaze to "serve as a warning," etc., this man of a "logical mind" condescends to treat me as sane enough to entertain a bet. He is careful to prefix his offer with "your friends can't do as they claim, of that I am positiv." No one can convince him that a statement is true, when he claims to know positivly to the contrary; for, as the author of "Hudibras" says,

> A man convinced against his will
> Is of the same opinion still.

My pathological counselor, although declaring that I am on the road to the lunatic asylum, advises me to halt and put myself under medical treatment immediately. I had a taste of such treatment, which I related in my former letter. I was lucky enough to be delivered from it before too late Probably the unfortunate cashier he speaks of so pathetically was under that kind of treatment, and not so lucky; but "went off scientifically," as I once heard a physician say of his patient—that is, became a martyr to a science which Sir Astley Cooper declared to be "founded in charlatanism and improved by murder."

I wish to cast no reflections on Æsculapius, the god of the healing art; but must say that, like some worthy preachers, he has some very unworthy sons.

As regards lunacy, I think that statistics will warrant me in saying that there are far less Spiritualists in proportion to their numbers in our asylums than there are Materialists or Christians. The reason may be found in the "specious and noble principles" (which Gibbon says the ancient philosophers taught) they advocate. Besides, Spiritualists hav a cheerful doctrin, founded on phenomena, which is proof to them; whereas, Materialists occupy "a melancholy position" (as the same writer observes), and the belief of Christians that nine-tenths of mankind will be damned forever is not a pleasant one.

But my dogmatic friend says, "Set up no claim for yourself or spirit friends which you cannot demonstrate, as it looks silly in you." Can he demonstrate Materialism? If so, he surpasses all scientists, ancient and modern. Even Darwin claimed to be "rather agnostic" in regard to a future life. Can he demonstrate that my statement of September 10th is false? If he cannot do so, then his "logic" condemns him as "silly."

Did such men as Socrates and Plato "hav small love for science or truth?' They taught the immortality of the soul, and could "reason logically," possibly as much so as the philosopher of Lebo, Kan. They really taught the doctrin of Spiritualism over two thousand years ago. How, then, can it be "a legitimate child of modern theology?" No; the truth is, theology is the perverted child of Spiritualism. According to history, Socrates had his "familiar spirit"—that is, was a medium, called "crazy"—and was finally slain by intolerance, as many others hav been since his day, who were condemned to death as witches or heretics. Superstition and bigotry hav borne down on Spiritualism with a heavy hand for hundreds of years, but its day is dawning. Bryant's lines are prophetic:

> Truth crushed to earth shall rise again—
> The eternal years of God are hers;
> But Error, wounded, writhes in pain,
> And dies amidst her worshipers.

Let us be thankful for the progress the world has made. In former times spiritual agents were killed. In these days they are simply called "cranks," "crazy," or said to be in league with the devil, as was said of Dr. Faust, who established the art of printing.

To conclude, let me say to my censorious friend that, metaphorically speaking, I stand upon the rock of Truth, and neither pseudo-scientists nor bigots can drive me from my position. N. S.

LONGSTREET, GA., Nov. 11, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I may be wrong in my thinking—i. e., my thoughts and reasonings may lead to wrong conclusions—but I hav said, "I believe nothing. I hav no belief. It is not needful that I should." And I say so still, notwithstanding our greatest and noblest champions of Freethought claim that we must believe something. Ingersoll finds plenty of use for the word right along. My friend Shaw says we hav as much use for it as anyone else, or words to that effect. I claim the word to be of no value only in the orthodox sense of it, and that in every other sense the word "think" is a better word for Freethinkers. If the salvation of the race is conditional upon belief, then let us believe. If not, then the word becomes of no value. "Obsolete," I think, is the word, every time.

What we know is knowledge, and it is incorrect to say we believe that which we know. "Believe" has the same value as "don't know," no more, no less. Science, in no department of it, has use for the word "believe." Her work is to think, to study, to reason, to investigate, to classify, and get at fact, truth, and so explain as to bring it within the grasp of man's consciousness. If evolution is the true theory, it embraces all there is in the entire universe of things, and all is phenomena, explained or unexplained, and all is natural, reasonable, rational, possible, not miraculous. Life itself, inherent in all things, without a beginning that we know of, and without an ending that we know of, and hence eternal, is natural, and there is no placefor the supernatural. Immortal life, then, is the natural life, and mortal life (so-called) is an expression of it—a link in the endless chain of being, "of life always on the move." So let us think and say.

But what is before or behind phenomena we know not, neither is it needful that we hav any belief about it.

How many Anthony Comstocks do you think it would take to kill out or imprison all the Freethinkers in this free country of ours? I do not hesitate to say, in all candor, and with all the truth that is in me, that he is infamously persecuting one of the finest-minded and one of the noblest women to be found in the ranks of the Liberals of this country.

Aunt Elmina is superior in mind and morals, in intelligence, and in her sense of honor and justice, and in her life of purity and benevolence, to Comstock's entire horde of understrappers. It is a pity this world must be cursed with even a few such bigots as he seems to be. The theory of life, of health, and a pure morality which Aunt Elmina holds as true is of more importance to the race of humanity than any other one thing or subject, and it is a subject on which there is vast ignorance.

If new words must be invented and new terms used by which to convey the proper meaning of what she, or anyone, wishes to teach in reference to a great and growing evil, before a communication on the subject can be allowed to go through the mail, then our laws need remodeling for the good of humanity. No matter what terms (common to medical science or not) she uses to convey her meaning and to explain her theory, she cannot by any possibility be justly charged or suspected of the least intimation of obscenity. The idea is preposterous. The spirit of spite and hate, hatched in the brain of the malicious, low, and vile, is persuing this pure women, and I hope she will be vindicatd. She is a Materialist, and that's what's the matter. She has been great enough and honest enough to speak her honest thoughts, and probably Comstock hopes to crush her because she is poor. Some advantage, you see.

I don't know how to rate that creature Comstock. I am not acquainted with any such stock down here in old Georgia, and how he came to venture so far South as old Virginia in search for game, I can't conceive. I suppose he has emissaries out on the hunt, and he only holds the bag. He is out of danger, so he will be saved, though he is not worth saving. J. N. MASON.

P.S.—I take pleasure in saying THE TRUTH SEEKER is always welcome at my home. Articles from friends interest and entertain, and your able contributors always giv us something that will do to keep and never part with. Your own views, Mr. Editor, coincide with mine in reference to those Anarchists. My opinion was and is that it has not been proven that any one of those condemned men threw that bomb. If so, then there has been injustice done. The fault then is with the law in Illinois, or with the judge, or jury, or all three. It seems, also, that their lawyers failed to understand the points, until too late, which they might hav made, that would hav availed them before the United States Supreme Court. M.

BEARDSTOWN, ILL., Nov. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: During the past week Rev. Barnes, who swings a theological tack-hammer over this section of the Lord's heritage, delivered a series of lectures upon the Bible as a civilizing and moral factor. Were he to read Helen H. Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods" with a particle of historical perception, he surely, like the fraudulent priests of old, who when they met each other laughed at the credulity of others, would snicker at himself. Just think once seriously of the Bible as a civilizing and moral agency!

After hearing the Rev. Barnes's first lecture, we wrote him the following letter:

"Dear Sir: The propositions I noted down from your lecture will bear to be investigated—perhaps. In my lectures on such themes I always giv an opportunity for any to present the other side of the issue. There are always two sides to any question, especially those touching Bible claims. Such a course will render your lectures both interesting and profitable. Respectfully, DR. G."

If he ever wrote a reply it miscarried. But, as specimens of roughly-hewn flints in the stone age of superstition, we present some of the Rev. Barnes's "false claims." They drift in the current of church thought or rather thoughtlessness.

"The Bible is a genuin title deed from God." I should like to see the lawyer that drew it up. He would be a winning card in a dime museum.

"Robert Ingersoll is interested in the Bible as God's title deed." This is sufficient evidence that a private correspondence between the colonel and Rev. Barnes occurred, in which the former informed his reverence that he was so "interested." But, according to Ingersoll's recent reply to the Rev. Field, he shows no interest whatever in the title deeds to corner lots in the kingdom of heaven. The colonel will hav to rise and explain.

Again, "The Bible is to be received if true, whether from God or not." This is toning down nicely. The same may be said of any other books or Bibles, whose number is legion.

"Archæology has proved the Bible true, hence it is from God." But archæology has also proved that the Vedas, Zend Avesta, Egyptian Book of the Dead, the Greek and Roman classics, and Central American sacred books are true. Therefore they also are from God!

He related a very taking anecdote where a missionary left the wife of an Infidel a Bible, and when the husband came home he chopped the Bible in two and took his half. When the wife came to an unfinished story (of which there is a wild profusion) in her half she had to borrow the Infidel's half to finish the story. It strikes us that there are an embarrassing number of Bible stories which require something to finish them, especially as civilizing and moral factors. See Gen. xix, 8; xxvii, 38; xxxviii, 12, 26; xxi, 7; Jud. xix, 24; Num. v, 11, 31, and Lev. xii,; Deut. xx, 10, 16; 2 Sam. xii, 11.

We are thoroughly convinced that as civilizing and moral factors these badly need the other half of something to finish them. The good common sense of nineteenth century has "finished" them.

On this and similar topics we suggest that science is the Infidel's half of the Bible that can literally "finish" all such fables.

"The Bible is full of light and fire," especially the latter. The following is a specimen: "A fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn to the lowest hell" (Deut. xxxii, 22); "Cast into everlasting fire" (Matt. ix, 43). Yes, there is a good deal of light and fire in the Bible, but the former is like the red lights of a low theater, and the latter emits, according to the book's own statement, the fumes of sulphur.

Further, "All the moral purity in the world at that time was incarnated alone in the Bible people." Especially in Father Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Judah, David, and Solomon, and lesser Bible lights. The Truth Seeker Company should send to Brother Barnes an illustrated Bible primer composed of selections from Watson Heston's cartoons on the piety of the patriarch.

"There was no improvement made on Bible morality." We should devoutly hope not. We should simply throw that away, and take a totally different morality.

"Greece was indebted to the Bible for being a liberty-loving nation." Hume, Gibbon, Rollins, Macaulay, and Hallam, just step down and out. Giv the palm to Barnes.

"God overran the world, by Alexander, for the express purpose of spreading the gospel." It is no compliment to the richness of the new gospel that it was indebted to a foreign tongue to giv it currency. Besides it is less of a compliment that "the prince of peace" had to hire a Greek general with swords to overrun a whole continent, in order to spread his gospel of peace. Yet it seems that more than three hundred years before this "prince of peace" is born, he hires Alexander to do this prepartion for his gospel. We want the Infidel's half of the Bible to complete this little gospel story of discrepancy.

"The sole object in the establishment of the Roman empire was the spread of the gospel." Query: Was not the object in establishing the Southern confederacy the same? The slaves did not think so. Doubtless the despots termed the czar of Russia and the sultan of Morocco are established for similar purpose.

"The Bible brought Constantine to a knowlege of the civil rights of man." But it has done precious little in that line for women. Besides, it did not operate that way on the old Puritans in their dealing with the civil rights of those who differed from them. The whole history of the Bible shows that the bringing of a knowledge of "civil rights" is not its forte.

"The person and work of Christ were settled by that council of civil rights held A.D. 325." We had always been taught to believe that these were settled in the Bible, like a thousand other useless fancies. Here is a concession that Jesus knew nothing about his own self and work, the object for which he came; and then, after he has been defunct for more than three centuries a body of his followers meet to find out how and why he was born.

"The world never heard of right as a law till it was revealed in the Bible and by Constantine." That is, Constantine, three hundred and twenty-five years after the Bible was made, perfected it as a revelation of right by presiding over more than three hundred theological cranks, while they cussed and discussed over two months the merits of a Greek iota. He demonstrated the "civil right" to banish those who believed in the existence of that smallest letter in the alphabet. Immaculate civil rights!

A man who banished Arius and his friends for honestly believing in a Greek dot, must hav possessed a Christian's capacity for "civil rights." A man who, in the year following this revelation of "civil rights" given him in this great Nicene council of "civil rights," heartlessly assassinated his own nephew and son, Crispus, through an unfounded jealousy that the latter was a rival to the throne, must hav been highly capable of the broadest "Christian civil rights." The representativs of the pagan religion of the Platonic type told him justly that there was no pardon for this most atrocious crime. Hence, Milman terms its ministers an "unaccommodating priesthood." But there is virtue in the blood of Jesus to wash this sanguinary villain, "the first Christian emperor," "whiter than snow." Of course, when "civilization and morals" are thus to be promoted, the Christian priesthood is, and ever has been, "accommodating." In short, every one who stood in the way of this "first Christian emperor" enjoyed the luxurious "civil right" of being summarily put out of the way. His nature and action abundantly explain his motivs of conversion to Christianity, namely, "hypocrisy, policy, superstition, and divine inspiration."

"Before Bible right was known men were bought and sold for $15. To-day there is not gold enough in this country to buy one man." One drink of whisky on election-day buys thousands cheap. The above "claims" we made the basis of a lecture at Havana. ZOA TOPSIS.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Lesson.

When the weary heart is sad
And the days seem long,
When the eyes are full of tears
And life an empty song;
When the burden of the heart
Grows heavier day by day,
Oh! tell me, is there nothing
To help along the way?

Ah! yes, sad heart! there's pleasure,
Not only in the air,
But in the sun and raindrops,
And in the flowers fair;
The kindly words oft spoken
By those we daily meet,
In lingering echoes whisper,
Each hour has pleasures sweet.

'Tis true that hearts hav burdens,
With many doubts and fears—
Hav dark and lonely vigils,
With many silent tears—
That life, at times, and pleasure
Seem but an empty song,
Where weary hearts are aching,
And the days are sad and long.

All hearts must bear their burdens,
Yet will they lighter grow,
If each will but endeavor
To share the other's woe,
So, weary heart, take comfort,
For if you strive each day
To ease your comrade's burden,
Lo! yours will fall away.

Cats, Birds, and Snakes.

Cats are attached to localities, dogs to persons. A dog will persistently follow his master or mistress, through good report or ill, to the end of life. Cats will not do this, but will remain in the old home, although all the family may desert it and leave it tenantless. Dr. Hervey tells of a family removing to a distant part of the city, and taking with them the old family cat. The new quarters evidently did not suit the cat, who promptly returned to her former residence. She was as promptly taken back to the new home. She would not stay, however, and traveled back to the old home, every nook and cranny of which were dear to her. She took kindly to the new dwellers in the house, and seemed determined to make her abode with them in the dwelling to which she was so fondly attached. One day she caught a young robin. The old mother bird flew to the protection of her darling, and screamed frantically. The father bird, and all the bird relativs and friends, gathered, and made most distracting efforts to rescue the poor little baby bird in the claws of the cat. The mother flew at the cat, screeching and flapping her wings, pecked at her eyes, and circled about the cat's head until she forced her to drop the tender little birdling, when the mother, bending over its prostrate form, perceived that it was dead. She looked at its bleeding form sadly and reverently, and then, thinking possibly that she might restore it to life, she very gently took its wounded little body in her bill, and flew with it away to her downy nest, and placing it therein, called the father bird, and together they, no doubt, mourned over their loss. The cat, apparently heartily ashamed of her wicked conduct, walked out into the highway and proceeded to the new home of her friends, and it is to be hoped she will never meddle with young robins, or other birds, again. While Dr. Hervey was relating this little incident, Dr. Larchar said he had witnessed a peculiar act of a snake. He saw, one day, a black and glossy snake ascend a tree, look into a robin's nest, and take therefrom a young robin, quietly descend and proceed to swallow it without delay. Following this, Bethia and Flossie Cassell were walking in the sand under the bluff of South Boulevard at Onset one morning, when all at once Bonnie, who was following them, commenced barking furiously, and leaped wildly about. Looking, they espied a big black snake, long and shining, making off with a bird in its mouth. Bonnie barked so that the snake was frightened, and, dropping his prey, made off into the woods. Flossie picked up the bird and brought it to me. It was panting terribly, but was still alive. The dear little girl took it home, and, placing it in an old nest that she had found one day, gave it some water and a doughnut. This was fair treatment, and birdie seemed to revive, but, although it received the best of care, and was placed in a sheltered, sunny nook ever day, its injuries were of such a nature it could not overcome them, and after two or three days it quietly dropped into a sleep from which it never awoke. Flossie buried it, and solemnly placed bright flowers upon its tiny grave. "Its papa and mamma will be pleased to think I cared for their little one," said she.

"They may not be aware of it," I replied, "but it shows what a very kind heart you possess, and being tender toward birds, I think you will be no less so toward every living creature." S. H. W.

Facts for the Curious.

In Lower California there are three mountains of alum, and one of alum and sulphur. They are almost chemically pure, and the quantity of alum is estimated at 100,000,000 tons and the sulphur at 1,000,000 tons.

The mortality of the globe, as given by a continental journal, which has made the computation, is as follows: Per minute, 67: per diem, 97.790; and per annum, 35,639,835; whereas the births are 36,762,000 per annum, 100,000 per diem and 70 per minute.

Figures are wonderful things. Here is a sample of what can be done with them: By placing one grain of corn on the first square of a chess-board, doubling the number of grains for each succeeding square, the quantity of corn required for the whole board of 64 squares would fill 1,844,375 barns, each holding 1,000,000 bushels of 100,000 grains each, bushels round numbers. If the United States grows 1,800,000,000 bushels each year, it would require a little over 540 years to make enough.

The "cutting-room" in a shoe factory is, by reason of the intricate machinery it contains, the most dangerous room in the building. It is a rare thing to find such a room in a large factory that does not contain one or more employees minus a finger or thumb. Sometimes frightful accidents occur. The racer, a huge machine modeled something after the guillotine of France, is used in cutting the heaps of leather into strips. It contains a knife four feet long that would cut a man's arm off as easily as scissors cut a thread.

It has long been known that the hair and nails grow faster in warm weather than in cold. The Popular Science Monthly cites a remarkable instance of rapid growth from the statement of Colonel Prjevalsky, a Russian traveler in central Asia. In June the ground and the air became so hot that travel was impossible during the day, and the hair and beards of the party grew with astonishing rapidity. But, what was strangest of all, some young Cossacks, whose faces had been entirely smooth, developed quite respectable beards in the course of a very few days.

Birds as large as ducks are taken in Japan by a very ingenious process. The young shoots of the wistaria, which attain considerable length, and are strong, light, and flexible, are gathered, dried, and knotted together in one continuous length. This is smeared with bird-lime, and floated out to sea; in the morning the hunter is rewarded by the capture of several birds. It is a very inexpensiv method of bagging wild fowl, as the tackle will serve any number of times till the bird-lime dries, when it is easily replaced. There is no noise made in this kind of hunting to drive away the ducks, or to inform the neighbors of what is going on about the haunts of wild fowl.

Some very curious customs are connected with gloves. For instance, the ceremony of removing them when entering the stable of a prince or a great man or else forfeiting them or their value to the servant in charge. This is an odd survival of vassalage, for the removal of the glove was anciently a mark of submission. When lands or titles were bestowed, gloves were given at the same time; and when, for any reason, the lands were forfeited, the offender was deprived of the right to wear gloves. The same idea was prevalent in the bestowal of a lady's glove, to be worn in the helmet of her knight, and forfeited by him if her favor ceased. In hunting, the gloves are to-day supposed to be removed at the death of the stag. It was a very ancient form of acknowledgment to present a pair of gloves to a benefactor; and white gloves are still presented to the judge at maiden assizes.

Stephen Allen's Pocket-Piece.

Many years ago, the fine steamer Henry Clay, which ran between New York and Albany, when on her down trip, and just opposit the beautiful city of Yonkers, was found to be on fire. The steamer was immediately headed for the shore, but, notwithstanding its nearness to the land, and the heroic efforts to rescue the passengers, many lives were lost. Among the victims was Stephen Allen, Esq., an aged man of the purest character, formerly a mayor of New York, beloved and esteemed by all who knew him. In his pocket-book was found a printed slip, of which the following is a copy. If our young men, and old ones, too, would practice these precepts, the virtue, patriotism, and prosperity of the nation would be vastly improved:

Keep good company or none.
Never be idle.
If your hands cannot be usefully employed, cultivate your mind.
Always speak the truth.
Make few promises.
Liv up to your engagements.
Keep your own secrets, if you hav any.
When you speak to a person, look him in the face.
Good company and good conversation are the very sinews of virtue.
Good character is above all things else.
Your character cannot be essentially injured except by your own acts.
If one speaks evil of you, liv so that none will believe him.
Drink no kind of intoxicating liquors.
Ever liv (misfortunes excepted) within your income.
When you retire, think over what you hav done during the day.
Make no haste to be rich, if you would prosper.
Small and steady gains giv competence with tranquility of mind.
Never play at any game of chance.
Avoid temptation, through fear you may not withstand it.
Earn money before you spend it.
Never run into debt unless you see a way to get out again.
Never borrow, if you can possibly avoid it.
Do not marry until you are able to support a wife.
Never speak evil of anyone.
Be just before you are generous.
Keep yourself innocent if you would be happy.
Save when you are young to spend when you are old.
Read over the above maxims at least once a week.

A Curious Puzzle.

Two Arabs sat down to dinner. A stranger requested to join their party, saying that as he could not buy provisions in that country, if they would permit him to eat an equal share with themselvs, he would pay for the whole. The frugal meal consisted of eight small loaves of bread, five of which belonged to one of the Arabs, and three to the other. The stranger, having eaten a third part of the eight loaves, arose and laid before them eight pieces of money, saying: "My friends, there is what I promised you. Divide it between you according to your just rights."

A dispute arose, of course, respecting a division of the money; but reference being made to the cadi, he ajudged seven pieces of the money to the owner of the five loaves, and only one to him who had the three loaves. And yet the cadi decided justly.

Answer—A has 5 loaves; B has three loaves. The stranger eats 1-3 of the eight loaves, which equals 2 2-3 loaves. There would now remain 5 1-3 loaves. Supposing that A and B shared alike in eating the remaining 5 1-3, this would giv an amount of exactly 2 2-3 loaves to each person. But B only had three loaves of his own. Hence the stranger could only consume 1-3 loaf belonging to B. The remainder of the stranger's portion (2 1-3) must hav been part of A's loaves. Now, 2 1-3 or 7-3 was supplied by A, and only 1-3 was suppiied by B. But 7-3 is seven times as great as 1-3; that is, the portion belonging to A, which the stranger ate, was seven times as great as that portion belonging to B consumed by the stranger. Wherefore the cadi's decision was just, viz., seven pieces of silver to A and one to B.

Correspondence.

OMAHA, NEB., NOV. 20, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am between thirteen and fourteen years of age, attend school, am in the eighth grade, and study history, physical geography, penmanship, vocal music, mechanical drawing, grammar, and arithmetic. I hav your book entitled "Story Hour," and think it is a treasure.

I wrote you a letter last February, and not seeing it published, I thought you had not received it. We hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for nine years, and hav many Liberal books from THE TRUTH SEEKER office. I will now close, wishing success to the Corner

Your friend, MARGARET COLVIN.

[We hav never before received a letter from Margaret. We trust the above may not be the last with which she will favor the Corner. —ED. C. C.]

MILLEDGEVILLE, ILL., NOV. 20, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines to the Corner. My uncle takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like to read the Corner very much. I hav one sister; she is six years old. I hav the "Apples of Gold" and the "Story Hour." I spoke "Dare to Be True," "Our Children," "Her Birthday." I spoke "Dare to Be True" at children's meeting, the only time I ever had anything to do with religious matters, and would not hav then if I could not hav had the privilege of speaking that. Do you know the price of "The Liberal Song Book?"* Will you please tell me? I am afraid I am getting my letter too long, so I will close. ELLA HUNTER.

* Twenty-five cents.

What Ailed the Sentence.

After writing sentences one day the scholars exchanged work for correction. A small boy marked an error, and then at the foot of the paper made the following explanatory note: "He didn't begin Massevchewsits with a caterpilla."—Harper's Bazar.

A Profound Reflection.

"Grandpa," inquired Johnny Bliss, "must everybody die?"

"Yes, my child. Everyone in this world must die when his time comes."

"Well," long pause, "what I'd like to know is, who'll bury the last man?" —Detroit Free Press.

The Long and the Short of It.

"Willie Wafflers," said the teacher, "which is the shortest day in the year?"

"Twenty-fust of December," replied Willie, who was correct as far as the writer knows.

"And Tommy Tuff may tell us which is the longest day," said the teacher indulgently.

"Sunday!" shouted Tommy.—Philadelphia Chronicle.

It Was Hot.

Six-year-old Ned was enjoying the first ham and eggs of the season, and, as the horse radish bottle was passed, thought he would hav some too. When he had recovered somewhat from the burning, and had settled down to his breakfast again, he explained the situation with:

"I guess I'll wait until that gets cold 'fore I try it again."—Toledo Journal.

Conclusiv Logic.

Little Nell: "Mamma, my doll's broke her head."

Omaha mamma: "You careless child, how did that happen?"

"She broke her head her own self; she tumbled off the chair."

"Now, see here, Nell, dolls can't tumble off chairs themselvs."

"Why, yes, they can, mamma; tumbling off is easy enough. It's holding on that they can't do."—Omaha World.

Revision.

Mr. Robert Johnson, who livs on the Fisher farm, has a little boy, Dave, who is just old enough to be taught to say his prayers. The other evening his mother was teaching him the Lord's Prayer, and got along very well until they reached the line, "Give us this day our daily bread."

The mother repeated it twice, but the child made no attempt to follow her.

"Why don't you say it?" urged his mother.

"'Cause I don't want bread," said the boy; "I want pie."—Oil City Derrick.

A Young Anarchist.

It sounds a little bit irreverent, but as it was told by a highly esteemed clergyman, and in Sunday-school, too, it is presumably tellable in print. A little girl, walking in the public garden on Sunday with her mother, began to play upon the grass, and was instantly restrained, to her chagrin.

"Why can't I run on the grass, mamma?" she exclaimed.

"Because the policeman will make you go off if you do. Don't you see the policeman over there? Besides, it is Sunday, and God doesn't want you to play."

"Oh, dear," said the little girl, "if it wasn't for the policemans and God, what nice times we could hav!"—Boston Transcript.

FREETHOUGHT NOVELS.

The Heathens of the Heath. A finely written Radical romance. By Wm. McDonnell, author of Exeter Hall, Family Creeds, Day of Rest, etc. 500 pages. Price reduced. Paper, 90 cents; cloth, 1.25.

All in a Lifetime. A Romance. By Miss Susan H. Wixon. "The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks." Price, 1.50. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the three will be forwarded to any address, for 50 cts, or either one for 15 cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, 4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, 7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

HOW THE LEAVEN OF CHRISTIANITY IS LEAVENING THE HUMAN LUMP.

NOT SURPRISING.

Mary Belovic, a Bohemian woman of Omaha, has become insane on religious subjects, and will probably be given a place in the asylum.—Omaha Herald.

AN OFF-COLOR SCANDAL.

New Brunswick, Oct. 28.—William Williams, colored, has been dropped from the roll of the First Methodist church on account of his alleged relations with a white woman named Hassell, who is also a member of the church and who sang in the choir. The elders became aware of the scandal about two weeks ago, but kept it quiet.

ESCORTED THENCE.

The Rev. Robert Rayson, of the Methodist church at Greenwood, confessed to gross immoralities, and was promptly dismissed. On his way to take the train at Withee he was followed by a crowd that loudly threatened tar and feathers. Rayson, who came from Canada, was preaching on trial in the Western Conference. — Daily Northwestern, Oshkosh, Wis.

AMUSEMENT AT A COLORED CHURCH PICNIC.

Columbia, S. C., Oct. 5.—At a negro Sunday-school celebration in Greenville county several drunken darkies became involved in a quarrel among themselvs, during which Richard Johnson was shot and instantly killed by Jeff Bailey, who was also shot and seriously injured by another negro whose name is unknown.

HO, EVERY ONE THAT THIRSTETH!

New Haven, Oct. 28.—A few weeks ago the pastor of the Catholic church in Portland, Conn., decided to hold a fair, and went among his parishoners to solicit articles. James Laverty, a wholesale liquor dealer, contributed a barrel of beer, which the priest accepted, and for the past few nights the attendants at the fair hav been taking chances on the beer at twenty-five cents a ticket.

A SAINT, NO DOUBT.

Grand Rapids, Mich., Sept. 20.—Rev. Geo. W. West, rector of Grace church, denies that he has been guilty of any indecency with any person, boy or girl, and alleges that he never made an indecent proposition in his life. His church was attended by about the usual congregation last Sunday, and his resignation has been accepted. This, of course, prevents the formal investigation of any of the charges against him.

AN INHARMONIOUS SOCIABLE.

A church sociable and hugging bee at Elk Creek broke up in a row recently. A withered remnant of a man, aching for a smack of sweet sixteen or thereabouts, blew in fifteen cents and was blindfolded. The managers ran his wife against him, and the squeeze he gave her made her ache. When the bandage was removed and he discovered the swindle, he howled like a madman, smote the manager on the jaw, and choked the treasurer till he refunded.—Dawson county, Neb., Herald.

PROGRESS IN THE CORA LEE CASE.

Independence, Mo., Oct. 5. — Attorneys were engaged in taking depositions in the famous Cora Lee case, which will be on trial at Springfield, Mo., in a few days. It seems that Dave Fisher, colored, was a porter in the Laclede Hotel, in this city, when the party composed of the Rev. George E. Graham, Mrs. Malloy, the revivalist, and Miss Lee stopped there July 26, 1886, and registered as Graham and wife and Mrs. Malloy. After Graham was killed, Dave Fisher saw his picture, and recognized it as the man, Graham, who stopped at the hotel at the time.—Kansas City Post.

A METHODICAL METHODIST SUICIDE.

Cleveland, Oct. 2.—Rev. Henry Clemmens, a Free Will Methodist preacher in Holmes county, this state, committed suicide Friday night under very peculiar circumstances. He for a long time preached the doctrin of perfection, and asserted that he was sanctified, and therefore sinless in the sight of God.

Friday night he arose from his bed, took a loaded shotgun that stood in a corner of the room, placed the muzzle of the gun in his mouth, and discharged the weapon. His wife was awakened by the report, and lighting a lamp, found the body of her husband on the floor.

AN ENGLISH CURATE MURDERS HIS VICAR.

The curate, the Rev. Gilbert Cooper, was brought before the magistrates, at Framlingham, Suffolk, yesterday forenoon, and, after formal evidence, remanded till Thursday on a charge of murdering his vicar, the Rev. Wm. Farley, seventy-three years of age. In the afternoon the inquest took place at Cretingham, when, after evidence had been given by the widow, a woman in the prime of life, she was subjected by one of the jury to severe cross-examination respecting her relations with the prisoner. She denied that there had ever been any impropriety between them, saying she treated prisoner as a boy. She showed great indignation at the repetition of questions suggesting levity of conduct. The groom of the deceased, in cross-examination, said he had known his mistress go to Mr. Cooper's room before he was up in the morning, but she stayed no time. After the doctor had described the wound and the police the arrest, the jury returned a vedict of "wilful murder" against Cooper. The latter remarked it was not wilful. The coroner recommended him to say nothing at present. Prisoner was composed and attentiv during the proceedings, but his eyes had a wild, scared expression.—Liverpool Post.

"HAPPY BOB."

Robert E. Van Brunt, otherwise known as "Happy Bob," because of his connection with the Salvation Army, was tried and convicted in February of the murder of Will Roy at Castile, on Oct. 7. 1886 Van Brunt claimed to be engaged to Eva Roy, a pretty girl of sixteen years, a half sister of Will Roy. He was living in the house of the girl's parents, and coming from his room at midnight found Eva and her half brother in conversation in the sitting-room. In a fit of jealous anger he drew a revolver and shot the victim, for which crime he will be hanged December 8th.

FELL FROM GRACE.

Eau Claire, Wis., Oct. 5.—The sheriff of this county arrested at Arkansaw, an isolated village in the adjoining county of Pepin, the Rev. Henry Overing, a Methodist minister, on the charge of seduction, preferred by a young lady living in the town of Washington, three miles east of here. Overing, who has been preaching in that locality during the summer, was brought to this city for examination, and the testimony was so strong against him that he was held for appearance at the circuit court. His friends were greatly surprised at his arrest, and furnishing bonds for his appearance, he was temporarily released.—Daily Northwestern.

"RAZORS FLYING THROUGH THE AIR."

New Orleans, La., Nov. 1.—A fatal affray at a negro church is reported from West Feliciana parish. Following a custom in vogue among plantation negroes in portions of the South, two members of the congregation exchanged wives two years ago. The bargain did not prove satisfactory, and quarrels arose among the members of the much mixed families. It was decided a few days ago by the parties involved to meet at the church and settle all difficulties by a general fist fight. A large number were present. As soon as the parties came together, knives and pistols were drawn, and a bloody riot followed, the result of which was that Edmund Turner and Gibson Clark, the principals, were killed outright, and James Stowbury was severely, if not fatally, wounded.

IMPOTENT FAITH.

Eugene P. Banter and his wife are two of the many converts of faith cure in Hammondsport, Pa. Recently the daughter, a bright girl of twelve years, was taken ill with a mild form of scarlet fever. The fever passed away, but she still contiuued sick. Her parents would not employ a doctor, but depended on the faith cure. The girl lay day after day without any medical attendance until the neighbors began to expostulate with the parents about it. They still refused to employ a doctor, until the neighbors told them that the girl was dying. Then they called in a physician, but it was too late. She was beyond the doctor's skill and died within a few minutes. The physician says that if she had had proper treatment she would hav lived, and he blames her parents very much for their neglect.

BOB CHISHOLM, JIMMY DENNIS—TIME!

Hannibal, Mo., Sept. 30.—At the "Sanctification" or "Holiness" Camp in this city, the Rev. J. Dennis, one of the evangelists, preached last night a sermon on the subject of "Glorification." The Rev. Robert Chisholm took exceptions and called him to order, but the speaker continued. Chisholm therefore mounted the rostrum and began to speak. Each tried to cry the other down, and, failing in this, they clinched, and each tried to pull the other off the platform. During the excitement some one blew out the lights, and the meeting came to an abrupt termination. Each had the other arrested, and to day at the trial the Rev. Chisholm was fined $5, which he paid, and the Rev. Dennis $10, but he was unable to pay the fine, and now lies in jail.

WORSE THAN ANARCHISM.

San Francisco, Oct. 3.—Passengers by the Australian steamer which arrived Saturday bring details of a most revolting tragedy that occurred in New South Wales August 28th. Wadham Wyndham, a man of excellent standing, becoming suddenly attacked with religious frenzy, murdered his wife and three children, all of whom he loved most dearly. In explanation he said that he felt called upon by God to commit the deed. The resurrection was near, and their time had come. As Wyndham's wife offered resistance, he took her outside and with a stone broke in her skull. He then took a carving-knife and fork and thrust them into her side. He also pierced her hands and feet, explaining afterward that he intended to crucify her, as Christ was crucified. His favorit daughter had four cuts on her forehead, and the right side of the skull was beaten into pulp. She had two pierced marks on her breast, two on each foot, and two on each hand. The marks appeared to hav been made with a fork. The left side of the skull of his son was battered, his left side was pierced in two places, as also were his hands and feet. The other son seems to hav been killed directly by a cruel fork thrust entirely through the left side of his body. The hands and feet of all were pierced, as it was Wyndham's intention to nail the bodies to a cross, they refusing to be thus nailed while alive.

SMALL BUSINESS.

A church committee at Xenia, O., appointed by the Cincinnati conference, Methodist Episcopal church, to investigate charges against the Rev. H. M. Keck, stationed at Cedarville, O., found the minister guilty, and recommended his suspension from the ministry. The charge against him was the larceny of a flat-iron from the store of Joshua Wolf in Xenia. It was shown at the trial in the mayor's court that he put the iron in a bucket and hid it in his buggy, where it was found by a man who suspected him. Mr. Keck said in explanation that he had taken morphine that day, and did not know what he was doing —Sun.

JEREMIAH IN THE CHARACTER OF DAVID.

Grand Rapids, Mich., Sept. 19.—Prosecuting Attorney Clay has been to Cedar Springs to hear the story of the young German girl who claims to hav been ruined by Elder Jeremiah Payne, a religious exhorter and supervisor of Solon township. The girl says, while Mrs. Payne was away visiting during the summer, Payne sustained criminal relations with her at different times until she became encinte. He gave her presents of a ring, shoes, and other small articles, exacting a promis from her that she would never speak of the matter. Last Thursday night the girl suffered a miscarriage, and to the physician and other attendants she said Payne was responsible for her condition. The investigation will be continued this afternoon, and papers issued for the arrest of Payne tomorrow.

A SPIRITUOUS-MINDED MINISTER.

It is reported that a minister of the Christian Baptist church has been doing an extensiv manufacturing business at the head of Laurel Creek, in Boone county, W. Va. He has made thousands of dollars by the illicit distilling of whisky, and has managed the business so nicely as to escape detection by the government officials. To the outside world he was known only as a marble-cutter and a manufacturer of pottery ware. He had a large dry-house built for drying the pottery ware before putting it in the kiln to be burned. It is said that in this dry-house he erected a still, and has carried on the business of making whisky for several years, until he has accumulated a small fortune. He closed up his business a few days ago and announced his intention of going on a lecturing tour through the country.

A PREACHER AND A HORSETHIEF.

Venita, I. T., Oct. 30.—Manjos DeLong, alias Rev. James H. Healy, who was arrested at Joplin, Mo., on the charge of horse-stealing, is meeting with his just dues. He has figured here at this place since July 2, 1887, as a Baptist minister, and was about to be taken into the Methodist Episcopal conference, which was in session here two weeks ago, when he was discovered to hav run off with a team belonging to a man of this city. Healy was captured just this side of Baxter Springs, but jumped from the buggy, turning the horse loose, and crossed the line just as the officers got in shooting distance of him. He next turned up at Oswego, Kan., where he played the "saw-mill racket" on a man named Johnson to the tune of $25, claiming he had a saw-mill at Venita and wanted Johnson to go there and run it for him, requesting a deposit of $25 as a guarantee of good faith on the part of Johnson. Healy owes a number of store bills, etc.

ONE OF THE WORST.

Eleven fair ladies sat up in a tree,
Singing willow, tit willow, tit willow;
That man is as naughty as naughty can be,
Singing willow, tit willow, tit willow.
Oh, what shall we do, and what will the world say?
Oh, why did we trust the vile wretch for a day?
Oh, why did he weaken and giv us away?
Singing willow, tit willow, tit willow.

The Rev. Rayson has been officiating at the Methodist Episcopal church at Greenwood for a year or more. Since early last winter ugly rumors hav been afloat concerning his relations with different female attendants at church, and several times a great social upheaval has been predicted by persons at Greenwood who allege this criminal intimacy on the part of Rayson. Several of the most prominent members of the Methodist Episcopal church withdrew on account of Rayson's conduct, and the matter has been kept at a fever-heat until the departure of the reverend gentleman, which took place week before last. Upon his going away, it came out that Rayson had made a confession which implicated some of the first families of Greenwood Thereupon he was followed and brought back, and when threatened with prosecution for slander, he dared his former associates to go ahead, and he would bring before the court members of families of whom there had been no suspicion of wrongdoing. The prosecution of Rayson was then dropped.

The social firmament of the village glistens with some of the brightest intellects of which any community can boast; some of the truest wives and mothers—ladies who are cruelly hurt by the broad assertion that in the Rayson scandal the first families of Greenwood are besmirched. If a black-hearted Rayson has despoiled any homes, let a mantle of charity cover the wreck and time blot out the memory of the fiend. For Rayson we hav no word of sympathy, but hope, if he has committed the crime he claims to hav done, the record of it will precede him wherever he may go, and save female virtue from his blighting touch. —Neillsville, Wis., Times.

WORSE THAN LOT.

Nashville, Tenn., Oct. 20.—A brutal and remarkable attempt at murder is reported from Liberty, DeKalb county, Tenn. While two young men were walking in the woods, two miles and a half from Liberty, they started to cross the public road, when they were startled to see in the road the prostrate form of a woman. Her face was so disfigured and her face and hands so covered with blood that they were unable to recognize her or to tell, indeed, whether she was a negro or white person. There was a dwelling half a mile distant, and one of them rushed there for assistance. On his return with Mr. Scott to where the prostrate form lay, at that moment she struggled feebly and said: "Father, you won't kill me." Then they saw that she was a white woman, the daughter of Rev. J. H. Vickers, who lived in that neighborhood.

The young men assisted her to the residence of Mr. Griffith, her grandfather, to whom she told the circumstances of her attempted assassination. She stated she was riding along to attend religious services at Cooper's chapel one mile distant from Mr. Grffith's, where she had been living for several months; some one rushed from behind a small cedar tree, struck her with a large stick and jerked her off the horse she was riding, when she became unconscious. She says the person who assaulted and struck her was no other than her own father. The person attempting to commit the foul deed was terribly in earnest. The girl is perfectly helpless, although rational. Her nose is cut nearly off, her ear is split, her scalp has perhaps twenty wounds about an inch in length, while the skull is fractured in three places. The physicians pronounce the injuries fatal.

The neighborhood is aroused and there are threats of lynching Vickers. The past bad terms on which Miss Vickers and father had been, because of a former relation of hers to the effect that her father had frequently made indecent proposals to her, together with the girl's statement, and that of one or two witnesses' testimony, renders the girl's statement plausible, to say the least. Vickers has been arrested.—Daily Times.

THE CREMORNE MISSION SCANDAL.

A moral thunderbolt fell in full prayer-meeting on Thursday night at the Cremorne Mission in West Thirty-third street. On the platform at that time sat Mrs. McAuley, leader of the mission and widow of Jerry McAuley, who was as famous for his monumental reformation as for the vices of his previous career, and several gentlemen who are prominent in the cause of reclaiming the fallen and despised. One of these gentlemen was the Rev. Bradford L. Gilbert, the well known architect, of No. 71 Broadway. Mr. Gilbert has for sixteen years taken a very activ part in the meetings held by the mission, and he belongs to the Board of Trustees. At an interesting point of the Thursday evening services, a man arose in the middle of the audience and walked up to the platform. Then he deliberately drew two papers from his pocket and presented one to Mrs. McAuley and the other to Mr. Gilbert, saying to each of them separately, so that everybody could hear, "This is for you." The man was a Westchester county court officer. The legal documents were the complaints and summonses in two suits at law brought by Mrs. Cora Rathbone Gilbert against Mr. Bradford L. Gilbert, her husband, and Mrs. Jerry McAuley, in the Supreme Court at White Plains, Westchester county. The first action is one for absolute divorce on the ground of infidelity to marital vows, and Mrs. McAuley is made the co respondent. It is alleged that the intimacy between them assumed a criminal character a good while ago; that they hav been frequently, almost constantly, together; that their common interest in the mission has served as a cloak to their sin, and that they hav broken the seventh commandment over and over again. The places were these alleged acts occurred are for the most part very generally designated, but the affidavits are specific in regard to one of them, and that is the mission. Mrs. McAuley resides in the same building, upstairs, and there it is alleged that their guilty love took its present course. The second suit is directed against Mrs. McAuley, and is based very largely upon the same evidence as the other. It accuses the superintendent of the mission of alienating the affections of Mr. Gilbert from his wife, and demands $50,000 as a compensation for the injury thus inflicted.—New York Herald.

A FRISKY METHODIST PREACHER.

From the Los Angeles Times it is learned that the Rev. Dr. John White, Methodist, has been undergoing tribulation. The Times givs this account of the trial: "Young Bowers testified that the Rev Mr. White had often in his presence used vulgar and indecent language; that on one occasion he and the doctor were standing on the steps of the court house at Ventura; that a lady unknown to him passed. The doctor made the remark: 'There goes a woman with fine breast works.' He was surprised and disgusted at the doctor's language. Upon another occasion he was making the rounds of the sporting-houses of the city. In the house of Jennie Miller he heard what he thought was a familiar voice. He looked into the room whence the sounds came, and saw Dr. White in a compromising position with one of the inmates. He was fondling and kissing the woman. They were both partially undressed. The doctor bet on horse races, and attended dog and chicken fights, and was always and wanted to appear as one of the boys. De Moss Bowers testified that White's influence was bad in the community. That he was corrupting the young men and setting a bad example. That his son had told him of the incident regarding the lady, and that he had, upon White's promis to amend for the past, suppressed the evidence. White kept going from bad to worse, was in constant company of low and loose associates, and he was bringing the Methodist Episcopal church into disrepute. Charles Hall stated that Dr. White had upon divers occasion in his hearing used vulgar and indecent language. That he had more than once acted in an unministerial manner, and was in the habit of associating with vicious persons. He seemed to be at home in company which any respectable man would be ashamed to own. That he, the doctor, was in the habit of standing on the street corner upon a rainy or muddy day, and watching the ladies as they tripped over the muddy crossings. That the doctor had often boasted to him of his many conquests among the fair sex, and how this lady was sweet on him, and that lady had sent him a tender note. How though he was a minister of the gospel, he was still human and one of the 'bohoys.' After being out about one hour and ten minutes, the committee found Dr. White guilty as charged, and suspended him from the ministry for one year."

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

A very ancient granite, which is now in the museum at the "Indian House," was dug from the ruins of a temple in the island of Bombay. It is, as described by the late Thomas Maurice, (Indian Antiquities, vol IV, p. 372,) "A bust composed of three heads, united to one body, adorned with the oldest symbols of the Indian Theology, and thus expressly fabricated according to the unanimous confession of the sacred sacerdotal tribe of India, to indicate the CREATOR, the PRESERVER, and the REGENERATOR of mankind; which establishes the solemn fact, that from the remotest eras, the Indian nations had adored A TRIUNE DEITY."
Nearly all the Pagan nations of antiquity, in their various theological systems, acknowledged a Trinity in the divine nature. This is shown in BIBLE MYTHS.

News of the Week.

PROHIBITION was defeated by a small majority in Atlanta, Ga., on the 26th ult.

A DETATCHMENT of the Salvation Army was mobbed in Quebec, Can., on Sunday.

ACCORDING to the report of the director of the mint, there is more than a billion dollars in the national treasury vaults in coin and bullion.

A STRIKE among negro plantation hands at Thibodeaux, La., last week was attended by riot and bloodshed. About twenty-five persons were killed.

IT pleased Providence to allow the Pilgrim Congregational church at Duluth, Minn., to be destroyed by fire last Sunday. The loss in money, is $35,000.

GEORGE W. PRICE, a former clerk in the Bible House, New York, is under arrest for breaking open a contribution box and appropriating its contents.

MRS. MARGARET KIDDER, of Chicago, went out of curiosity to see a faith cure doctor. She got interested, took lessons in the art, and in due season became insane.

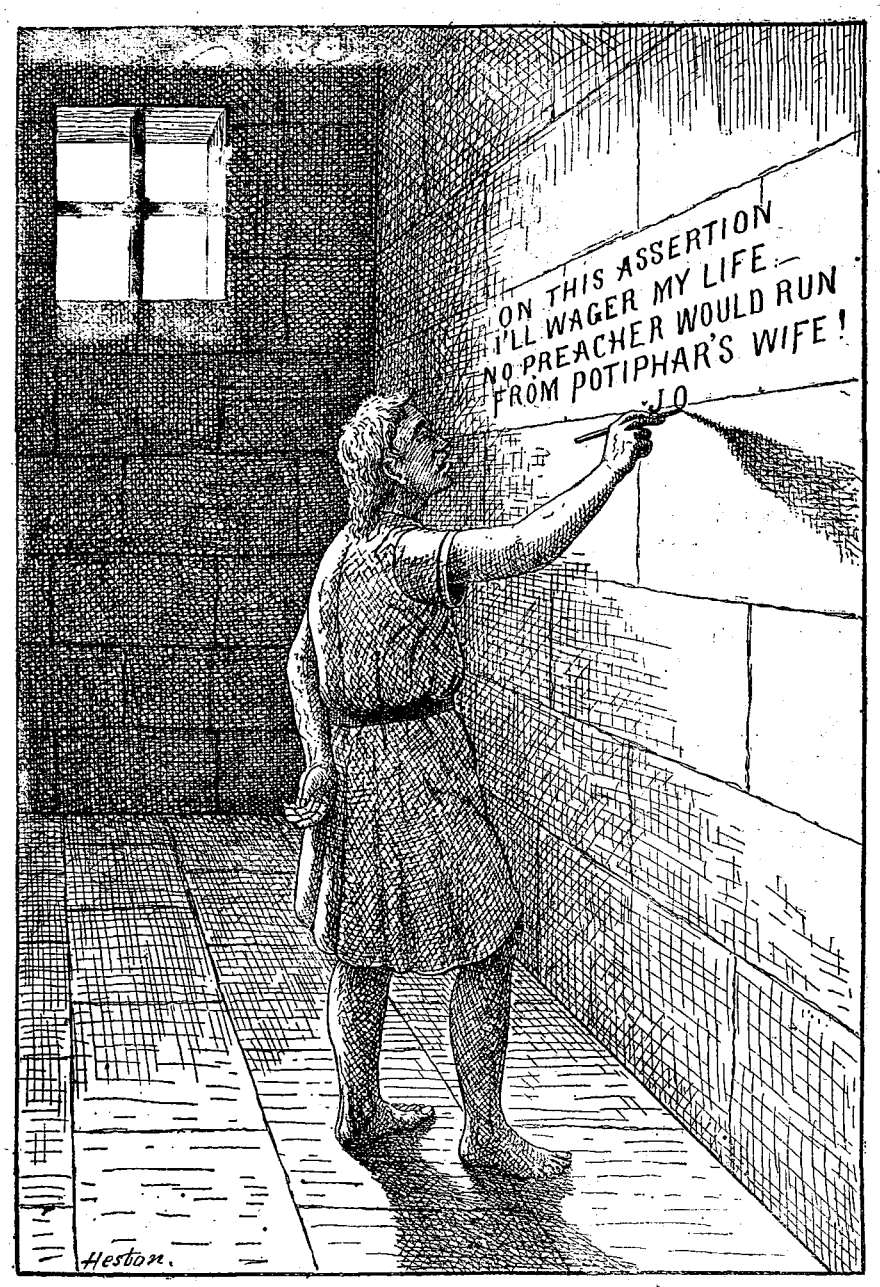
THE annual report of First Assistant Postmaster-General Stevenson shows that the whole number of post-offices in operation in the United States on June 30, 1887, was 55,157.

NEWSDEALERS in Connecticut and Massachusetts hav been arrested for vending the New York Evening Telegram containing cuts of the photographs seized in this city by Anthony Comstock.

THE government of New South Wales, through its agents in this city, offers $125,000 to American inventors for any process that will exterminate rabbits, which hav become a pest throughout Australia and New Zealand.

AN attempt made in Limerick, Ireland, to hold a demonstration in honor of the so-called Manchester martyrs on Sunday was suppressed by the police. At other places meetings for the same purpose were not interfered with.

A NEW YORK daily suggests that "Anthony Comstock should look after the trees in the Central Park. Stripped of their leafy garb, their bare limbs exposed to the blasts of November—why, there's a genuin Comstock lode up there."



ON Nov. 23d, at Salt Lake City, Utah, Marshal Dyer, the receiver of the Mormon church property, took possession of all the books and property in the office of the president of the church. The Mormon people view the act as unconstitutional.

A WOMAN and four male accomplices, convicted of an attempt at forgery in Lancaster, S. C., last week, were sentenced to giv each other twenty lashes with a whalebone whip, which sentence was executed, and the victims allowed to go their ways.

THE Fenians of New York held a meeting last week to commemorate the deaths of some other Fenians who were hanged for murder some years ago. The meeting divided over the question of popery and anti-popery, and the services of the police were necessary to prevent a riot. McGlynn and one Caffrey were the firebrands.

THE German parliament opened on the 24th, the emperor's speech being read from the throne. Besides the usual political platitudes, the emperor sets forth that God's decrees rule in the destiny of nations as much as in the destiny of individual men—which is probably true. He further says that firm confidence in God is the chief defense of the empire, but in view of the same the speech does not recommend disbanding the army. The expenditure for imperial armaments is estimated in the budget at 362,465,016 marks, or about $90,500,000.

MISS REBECCA FREAM belongs to the Dewitt Memorial church in this city, and is in the habit of making such long exhortations in prayer-meeting that the other professors of religion are afforded no opportunity to giv in their testimony to what the Lord has done for them, and their speeches get cold. Recently the committee requested her to be more brief. She declined, and they called in a policeman, by whose august presence Miss Fream was quelled into silence, but she has consulted a lawyer, and declares that she will attend future services and speak when she feels like it.

Odds and Ends.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN once told a good story about Henry Ward Beecher, who, dressed in very common clothes, was studying human nature as exhibited in the highways and by-ways of New York. In the course of his philosophic perigrinations he went into a mock auction shop. He stood a while on entering, and reflected, doubtless, how anyone could be so lost to all sense af truth and honesty as the auctioneer in question, endeavoring to palm off his worthless trash to the inexperienced in city ways as good and valuable, and finally the auctioneer called out: "Mr. Beecher, why don't you bid?" He was greatly astonished, as can be imagined, at finding himself known in this place, and, as he had supposed, in his purposely careless dress. He immediately left and started for the residence of one of the members of the church in the neighborhood, and requested him, as an act of kindness, to go down and inquire of that person who had sold himself to Satan for the love of gain how it was he knew him in his disguise? The neighbor kindly consented, and, on entering the "Peter Funk" shop, he addressed the auctioneer: "How is it that you know Henry Ward Beecher so well as to be able to recognize him in his disguise?" "How do I know him? Why, I hav been a prominent member of his congregation for the last five years, and lease the fifth pew from the front!"

THE subjoined communication has been sent to this office by one of Life's most valued correspondents. It is in no sacrilegious spirit that we offer it to our readers, but in that spirit which prompts us to do our duty. We do not even vouch for its authenticity, but, we may add, it need occasion no surprise if it be officially acknowledged by the A. B. C. F. M.:

DEAR LORD: Please find inclosed majority report. We beg your careful consideration of the same, and earnestly invite your co-operation. Any suggestions as to minor points under consideration we shall be glad to receive from you, but we beg to remind you that the report in its essential details meets the approval of a majority of our members, and we shall feel constrained to consider any radical alteration of doctrin as an unwarranted interference with our established prerogativ, and shall treat it accordingly. Pray do not misunderstand us. Individually, we entertain nothing but the kindest feelings for you. As an administrativ body, however, we are compelled in all frankness to say that your conduct, construed in the light of modern Liberalism, is not all that we should desire, and we beg to suggest, with all possible delicacy, that if you find it impossible to sanction the report which we herewith present, there are members of this board well qualified to administer the affairs of the Universe in case you should see fit to retire to the happy obscurity of private life. But this is a contingency which we devoutly hope to avoid. Any change in the administration at present would be highly detrimental to our interests, as well as to your own, and for that reason we urge upon you the following reasons why you should giv the report your official sanction:

I. It embodies the true idea of a literal hell of fire and brimstone, and in this connection we wish to call your attention to the magnanimity of this committee in refusing to insert into its articles of belief a solution of gun-cotton and dynamite. Such an innovation is, as yet, premature. Be good enough to advise the committee on this point.

II. It presupposes the death of Mercy with the destruction of the world—a doctrin rigidly adhered to by our forefathers in 1620, and one which a conservativ body like ours cannot afford to overlook.

III. It affords a reasonable presumption that in the future state the members of this board and their sympathizers will have the exquisit pleasure of looking down from a state of exaltation upon the interesting writhings of countless millions of heathens—a comfortable and sustaining belief to the average orthodox New England Puritan.

IV. It receives the approval of a majority of this board. The force and significance of this last proposition will strike you at once.

This is all we hav to say, except to remark quite incidentally that we don't think the Pharisees were such very bad fellows after all. We heartily re-echo their sentiments in congratulating ourselvs that we are not like some other men whose names we might mention. We await your favorable reply, gently reminding you once more, in a spirit of deep humility, that any opposition on material points will inevitably result in your immediate removal. Yours in sincerity,

BOSOM LINES FROM SHAKSPERE.

No poet comes near Shakspere in the number of bosom lines—of lines that we may cherish in our bosoms and that seem almost as if they had grown there—of lines that, like bosom friends are ever at hand to comfort, counsel, and gladden us, under all the vicissitudes of life—of lines that, according to Bacon's expression, "come home to our business and bosoms," and open the door for us to look in and to see what is nestling and brooding there.—Hare's Guesses at Truth.

   Which, like the toad, ugly and venomous,
   Wears yet a precious jewel in his head.
   And this our life, exempt from public haunt,
   Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks.
   Sermons in stones, and good in everything.

5. Trifles light as air
   Are to the jealous, confirmations strong
   As proofs of holy writ.—Othello.

[These, I imagin, are the sort of lines that the ingenious author of Guesses at Truth refers to. They occur by the thousand, and every reader of the myriad-minded bard will choose for himself. Happy is the young man or maiden that "before the evil days come" lays up a store of them in the memory.—Hylax.]

You must remember, my dear son, that it is not enough to hav been a good boy. You hav yet to be a good man, and that is rather a different, and sometimes a harder, thing. For, as soon as a man goes among other men he finds they expect him to do things that they ought to be ashamed of doing themselvs; and then he has got to stand on his own honest legs and not move an inch for all their pushing and pulling; and when a man loves his fellow-man and likes to be on good terms with him, that is not easy. . . . But, of all things, if you ever should fail or fall, don't lie because you are down: get up again; for God's sake, for your dead mother's sake, for my sake, get up and try again.—George Macdonald's Castle Warlock.

SOMETIMES there are hopeful signs that the force of scholarship in the universities of England will overcome the tendency of the clergy to travel into antiquity and turn to mummies. On May 31st of this present year, the convocation of Oxford University declined a bequest of a thousand pounds (five thousand dollars) offered by a gentleman to pay for two annual sermons by an evangelical M.A. "upon the past history and religion of the Jewish nation, and upon the prophecies in holy writ relating to the return of that nation to Judea, and the restoration to it of its former glory." That it was not from any lack of archeological enthusiasm is proved by the fact that the same convocation accepted the superb anthropological collection of Gen. Pitt Rivers—showing the evolution of weapons and implements—agreeing to build a new museum for it. These two incidents of one convocation, put together, will bear much reflection. This restoration of the Jews question, once the burden of much Protestant preaching, has become a mummy within our memory, by which I mean that the brains hav gone out of it.—M. D. Conway. NOTE.—I well remember that in a far-off generation, when the century was in its early days, the ministers of the church of Scotland used always to pray: "Bring in, O Lord, thine ancient people the Jews with the fulness of the gentiles. Confound, O Lord, the pope o' Rome. Let all papists and Infidels see the error of their ways. Bless all ministers of the gospel duly called to the work of the ministry," and much other sorry stuff. I don't know that the Lord ever paid any attention to the holy men's prayers.—Hylax.

LEARN to think carefully, to distinguish things that differ, to form convictions on grounds that are real and valid to your own minds. Acquire the best use use of your faculties and implements. To use a phrase of Lord Bacon, "Whet your scythe." And let all your knowledge be charity. Use the whetted scythe, not to cut the legs of your neighbors, but to mow down those errors and prejudices which grow so thickly in the path. You will be of small account in your generation if you will not use stimulus and disc plin within your reach. Depend on it, we are moving toward an epoch when brains trained and fortified will tell far more than ever; knowledge will be a power, and the gray goose-quill will gain more victories than the sword. Privilege will go for less; tradition for less; rifle and cannon for less; wisdom for more; skill for more; trained intelligence for more. And, poor patriarchs, you will be in society when you are young men no more, if you do not lay up a store of mental furniture.—Rev. Dr. Donald Fraser.

[This Dr. Fraser is a Scotchman of the Liberal wing of the Presbyterian church, now settled in London, and anything he says is worth listening to, though it need not be swallowed entire.—Hylax.]

THROUGHOUT the whole Bible, no woman ever appears as a wise adviser. If she advises at all, it is as the mother of Jacob advised him into a fraud. Throughout the inspired word woman appears in the subordinate and slavish role which polygamy assigns to her as an article of property, to be bought and sold, given away, fetched, moved, and carried.—V. B. Denslow.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. Thompson F. Hildreth, D.D., is on trial at Cleveland, O., charged with immoralities of various descriptions. Hildreth is a Methodist, and formerly occupied a pulpit in New York.

THE New York fire commissioners report 21 churches in this city to be in danger of burning down on account of defectiv safeguards against fire. In Brooklyn 15 church buildings are in the same category.

THE Independent refers to the alarming drift among men away from the church. This is especially true, it says, in regard to young men. It tells of twelve average church congregations recently visited, in which there were at least five time as many women as men.

"IF men voted as they pray," said a Prohibition orator, "the Prohibitionists would elect the next president of the United States." Oh, come off, thou reservoir. If men voted as they pray some men would spend their lives in the penitentiary for repeating, while others would never cast a vote in all their lives, and others again would do all their voting during babyhood. Vote as they pray, indeed!—Ex.

"THE Star of Bethlehem is now visible in Texas—a thoroughly Democratic state, by the way."—Louisville Courier-Journal. "The Star of Bethlehem may hav been seen in Texas twinkling in the noonday sky, as the press dispatches indicate, but we must hav good Prohibition authority. It is strange that the Star of Bethlehem has only been sighted in Kentucky and Texas."—Kansas City Times.

OLE PALSEN, who says that he has fished in the Columbia river for eight years, caught near Astoria, Or., recently, a fish twelve feet long, which he can't classify. It wasn't a sturgeon, and between the eyes was a straight horn, thirteen inches long, three inches in diameter at the base, and almost as sharp as a needle.

THE other day five leading Indians of the Cœur d'Alene tribe left Spokane for their reservation with the latest improved thrashing machine and a handsome buggy. Each has seventy acres of grain, which by this time is harvested, and they were well dressed and drove well-fed ponies. It is said that most of the tribe are thus prosperous.

"No one ever thought," remarked Gillyboat, pensivly, "that Bill Julep would ever settle down to a quiet, humdrum life. He was the wildest and most dangerous character in the entire neighborhood, a drunkard and a gambler, but all at once he settled down, and has now quit all his evil habits forever." "Did he experience religion?" "Well, no, not exactly. He went to the penitentiary for life."

WHEN the winter quarters of Barnum's menagerie were burnt a few weeks ago at Bridgeport, Conn., an escaped lion got into the barn of the widow Gilligan and proceeded to make a meal of a cow and calf. Mrs. Gilligan, hearing the disturbance, went to the barn in her nightgown and assaulted the lion by poking him in the ribs; in consideration of which act of bravery Mrs. Gilligan, who is a poor woman, has been offered $60 per week to travel next season with Barnum's circus, and a ranch owner in Colorado wants her to marry him.

THE Freeman's Journal, Roman Catholic, says: "A recent declaration of the holy see deserves the attention of our readers on account of its incidental connection with the land theories of Henry George. Rome declares it an article of faith that the church may not only possess, but also administer, private property, without let or hindrance from the state. The right to private property is therefore indirectly asserted, and the cardinal principle of George that 'the land belongs to the people,' in such a way that it cannot be alienated and appropriated to private ownership, is necessarily thrown overboard."

HON. JAS. DOUGHERTY, United States Congressman from Florida, owns considerable mineral and farming lands in Georgia counties adjoining Chattanooga. He has been there for several months looking after his interests and buying more land. In Catoosa county there is a very strict Sunday law, which is rigidly enforced. The Congressman, in his anxiety to hav his cotton crop gathered, permitted some of the hands to work on a recent Sunday, and a day or two afterward he was arrested for violating the Sunday law. His aged mother, who is very pious, insisted that he be prosecuted to the full extent of the law if found guilty, and she joined in the indictment. The trial excited a great deal of interest in the county. The testimony seemed conclusiv until finally the congressman was put on the stand. He swore "that he had never done a lick of work in his life." This was corroborated by strong proof, and he was accordingly discharged, and the church supporters taxed with the costs.—Memphis Avalanche.

THE wearying exactitude of legal phraseology probably never had a more striking illustration than in a case that is recited now; first, because it will amuse, and next, because it will afford somebody a chance to giv it a name and a location, and say that it happened last week or yesterday. It was a suit to recover the amount of a marine policy of insurance, and it was claimed that the vessel was "wrecked and totally lost by the act of God, and through no fault of the owners or persons on board." The traverse set up that "in truth and in fact the said loss was not the act of the said God, but was occasioned by fraud on the part of the master of the vessel."

DR. PARKER'S round of American experiences is complete. He has now had a "vindication," something which invariably accompanies the drawing of constructiv mileage. The good doctor's peculiar treatment of an audience gathered to hear him lecture on Gladstone by declining to do so on the ground that it was too late, although it was only 8:45, and inviting his hearers to come another evening, when, it is to be presumed, there will be an admission fee, subjects him again to cruel misconstruction. The doctor is continually in hot water. Here is one of the newspapers printing a confiding and almost tender epistle from him asking the advice of editors upon a proposed newspaper to be called the Royal Mail, and to be sent weekly from England, which shall represent the thoughts of many minds "without any of the annoyance or friction of interviewing." Truly, for a clergyman Dr. Parker hunts the almighty dollar with uncommon anxiety.—New York Tribune.

The Bible of Nature; or, The Principles of Secularism.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Secret of the East," etc.

IV.—Objective Maxims.

CHAPTER XX.—THE PRIESTHOOD OF SECULARISM.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

An instinct inherited from the habits of many generations teaches our social fellow-creatures to entrust the welfare of their communities to the protection of an experienced leader. Birds that become gregarious only at a certain time of the year select a guide for that special occasion. Others have a permanent leader, and among the more intelligent quadrupeds that leadership becomes dual. Besides the stout champion who comes to the front in moments of danger, wild cattle, horses, antelopes, deer, and the social quadrumana have a veteran pioneer who guides their migrations and sentinels their encampments.

Among the primitive tribes of our fellow-men, too, the authority of leadership is divided between a warrior and a teacher, a chieftain and a priest. The obstinacy of savages, who refuse to yield to reason, suggested the plan of controlling their passions by the fear of the unseen, but ghost-mongery was not the only, nor even the most essential, function of primitive priesthood. The elders of the Brahmans were the guardians of homeless children and overseers of public charities. The Celtic Druids were the custodians of national treasures. The rune-wardens of the ancient Scandinavians preserved the historical traditions and law records of their nation. The priests of the Phœnicians (like our Indian medicine men) were trained physicians. The Egyptian hierophants were priests of knowledge, as well as of mythology. They were the historians and biographers of their nation. They codified the national laws. They taught geometry; they taught grammar; they taught and practiced surgery; they devoted a large portion of their time to astronomical observations. Their temple-cities were, in fact, free universities, and the waste of time devoted to the rites of superstition was more than compensated by secular studies, and to some degree also by the political services of learned priests, who seem to have been occasionally employed in diplomatic emergencies.

Motives of political prudence induced the lawgivers of the Mediterranean nations to circumscribe the authority of their pontiffs, which at last was, indeed, almost limited to the supervision of religious ceremonies. But in Rome, as well as in Greece and the Grecian colonies of western Asia, the true functions of priesthood were assumed by the popular exponents of philosophy, especially by the Stoics and Pythagoreans. The weekly lectures of Zeno were attended by a miscellaneous throng of truth-seekers; the disciples of Pythagoras almost worshiped their master; Diagoras and Carneades traveled from town to town, preaching to vast audiences of spell-bound admirers; Apollonius of Tyana rose in fame till cities competed for the honor of his visits; the clientèle of no Grecian prince was thought complete without a court philosopher; the tyrant Dionysius, in all the pride of his power, invited the moral rigorist Plato and submitted to his daily repeated reproofs. Philosophers were the confessors, the comforters, and the counselors of their patrons, and philosophic tutors were in such request that wealthy Romans did not hesitate to procure them from the traffickers in Grecian captives and indulge them in all privileges but that of liberty. Centuries before a bishop of Rome contrived to avert the wrath of King Alaric, doomed cities had been spared at the intercession of pagan philosophers, and philosophers more than once succeeded in allaying the fury of mutineers who would have ridiculed an appeal to mythological traditions.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

The power of filial love hardly exceeds that of the passionate veneration which kindles about the person of a sincere teacher of truth. The homage paid to an apostle of light is the noblest form of hero-worship. The hosannas of idol-service overflowing upon the idol-priest are marred by the discords of hypocrisy and the reproving silence of reason; but the approval of wisdom is the highest reward of its ministry. The brightness of that prestige shames the gilded halo of the mythology-monger; the minister of Truth may lack the pomp of consecrated temples, but his disciples will make a hermit's cave a Delphic grotto and will not willingly let the record of his oracles perish. The chants of the Eleusynian festivals, the shout of the Lupercalia, the mumblings of augurs and sibyls, have been forever silenced; but the words of Plato still live; Socrates still speaks to thousands of truth-seekers; the wisdom of Seneca still brightens the gloom of adversity.

Religions founded on any basis of truth can survive the fall of their temples. Jerusalem was wrecked in the storm of Roman conquest, but the health-laws of the Mosaic code defied the power of the destroyer, and of all the creeds born on the teeming soil of the East, Judaism alone can still be preached without an alloy of cant and compromise.

The enthusiasm of progress has nothing to fear from the growth of skepticism. Mankind will always appreciate their enlightened well wishers. In cities where the creed of the Galilean supernaturalist has become almost as obsolete as the witchcraft delusion, progressive clergymen still draw audiences of intelligent and sincere admirers, and the apostles of social reform are haunted by anxious inquirers, disciples whom the penalties of heresy fail to deter, and who if barred out all day will come by night: "Master, what shall we do to be saved?"

In spite of sham saviors, the search after salvation has never ceased, and after eighteen centuries of clerical caricatures the ideal of true priesthood still survives in the hearts of men.

C.—PERVERSION.

The puerile supernaturalism of the pagan myth-mongers could not fail to injure their prestige, even in an age of superstition; but the antinaturalism of the Galilean fanatics not only neglected but completely inverted the proper functions of priesthood. The pretended ministers of Truth became her remoreless persecutors; the promised healers depreciated the importance of bodily health, the hoped-for apostles of social reform preached the doctrine of renunciation. We should not judge the Christian clergy by the aberrations engendered by the maddening influence of protracted persecutions. It would be equally unfair to give them the credit of latter-day reforms, reluctantly conceded to the demands of rationalism. But we can with perfect fairness judge them by the standard of the moral and intellectual types evolved during the period of their plenary power, the three hundred years from the tenth to the end of the thirteenth century, when the control of morals and education had been unconditionally surrendered into the hands of their chosen representatives. The comparative scale of human turpitude must not include the creations of fiction. We might find a ne plus ultra of infamy in the satires of Rabelais, in the myths of Hindostan, or the burlesques of the modern French dramatists. But if we confine our comparison to the records of authentic history, it would be no exaggeration to say that during the period named the type of a Christian priest represented the absolute extreme of all the groveling ignorance, the meanest selfishness, the rankest sloth, the basest servility, the foulest perfidy, the grossest superstition, the most bestial sensuality, to which the majesty of human nature has ever been degraded. Thousands of monasteries fattened on the toil of starving peasants. Villages were beggared by the rapacity of the tithe-gatherer; cities were terrorized by witch-hunts and autos-da fé. The crimps of the inquisitorial tribunals hired spies and suborned perjurers by promising them a share of confiscated estates. The evidence of intellectual pursuits was equivalent to a sentence of death. Education was almost limited to the memorizing of chants and prayers. "A cloud of ignorance," says Hallam, "overspread the whole face of the church, hardly broken by a few glimmering lights who owe almost the whole of their distinction to the surrounding darkness. . . . . In 992, it was asserted that scarcely a single person was to be found, even in Rome itself, who knew the first elements of letters. Not one priest of a thousand in Spain could address a common letter of salutation to another." Every deathbed became a harvest-field of clerical vampires who did not hesitate to bully the dying into robbing their children for the benefit of a bloated convent. Hords of howling fanatics roamed the country, frenzying the superstitious rustics with their predictions of impending horrors. Parishioners had to submit to the base avarice and the baser lusts of insolent parish priests, who in his turn kissed the dust at the feet of an arrogant prelate. The doctrine of Antinaturalism had solved the problem of inflicting the greatest possible amount of misery on the greatest possible number of victims.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

The intellectual interregnum of the Middle Ages, the era of specters and vampires, received the first promis of dawn about the middle of the fourteenth century, when the lessons of the Crusades and the influence of Moorish civilization began to react on the nations of Christian Europe. Yet, by methods of their own, the vampires succeeded in prolonging the dreadful night. They set their owls a-shrieking from a thousand pulpits; they darkened the air with the smoke-clouds of autos-da-fé. They treated every torch-bearer as an incendiary.

But though the delay of redemption completed the ruin of some of their victims, the ghouls did not escape the deserved retribution. Their fire alarms failed to avert the brightening dawn. Daylight found its way even through the painted glass of dome-windows, and in the open air the blood suckers had to take wing on pain of being shaken off and trampled under foot. The slaves of Hayti never rose more fiercely against their French tyrants than the German peasants against their clerical oppressor. From Antwerp to Leipzig thousands of convents were leveled with the ground; the villages of Holland, Minden, and Brunswick joined in a general priest-hunt, carried on with all the cruelties which the man-hunters of the Frankish crusade had inflicted on the pagan Saxons. In the Mediterranean Peninsulas the Jesuits were expelled as enemies of public peace, and their colleagues could maintain themselves only by an alliance with despotism against the liberal and intellectual elements of their country. To patriots of the Garibaldi type the name of a priest has become a byword implying the very quintessence of infamy. The explosion of the French Revolution struck a still deadlier blow at clerical prestige. The fagot-arguments of the Holy Inquisition were answered by a "burning, as in hell-fire, of priestly shams and lies," and not one out of twenty French monasteries escaped the fury of the avengers. Our Protestant clergymen see their temple walls cracked by a breach of ever-multiplying schisms, and can prop their prestige only by more and more humiliating concessions, and in every intelligent community have to purchase popularity by rank heresies against the dogmas of their predecessors. Here and there the orthodox tenets of the New Testament have survived the progress of rationalism, but haunt the shade, like specters scenting the morning air, and momentarily expecting the summons that shall banish them to the realms of their native night.

E.—REFORM.

When the harbinger of day dispels the specters of darkness, half awakened sleepers often mourn the fading visions of dreamland, as they would mourn the memories of a vanished world, till they find that the solid earth still remains, with its mountains and forests, and that the enjoyment of real life has but just begun. With a similar regret the dupes of Jesuitism mourn the collapse of their creed and lament the decline of morality, till they find that religion still remains, with its consolations and hopes, and that the true work of redemption has but just begun.

The reign of superstition begins to yield to a religion of reason and humanity. The first forerunners of that religion appeared at the end of the sixteenth century, when the philosophers of northern Europe first dared to appeal from dogma to nature, and since that revival of common-sense the prison walls of clerical obscurantism have been shaken by shock after shock, till daylight now enters through a thousand fissures.

But Secularism has a positive as well as a negative mission, and after removing the ruins of exploded idols, the champions of reform will begin the work of reconstruction. Temples dedicated to the religion of progress will rise from the ruins of superstition. Communities of reformants will intrust the work of education to chosen teachers, who will combine the functions of an instructor with those of an exhorter. In the languages of several European nations the word "rector" still bears that twofold significance. The ministers of Secularism will not sacrifice physical health to mental culture. They will be gymnasiarchs, like the Grecian pedagogues who superintended the athletic exercises of their pupils and accompanied them on foot journeys and hunting excursions. They will be teachers of hygiene, laboring to secure the foundations of mental energy by the preservation of physical vigor, and to banish diseases by the removal of their causes. They will seek to circumscribe the power of prejudice by the extension of knowledge. They will obviate the perils of poverty by lessons of industry and prudence. Their doctrines will dispense with miracles; they will make experience the test of truth, and justice the test of integrity; they will not suppress, but encourage, free inquiry; their war against error will employ no weapons but those of logic.

The religion of reason will limit its proper sphere to the secular welfare of mankind, but will ask, as well as grant, the fullest freedom of metaphysical speculation. Why should the friends of light darken the sunshine of earth with fanatical wars for the suppression of private theories about the mystery of the unrevealed first cause? Why should they rage about the riddle of the veiled hereafter to please the ordainer of the eternal law that visits such inexorable penalties upon the neglect of the present world? Should the friends of common sense quarrel about guesses at the solution of unknowable secrets? We need not grudge our wonder-loving brother the luxury of meditating on the mysteries of the unseen or the possibilities of resurrection. Shall the soul of the dying patriarch live only in his children? Shall it wing its way to distant stars? Shall it linger on earth:

> "Sigh in the breeze, keep silence in the cave,
> And glide with airy foot o'er yonder sea?"

Why should we wrangle about riddles which we cannot possibly solve? But we might certainly have honesty enough to admit that impossibility. Musing on the enigmas of the "land beyond the veil" may entertain us with the visions of a dreamy hour, but should not engross the time needed for the problems of the only world thus far revealed.

Thus, founded on a basis of health, culture, reason, and justice, the office of priesthood will regain its ancient prestige, and the best and wisest of men will become ministers of Secularism by devoting their lives to the science of happiness on earth.

THE END.

Life and Death—Hell and Heaven—God and Eternity.

Of one thing all rational men are certain; that is, that they exist. What transpired before their existence they can only learn from others. What will take place after their death they hav no means of knowing.

But why should death hav any terrors, since it is the lot of all? If there were something unnatural about dying, it might appear differently. But it is as natural to go out of the world as it is to come into the world. Whether we contemplate the animal or the vegetable kingdom, we find on every hand evidences that death and decay is a universal law. All life must end in death. Every flower that blooms, every acorn that sprouts, every animal that sees the light, must terminate its existence in death.

If death is not according to a natural law, but was brought into the world by disobedience, then it might be proper to ask if the first vegetables and the first animals ate also a forbidden apple.

If the existence of man is to be eternal, then there is no death, only a change of places or conditions.

If a man die, he must remain dead. To say that a man dies and still livs involves a great absurdity. True, the same power which brought us into existence may bring other beings into existence, but if we die it cannot call us into existence again, because that would be another and not the same life. When an oak dies, an acorn may produce another oak, but the same oak can never liv again.

If death is the end of life, how can we die and still liv? Is the life of Jumbo still prolonged and represented by a great conscious ghost or spirit, or is Jumbo dead? If Jumbo died, he can never liv again. Another great elephant may be brought into existence, but the life which went out when Jumbo was struck with the cars cannot be prolonged.

Let us consider a lifeless human form. The brain, that great mental battery, has ceased to act; can it ever be reanimated? It was the engin of thought. Can the mind, or any function of it, which was the product of that brain, still act? Can the engin still exert its power over the machinery after the fire has gone out and steam is not generated? Can a watch continue to measure time after the mainspring has been eaten away with rust? Can those limbs, once so strong and activ, ever hav their former strength and activity restored? Will those glassy eyes ever see again? Will that tongue, once so eloquent, ever speak again?

Other brains may think, other limbs may be activ, other eyes may see, other tongues may speak, but those which we are considering are dead. "No sound can awake them to glory again."

Webster describes death as a "total and permanent cessation of all the vital functions." How can the cessation be total if some of the functions continue? If some of the functions remain unimpaired, then according to Webster there is no death.

The world must learn that death annihilates life—that life and death can never be joint tenants in the same tenement. When death enters, life steps out. But Christians persist in using life and death as synonymous terms. They are as opposit as heat and cold, light and darkness.

Those who affirm that there is a something which survives what we call death, ought to be able to tell what that something is.

Is it the sight? How can a dead eye see? How can a message be sent over the wires when they are down, and the battery ceases to operate? Is it the feeling? There is no nerve to convey the sense of feeling to the brain, and no brain to receive the message. Is it the hearing? How can vibrations of the air affect a dead ear so as to affect a dead brain? Is it the taste, or the smell? These, like the other senses, are powerless to affect a dead brain.

What cannot be described; what cannot be heard, felt, smelt, tasted, or seen; what cannot be weighed or measured, and what cannot be determined by any test, is nothing. And that is all there is to liv after a man dies.

I hav often heard the caterpillar and butterfly referred to as showing how our existence is to be continued into another life, or state of existence. But if death is a "total cessation of all the vital functions," shall we be conscious in the next life of what transpired in this? Can the butterfly hav any idea of caterpillar life?

I hav a faint conception of the first rude inhabitants of the earth; but were they made happier on account of my existence to-day? Or, if I am to hav another state of existence, will that affect my happiness or misery in this life? If I am to hav another life, will I not be provided for as I hav been in this? "Take no thought of to-morrow" (the next life), but make the most of to-day (the present life).

If death is a "total cessation of all the vital functions," there cannot be the least relation between this life and one which is to follow, if there be any. And we can be no more interested in another life than we are in a comet which may be discovered a thousand years hence. If we hav been evolved from lower forms, how could those lower forms be affected by superior beings which sprang from them a million years later?

If death is the "total cessation of all the vital functions," we must lose our identity. Philosophically, there cannot be the least relation between things or thoughts in this life and something which may transpire in another state of existence. An eternal sleep is just as welcome to me as to lose all knowledge of this life and turn up in another world some thing (or body) else.

When the mind turns to limitless space or endless duration the thoughts become confused. The time which preceded our existence may be considered equal to that which will follow it. I can see no more cause to lament because our existence is to cease with this life than there is to lament because we were not brought into existence at the first tick of time's old clock.

A beginning of time is unthinkable. The time which elapsed before our existence cannot be measured by millions or trillions of years. Yet all this time elapsed before we were ushered into a conscious state. During all these trillions of years we had no existence; will it be any worse to be annihilated for an equal period of time after death?

If we look into our own minds, we shall find it quite difficult to determin just when conscious existence commenced. We remember, perhaps, the caresses of parents, or a faint recollection of some bright toy is left upon the mind, like the shadows in a dream—beyond all is blank and dark.

To us this was the "beginning." It is the same to us as if there never had been a transaction before. In a few years we shall die and again be reduced to the same unconscious state that preceded our advent into the world. To us there was nothing before our birth; there will be nothing after our death. Death is

> The last great day of nothingness;
> The last of danger and distress.

"But why should we be brought into existence for so short a time and then be cut off forever?" It is hard to tell why nature has fashioned us as we are, or why we were not born a thousand years ago, or a thousand years hence; or why the life of one animal is but a few hours and another a thousand years.

Life may be likened to a narrow neck or rib of land bounded on either side by an ocean. Of our own knowledge, we know not when we were cast upon the shore, nor why we were not cast up a century earlier or later, nor why this neck of land is not narrower or wider. We scramble up the incline with more or less ambition, reach the summit, go down on the other side, and plunge into the unknown, unknowable, and mysterious waters. And, as far as human knowledge has informed us, this is the end of life. If there are roses on one side of this neck of land, there are ripe fruits on the other. Autumn leaves are as beautiful as spring flowers, and sleep is even sweeter than wakeful activity.

We come down to the water's edge and we strain our eyes to see the other shore. We peer into the darkness, but we see no ray of light. But the darkness is always welcome when we are weary. Every time one passes to that bourne from which no traveler returns, we try again to lift the dark curtain in order to learn something of the "beyond," but we are no wiser than the thousands who hav attempted the same thing before. We shout at the top of our voices to those who are said to hav "gone over," but no response is vouchsafed to us.

One affirms that when we leave this state of existence we shall either be wafted to a state of bliss or be driven to a state of eternal torment. But he would find himself in a sad dilemma if he were compelled to demonstrate the truth of what he affirms.

Death ends all, or it does not. At the best it is mere conjecture. Who dares affirm that he knows what has been barred forever from human knowledge? Oh, how the ignorance in regard to these matters should come home to all who put forth pretenses to such knowledge, and smite them with shame!

Reasoning from analogy, we seem to be safe in saying that all will share the same fate after death, whatever that may be. One will not liv on, and another be annihilated; neither will one be consigned to a state of bliss and another sent to hell.

We are all begotten alike—all conceived alike, and all subject to the same general laws. We cannot breathe pure nitrogen; we can endure only a certain degree of heat and cold; we can only liv stated periods without nourishment, and poison in sufficient doses will destroy human life.

If one were brought into existence in one way and another in another; if one died and another lived on; if one were subject to the law of gravitation and another not, I might be led to believe that there was a hell for one and a heaven for another. There seem to be certain undeviating laws to which not only we, but even the brute creation, in many respects, are subject, and these considerations make it seem reasonable that the same fate awaits us all, whatever that may be. But the Christian shudders at the thought. Is this all there is of life? he asks. "Were we born only to hav our existence prematurely cut off? Is there no hereafter? The thought of an eternal sleep overwhelms me." But why should he regret and dread going to sleep on this side of life more than regret that he did not wake up millions of years sooner on the other?

I am not out of love for life. I do not pray for death. I think life is desirable as long as one is blessed with health and vigor. But old age and decrepitude, or accident, or disease must come to take us away. We can only escape from this life through the gates of death, and according to Webster's definition "death ends all."

What sensible man would not prefer annihilation to the Christian's heaven? Think of the Christian's occupation when he gets there. He is going to walk the street of the New Jerusalem, which are to be paved with gold. The gates are to be of gold, and he is to hav a golden harp and a golden crown. He is to hav a pair of wings, and be clothed with a white robe. Then he is to circle around the great white throne, and sing praises to God and shout hallelujah with Moses and the lamb. But why so much gold in heaven? Simply because the sordid and miserly disposition of the people was transferred to the Christian's heaven.

David, the man beloved of God, not content with robbing the people on every hand, and appropriating their wealth to himself, like a miserly old Jew, clung to it even in death, and had his plunder buried with him. Hundreds of years after his death his sepulcher was opened and used as a mine from which to draw gold to supply the sinews of religious wars. (See Josephus's "Antiquities of the Jews," Book VII. c. 15, sec. 3.)

From this it is easy to see why there is to be so much gold in heaven. The people were the most sordid that could be imagined, and nothing would wake up such enthusiasm as the prospect of a heaven plentifully supplied with gold.

> For gold they loved the impotent and old,
> And hugged and kissed and sighed for gold.

Why is each one to wear a crown in heaven? Because a crown is the insignia of power and royalty. For crowns wars hav been waged, for crowns thousands hav been murdered. Nothing has been more coveted than crowns. What thousands hav fought for on earth and could not obtain, they are to be rewarded with in heaven.

And then a harp is to accompany every crown. The harp is one of the most ancient instruments of music. In ancient times the people were not beset with as great a variety of musical instruments as in latter times. No doubt the harp, in the hands of a skilful performer, gave forth strains which enchanted the listeners. Very few could obtain a harp, though nothing was more coveted. Hence a promis of a harp in heaven would increase the zeal of the masses in taking the proper steps, as directed by the priesthood, for obtaining a prize which they were unable to possess here.

If we compare the heavens of the different systems of religion, we will find that no two are alike. The heavens are fashioned according to the desires of the different peoples. The heaven of the Christians would hav very little attraction for the orientals. Indeed, I am informed that the missionaries are shrewd enough to change their heaven so as to make it correspond with the tastes and desires of the people. I know that, in formulating the Christian scheme, paganism was interwoven to secure the adherence of the pagans.

Next, what are they going to do in heaven. Fifty or sixty millions of harps, all being twanged at the same time, would be a little too much of a good thing. And it strikes me that a sensible God would not be delighted with the simultaneous shout of such a vast multitude. And it would appear that so many white robes would look a little monotonous.

Now I would ask how such a man as Newton, or Franklin, or Humboldt would enjoy such a heaven? It would be no place for men of mental acquirements. Every idea of heaven, as believed in by the Christian, had its origin in human desires, and shows the low mental standard of those who originated it. If a committee of the wisest men should be chosen to prepare a plan for a new heaven, we hav every reason to believe that it would differ widely from that of the Christians.

They would want ample play-grounds for the children—flowers, and meadows, and running brooks. They would want art galleries, scientific and literary societies. There would be some way provided for scientific men to enjoy themselvs besides playing a harp. It strikes me that Herschel would want to be sounding the Milky Way, and Peters would find enjoyment in calculating the distances of the fixed stars. All of us would want to see the waxing and waning moon, and enjoy the vicissitudes of day and night. In short, this life is far more desirable than the picture of heaven which Christians hav drawn.

The idea of the Christian heaven ought to be discarded from the utter impossibility of its being true. I do not believe that minds capable of scientific investigation would ever believe in such a heaven if their minds could once be brought seriously to consider the absurdity of the idea. In the name of all that is sacred to scientific minds, I ask how such a man as Herschel could bring his mind down to playing a harp for fifty thousand years or more?

If I am to be so changed that I would find enjoyment in the Christian heaven, I think I would find just as much enjoyment to be turned into an ox if the clover were only abundant.

But it is claimed that more rational men hav formed more rational ideas of heaven. This only proves that it is still a picture of the imagination, and never did and never can hav any real existence. The whole Christian scheme is a sham; heaven is a sham.

> And talk of hell! why, d—n it,
> The more they talk the more they sham it.

As the Christian's heaven shows his lack of good sense, so hell shows his vindictivness. Hell was born of spite, and hatred, and malice. When you displease a Christian the first thing he thinks of is hell. There is no torture, perhaps, that equals that of fire. People generally prefer death any other way rather than by fire. Hence, Christians hav invented this barbaric treatment for their enemies. Hell was never invented for Christians; it was designed for doubters and heretics.

Did you ever get a snuff of burning brimstone? Nobody but a Christian would ever hav thought of combining brimstone with fire for the punishment of those who do not believe in the Christian's heaven and his three-ply God.

It was easy enough for a Christian to think of fire for an unbeliever; then as an improvement another might mix in brimstone for those who sinned against the Holy Ghost or played a jew's-harp on Sunday. Then, of course, a devil, with regulation horns, would be indispensable to keep up the fires, so that offenders shall be kept squirming for the amusement of the harp-players in heaven. To invent and equip hell was all easy enough; but to locate it was a little too much for Christian ingenuity. JOHN PECK.

CORRESPONDENTS AND COMMENTS.

OFFICE "INDEPENDENT PULPIT,"
WACO, TEX., Nov. 22, 1887.

E. A. STEVENS, SEC. AMERICAN SECULAR UNION, Dear Sir: Sickness and press of business hav prevented me from writing you before. I am in sympathy with all truly Liberal work, and especially that of the American Secular Union. The Nine Demands afford ample field for Liberal propaganda.

I hav just read your "Word to Liberals Everywhere," and while I hav a long row to weed, being almost alone in a wide field, and cannot do much, will do what I can. Hav therefore enlisted you one year for the Independent Pulpit, and send you one dozen each of my own publications. They retail at twenty-five, fifteen, and ten cents, for which I make no charge. Wishing you success,

I am yours truly, J. D. SHAW.

Brother Shaw shows true Texan grit, as he is performing herculean labor as publisher of a Freethought paper, for I hav personal knowledge of the continuous struggles which founders of Freethought journals must encounter. When such men, I say, are moved to make even more sacrifices than their daily battle necessitates, what must we think of those insipid "Liberals" who excuse their indifference in supporting Freethought papers, or in aiding the American Secular Union, by such corkscrew gibberish as: "Well, I believe in letting everybody think as they like; let them form their own opinions. I don't hav to hav lectures, books, nor papers to tell me what to do?" I was asked to call on a party the other day who, with idiotic pomposity, delivered himself as above. Notwithstanding his laissez-faire attitude, his habit was to everlastingly prate of his wisdom, for fear that discovery would not otherwise be made. These egotistical nuisances, whose confused and disjointed conceptions of what Liberalism is arise from their entire ignorance of its standard writers and current literature, help to retard real radical progress. The worst of it is that Freethought is, in the minds of the general public, held sponsor for their vapid utterances, while they hav neither understood its philosophy, comprehended its purpose, nor contributed a dollar to disseminate mental freedom. What they hav contributed is the odium of their flaunting ignorance. They are the millstones around the neck of radicalism. They love themselvs too well to care for humanity or posterity. Well, the reader, should he know such a one, just let him read this. Let them know their hollow pretense is recognized; that, as they stand, we repudiate them; that they should either help the enthronement of reason, or be driven back into the chain-gang of the church.

Hardly had I mailed last week's letter before a registered one arrived from Leonard Geiger, of Hudson, N. Y., who also paid $25 for a life membership. Are there any more Geigers in the field? In his letter he says:

> Inclosed find my subscription ($50). Please inform me if the lectures delivered at the Congress are printed or are to be printed, and where to get them. There are only a few here who take a life interest in Secular work, and we want all the literature we can get. Yours respectfully, L. GEIGER.

Hugo Schmidt is a hard man to get away from his family circle, but he makes up for lack of personal attention by generous help for those who do. He is also a prominent member of the Chicago Turn Gemeinde, and always a liberal contributor, in times of financial trouble, to the funds of the Chicago Secular Union. He pledged $25 to the Campaign Fund, and writes:

> CHICAGO WATCH TOOL CO., NOV. 26, 1887.
> FRIEND STEVENS: Inclosed please find check for $25. Hope it will do a great deal of good.
> Yours truly, HUGO SCHMIDT.

A. C. Berg, one of our members, paid me his personal pledge ($5), but remember it costs him several V's each year, for Berg is one of our very best workers.

J. H. Collins, the sterling Freethinker, of Barnum, and the solitary representativ of Minnesota at the Congress, sends his pledge ($5). Shake, Brother Collins! You set a good example for the rest of the Minnesota Liberals, which I hope they will not be slow to follow. I hope that before January 1st we can hav published the more necessary documents, so instead of hoarding your funds for Christmas, let a little of it go for Liberalism.

I had to take a flying trip on personal matters through this state, and while in Springfield, pacing the platform of the Wabash depot awaiting a train for Jacksonville, was greeted by Mr. Budinot, an occasional contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER, who recognized the blazing torch of Reason with which Otto Wettstein had decorated our manly breast. Of course we had a brief but pleasant chat, which started me ruminating why more of those badges were not worn so that we might meet with warm and friendly greetings from fellow-Freethinkers, which would recompense us for the outlay a thousand fold.

At Jacksonville I met Mr. Hackman, who has read the Investigator twenty years. Mr. B. F. Brown is conceded to be the activ worker for Liberalism, and is the agent for the Investigator.

I made a brief call on Dr. David Prince, the leading physician and head of a sanitarium. As a member of the school board, a position he has held for years, the doctor has done excellent service to secularize their educational system. No easy matter, we surmise, when surrounded by the influence of three sectarian colleges. I found a stanch Freethinker in O. Solinsky, a merchant tailor, whose wife, a well-educated lady of Brooklyn, shares his radical opinions.

In Quincy, Ernst Bertschinger, treasurer of Dick's Brewing Company, is neither running a Bible-class nor superintending a Sunday-school; so they consider he is little likely to become a defaulter, both he and his amiable wife being former members of the Chicago League, and here the secretary of the American Secular Union can count on a hearty welcome. Mr. and Mrs. Bertschinger take an activ interest in Turn Verein affairs, and their society has recently erected a splendid structure at a cost of about $25,000. There are more Catholic churches in Quincy, I presume, than in any city of its size on the continent, and Romanism dominates the town. One sturdy Freethinker, however, in the common council, Dr. Durant, puts in his vigorous protest against church and state encroachment whenever necessary, and sometimes with good effect.

I met Mrs. Minerva Merrick, a lady who, though she has seen seventy summers, shows more vim and vigor in protesting against orthodox dominion than thousands of young and professed Freethinkers. At her own expense, she has erected a large, handsome brick structure, known as Merrick Hall, so that radical opinions may find a platform in that hotbed of Romanism. Mrs. Merrick conducts one page in the Watchman, a Spiritualistic paper published in this city, and was formerly editor of the Fountain of Light. I also made the acquaintance of Mr. Isaac N. Lee, a radical Secularist, formerly a member of the St. Louis Liberal League, and who is anxious to espouse the Liberal cause as lecturer and organizer. He certainly appears well equipped for such work.

At Peoria I spent a pleasant evening at the residence of Mrs. James Taylor, a lady of firm Freethought proclivities, in whose parlor stands a splendid marble bust of her friend, the peerless orator, R. G. Ingersoll; a statuet of Thomas Paine, and portraits of similar celebrities. Her twelve-year-old daughter is training in the path of Paganini, and givs most excellent promis as a player.

In Bloomington I was startled to learn that one of the most genial of men and uncompromising of Liberals, Robt. Munholland, had died by his own hand shortly after I saw him in July last. Domestic trouble is ascribed as the cause.

W. A. Gerken is a worthy upholder of the Freethought standard, and, were his business cares not so exacting, would be an activ worker for the American Secular Union.

Dr. Z. Waters is a leading physician and well-known Liberal with whom I had an agreeable visit. I wished to hav seen Mr. Howes, but time would not permit.

At Mr. Bean's, in Rock Island, I had the pleasure of refreshing my optics with a sight of THE TRUTH SEEKER and of meeting Mrs. Minchen, of Carroll, Ia., who, with her daughter, is spending the winter with "the old folks at home." I was ferried over the river to see H. G. Scharfenberg, who reads his TRUTH SEEKER with avidity, who always has been activ in Freethought propaganda, and who extends an invitation to the secretary to lecture in the new Turner Hall on its completion, which will be one of the finest buildings in the city when finished. Scharfenberg helps all the Liberal papers to get subscribers. E. A. STEVENS.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

SAVANNAH, Mo., Nov. 15th to 18th.—I would like to know why all the villages in Missouri hav a public square, around which cluster the stores, and why each county seat adorns its square with a wretched, unsightly brick structure, with a dirty "I'm-ashamed-of-myself" wooden steeple, and call the thing a court-house?

This vill——city (I expect to be assassinated for failing to designate all the little villages I stop at cities, but I confess ignorance of how many shanties are necessary to constitute a city; perhaps this humble confession of lack of discernment will save the outpouring of my gore)—this city, Savannah, is laid out with fine broad avenues for streets, with possibilities of greatness in the future; there are many very handsome, and some real nice, cosy, home-like residences. The best of her citizens are Liberals, which accounts for the thrift and progress of everything except the jail and court-house—places Christians alone are interested in. They had three devout Christians, who had been blessed with Sunday-school instruction, detained in the jail awaiting trial for murder.

The public school is a magnificent building, well attended and admirably conducted. A rich farming country on every side insures a bright business future. Wm. Cook, Jas. D. McKnight, Geo. N. Davis, and E. S. Follett, all prompt-paying subscribers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, take the lead in every good work. I delivered a course of four lectures here, with good attendance and interest. A little of energy and self-sacrifice and an efficient organization could be perfected that would be a power for good. There is abundance of material; it needs only persistence and self-sacrifice on the part of a few to start it. I distributed a large amount of Liberal literature and periodicals.

CHILLICOTHE, Mo., Nov. 20th and 21st.—By an accident, that right-royal Liberal Wm. McIlwrath failed to get notice of the lectures in the local paper, and much to my chagrin I had to lose Sunday, "taking my ease at mine inn." But bright and early on Monday morning friend McIlwrath and that sturdy veteran in the cause of progress, James Graham, completed arrangements for a lecture on Monday evening, resulting in good attendance, and I was much flattered at the general regret expressed after the lecture that I could not hav delivered the other two. Friend McIlwrath promptly paid me the sum agreed on for the three lectures. There is a wonderful difference between Liberals and Liberals. We need more of the McIlwrath and Graham kind.

BRUNSWICK, Mo., No. 22d and 24th.—Brother Wm. Tyler is an intelligent, whole-souled, outspoken Liberal, an earnest worker for THE TRUTH SEEKER, the friend of justice, and the unrelenting foe of superstition, cant, and hypocrisy. At Lancaster, N. Y. I once baptized two of his grandchildren into the Seventh-day Adventist church, and the old gentleman's greatest grief is that he has a daughter—so good a woman naturally, but so wretched a fanatic. With abundant wealth, everything to make home a paradise of love and joy for herself, her husband, and her children, she exiles her little ones, three beautiful girls, to Battle Creek, Mich. The poor children are deprived of a mother's love just when they most need it. The parents suffer in their bitter loneliness, their beautiful home is desolate, and the lives of father and mother one long cruel penance. All for Jesus, all for the hope of being united in heaven when Jesus comes! Oh! the untold misery, the bleeding hearts, the needless anguish, the self-inflicted torture, the ruin and blighted lives of children, this Christianity occasions.

Despite the prophecy of the saints, I had good attendance and an almost unanimous request to deliver another lecture on the 24th, which I did. A number were interested in organization, and will remit for annual memberships of the American Secular Union to Secretary E. A. Stevens, of Chicago, Ill.

SALISBURY, MO., Nov. 23d.—This is another hotbed of orthodoxy, but in process of evoluting. Prejudice bristles to the surface, and, prejudice being the natural offspring of ignorance, no wonder the more ignorant the Christian the more savagely hostil to anything that seems destructiv to his creed. It poured of rain, then turned to ice and sleet just at the time of the lecture. Yet I had quite a goodly number, and a very attentiv audience.

I had the pleasure to meet friend John Trueblood, a most zealous and outspoken worker for Liberalism; friend Stewart and his bright, talented young son, and the enterprising Loeb Brothers, the principal merchants of the place.

We need to cultivate a zeal according to knowledge; we must shun the intolerance of the sectarian that we deplore, and not feel hateful or impatient with those who fail to embrace the truth. Nor does it help our cause to attempt to force the subject upon people in season and out of season. No one has more contempt for the mollusk than myself. But I do not think it compatible with Liberal principles to attack people every time we meet them, or to break in on conversation on other subjects to force attention to our objections to Christianity. "Put yourself in his place." The exercise of a little common sense and a good deal of forbearance is essential to success in winning people from superstition and error.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

A Speech by Colonel Ingersoll.

Stuart Robson and William H. Crane, the well-known actors, were given a dinner by C. P. Palmer on the 21st ult., at which were gathered as eminent a company as New York can count. The speeches were all brilliant, but the best, of course, was by Colonel Ingersoll. General Sherman said he liked the stage, and had the best kind of an exemplar in General Washington. Chauncey M. Depew, in spite of his piety, likes the theater, and honors the good actors. The other speakers testified to the same effect, and Colonel Ingersoll said:

I believe in the medicin of mirth, and in what I might call the longevity of laughter. Every man who has caused real, true, honest mirth has been a benefactor of the human race. In a world like this, where there is so much trouble—a world gotten up on such a poor plan—where sometimes one is almost inclined to think that the deity, if there be one, played a practical joke—to find, I say, in such a world, something that for the moment allows laughter to triumph over sorrow, is a great piece of good fortune.

I like the stage, not only because General Sherman likes it (and I do not think that I was ever at a theater in my life but I saw him)—I not only like it because General Washington liked it, but because the greatest man that ever touched this grain of sand and tear we call the world wrote for the stage, and poured out a very Mississippi of philosophy and pathos and humor, and everything calculated to raise and ennoble mankind.

It givs me pleasure to see the stage honored, because actors are the ministers, the apostles, of the greatest man who ever lived, and because they put flesh and blood upon and passion within the greatest characters that the greatest man drew. This is the reason I like the stage. It makes us human. A rascal never gains applause—a hypocrit never commanded admiration, not even when he was acting a clergyman—except for the naturalness of the acting. No one has ever yet seen any play in which, in his heart, he did not applaud honesty, heroism, sincerity, fidelity, courage, and self-denial. No man ever heard a great play who did not get up a better, a wiser, and more humane man; and no man ever went to the theater and heard Robson and Crane, who did not go home better-natured, and treat his family that night a little better than on any other night when he had not heard the same actors.

I enjoy the stage, and I always did enjoy it. I love the humanity of it. I hate solemnity. It is the brother of stupidity. You never knew a solemn man who was not stupid, and you never will. There never was a man of true genius who had not the simplicity of a child and over whose lips has not rippled the river of laughter. Solemnity is a mask worn to hide stupidity. I like, I say, the stage for its wit and for its humor. I do not like sarcasm. I do not like mean humor. There is as much difference between humor and malicious wit as there is between a bee's honey and a bee's sting, and the reason I like Robson and Crane is that they hav the honey without the sting.

Another thing that makes me glad is, that I liv in an age and generation that has sense enough to appreciate the stage; sense enough to appreciate music; sense enough to appreciate everything that lightens the burdens of this life.

Only a few years ago our dear ancestors looked upon the theater as the vestibule of hell, and every actor was going the primrose road to the eternal bonfire. In those good old days our fathers, for the sake of relaxation, talked about death and graves and epitaphs, and worms and shrouds, and dust and hell. In those days they despised music, cared nothing for art, and yet I hav lived long to hear the world—that is to say, the civilized world—say that Shakspere wrote the greatest book that man has ever read. I hav lived long enough to see men like Beethoven and Wagner put side by side with the world's great and best.

We must remember that imagination makes the great difference between men; and I hav lived long enough to see actors placed with the grandest and noblest, side by side with the benefactors of the human race.

There is one thing in which I cannot quite agree. I do like tragedy, because tragedy is only the other side of the shield, and I like both sides. I love to spend an evening on the twilight boundary line between tears and smiles. There is nothing that pleases me better than some scene, some act, where the smile catches the tears in the eyes, and where the eyes are almost surprised by the smile, and the smile touched and softened by the tears. The greatest comedians and the greatest tragedians hav that power.

And, in conclusion, let me say, that it givs me more than pleasure to acknowledge the debt of gratitude I owe, not only to the stage, but to the actors whose health we drink to-night.

Great Men's Sons and Daughters.

New York Correspondence of the New York Mirror, December 3d.

It is the wish of almost every man to leave behind him a son—to carry on a business, to perpetuate a name, to inherit a fortune. And how many of 'em hav their wish? The faculty for getting and managing money is more apt to be transmitted than anything else. The Astors, Vanderbilts, and Goulds hav properly constructed sons, who follow in their fathers' tracks with feet big enough to fit them. But brains, unlike other qualities, do not seem to run in families. A notable example is being squirted round the country just now by Major Pond. If anything is unlike another thing, it's Charles Dickens fils to Charles Dickens pere. Without doubt, the elder Dickens was the most important man, in literature, that ever visited this land. A more inconsequential person than Charles Dickens the younger the Lord never made. He is absolutely nobody—merely the son of his father—and how he came to be that is a wonder.

I can't call to mind any celebrated poet who can say, "My father, the great verse-maker." Nor do I remember any great novelist whose spirit derives at present any great comfort from the proceedings of his son, save that of the elder Dumas. With actors it has been somewhat better. The Keans, the Kembles, the Mathews, and the Booths hav held dramatic ability with more equality, though the elders of all these names hav been the greater; so that I never take any interest in celebrated men's sons. It's no earthly consequence if they hav any, unless there's a vast fortune at stake.

The rare and radiant daughter is not so scarce an article as the satisfactory son. The finest children men of great intellects hav had hav been girls, and a very Romola of a maiden has Robert Ingersoll. He has two—Maud and Eva, both splendid women; but as one star differs from another in glory (according to the burial service), so Eva possesses a type of loveliness that dims the beauty of any handsome woman near her. That great lover of nature, grace, and beauty—her father—must look at Eva Ingersoll with very much the same feeling that Praxiteles contemplated his completed Venus of Cnidus—believing the world owed him the most perfect specimen of female beauty extant.

Eva Ingersoll is neither blonde nor brunet. She has a complexion that would be fair with the blondest hair; she has hair dark enough to set off the oliv skin of the most pronounced brunet; she has features as regular as those of a Greek statue, and all the intelligent expression that belongs to an entirely irregular style of face. She is so unconscious of her loveliness that she makes you wonder what the society belles, May, Marion, and Adele, would do if they had her charms, since they take on such airs with a tithe of her beauty. She is splendidly educated. Her father has been her teacher. She is tall, slight, and graceful. I looked at her the other night—not an ornament on her beautiful person. A plain dress of cream-white nun's veiling fell in unbustled folds behind. The material was crossed on her white bosom in front, showing her throat. Her hair was lifted over the small ears and gathered in a knot low in her neck. There was not the smallest affectation in the simplicity of her dress or her hair dressing. She was not posing in the classic statue business. She looked that which she is—the ideal sweet of perfect womanhood. There sits in the depths of her dark, soft eyes and on the curves of her smiling mouth a spirit that could in a moment of peril transform her into a heroin—a spirit of strength and endurance that would make her white arms a support and defense—a spirit of truth and changeless devotion that would light her noble face with a smile as she died for a creature she loved. Well, Robert Ingersoll has the finest girl in New York by his fireside to-day. If I belonged to his sex, I'd be found tuning my lyre in the columns of the newspapers and on his front-door steps morning, noon, and night. I would relate the anecdote of my affections early and late. I would win that woman if it lay in my power, for never before in my life did I meet a girl physically, mentally, and wholly so attractiv.

And that great certificate of a daughter's future, her mother, only intensified the opinion I had of her. Mrs. Robert Ingersoll is handsome and happy. Think of a woman twenty-odd years a wife filling that description! The prints hav from time to time told of the mighty iconoclast's home life. There the strongest credentials in favor of his creed and his character are the faces of his wife and his daughters.

For the Lord's sake get a picture of Jane Carlyle; go look at Mrs. Cotton Mather; catch onto the countenance of Miss Maria Milton, the "Paradise-Lost-" no-reward-offered daughter; see what you think of the face of Mrs. Bishop Biblebanger, and then study the photographs of that magnificent matron, Mrs. Robert Ingersoll, and her splendid daughters Maud and Eva. I don't believe they will exchange conditions—those daughters—in a hurry. Mr. Man who goes courting into the camp of Colonel Robert must be measured beside that intellectual Titan, and I would like to know where the man will come from who can stand that comparison. As Eva Ingersoll pales the ineffectual fires of rival beauties, so Robert, her father, dwarfs every man who anchors alongside.

Museums and Libraries in Great Britain.

The following is a list of the places now open to the people of Great Britain on Sundays:

National Museums and Galleries at Kew.
National Galleries at Hampton Court Palace.
National Exhibition at Greenwich Hospital.
National Gallery of Ireland, Dublin.
National Museum of Science and Art, Dublin.
Municipal Art Gallery and Museum, Birmingham.
Municipal Free Public Library, Birmingham.
Municipal Free Public Libraies (Seven), Manchester.
Municipal Free Public Library, Middlesborough.
Municipal Free Public Library, Newcastle-on-Tyne.
Municipal Free Public Library, Rochdale.
Municipal Free Public Library, St. Helens.
Municipal Museum, Stockport.
Municipal Free Public Library, Wigan.
Municipal Free Art, Gallery, Leek.
Municipal Collection of Models, Newcastle.

Repeated inquiries of the officials controling these institutions tend to show that they are largely used by the wage-earning classes, in whose interest the Sunday opening was determined upon. In most cases the proposal was strongly denounced when first made, but the results hav completely silenced all opposition. The Birmingham institutions hav been open since 1872, and the numbers visiting them hav increased steadily from 23,000 in that year to 109,000 in 1884, and to a much higher number since the opening of the New Art Gallery. The Manchester Free Libraries hav been open on Sunday since 1878, and readers hav increased from 125,000 in that year to 253,800 in 1886. Abundant evidence from many other places can be supplied to show that Sunday opening is highly appreciated wherever it is given a fair trial.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Society of Humanity had one of its pleasant literary and sociable entertainments on the evening of November 29th. As that was the anniversary of the birth of Wendell Phillips, the address by Edward King dealt with the great Abolitionist's life and services. Like all of his addresses, this one was able and instructiv, and those who hav heard Mr. King often, say that it was brilliant even for him. Piano music by Magnus Gross, Jr., and Miss Carrie Louis, followed the speech, and then a reception and dancing. Among the fifty or more present were Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., and Mrs. E. B. Foote, Mr. and Mrs. C. L. F. Bridge and two daughters, Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Lipton, Dr. F. S. Olcott, Dr. Eversfield, Mr. George Gross, Lawyer F. C. Leubuscher, Mrs. Wood and daughter, Mrs. Andrews and daughter, Mrs. Somerby, Miss Burnier, and Miss McCarthy; also, Messrs. Burnier, Roche, McIntyre, Dailey, Verrell, Montague, Korff, Thompson, Le Compte, Mrs. Johnson, Mrs. Herani, Misses Duganne, Knapp, Brodley, Lawrence, Seward, George, Groo, Gross, and Leubuscher. The number of attractiv young ladies present was noticed by all, and it was also numerously remarked that Mr. King addressed himself no less successfully to the hearts of those present at the reception than he had previously done to their understanding. Another conspicuous feature of the gathering was the general sociability among the guests, which made anything in the way of entertainment almost superfluous. It is the intention of the Society to hold one of these sociables every month. The parlors at 28 Lafayette Place are open and warmed daily. The nucleus of a library has been formed by a donation of books from the Truth Seeker Company, and Mr. Charles Eckhard may be found in attendance. You are invited to call.

Freedom of Debate.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: There was roaring fun at our house when we received The Truth Seeker of October 29th. Wife said: "It is just like you!" It would hav suited me better if Brother Heston had placed me nearer the "animal." I judge, however, by the looks of my brother-lecturers that I was near enough to hit it. It would hav been truer to nature and facts if our gifted artist had represented those brethren just vanishing in the dim distance.

Well, I enjoy it, cartoons and all. A little genial mirth enlivens serious controversy and injures no one.

I may as well contribute a little more fuel to keep the pot boiling.

We may as well pause in our attacks upon theology, and ask ourselvs whether we understand our own fundamental principles of Freethought.

It would hav been gratifying if you had replied to my article, and, by a course of logical reasoning, shown wherein I am wrong in my positions on the subject of debate. For twenty-eight years I hav been in public life, challenging the Christian world to meet us; and, if my Christian opponents indorsed their champion, I always felt that that settled the question of fitness. For me to refuse to meet anyone that the Christian community indorsed, would hav been considered by Christians as moral cowardice on my part, and I think they would hav been right.

I notice that you hav had a visit from my old and valued friend, W. W. Frasier, Ottawa, Kansas. What a stinging rebuke that was he gave Braden! But, had your policy been carried out, he would hav allowed the opportunity to pass. Mr. George Baldwin is another Freethinker who bearded Braden in his own meeting in Linesville, Pa. Braden has been trying for years to be able to say that Freethought lecturers, who challenge the clergy, dare not meet Clark Braden. If Freethinkers choose to allow him to come into their town and berate them, misrepresent, and vilify Infidels without accepting his challenge, they are at liberty to do so. But how does that accord with our claim for free debate? How does it harmonize with Ingersoll's claim that there are two or three men in every town who can corner the parson? And when this parson comes along, maintain a dead silence! You intimate that if Christians would read all that Freethinkers hav said against Braden, he could obtain no indorsement. You, away off in New York city, show by this that you do not know Christians and hav not come in contact with them as I hav—not in one or two towns, but in nearly every town.

You said: "Mr. Frazier knows Clark Braden well, having acted as best-man to Champion Jamieson in arranging a debate between them, out of which Braden crawled."

Now let me ask, Would my Freethought friends hav been proud of our position if I had done the crawling instead of Braden? We knew the man then as well as you know him now.

Underwood had six or seven debates with him. Seems to me, with his knowledge of zoology, he ought to hav found him out earlier in the campaign. Watts, I am informed, had two debates with him. If Braden is the kind of animal depicted by your artist, did it require two Jehovah Jacob "wrestling-matches" before Watts discovered the nature of the animal?

When a lecturer invites criticism, at the close of his public addresses, does he couple with the invitation that the critic must be a person of undoubted good character? These invitations often lead directly to public oral debate. Suppose, then, the lecturer objects to his character and the Christians of several denominations step forward and say: "We indorse our champion;" and still the lecturer refuses to meet him! I would call that trailing our Freethought banner in the dust and ashes of humiliation in the name of a pseudo respectability. Either let us quit challenging "the world, the flesh, and the devil," as we hav been doing for more than a generation, or stand by our guns. Ought we to allow Christian pole-cats to drive us from our position?

In all our battles with the Christian church she has never been able to make us retreat one inch. Our march has been resistlessly forward. But if your position is the true one, the church has at last discovered something more effectiv than "iron chariots" (which were too much for the Lord), more powerful (no pun) than General Joshua's ram's horns. Steadily we hav been driving the church before us. All the church slanders against the Freethought army hav utterly failed to stay its progress to victory. Christianity has employed every conceivable weapon, honorable and dishonorable, without avail. Our lines never wavered. We were driving her to the perdition she had prepared for the human family. She was at the very precipice of "fear, remorse, and despair," when, lo! almost by accident, she discovers one thing that makes nearly the entire army of Freethinkers halt in blank amazement! "Any shape but that!" No battering-ram did the church ever employ that was half as strong. (This is figurativ.) We hav witnessed the commotion. Look! That splendid Freethought army that hitherto defied the foe is now beating a retreat, "driven from sea to sea," by an innocent-looking little quadruped.

O my countrymen! it makes me sad. I am not afraid of death; but I do not like to die in that way.

My compliments to Watson Heston. I agree with him when he says that "the worth of the pelt will not pay for the skinning!" That is the trouble with some of you, my brethren. You hav engaged in the pelt business, and hav just awakened to the fact that such hides are not worth a dime a dozen. I hav gone for the life of the animal. The church is welcome to the pelt.

There is not a Freethinker in the land that does not know a few good, resounding whacks with that club would end the existence of the pestiferous curse. I hav never yet been able to get a second stroke (a second debate) at the animal in the same town. True, we may soil our Sunday suit; but if there is a soldier among us who is afraid of that, he should never hav "joined the army."

Dr. Lyman Beecher's excuse for not debating was that he once threw a hymn-book at one of the "critters"—gained a victory, but spoiled the book!

Brother Watts says, "It would be a degradation of the deepest dye to meet him [Braden] on a public platform."

I would hav been glad, indeed, if he had had the goodness to support such a statement with reasons. As it stands, it is neither better nor stronger than a clergyman's positiv assumptions—which we Freethinkers long ago rejected.

Did he not know who Braden was before he debated with him? If not, it confirms my position: that Freethought lecturers hav not been in the habit of raising the question of character. It has been the universal custom for our lecturers to throw out challenges to the Christian clergy indiscriminately, and if a Christian were put forward to champion Christianity, indorsed by even one denomination, that settled the question of fitness. Christians were the first to demand from Freethinkers an indorsement of the lecturer before they would "condescend" to debate with the "Infidel." Now that Christians pluck up courage enough to indorse a debater, why should Freethinkers shrink from meeting him? Is it purely a personal prejudice? I look beyond the person to the system he champions.

If Mr. Watts did know what kind of a man Clark Braden is before he debated with him, why should he offer Braden's bad character as a reason for not debating with him?

In either case, it is bad for him. If he did not know him, it shows he "rushed in where angels [or lecturers] fear to tread."

For many years the celebrated Investigator debates hav been in vogue in Boston. I never knew the Infidels there to demand a certificate of character from a Christian before he would be permitted to exercise the right of free speech. They did not even ask that he be indorsed by anybody.

The more my Liberal brethren hav written against debating with a bad Christian, the more clearly it is seen that they are obliged to adopt not only the foolish doctrin, but the very expressions of Christianity. As you quote him in your issue of October 8th, Mr. Watts says: "After reading them [the views of Braden's life] one cou d no longer doubt the reality of human depravity."

Very few Christians believe in total depravity. They believe just as Watts does. We are indebted to the Watts family for a large cargo of literature upon depravity.

D. M. Bennett, the grand old fearless Freethinker, said: "No matter how bad a man he [Joseph Cook] can make you believe me to be, it will not prove Christianity true;" and, further, that if all Cook had said of Bennett had been true it did not exonerate Cook from meeting Bennett in debate. Cook's reply was the same as yours: "No honorable man can keep company of this kind." D. M. Bennett was willing to meet a clergyman in debate whom he charged with being "a falsifier and maligner;" "defends perjury and the worst villainy."

Infidels are so thoroughly in favor of universal mental liberty that they would never deprive a slave nor a state-prison convict of free speech. The freedom of debate contains the very kernel of free speech. How can anyone maintain "universal mental liberty" and deny to any human being—the meanest, the worst—a free platform? Bad as we believe the Jehovah of the Jews to hav been, if real, even he admitted the right of Satan to enter heaven and express himself with entire freedom; and, seemingly, there was no fear that the good angels standing around would be contaminated by such "associations." It is not catching in some families.

It is true that Braden deals in wholesale vituperation of Infidels in general, and personal abuse of his opponent in particular. He imagins that the vials of holy wrath, scorn, contempt, that he pours out upon the head of his Infidel opponent—the slime of superstition—helps Christianity and hurts Infidelity. That he is sustained in this view by too many Christians is a lamentable fact. Braden expresses in public, in a harsh manner, what thousands of Christian fathers and mothers teach their children against Infidels. There is not a community that I ever visited, where Infidel families and their Infidel children are not traduced, abused, lied about, by Christian parents. I tell you it is the system itself that we must deal with. I hav often felt the same kind of pity, I suppose, for Christians (victims of the hate born of their religion) that my Christian neighbor feels for the lost souls of poor heathen.

I hav met Braden three times in debate. Eight nights in Paola, Kansas; twelve nights in Salem, Ill.; four in Linesville, Pa. I did not feel that I had been degraded, and supposed that if I conducted myself as a gentleman no opponent could degrade me.

When Mr. Watts says that Elder Braden is intellectually weak, I differ from him. I am aware that if one does not like an opponent he is very apt to underrate his ability. This is the fault of the Christian world generally. We ought to eschew that bad trait of the Christians. Some general has said that "it is not safe to underestimate the strength of the enemy."

I hav heard Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, and other distinguished preachers, and must say that Braden is as strong intellectually as any of them. I admit that this is a mere matter of opinion. But wherever Braden has lectured and debated Christians, with few exceptions, hav considered him a very learned man, possessing wonderful intellectual powers; and many of them assert that they believe he is the ablest debater Christianity ever had. This is the way, indeed, that the mass of Christians hav talked in every town he has visited, as far as I hav heard.

In Paola and Salem our debates were thronged scores could not gain entrance. It was thus for twelve nights in Salem. I consider it a grand opportunity to spread Freethought principles, and to undermine superstition. It may seem, sometimes, that I am very harsh myself toward persons when charging upon the church. I hav had some Infidels make this mistake, and take me to task for my severity. I never shot a Christian yet unless he got in range of my guns, trained on the detestable system. While striving to crush the life out of slavery, I had a tender heart always for the slave. Some of you now think I am altogether too kind to the slave.

It is not the question, whether Clark Braden's character is as good as D. M. Bennett's. Suppose both equally good or bad, what has that to do with the principles of free speech or free debate? But you say Clark Braden, in addition to being a "reprobate" (another pious expression), "has persistently, maliciously, and indefatigably slandered a family of Freethinkers, respected by every one who enjoys the slightest acquaintance with them."

This is the penalty we pay for being Freethinkers. Who has escaped?

You say no Christian church that knows Clark Braden will put him forward as a representativ. But it will. You are entirely mistaken. The fact is against you. There is no Freethought lecturer that can obtain a stronger indorsement by Freethinkers than Clank Braden can by Christians, and by Christians who hav read all that Freethinkers hav printed and circulated to his discredit. In my Salem debate Clark Braden was indorsed by six denominations. You say, "There are some things which even Christians refuse to do." You supposed they would refuse to indorse Braden as their representativ, if they knew him. But they do. I tell you, my good friends, there is nothing which Christians refuse to do, as a class, mind you, where their religion is involved.

I regret exceedingly that you hav raised the question of personal character. It is a serious mistake—just such a mistake as Abbot, Underwood, and Bundy made with reference to D. M. Bennett. It has been the main dependence of Christians in assailing Freethought. This was the line of attack upon Thomas Paine—his bad character, his personal habits. Instead of answering Paine's crushing arguments against the Christian system, they bedaubed him with accusations. They were not logical enough to perceive that if every charge had been true, it did not prove Christianity divine, and did not answer any of the damaging arguments which Paine brought against Christianity.

I want to see this question thoroughly discussed. If Mr. Watts wishes to take up my errors and logically dissect them, I am willing he should try, either through his own paper, or yours, or both. All I ask is a free press for reply. A man who is afraid to hav his errors exposed is afraid of truth. Merely saying that "gentlemen will not associate with blackguards," as you remarked, is no answer to my position on free debate. As Freethinkers we long ago declared that we would not deny even the devil himself the right of free speech. The church claims that Jesus Christ had a debate with him. Did that make the Christian's Christ an associate of that celebrated personage with a character as black as his complexion?

Even the great Bishop Watson debated with Paine, vile as Paine was believed to be by Christians. Were Watson and Paine "associates" because they disputed against each other?

Freethinkers hav contended that to deny a man the liberty of debate is to deny him the liberty of speech. So far as debating is concerned, you would impose silence upon Clark Braden for bad conduct. Joseph Cook and Comstock would hav done precisely the same thing with Bennett, and for precisely the same reason.

O Liberty! thou sphinx of the ages! even thy best friends do not comprehend thee. Thou true savior of the race! twin of truth! grander, more glorious, than any god art thou—mightier than any monarch of the skies. For love of thee multitudes of nature's noble men and true-hearted women hav perished. Art thou, after all the struggle to know thee, but a figment of the imagination of man? Is there no reality? Banish thee, arrayed in the glittering splendor of truth, and life and death are all one, and human love itself mockery. Inclosed in thy warm embrace oblivion itself is sunshine sweet, rather than the unending years of immortality without thee, priceless friend of humanity! W. F. JAMIESON.

Religious Delusions.

THEIR STULTIFYING AND DESTRUCTIV POWER, ILLUSTRATED IN THE HISTORY OF THE ECONOMITE SOCIETY, LOCATED ON THE RIGHT BANK OF THE OHIO RIVER, AND TWENTY MILES BELOW PITTSBURGH.

III.

If it should be asked how it came about that the Economites, believing as they did in the Second Advent, and expecting every night when they said their prayers and went to bed that they might be awakened before morning by the clangor of the archangel's trump, did not fold their arms in idleness and put on their ascension robes, as the Millerites did, but worked steadily every day at their vocation of farming and manufacturing, amassing wealth with such wonderful success that their treasury overflowed with gold, I answer: Miller and his followers believed and expected Christ to make his appearance here in the United States. Rapp, on the contrary, being a Millenarian, and not only a Second Adventist, believed that Jerusalem, in Palestine, a country lying on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, was the appointed place; and that, while every human being on the earth would receive notification of Christ's arrival in some miraculous way, the actual appearing would take place in the city where he was crucified, and which was to be for a thousand years the metropolitan city of the new kingdom. The Economites were eminently practical men, and believed firmly in the doctrin of dollars and cents. They knew by experience that it cost money for them to migrate, first, from Germany, then from Pennsylvania to the Wabash, and from that place back again to Pennsylvania. Rapp did not believe in unnecessary miracles; that he and his people would cross the ocean and be landed in Jerusalem by miraculously contrived balloons that could go without gas, but that they must travel by steamboats on the sea, and by wagons of some kind on the land, till they reached the sacred spot. All this would require the outlay of vast sums of money, and these honest and sincere believers worked hard and saved closely to accumulate what was requisit. The Economites keep their own secrets; but after the death of Rapp and time forced upon his survivors the conviction that their departed leader had somehow or other made a mistake in his calculations as to the exact time of Christ's appearing, a report was in circulation, and seemed to be well founded, that large sums of gold and silver, which had been accumulating for years, were transferred from Economy to one of the banks in Pittsburgh for safe keeping, till such times as they should be needed.

THE ADOPTION OF CELIBACY AS A RULE OF LIFE.

It was this religious delusion concerning the coming of Christ that was destined to extirpate the Economites from the face of the earth as a community of prosperous and happy people, and to scatter their wealth we know not where. Not taught wisdom, or even common sense, by the disappointment of the primitiv Christians, nor by the second great failure of Christ to appear eight hundred years ago, when three centuries of abortiv war to rescue Jerusalem from the Turk piled up their proofs mountain high that it was a delusion, these Economites so cherished their Millenarian views and expectations that, reasoning precisely as the Christian apostles did, they came to the conclusion that marriage, with its consequences of the birth and bringing up of families of children, was all wrong, and they became celibates. Of course, they had scripture authority for this policy; for all the scores of antagonistic sects now composing the visible church go to the Bible for their discordant creeds and modes of worship, and find them there. Good morals and bad morals, truth and falsehood, all find countenance in that volume.

But love, that holy sentiment which binds the hearts of husbands and wives together in the bonds of a true marriage, and yields infinit delight to parents, in the birth, training, well-doing, and companionship of properly organized children, revenges itself sooner or later on all those who under any pretense, or in any way whatever, put dishonor upon it; and the day that religion, in its reckless cruelty and utter indifference to human happiness, tore asunder the loving hearts of these German husbands and wives, was the time when their doom of ultimate extinction was sealed.

There is a large class of persons in this world who are abundantly able to work in the various vocations of life, but who, from some defect in their mental organization, do not plan and work wisely. The consequence is that even in the prime of life they are poor, and of course hav accumulated no means of comfortable living in old age, and ultimately fall victims to that relentless law which nature has enacted for the perfection of her species, the struggle for life, and the survival of those only which conform to their environments. There is another class in whom the property instinct works normally and well, and they accumulate much more than they need. In a community whose interests are managed by competent men, the labor of this class of incompetents, if directed by superior business ability, is sure to provide for them during life all the substantial comforts which wealth can procure. But will these incompetents be willing, in consideration of their participating in the general prosperity and abundance of a community, to be subordinated to those who are superior to them in business intelligence and plan? And if so, what about their wives and children?

On this account I feel the more vexed at this blunder of the Economites, and the more indignant at religion for causing it, because they had it in their power, by continuing marriage and the family relation, to settle the question whether a community, based upon the principle of the natural institution of marriage, could permanently prosper from one generation to another, or whether celibacy, by preventing the ambition and rivalry of separate family interests, is not a sine qua non to success. The experiment made by the Shakers, as well as that of the Economites, proves that a community, with a single view and interest, and by working into each other's hands, can succeed, with a moderate amount of labor, in accumulating vast wealth, and in gathering around them all the comforts that wealth can purchase. But is not this condition of things limited to a single lifetime? That is the question. It is worth noticing that Shaker celibacy, and Economite celibacy, stand on two different foundations. The Shakers believe, and practice accordingly, that love, in its conjugal manifestation, is wrong, at least for them, and that celibacy is right, since Jesus, the model man, and Mother Ann, the model woman, during the latter part of her life, when she responded to her high calling, were both celibates. But the Economites, before they were hallucinated by the expectation of Christ's second coming, were married people. And they only gave up marriage because, with its obvious consequences, it altogether interfered with their character as Christians, waiting daily and hourly for the appearance of their Lord in the clouds of heaven. They knew by experience what a care and hindrance to their movements helpless children and their nursing mothers were, and they consistently thought that the end of the world being so near, and a march of five thousand miles to Jerusalem being in prospect, it was no time to marry and giv in marriage. If the success of communal life for more than a century of time depends, by necessity, on the extinction of the family institution, we might as well giv up the theory as impracticable and Utopian; for, rich as the Shaker communities and the Economites are, experience proves that they cannot depend upon the world's people coming in and filling up their ranks as they are thinned by death. There are thousands of people now in this country who are struggling, like drowning men, to make a mere living. But Nature, bent upon her purposes which reach into the far distant future, will not let one of them accept a joint partnership with the Shakers or Economites in the vast wealth they possess, upon the condition that they crucify the sentiment of conjugal love, and count it an unholy thing. Hence these institutions are gradually being disintegrated by time, and their great wealth cannot save them from being utterly wiped off the face of the earth.

Many people in Western Pennsylvania are now speculating as to what disposition will be made of the large possessions of the Economites when the last one of them givs up the ghost. Jacob Henrici, who now occupies the place of Father Rapp as head of the community, and who, for the sterling virtues of his character, is loved and admired by all who know him, is above eighty years of age. Unless he has the indomitable faith of his great leader, which bade defiance to death itself, he must at least hav some suspicion, when he notices the trembling footsteps of the little handful of old men and women to whom he preaches every Sunday, whether the Economites, like the early Christians, the later Crusaders, and the recent Millerites, hav not been victimized by a strong religious delusion. ## The Gospel According to Common Sense.

ABRAHAM'S SACRIFICE.

The Euthyphron of Plato furnishes a good type of the modern Christian, for he attaches more importance to the performance of what he considers his religious duties than to the common claims of justice and humanity. These duties he describes as "prayer and sacrifice"—the first asking favors of the gods, the second offering something to them in return. Socrates adroitly infers from this admission that "religion is the art by which the gods and man traffic with one another." Such is undoubtedly the character of modern Christianity, only in the present day the sacrifice, which used to be in the form of something edible, prepared for roasting, is commuted, like the English tithe, by a payment in money for the benefit of the officiating priest. He is no longer, as with the Mosaic Jews, compelled to act as butcher and cook for the whole community, contenting himself with a choice of the prime cuts for the consumption of himself and family. In the time of Abraham human sacrifices seem to hav been common, from which we may infer that his contemporaries were, for the most part, cannibals, for the sacrificial victim was not, as some suppose, consumed by fire, but simply roasted and eaten. It also appears to hav been the custom for the head of every family to contribute one, at least, of his offspring as a burnt-offering for the benefit of his neighbors. Custom is the God of all weak-minded people, and causes them to do, at times, the most absurd and cruel things. This must hav been the God that told Abraham to sacrifice his son, and, although it went sorely against the grain, he appears, at first sight, to hav been quite willing to do it. But common sense ultimately prevailed, and, seeing a ram opportunely "caught in a thicket," he concluded that mutton was a much more desirable food than human flesh, in which decision we cordially agree with the "father of the faithful."

Whoever invented the God of the Old Testament was not very careful to preserve the unities, for a more inconsistent character it is scarcely possible to conceive. He first of all commands Abraham to commit an unnatural crime, them excuses him from doing it, and finally rewards him for being willing to do that which he did not do. He moves David to number Israel, and then punishes Israel for being numbered. Another account tells us it was the devil who influenced David, by which it appears that the God and devil of the Jews were one and the same being! This dual character is religiously preserved to the present day, and his good and bad attributes are so jumbled together that it is impossible for a thinking man to reconcile them, or to tell which is which.

Whether or not Isaac was really the son of Abraham, it is not our present purpose to inquire. The story of his birth is a very improbable one, and must be classed with another miraculous birth recorded in the New Testament. Faith, and not reason, is required in these matters, and Abraham had great faith. So long as he was satisfied, we hav no right to cavil at his credulity. We must giv him great credit for the moral courage which enabled him to break through an unnatural and tyrannical custom. In this respect he is even worthy of our imitation. If our fathers did absurd and cruel things—if our neighbors still do and believe in them—there is no reason that we should follow a bad example. Christianity is a euphemism for cannibalism. God the father gave his only-begotten son as a sacrifice, and we are invited to the revolting feast. The Anglican priest, when he administers the sacrament, gravely tells us that it consists of the body and blood of Jesus Christ who died for us. If he believes this, he is a fool; if he does not believe it, he is an impostor. In either case the figure is none the less absurd and disgusting. What shall be said of those who devoutly swallow it? The intention is, evidently, cannibalistic, whatever the act may be. We do not read that Abraham passed off his mutton for human flesh to those whom he invited to the feast. Common sense, for once, prevailed over fanaticism, and the descendants of Abraham down to present day hav (with some exceptions) ceased to be cannibals.

This was a great advantage to the Jews as long as other nations persisted in the practice. When they ceased to devour their offspring, they increased and multiplied exceedingly. When Jesus spoke of reviving the practice and offered himself as a subject, it went against the stomachs of some of his disciples, who thenceforward walked no more with him. The unbelieving Jews killed him, it is true, but they did not eat him. They left that savory morsel for the Christians. OUTIS.

ARTHUR C. EVERETT has again begun the publication of a small Freethought journal. This time he is located at Grand Rapids, Mich. Mr. Everett thus early in the campaign hoists his presidential ticket—R. G. Ingersoll and Helen H. Gardener. He calls his paper Common Sense, and agrees to mail it a year for $1.

Chronology.

No doubt all our readers remember the controversy over the Era of Science or Era of Man calendar between Messrs. Frederick Koezly, of this city, and G. N. Hill, of Boston, which has now extended over a period of many months, and which was finally left for decision to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. As we were to profit by the dispute, we preferred to hav the decision written by a friend of all parties, an astronomer of note, whose work has necessarily made him familiar with chronological reckoning, and we asked Mr. Henry M. Parkhurst to take the judicial seat. His decision was "handed down" some weeks ago, but owing to circumstances not necessary to mention here we delayed the publication until now, when we hav Messrs. Koezly's and Hill's proposition in plain and specific form. Mr. Parkhurst says:

"The debate which has arisen in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, relativ to the epoch from which the Science Calendar begins, does not affect the numbering of the year, but wholly refers to the question whether that numbering dates from the 1st of January preceding or the 1st of January following the event commemorated. A resolution was offered by Mr. George N. Hill, at a Paine celebration in Boston, in 1882, reading as following:

"Resolved, That in everlasting commemoration of that rise of science and Freethought—the two best friends humanity has ever had—which began during the sixteenth century of the superstitious 'Year of our Lord,' and in perpetual honor, also, of the heroism of that glorious teacher of reason, and noble martyr for science and man, Giordano Bruno, of Italy—so inhumanly burnt at the stake by the Christians, at Rome, on the 16th day of February, 1600, for proclaiming scientific facts—therefore, in future, all records, and other official documents of the Investigator Freethought Society of Boston, Mass., shall bear date from a calendar, beginning on the 1st day of January, A.D. 1600, thereby placing our society, and all persons also adopting it, entirely out of the bedeviling fog of the age of Bible faith, with its 'Year of Grace, 1882,' and into the humane light of the 'Age of Reason' and Year of Science, 282."

"This was based upon the principle stated by Mr. Hill in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 15th, that 'Calendar figures mean completed years, mathematically speaking.' If that is true, the resolution is correct as it stands.

"But Mr. Frederick Koezly claims that the first year is called year 1; the second year, year 2, and so on; which, if the first year, or year 1, were 1600, would make the preseat year 288. If he is right in that statement, the resolution is wrong, and the new calendar should be stated as beginning on the 1st day of January, A.D. 1601.

"It is not so easy as it appears to settle this issue, although so sharply defined. The definition in Webster's Dictionary says that the epoch is the point of time from which succeeding years are numbered; but this does not show how they are numbered, and I hav found many authorities equally ambiguous.

"When we say that the sun rose 1887, October 23, 6h. 19m. A.M., the 19 minutes are completed minutes, mathematically speaking; the 6 hours are completed hours; but the 23 means the 23d day, not completed; October means the uncompleted month of October. Whether the year follows the analogy of the month and day, or of the hour and minute, in any event there is a break in the mode of representation. Astronomers, as well as others, use that inconsistent mode of expression. But to make the year follow the analogy of the hour would make two breaks, while the other interpretation requires but one. I hav found three independent proofs that the best authorities make but one break, and regard the year as uncompleted.

"In the Encylopedia Britannica, article 'Chronology,' page 621, we find that the Era of Diocletian 'commences with the 29th of August (the first day of the Egyptian year) of the year 284 of our era.' On the following page we find this statement: 'Hence, to reduce a date according to this era to our own reckoning, it is necessary to add 283 years and 240 days.' I omit the statement as to a discrepancy of one day on account of leap years. Now, taking the year 1 of this era, and adding 283 years and 240 days, it givs the year A.D. 284, August, showing by this brief calculation that they commenced with the year 1, and not with the year 0; or, in other words, that year 1 was the uncompleted year. If there is any more direct proof in that article, I hav overlooked it.

"Next, turning to the 'American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac' of this year, the highest astronomical authority in this country if not in the world, we find on page vii, at the beginning, the statement that the year 1887 corresponds to the year 6600 of the Julian period. The 'British Nautical Almanac' makes the same statement, but there is nothing in the 'British Almanac' to show when the Julian period begins; whereas our 'Ephemeris' adds, on the same page, that 'the 1st day of January of the year 1887 is the 2,410,273d day since the commencement of the Julian period.' This corresponds to 6599 Julian years, of 365 days and 6 hours, with a difference of 12 days which it is unnecessary here to explain. This proves, therefore, that as soon as 6599 years had been completed, the new year was to be called 6600, an uncompleted year, making the first year of the Julian period year 1.

"Turning again to the Encyclopedia Britannica, article 'Calendar' (written by a different author from the writer of the article Chronology), we find the plain and direct statement, requiring no calculation, in table 12, that the 'Christian date of commencement' of the 'vulgar Christian era' is '1 Jan., 1 A.D.'

"All these authorities agree, proving conclusivly that calendar figures do not mean completed years, mathematically speaking, but uncompleted years, and that for that reason the resolution above quoted contains an error in stating that the new calendar begins on the 1st day of January, A.D., 1600, but should hav stated that it begins on the 1st day of January, 1601. HENRY M. PARKHURST."

It will be seen by this that Mr. Koezly's $25 must be returned to him, while Mr. Hill's share of Paine Hall stock is at our disposal.

We believe that there is only one paper dating from the "era of man" which recognizes the chronological difficulty which Mr. Hill got into, and obviates it in the manner indicated by Mr. Parkhurst. Harman and Walker's Lucifer makes the current year 287 by dating "from the first of January, 1601." This is in accordance with the accepted reckoning of chronologists, and the era begins only a few months after the martyrdom of Bruno, instead of a few days before, as Mr. Hill's resolution does.

We trust no feelings inimical to good fellowship and brotherly love will be born of this controversy and decision; but personally we feel safe. To reach our sanctum, gore-seeking gentlemen must run the gantlet of many stalwart clerks and printers. Peaceful visitors, however, find the road a pathway of roses.

Free Speech and Free Prisons.

The prosecution of John Most, the Communist-Anarchist, as he calls himself, which was concluded in this city last week, was a peculiar affair, and not altogether creditable to either party concerned. The prosecution was a sensation undertaken by a daily paper which could command the aid of an assistant public prosecutor. It was begun for notoriety, and because the paper had good reasons to suppose that the public, since the Chicago tragedy, is ready for anything in the shape of injustice toward so-called Anarchists. Most was selected because he has been in prison for a similar offense, and it was thought his previous unjust conviction could be easily repeated. Our courts lately hav been under the thumbs of the down-town editors, and into their war over their circulation and in scheming for power they hav indirectly dragged politicians high and low. When, therefore, the World undertook to convict Most the Herald spoke up for liberty of speech. The Sun began to report the circumstances of Most's arrest, his appearance, and his aims in a way favorable for him. Most denied the report of the World, the other papers sneered at it, and as a result Most had a fair trial, so far as the court could command one, but he was convicted because of the prejudice of the jury for his Anarchistic principles. We think, however, that the court erred in admitting in evidence a book written by Most a long time ago, and withdrawn from circulation four years since, for he was being tried for what he said, not for what he thinks or has written, but as the case will probably be appealed that question will be decided hereafter.

The indictment of Most was found under sections 451 and 675 of the penal code. Section 451 is headed "Unlawful assemblies," and reads as follows:

"Whenever three or more persons assemble with intent to commit any unlawful act by force, or assemble with intent to carry out any purpose in such a manner as to disturb the public peace, or, being assembled, attempt or threaten any act tending toward a breach of the peace or an injury to persons or property, or any unlawful act, such an assembly is unlawful, and every person participating therein by his presence, aid, or instigation is guilty of a misdemeanor."

Section 675, which is headed "Acts not expressly forbidden," reads:

"A person who wilfully and wrongfully commits an act which seriously injures the person or property of another, or which seriously disturbs or endangers the public peace or health, or which openly outrages public decency, for which no other punishment is expressly prescribed by this code, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

The punishment for a misdemeanor is one year's imprisonment in a penitentiary and a fine of $250.

The following are the words alleged by the World to hav been spoken by Most at a regular meeting of the Anarchists on the Saturday night following the execution of the Chicago Anarchists:

"FELLOW-SLAVES: The services over the death or our comrades, which were to hav been held to-night, were stopped by the police hounds. Oh, beware, you scoundrels! Your time will come. Hereafter our calls for meeting will be given in secret. The hirelings of the capitalistic press and the dogs of the police shall no longer attend our meetings. God help them if they are found in our secret councils! Hitherto we expressed our meaning openly and gave our enemies a chance. They shall hereafter hear and see nothing until the day of reckoning comes. That day is not far distant. It is drawing nearer and nearer. What care we for their soldiers and police? Our weapon is a hundredfold worse than theirs.

"Let Grinnell beware. He is the principal culprit who is guilty of murdering our brothers. Grinnell comes first. After him comes Gary. Then the Supreme Court judges. After them come the highest murderers in the land, the United States Supreme Court judges. Last, but not least, is the most cowardly murderer of them all, the governor of Illinois. I would giv ten years of my life to know the executioner. I would never rest until I strangled him as he strangled our brothers. I am willing to die for the cause if it be necessary. It is an honor to die if it benefits the working classes.

"The murder of our brothers will cry to heaven for vengeance. Had it happened in Russia it would hav caused a rebellion. Shame on the people of this nineteenth century to consent that these men should be hanged! Shame on them, I repeat! But the time will come when they will regret it and avenge our brothers' deaths. 'You hav murdered our benefactors,' they will say, 'and you must meet the same fate.'

"Death to the butchers! Anarchy will liv forever. They sought to stop it in Paris in 1871, but they killed thirty thousand men and women and Anarchy still remains. So it will be here. For every Anarchist they kill there will be recruits by the hundreds. The police fear us, but we do not fear them."

The witnesses against Most were a reporter who wrote the speech out from memory after leaving the hall, and two policemen who attended the meeting in citizens' clothes. The witnesses for Most were eleven of his friends who were at the meeting, and himself. One side or the other committed rank perjury, for Most and his friends swore that he said nothing of the sort attributed to him. The jury believed the reporter and the policemen, though, in his charge to the jury, Judge Cowing said that in the speech as Most repeated it there was nothing that came within the law. Great stress was laid by the prosecution upon the fact that Most is an Atheist, and the prosecutor also drew from Most's witnesses that they believed in a "philosophical God," but not in the Christian deity.

The verdict of the jury was unexpected by the public, and the judge seemed surprised. The defense said it was evident that the dragging before the jury of the career of Most, who has been in prison in Austria, Germany, England, and the United States for political harangs, was really the evidence upon which he was convicted. But somehow we fancy that the jury went further behind the returns than that, and convicted Most as the readiest means of expressing their opinions that the wild-looking, unnaturalized revolutionists should be given to understand that they had better shut up and and let the government get along as it is at present constituted. The verdict is, therefore, a practical suppression of free speech of a certain kind.

It is true, this free speech is of a very undesirable kind, for it is foolish on the surface, impracticable of execution, and unphilosophical in its last analysis. But we prefer to the method of this jury the method recommended by Judge Cowing, who said that "the best way to combat these new theories is to be just and fair toward them." And it does not make any difference in the principle at stake whose free speech is suppressed—whether it is the bluster of the Anarchist, the advocacy of Socialism, the propagandism of the Communist, the philosophy of the Atheist, or the exhortation of the Christian. If one sort can be suppressed, so can another. If the police hav the power they will find the motiv, and no one can say where it will stop, but every one who knows history knows that it will go further than the legislators who passed the law intended. It is dangerous to put the liberty of the people into the power of the police, or into the hands of a judge, or even into the discretion of a jury. Acts alone should be amenable to law. The Anarchist "demons," if there be any, should be treated before the law like drunkards—held responsible for the acts done by them drunk or sober. If an Anarchist gets mentally drunk on the wild harangs of his favorit orator, and commits a misdemeanor or felony, let him be punished—he deserves it. But it is not wise, it is not statesmanlike, it is not just, to punish a man for merely making a fool of himself before a crowd. It was remarked at the trial that had Most made his speech before the men composing the Chamber of Commerce, nothing would hav been thought of it. Supposing every Southern orator and every Northern Copperhead who ever fired the hearts of the people to defend the Southern Confederacy had been sought out after the war and jailed. This country would hav been a battlefield from the Canada line to the Mexico boundary. There is a wisdom in politics wider than the ideas of New York's puffed-up police, the ambitions of a disappointed office-seeker, or the schemes of a newspaper.

The prosecution, however, bids fair to do good through injustice. It will hav a tendency to make the impracticable snarlers of the east side behave themselvs. It will force a little common sense into their thickly-thatched heads. To dispute that the laboring people of this city and other cities hav grievances to be redressed, wrongs to be righted, would be to show unfamiliarity with current events. Great and grievous wrongs hav been perpetrated by legislation in the interest of concentrated wealth. But the wild harangs of such men as Most will never right them. As well attempt to destroy Gibraltar by exploding a fire-cracker at the base. It needs well-directed and common-sense efforts to achieve a purpose so vast. It will never be done by meeting in a beer saloon and hallooing against government. Henry George, in spite of the black eye given him last election, has done great good by setting the people to thinking in one direction; the Progressive Labor party by setting them to thinking in another. We never knew of any thinking being done by Most's followers. He does it all for them, and it is the daft leading the foolish. Nevertheless, they hav their rights, and beyond them is the magnificent principle of free speech—not their free speech particularly, not the Christian's nor Atheist's free speech, not the Republican's nor Democrat's free speech, but everybody's free speech—the right of all to say what they think, subject to the law when consequences follow license.

Editorial Notes.

WITH the close of the year, T. B. Wakeman, late candidate for attorney-general of the Progressive Labor party, resigns as associate-editor of the Freethinkers' Magazine.

REVIVALIST PENTECOST, now holding forth in Augusta, Me., is charged by a Unitarian clergyman, of that city, with measuring his professional services by the measure of money only. The Unitarian brother found out that Mr. Pentecost received from the Cleveland churches $928.46 for six weeks' work, and he spread the news around. Mr. Pentecost says the Unitarian is a busybody who had better attend to his own affairs.

THE Richmond, Va., State says: "Anthony Comstock, the high-priest of prudery, is now on one of his periodic crusades against undressed art in New York. The Herald has reminded him of his own natural weakness—a nude crown. But Anthony still prances about with his naked head, all the same. It is expected that he will next raid the barber-shops, where the practice of baring men's faces is carried on. It is believed that this philosopher's delicate taste shrinks even from roast fowl, because it has no feathers on it."

"THE United States," says Saladin's Secular Review, "are certainly not behind England in the talent and energy they hav thrown into the anti-Christian revolt. Three American lecturers we delight to bring under the notice of our readers—Ingersoll, Remsburg, and Washburn. Our former col. league, Charles Watts, works away valiantly in Canada. May his work prosper in his hands. S. P. Putnam is a man of ardent temperament and irrepressible energy; but there is no man on the Western continent doing grander service than Eugene M. Macdonald of THE TRUTH SEEKER."

THIS week closes the highly instructiv series of papers by Prof. Felix L. Oswald. The series will shortly be published in book form, in which shape we trust they will be possessed and studied by all Liberals. Professor Oswald is preëminently a teacher for this world, a clear-seeing guide to secular happiness. He knows also the reasons which hav kept and still keep the race in an imperfect condition—un developed, ignorant, and animal in instinct. These reasons may be summed up in one word—superstition: the superstition of Christianity as well as of paganism, of to-day as well as of the past. Professor Oswald's Bible of Nature is designed to lead us out of that slough and place us on the firm ground of this earth, where by generosity, physical and mental culture, and unselfish and broad education we can make conditions which shall produce a more perfect race of human beings, healthy in body, strong in mind, and enjoying a life which but few now-a-days consider worth the living. When people devote themselvs as enthusiastically to seeking happiness as they do now to seeking heaven, the world will be better and justice less an empty word. Professor Oswald has patiently pointed out the causes of our misery, indicated how they may be removed, and opened the entrance to the paths of progress and prosperity.

BISHOP CLEARY, of Kingston, Ont., has stirred up the Province by an attack upon the morality of its girls and women who are educated in the public schools. The Napanee Beaver says:

"He referred in the most scathing terms to the rudeness and immodesty of Canadian girls and women, and compared them (the ladies of this province) very unfavorably with those of the Old World. This he attributed to defects in our public school system, in which the morals of the young, and especially of females, are entirely neglected."

The bishop now denies having said this, but the preponderance of evidence is against him, and he must bear the odium of his outrageous attack upon the females of his country, which was actuated by his hostility to the public schools.

WE print the following letter that Mr. Walthall may voice the sentiment of several others:

"PARIS, ILL., Nov. 29, 1887.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: MY TRUTH SEEKER of October 19th was strangely disfigured by advertisments of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL and the 'Story Hour,' where they should not hav been. I hav waited thus far to get an explanation, an apology, or a dime to buy a clean copy, neither of which has come to hand. I like the ANNUAL, and will hav one; I also like the 'Story Hour,' but don't want them pasted over Oswald's articles or any one's. But there they are, as thick as the orthodox skull, and as black as a printer's devil. Now, what do you purpose to do about it? Yours for a clean, unmutilated TRUTH SEEKER,

"J. H. WALTHALL."

By this time Mr. Walthall has probably read the "Short Story of an Advertisment," and rejoiced with us that a bright and promising young life was saved by the black but important information conveyed in the picturesque columns of which he complains. Had he been in the Editor's sanctum and heard the cowboy softly singing that hymn about a world fairer than this, he would hav voted to cover up the whole paper with appeals to purchase the ANNUAL and "Story Hour." We solemnly assure Mr. Walthall that there are no copies of that issue without the advertisments.

CATHOLICS and Protestants conceive it to be the duty of each sect to convert the other. Both being followers of the meek and lowly Jesus, giving the coat when the cloak is taken, going two miles when asked to go one, and turning the other cheek when one is smitten, the religious discussions between them are always marked with courtesy, fairness, gentleness, and forbearance. The following dispatch from Biddeford, Maine, to a daily paper of this city illustrates this beautiful spirit of Christianity as fully as can be desired:

"The Rev. Justin D. Fulton, of Brooklyn, who delivered a series of lectures against Romanism here last week, and who created such excitement among the Catholics that the hall was stoned and the lecturer chased by a mob, returned to-night by invitation of the Protestant clergymen of Biddeford and Saco, and will begin another series of lectures on the same subject to-morrow evening. In his pulpit yesterday the Rev. Theodore Gerrish, pastor of the Methodist church, accused Mayor Parcher not only of refusing protection to the meeting, but of declaring that personally he would like to hire a man to kick Dr. Fulton out of town."

Further but more emphatic instances of brotherly love and charity between the religious brethren could be found in ancient, medieval, and modern history, but we can scarcely deem it necessary that they should be adduced here.

MR. JAMIESON wanders a good way from his subject in his contention for the blessed privilege of debating with Clark Braden. His apostrophe to Liberty is pretty enough, but he forgets one thing—that the liberty to not debate with Mr. Braden is just as precious as the other sort. To say that refusal to debate with Braden is denying him liberty of speech is—will Mr. Jamieson forgiv us?—the sheerest nonsense. Mr. Jamieson has the liberty to debate or not debate; Clark Braden has the liberty to hire as many halls as he or his friends can pay for; and we hav the liberty to entertain and express our opinion of the whole matter. Let us hav liberty all around, as well as liberty for Braden to vilify Freethinkers. If there is any fundamental principle of Freethought which demands that we shall associate with, or speak to or recognize specimens of totally depraved humanity simply because they are Christians who want to gain notoriety at the expense of our self-respect, then we havn't found and do not want to find it. A Christian has the right to refuse to debate with a Freethinker; of his reasons each must judge for himself. Cook had the right to refuse to meet Mr. Bennett; his infamy consisted in slandering Mr. Bennett's character. Mr. Jamieson has not yet attempted to prove that we hav slandered Braden's. And if Mr. Jamieson chooses to bear slanders and then shake hands with his slanderer, he can hav the privilege, of course. The question of free speech is not in the least involved.

WE must this week pay to one who was almost an inmate of THE TRUTH SEEKER home the last office left to grief. William W. Warner, of this city, who died under peculiarly sad circumstances on the 26th ult., was our friend, and a Freethinker whose work was none the less valuable that it was performed unostentatiously. He was in young manhood's prime, which makes his sudden death the more grievous to his friends. The daily papers hav reported his demise all wrong, owing to unscrupulous maliciousness on the part of the gentlemen who gather news for their columns. Mr. Warner was an intimate friend of many in this office, and consequently a frequent caller. He made his last visit on Friday afternoon, November 25th. He left about six o'clock and went directly to his hotel, where he met and conversed with friends until late at night, when he went to his room. Not appearing the next day, the landlord entered his room and found that death had intervened. A physician gave the cause as congestion of the brain, incited by a congestiv chill, to which Mr. Warner was occasionally subject. The surmises of suicide or foul play by the reporters were pure invention and wholly unfounded, and hav been the cause of much grief and indignation to his friends. Mr. Warner was buried at Tarrytown, by the side of his wife. He leaves a daughter of seven years of age, residing with his father, Judge Warner, of Waverly. He was thirty-four years old, and had been a practicing lawyer for several years. It was owing to his extensiv knowledge of law that we were able, last year, to giv the Liberals the valuable compilation of Sunday and blasphemy legislation in our ANNUAL. He was religiously educated, but early reasoned himself out of the church. He was a clear thinker, a shrewd lawyer, had an abundant stock of humor and good nature, and was a hearty and healthy friend to possess. In his pocket was found this bit of poetry, written when he was editor of the Latest News, called, "Snowfall," after Nicholas Lenau:

"The snow falls through a breathless air,
It's gray forms trooping ceaseless by;
The few dull sounds seem strangely near—
Close draws the fleecy, pallid sky.

"Wide as the scene, a shroud of white
Rests soft as grief's last sad caress;
No dead leaf wakes to fitful flight,
The somber pines droop murmurless.

"The sullen, sunless sky is gone,
Fast closing night blots out the day:
The dark stream rolls in silence on
Along its ice-bound traceless way.

"So to the woes of weary life
Death brings the long-sought blest surcease;
And grim remorse and passion's strife
Are hushed in everlasting peace."

This picture of a winter-evening snow-storm in the country is daintily painted. Our friend has found on his last couch that everlasting peace which his poetic sight placed in the kindly hand of Death.

A Few Suggestions.

It is not the worst use that a few dollars can be put to, to buy a few books for holiday presents. Books are pleasant companions, lasting souvenirs of friendship, and convincing teachers. We respectfully present the following list of elegantly bound volumes, hoping that our friends will remember the foregoing briefly-stated facts and send us their orders:

PROSE POEMS. By R. G. Ingersoll. A magnificent present for anyone. It is quarto size, has a fine steel engraving of Colonel Ingersoll, and in the fine editions is truly a royal gift. Cloth, $2.50; half calf, 4.50; half morocco, $5; tree calf, $9.

INGERSOLL'S COMPLETE WORKS. These are his principal lectures bound in one volume. A handsome book, for $5.

PAINE'S COMPLETE WORKS. This volume includes all of Paine's noted books, and there is no better volume to present to an "almost persuaded" friend. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, $4.50.

A TRUTH SEEKER AROUND THE WORLD. Mr. Bennett's last labor, and a splendid history of the world of to-day. We hav a few complete sets (four volumes) of this in morocco, gilt edges, for $10.50.

GODS AND RELIGIONS OF ANCIENT AND MODERN TIMES. The great and useful work prepared by Mr. Bennett during his incarceration in the Albany penitentiary, the infamy of which incarceration is known to all. This work is in two large volumes, leather covered, for $7; morocco, $8.

SUPERNATURAL RELIGION. If any Infidel numbers a minister among his acquaintances he should present him with this book, and put him under bonds to study it. The minister's congregation will feel the good effects. Bound in leather—the book, not the congregation—$5; in morocco, $5.50.

VOLTAIRE'S ROMANCES. We hav some of these bound in half calf, gorgeous in appearance and instructiv as well as amusing in substance, which sell for $4. In cloth, $1.50.

ALL IN A LIFE-TIME. By Susan H. Wixon, the loved editor of our Children's Corner. It is handsomely bound, and ought to be an acceptable present to anyone. Price, $1.50.

APPLES OF GOLD. This is a book suitable for youths of both sexes. Finely gotten up, interesting and instructiv. Price, $1.25.

For the children we hav THE STORY HOUR and LITTLE LESSONS. The first, by Miss Wixon, is quarto, board covers, and filled with handsome pictures and useful stories. The price is $1. Little Lessons, by Aunt Elmina, is smaller in size, but scientifically useful, as teaching dry facts in a graceful and entertaining manner. Price, 40 cents.

There are a great many more splendid works in our list, and orders for them will be received with thankfulness and filled with promptness.

The Minister and the Dray-Horse.

Dr. Fry, in the Central Christian Advocate, closing an article about the Andover controversy, says: "As Methodists, therefore, we hav no need of a second probation to make our theology consistent and humane. We believe that the present is the only probation the race will hav, and that those who do not in this life hav a revelation of the gospel, and liv as nearly up to the light they hav as saved believers liv up to the light they hav, will be saved without a second probation, by the atonement of Christ.

What the Rev. Dr. Fry "believes" about the hereafter is utterly and insanely idiotic as a basis or motiv for the most trivial action. Why will men of sense stultify themselvs by talking and arguing about matters they are as ignorant of as a dray-horse?—Industrial Appeal.

Letters from Friends.

GARDEN CITY, KAN., Nov. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We hav had Mr. S. W. Bell with us this week, and I want to say to you, and to the Liberal readers of your very valuable paper throughout the country, that we hav had a splendid treat in listening to three of his grand lectures. Mr. Bell is gentlemanly and agreeable in manners, and in style instructiv, earnest, and convincing. Altogether he has made the best impression on our people of any Liberal speaker that has ever been here. It would afford us a great entertainment if we could get some one of our preachers to hold a debate with him, but so good a thing is not to be expected. H. C. ST. JOHN.

STEUBENVILLE, O., Nov. 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.15 for TRUTH SEEKER binder and "Contradictions of the Bible." I was pleased to see Mrs. Freeman's article on "Hell and Hanging" in to-day's TRUTH SEEKER. It is well enough to speak out now on that great crime at Chicago, but if all who saw what a crime against humanity the hanging of those men would be had come out like men and demanded their liberation, they never would hav dared to hang them, especially if the Knights of Labor at Milwaukee had spoken in their favor with no uncertain sound; but Powderly, the tool of the pope, choked them off, and would not hav a word said to save them. That proves what I hav often said—it is no use trying to benefit mankind until this superstition is rooted from their minds. JNO. DOWNES.

SANTA, CAL., Nov. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last two years. I hav always believed in Freethought and hav never believed in this hell-fire and brimstone that we hear so much of in our raising; that is, if we are raised by Christian parents. Now I think when a man dies that is the last of him. The spirit that livs after we die is very good for the preachers to use to scare women and children, so that the preachers can be kept from making a living by the sweat of their brows. Now, I see that some of your correspondents advocate social freedom, and others advocate woman's rights. I am opposed to both those principles. I don't think a lady or a gentleman would countenance free love, and I know that no lady would advocate it if she knew the true position that it puts her in.

I hope that you will excuse bad spelling and poor writing, for I came to this coast in 1850, and I was nothing but a small boy. If you wish to publish this or any part of it, you hav my consent. G. W. JENSON.

DIANA, TEXAS, Nov. 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, which will giv the grand old TRUTH SEEKER to me and a new subscriber for another year.

I thank you for continuing the paper after my time had expired. Circumstances were such that I could not remit sooner. I hav been the only subscriber to your valuable paper at this place for several years, but now you will hav another, who, I think, will be a permanent one from this time on. I do not feel quite so lonely now as heretofore. My friend says that THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best paper that he ever saw, and I agree with him. I think the pictures a great addition. Heston is a brick. May his star never grow dim.

We are greatly in need of a Liberal lecturer in this part of the country, and would gladly hav some one of its able advocates pass this way. We will do all that we can for him.

That you may liv long and enjoy good health is the wish of your friend, J. M. WOODS.

MILTON, DAK., Nov. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find five dollars, for which mark my tab on your paper as far ahead as it will take it.

For real honesty, true manly courage, and morality, THE TRUTH SEEKER stands without a peer in America. Yes (using Colonel Ingersoll's words), it "stands like a plumed knight and throws its lance against the forehead of hypocrisy," holy cant, and fraud. Like a faithful sentinel, it givs the alarm when that old fraud, the church, undertakes any scheme to undermine the free institutions of our glorious country. It sides with the weak, and sympathizes with the oppressed. It sheds a halo of light in every house it enters where there is intelligence enough to understand it; that is, where the priest has not assassinated the reason of parent and children. Long may it liv to bless the world. S. E. HAIGHT.

P.S.—Brothers Putnam, Reynolds, Jamieson, and Bell, I would ask, Is north Dakota never to hav the honor of having the bread of life broken by some of you in her borders?

S. E. H.

WORCESTER, MASS., Nov. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I write to let you know how God's goodness is shedding itself abroad upon me. Not having seen my father, mother, and brother for some time, I went up to Fitchburg day before yesterday for that purpose, thinking to stop over Thanksgiving day. I was kindly but reservedly received by my folks, who are Christians of the "Plymouth Brethren" type. Father is an evangelist who averages about six converts a year. I refrained from expressing any of my Liberal ideas out of respect for them, till about three minutes before dinner to-day, when father, while talking, said that "the fool hath said within his heart, There is no God." And when he finished speaking I ventured to reply: "Yes, but the wise man speaks it right out, just as I do. Christians often think it, but do not dare say it." The result was that he gave me to understand that I could get out of his house at once. I inquired if he meant for me to go before dinner, and he replied that he meant what he said. I at once prepared to go, and my brother complied with my request to accompany me to the railroad station. I left on the one o'clock train, and liv to be thankful that Christian fathers cannot murder their children in this country as they hav in others.

I remain a more determined foe to superstition than ever before. DR. C. L. HASKELL.

FARLEY, IOWA, Nov. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, truth finder, and truth teller expires some time this month, I herewith send you a "V" to pay my fare two annual stations ahead.

I am very glad indeed that Mrs. Slenker is out of the clutches of that Comstock mob, but sorry that it could not hav been brought about by a clear vindication by the jury, rather than through a technical point in the indictment. But be it as it is, let us rejoice that she is free. Your stand in the Anarchist trial in Chicago is correct, as I see it, and if the feeling among the working classes in other sections is the same as it is here, it will add 500,000 men to the sympathizers if not to the Socialistic ranks. The execution of those men on the 11th inst. is the great theme of conversation, and it is very common to hear it stamped as murder.

Reading the trial, or rather the history of it, reminds one of the days of the holy Inquisition and the tribunals set up for the trial of witches.

"The powers that be" seem to hav no more idea of justice now in the trial of a Socialist than they did then in the trial of a heretic or a witch, and I do not believe that it will be many years before the state of Illinois will be as much ashamed of the 11th of November as is the church to-day of her punishment of witches, and the burning of Servetus and Bruno.

PIPPIN LAKE FARM, Nov. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Our Society is filled with new life and vigor, having just experienced the vivifying influence of a course of three lectures, given November 20th and 21st, by that pioneer in Freethought endeavor, Dr. J. L. York. Great as were our expectations, they were more than realized in the doctor's able and convincing way in which he taught his hearers to learn the science of life, or how to be happy; to know the truths of evolution and to feel that higher inspiration, or how God speaks to man. Without dogmatizing about the unknown, he summoned all his strong energies to enable his audiences to see the duties of this life, and to better our condition in this world. With that freedom of expression peculiar to Western life he put the vigor of his strong mentality into his telling points of logic, climaxing and clinching each with a magnetic and forcible, "Do you see it?" His over-flowing social good nature and manifest deep sincerity endear him to the people who come within the reach of his magnetism.

Brother York should be heard by every one who cares to enjoy an intellectual feast. From the lips of all who heard him here comes praise of his worth and work among us.

As soon as the announcement of his coming, parson and priest hobnobbed, and the silent prayer went out to immutable law to provide a storm to welcome the doctor's coming, and sure enough a furious blizzard arose soon after Mr. York's arrival. The temperature changed from 60° to 13° above zero. Having no Christ to say to the troubled elements, "Peace, be still," we had to brave the storm and inclemency of the weather, or stay away from the lectures. Many chose the latter course. With the departure of the agitator, strange to say, came balmy weather again. In the face of such an experience who will dare to say that prayer is not answered? MARIUS HEIGHTON,
Secretary Kent, O., Secular Union.

ROCHESTER, MICH., Nov. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.25 for one copy each of TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1888 and "The Story Hour."

My wife and self hav been much interested in the splendid variety of printed matter in your columns during the year. We hope the charming chapters from Felix Oswald will, before long, find themselvs in book form. Putnam's letters from the Far West, so cheery and brave, and withal poetic and musical, suggest the having an orchestral accompaniment in their reading to giv them the highest effect. To one who has read Field's open letter, and then Ingersoll's answer, most of which we found copied in a late number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, there seems but little left unsaid. The rejoinder appears complete, like a work of art from one of the old masters. But time and space fail us to refer to one in ten of the good things from the talented writers at your command.

Now, a little per contra. The illustrations on the first page of your paper seem, in the main, finely designed and strikingly executed. The take-off is timely, and usually hits hard; but not quite so those, or most of them, on the last page. The caricature of a death-scene, as if it were merely an old obsolete orthodox notion, is not, in my estimation, a happy treatment of the subject. Such scenes happen to be real. Most of us hav been present at them, and a burlesque on the like is what some of us very little enjoy. Again, in Heston's handling of the generally regarded coarse and, if you please, obscene portions of the Jewish Bible-history, we can but feel there is often very bad taste displayed. I allude, for instance, to the Tamar and Potiphar's wife scenes. Such methods are well calculated to defeat the desired object. Between the lines of the artist's drawing he appears to depict himself, perhaps unwittingly, as gloating over his subject. That particular use of the Heston spyglass reminds one of those pure and pious sisters who, with a mock-injured innocence, complained to their pastor of Deacon Jones's indecency in going a-bathing right before them. When it became known that he was a half-mile away and that they had been looking through a field-glass, the painstaking in the discovery somewhat damaged the sincerity of their claim.

If the able and judicious Editor of the foremost Freethought journal of the country shall determin that after the first of January next he will discontinue all further illustrations to his paper, here is one, at least, who over the loss won't invest a cent in crape, but still be glad, if not more so, that THE TRUTH SEEKER will continue to be due him till 1889.

C. H. GREENE.

HOME CITY, Nov. 22, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In the November 19th issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER Mr. A. D. Swan says it is a shame to call Chicago bloodthirsty. I say it is a shame that there are such bloodthirsty Freethinkers as he. Here is an example: "I received a letter before election telling me to keep my mouth shut or I would be hanged some night. I know the man, or suppose I know him, who wrote the letter. Now, hav I a right to kill him? No. I must wait until he kills me; then I can defend myself or be killed. It is the same with the state of Illinois. It could not prove that any one of them threw the bomb, but they must hang because they said they would." What logic! Further on he says: "The home of the free and the brave." He seems to think by the last war the whole problem of mental and personal liberty has been solved. He stands not a jot higher than the church-member, and if he would read THE TRUTH SEEKER carefully every week, and think, he soon would develop a step higher. "Everybody can get land just for nothing; pay for fee a mere trifle." Yes, come out here, Mr. Swan, on this cheap land, and you can raise corn, if you get any, and pay to the railroad twenty cents a bushel, and you get fifteen cents; buy coal for $6 or $7 a ton; coffee, thirty cents a pound. Fat cattle bring two cents a pound. Everything you buy is in the hands of monopoly, and so is what you sell. Free speech is suppressed wherever there is an opportunity. Sunday laws are enforced everywhere. Prohibition is forced on the people. The mail is watched by spies, and, worst of all, the election is run by money and low-lived politicians. And yet Mr. Swan has the courage to tell intelligent men this is the country for the free! FRANK VOGLER.

SODUS, N. Y., Nov. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Your postal receipt received; shall look for one every year as long as I liv. And you shall hav the money in advance. If Liberals can't pay, it is far better to tell the Editor. It is bad enough to be abused by religious idiots without being cheated by professing friends. I intend to send order for Ingersoll's complete works before many weeks. If I return to pious old New England—the place I still love—during the winter, I shall certainly giv you a call.

At last, and alas! the final act has been acted out with startling reality. History will point the finger of scorn and contempt at the state of Illinois for this judicial murder. They were brave men, and I respect them dead more than living; and as a fair and impartial man, unaffected by their spoken principles, I say, in a voice of warning, but in no threatening tone, Look out for breakers ahead! If these men had not been friends to the working men and women of this country, if they had not been Infidels, they never would hav been murdered to please a few millionaires and the combined religious press of the country. How grandly and nobly they met their fate, scorning the aid of the pious loafer who is ready to let the most brutal murderer into the kingdom of heaven. As an intelligent workingman I speak for many. We look upon them as martyrs, and their memory will be cherished by thousands as long as we liv; and if ever the struggle for religious supremacy comes, in our day, between Catholicism and Protestantism, we shall remain neutral. The workingmen hav learned this much—the intelligent part—that the church is only a corporation, and the most heartless of all. The priest will take his dime, but he likes the rich man's dollars in the same proportion as the relativ value.

If this should ever happen to meet the eye of some Freethinker, don't go to cussing the Editor of the paper; cuss me alone. I hav smiled sometimes on reading in the communication pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER how some are so shocked to think we are advocating these unlawful opinions. To such we say, Free speech, free press, justice to all, even to the most malicious Methodist mongrel that ever howled at camp-meeting. Mr. Editor, I promised you that I was going to light out on temperance, but I will stop. That is coming next, and then the duck-me-all-over-boys Baptists will catch it. J. E. COY.

SAN JOSÉ, CAL., Oct. 23, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 to continue my yearly subscription for the best Freethought and human rights paper in the world. I cannot find words to express my admiration for such benefactors as D. M. Bennett, its founder, and the present Truth Seeker Company, although appearances indicate that the power of mental slavery will outliv us all. Looking about, I behold the flourishing condition of this slave power manifested in its numerous churches (mental slave dungeons), and new churches are being erected daily. Hence it appears to me that there is but one hope in our age, and that hope lies in sowing the seeds of intellectual liberty for future generations. By close observation during the past twenty years I hav come to the conclusion that our greatest drawback in our own so-called Freethought ranks is the indifference to duty and the cowardice displayed by so large a number styling themselvs Freethinkers. It is discouraging. We hav many of this class in our city of San José, the Garden City of California. I hav frequently been out on a mission for the advancement of Secularism and human rights, using my best efforts in support of Freethought and intellectual liberty, opposing the blind followers of priestcraft and their false claims and I find many of the above-mentioned milk-and-water Freethinkers will oppose my efforts invariably, and say, "What is the use of your working against the popular religious and political power? You cannot stay the tide. You only injure yourself and lose business influence. I would not dare express my private opinion as you do. It would injure my business and standing. Although I think as you do, I frequently feel obliged to contribute something to different sects to aid in keeping up their churches, for many of my customers are church-members, and my wife and children attend church and Sunday-school. So I let them all think as they please, and advise you to do the same. When you are among wolves, howl with them." My reply is ever: "No! If I cannot raise their standard, at least they shall not lower mine, and I shall giv no support to priestcraft or priestly dungeons. I can always be found at my post of duty." R. H. SOHWARTZ.

CEDARVILLE, N. J., Nov. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Having read THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time, I wish to inform you that I like it very much, and wish to get some of the books and tracts advertised in it. Please send me what are named in the inclosed list. I would also like to hav Ingersoll's reply to Field to circulate among my Christian friends, who are so fond of harping about the advantages and comforts of religion here and hereafter, and the gloomy life and hopeless death of Infidels.

This is a church-going and priest-ridden community, with four preachers living like drones on the earnings of the people, the most of whom hav all they can do to get along and pay their honest debts; but, as the church does a cash business, the parsons get their money, and the tradesmen sometimes do not. Some of them say that Jesus paid their debts, but that don't do the grocer and butcher much good. I wonder why they don't pay the preacher in orders of that kind.

I was raised in the orthodox style, and went to church and Sunday-school in my youth, and for several years I tried earnestly and sincerely to be a Christian, but could not feel the reality of religion and the evidence that I was born again to my own satisfaction, and so I went to reasoning on the subject; and, comparing the practice and professions of Christians, I found that very few, if any, would weigh sixteen ounces to the pound, as they left their religion like their hymn-book in their pews, to stay there till they came there again.

I believe in a creator, not a being, but a principle or element, as light, heat, or electricity; and I do not believe in any revelation handed down from the misty ages gone by, but I think that the lightning, the earthquake, and the cyclone, as well as the laws of the universe and of Nature, prove the existence of a great and incomprehensible power. I don't think that mankind can either glorify or dishonor the great unknowable or cause of all things that exist.

I do not believe in immortality. If there is an immortal principle in us, where was it before we were born? For reason teaches that if it has no end it could not hav any beginning. H. E. EMMAL.

CONOORD, N. C., Nov. 22, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Is Sunday, or the Sabbath day, of divine origin? If so, hav the governments of the world any power delegated to them, and by whom, to punish violators of the Sabbath? If Sunday is of divine origin and to be kept holy, and all people to be restrained from work on that day, it is strange that God had not distinguished it from the other, or week days, by some visible mark by which it should be known. And the same might be said of Christmas. If Sunday is of divine origin, set apart by God as more holy than the week days, as claimed by the Christians and Biblists, why do they and their courts, of human origin and kept up by human agencies, punish a man who does not believe in such doctrins for working on that day? It is my belief that the courts should attend strictly to their own business, and punish violators of laws against their own governments, and not meddle with the courts or laws of heaven. Suppose the courts of North Carolina should attempt to punish violators of the laws of Canada, Mexico, or even of the United States, would not such courts bring themselvs into ridicule and deserve the contempt of the civilized world? Are not our Sabbatarians going many steps—yes, many leagues—further when they punish persons for violating the laws (as they claim) of God? Is not such practice disgusting, revolting to all Liberals of intelligence? Again, another question arises, and I would like for some Sabbatarian and Bibliarian to answer. If man is punished by earthly courts for violating God's laws, will that satisfy God's displeasure, or will he be punished again by God for the same offense after death? If such is the case, it stands to reason that God will punish those who assumed jurisdiction over his affairs. God placed the Anglo-Saxon in Europe, the African or negro in Africa, and the Indian in America. The Anglo-Saxon came to America, with his Bible in one hand and his musket in the other, revering the holy Sabbath as of divine origin; but finding the red man, on the ground which God had placed him, in their way, they did not persuade him according to the teachings of that Bible, "Thou shalt not kill," but taught them with their muskets. These were the Puritans of the Mayflower, the pilgrims of Plymouth Rock, the persecutors of all who were not orthodox in their creed.

I cannot but believe that the star of Liberalism is in the ascendancy, and the day not far distant when the fog of myth and superstition will hav to giv way to reason and science, and bigotry and persecution as ecclesiastically practiced now will take their stand with the Inquisition in the dead past, never to be resurrected. J. W. MEHAFFEY.

ADRIAN MICH., Nov. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Deacon George White, of Seymour, Ind., has been expelled from the church for declaring he believed the world to be one million years old. It served him right; he ought to know better. We hav Bible proof that it was made in a week. A man who utters such sentiments should be put upon probation as long as the devil was chained before he was let loose to pester us poor mortals. It is only equaled by the man in this city whose pension was cut down for alleged blasphemy through misrepresentation of a church-going man; it was for saying there is no personal God the pensioner was interfered with by malicious misrepresentations. He will hav it restored again, however. Thus it is, you must be born again or you will be damned in that place of torment, of fire and brimstone, with the devil and his angels prepared to keep you company through eternal ages, brought about by an all-wise, benign, and loving creator, whose whole aim is for the good of us poor helpless worms of the dust—one who cannot err. What a stupendous job! Only think, all this tremendous formation of worlds and its belongings for arbitrary ends.

Nature, the great architect, has done its work well; its formations are beyond mechanical skill; there is no process in the empire of mechanical inventions whereby worlds can be placed in constellations, or this world can be reversed in its orbit. Neither can you change the seasons or limit twenty-four hours to a minute. Well; but our Bible sage or devotee says God spoke all this stupendous work into existence. Where did he get the spoke from? His speech must hav been a prolific conglomeration, and maybe the poor soul of a devotee to orthodoxy does not know how many times the heart beats a minute, but knows how much he pays the priest to shrive him, and thinks the money paid for such benefits well bestowed. And many children and wives go hungry at home while the priests fatten on their starvation. How long, O humanity! must this be endured? The answer is, until priestcraft is wiped out from the face of the earth, and truth is allowed to expand; but not in our day, O ye Freethinkers! but the day will surely come.

I well remember, when a boy, going to meeting and sitting on a high bench, with my little feet hanging down, my legs thrust through a short pair of wide-legged trousers, with a calico waist too small for me, nearly scared to death listening to the preacher telling of the awful punishment awaiting us in God's future world. Even we little ones were included among the damned. I did not know the meaning of the word hell, but was told it was a place that our heavenly father had prepared for them who did not obey him in all things whatsoever. Finally a preacher came along and preached that babies were in hell who were not longer than his hand. I thought I had the bulge on him, as I was a good deal bigger than that, and he could not mean me. I hav thought since that if there was such a hell as he or they preached about they ought to hav a taste of it for scaring me as they did. If there is a personal God, and if he, as is said, is all love, and infinit, he cannot err. If this be true, then somebody has lied. O. S. BARRETT.

LEXINGTON, KY., Nov. 9, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Some men love justice more than mere pleasure. They would rather die than abandon the cause. Their souls inhabit a sphere which is not based on sensation. Their business is to set a good and heroic example, to raise the human race to their own exalted level. Behold Socrates, the jewel of the world, condemned to die by the scum of society. Behold Arnold of Brescia, murdered in his cell by order of the pope of Rome. Did Freedom die then? Freedom seems to be always dying. A bishop lately remarked that men, like birds, must hav a leader to direct them and mold their judgment. Among birds there is a silent acquiescence, which proves that their leader is elected, but when the blind attempt to lead the blind, we always expect disastrous results.

When the church rules the state, blind habit, fear, and selfishness drag the soul downward, and there is then an end to evolution. Every throb of triumphant joy which is not pure and noble is followed by disintegration, self-condemnation, and partial wreck. A partial separation from the world, hearts full of pity, hands filled with good works, redeem our nature. A differentiation follows a struggle; and for what is this struggle? To obtain something for the human race which to be deprived of amounts to a living death; something for which deep, holy, earnest hearts hav sighed, agonized, during years of pain. And thus the heart leaps forward; becomes enlarged, nobler, better.

The clergyman said last night that a struggle does no good unless the breath of God fills our sails. Such idle talk coincides with no well received system of philosophy. And still these triflers are pampered and supported by the public. The reason is this—time has not made our philosophy strong enough to sink deep into the human heart; to raise the veil which hides the loathsome Mokanna of orthodoxy. Look at Germany—there philosophy has triumphed; see how the minds of the people are marching toward Rationalism. And the churches, bishops, and pastors are what? A placid-faced bishop used to be called, by some old lady, "a sweet man;" but now, if you affirm that they are silly, pronounced, unmitigated antiquities, no one takes it to heart. A plain, rough German lady said to me to-day that "the creation was a system of degrees—no God made jelly-points; they grew from something else." I thought, also, that Nature's children were not in the clouds; they are safely anchored near her warm, beating heart.

No experience of joy is above the brute's unless it is a germ of that activ holiness which belongs to the universe. And here let me remark that the twenty-four clergymen who approved of the adoption of the Constitution objected to the insertion of the name of God in that instrument. John Fiske remarks that the seeds of modern Infidelity were planted in their hearts.

One thing ought not to be overlooked; it is of no use to speak of peace or quiet in this country while the Catholics are lashed into a foam about the useless way some instructors hav of teaching in the public schools their system of theology. Catholics and Infidels should combine and suppress this.

The Episcopal clergy hav, it seems, decided to insist no longer on the idea of the Apostolic succession as a part of their creed. Such concessions lead us to think that in a few years the moles and the bats, and other interesting creatures, will find pleasant homes in churches, with none to molest them. It is said that more than ever are business affairs engrossed by the few, and the masses must take the pittance which is doled out to them, consuming it mournfully in some corner, or die. Society is honeycombed by these plots and stratagems of rich men. Their webs are woven in every corner. No law hinders them; no arm arrests them; the voice of justice is faint and seldom heard. And yet the alarum falls upon the drowsy ear, and the few lion-hearted men who enter their protest are hurried to a dungeon. Liberty is dying in the house of her friends.

During some thrilling pause, Heber Newton cheered on Christians who are evoluting into Buddhism; and we might add, Peruse Chinese poetry, dear friends, so as never to lose sight of the streets of gold, the seas of glass, there described.

BRUNSWICK, GA., Nov. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Some people seem not to understand the main principle of THE TRUTH SEEKER or its editorials, as for instance Mr. Swan, of Ohio, who objects because you asked for justice for the Chicago Anarchists; and Mr. Aitken, of Long Island, who finds fault because you do not indorse the Anti-Poverty Society. Now, as I look at it, THE TRUTH SEEKER is a paper that kindly offers its columns to all for the expression of their views, and the Editor has equal rights with the rest. While Messrs. Swan and Aitken are afforded the opportunity to express their own notions, they should not object if others are given the same privilege.

What does Mr. Swan mean by "the land of the free?" Is that land free where a man may be arrested for expressing his disbelief in religious dogmas, or may be put in jail for editing a paper like Lucifer, or where a woman like Mrs. Slenker may be imprisoned as in the case we are all familiar with? Is it liberty if a man dare not declare his opinion? This government givs equal rights to all on paper only. The Anarchists of Chicago had a full and undoubted right to express their views, and the police were unjustified in breaking up their meeting. The right of free speech has no limit; if you put bounds to it, it is no longer free. Ideas are dangerous only when under the pressure of enforced silence. I do not claim to be infallibly right in my opinion, but I do claim—and I shall defend this claim to my last breath—the right to hold my opinion and to express it. Instead of condemning the Editor, Mr. Swan, you should applaud and defend him for having the courage of his convictions. I may not indorse your views, but I respect your right to proclaim them. Giv to others the privilege you claim for yourself.

If you knew more, Mr. Swan, about the men who died in Chicago on the 11th of November, you would not talk as you do about them. It does not matter whether they were wrong or right. The question is, Were they guilty of murder or treason? If you will read the United States Constitution, you will see that the law does not recognize treason except in two cases, neither of which applies to these men. No reasonable man can find the least evidence that they had anything to do with the killing of those policemen. Let me tell you that the people of Illinois hav done themselvs more harm in hanging those men than they could possibly hav done by letting them liv.

Capital punishment, in my opinion, is nothing but the enforcement of the claimed right of those possessing power. The state, no more than the individual, has the right to kill except in self-defense. I am not for the throwing of bombs, or shells, or dynamite; neither am I on the side of those who expect too much from the sweet by and by that will come and make things better. A revolution is good if the cause is good. This late war was the same in one way as the struggle of the laboring class in the United States in the other. By waiting and waiting the slave would not hav been free to-day. But for the war they would hav been slaves now. And so with the workingmen—they will never get their right if they do not help themselvs. To expect something from the Congress and Senate in their favor is nonsense. You know that the most of our legislators are corrupt and on the side of the money party. Do you call it honest for a person to accumulate a million dollars? My idea is that a person should not possess wealth which he has not worked for. Now, you are not going to tell me that Vanderbilt and Gould hav a right to own the immense amount of money and land they possess. They stole it—everybody knows it—and still everybody lets them hav it.

No, sir, though I am not an Anarchist I say, Hats off to those five men that died in Chicago for the sake of the emancipation of the poor man. They had their faults, but I think we all hav them. In a Western paper I read the following on the case: "There is no test of a higher civilization of a people so valuable and so complete as the test of their ability to invite the discussion of the most dangerous theories that threaten civilization. This best lesson in the philosophy of agitation the American people hav not fully learned. They would not tolerate the fullest and frankest discussion of slavery, and they are not showing the disposition, I regret to say, to accord to the complicated and delicate relation of labor and capital the careful and searching attention they deserve" (John Snyder in St. Louis Globe-Democrat).

Enough. I am taking too much space. It is not for myself, but for those who are dead, that I write these lines. History will judge who was right—who was more guilty of murder, those five or the sheriff that hung them. As for a policeman, I will tell you that next to a clergyman he is the most detestable being in my eye. I thank the Editor for his kind words in behalf of the men that died for the sake of their fellow-workingman. FRED. L. HOFFMAN.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Pilgrim Mothers.

Now the Pilgrim fathers long
Hav been rehearsed in story,
And the patriotic song
Commemorates their glory;
But the Pilgrim mothers, too,
Deserve a kindly mention,
For their gentle hearts were true
'Mid danger's intervention.

From sad want they suffered more
Than they had words for telling,
Yet they pain in patience bore,
Whilst dread foreboding feeling.
With no wishes to be great,
They filled a noble station,
At the foundation of the state,
As mothers of the nation.

Thank the heroes of the past;
Bless heroins most truly;
Hold their virtues ever fast
And emulate them duly.
Praises giv to all the brave,
Americans or others;
In deepest memory engrave—
The grand old Pilgrim mothers.

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

One at a Time.

One step at a time, and that well placed,
We reach the grandest hight;
One stroke at a time, the earth's hidden stores
Will slowly come to light;
One seed at a time, and the forest grows;
One drop at a time, and the river flows
Into the boundless sea.

One word at a time, and the greatest book
Is written and is read;
One stone at a time, and the palace rears
Aloft its stately head;
One blow at a time, and the tree's cleft through,
And a city will stand where the forest grew
A few short years before.

One foe at a time, and he subdued,
And the conflict will be won;
One grain at a time, and the sand of life
Will slowly all be run;
One minute, another, the hours fly;
One day at a time our lives speed by
Into eternity.

One grain of knowledge, and that well stored,
Another, and more on them,
And as time rolls on your mind will shine
With many a garnered gem
Of thought and wisdom. And time will tell.
"One thing at a time and that done well,"
Is wisdom's proven rule. —Golden Days.

Biographical.

FRANCES WRIGHT.

Frances Wright was born in Dundee, Scotland, Sept. 6, 1795, and she was one of the bravest and most highly gifted women that ever came into being. From her father she inherited those elements of character that made her a fearless and eloquent reformer, while from her mother she received fine analytical powers, and an aptitude to perform thoroughly and properly whatever she undertook. Her father was at one time under the governmental watch for circulating Paine's "Rights of Man." He was a man of great ability, but he, as well as the mother of Frances Wright, died early, leaving Frances and two other children, baby orphans, but with means to educate and bring them up properly. Frances had quick perceptions and a rare genius that was soon observed by her teachers and others. Once at school she asked her teacher a question that he could not answer, as was often the case; this time he told her that her question was dangerous. Looking up with flashing eyes and a bright color in her cheeks, she inquired, "Can the truth be dangerous?"

She was studious and philosophical, and, withal, sweet, modest, and sympathetic. When only fifteen she began to study the labor problem, and at that time solemnly promised herself that she would wear the cause of the poor and oppressed in her heart as long as she lived, and would do all in her power to relieve their woes and distresses, a promis that she faithfully kept to the end of her life. When a young lady of twenty she visited America, and afterward wrote a book entitled, "Views of Society and Manners in America," which was received with great favor, and was translated into several languages. She held up some of the institutions of this country so well, showing their worth and importance, that a general interest in them was awakened for the first time among Europeans.

Among her friends was the Marquis de Lafayette, who thought highly of her wonderful abilities, and she once visited him at Paris, by special invitation.

In 1824 she came again to America, this time determined to make it her future home. She became greatly interested in the subject of slavery as it was then carried on in the Southern states, and conceived a plan for the emancipation of the slaves. She traveled all through the South, and talked with the slaveholders upon the subject that agitated her free and liberty-loving mind. To illustrate her plan she bought two thousand acres of land in Tennessee, where the city of Memphis now stands. She also bought slaves and placed them on the land to cultivate it, while she employed a system of education, hoping to teach them to take care of themselvs, when she would send them to Hayti, as a country free to all of their color. Her scheme did not prove as productiv of good as her sanguin mind anticipated, and she was forced to abandon it after awhile. Her attempt, however, proves the nobleness of her nature that could not look upon distress and not try to alleviate it. As John Brown stood at Harper's Ferry at a later day, so she stood at Nashoba, the name of her place, pleading for right and justice to a race bound in the chains of serfdom.

She was editor of the Free Enquirer, together with Robert Owen, a Liberal newspaper, printed at New Harmony, and later in New York city, when that paper was the only one in the country entirely free from superstitious taint, party or sectarian influence. She became a lecturer of great ability, and went all about the country, speaking in the larger cities in favor of a free and Liberal policy in the government. Halls and churches were closed to her, and she usually spoke in theaters, but was terribly denounced on account of her radical opinions by pulpit and press. In those days it was the custom to stretch ropes across the streets to prevent travel while "divine services" were going on. Once, while she was lecturing, she said: "Do you wish me to name an instance of religious tyranny to-day? Go, look at the chains stretched across your streets!" The effect is said to hav been electric and startling. She was cheered to the echo, and soon after the chains were removed, never to appear again for such a purpose.

She was once turned away from a hotel in New York on account of her radical sentiments.

After severing her connection with the Free Enquirer she was associated with Abner Kneeland in publishing the Boston Investigator. She continued writing and lecturing as long as her health would permit. Her greatest work is entitled "A Few Days in Athens," which she wrote in her nineteenth year, and it is full of rare beauty and is of great worth. The chapters on Virtue, Happiness, and Religion are exceptionally fine, and will bear re-reading many times.

She believed in coöperation, in a national and rational education, and was among the first to advocate schools of industry along with those of mental training. She advocated the higher education of woman, was a believer in universal suffrage, and in all reforms that would make humanity better, truer, nobler.

In 1831 she was married to a Frenchman, M. Phiquepal d'Arusmont, but the marriage was said to be not a happy one. She was called an extremely handsome and attractiv woman. She was a great thinker, when it was most unpopular for women to think at all except upon frivolous or religious subjects. She was foremost in all good works, in advancing new ideas of education, in starting the progress of Freethought in this country, and in stirring the Abolitionists to action by calling their attention to the gigantic evils of slavery. With Mary Wolstonecraft and Ernestine L. Rose, she started the element of woman suffrage in this country, and struck brave blows for religious emancipation.

She was the object of long and bitter vituperation, on account of her opinions, and was spoken of as "that notorious Fanny Wright." But through all she maintained the spotless purity of character, and of noble conduct that won her many friends among the best thinkers of the age. She was a brilliant reformer, giving time, talent, opportunity, and wealth to the uplifting of the down-trodden and oppressed, and to the furtherance of universal mental liberty.

This brave woman, peerless among her sex, died in Cincinnati (Ohio) in 1852. She left the world better than she found it, and her memory is as sweet and fragrant as the summer flowers.

Her many good words and works deserve to be engraved in gold and marble, and her name should occupy a high place among the world's saviors and redeemers. S. H. W.

Correspondence.

GREENCASTLE, IND., Nov. 26, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Please put this in the paper for Pearl Deury:

FRIEND PEARL: I saw your request to hav some one correspond with you and I thought I would try and see. If you like me we will be friends for life. I feel sorry for anyone who has no mother; my mother is very sick and nearly died last winter. Aren't the pictures nice in THE TRUTH SEEKER? I like them ever so much.

I am taking music-lessons in the college here. I am going to play a piece at a recital Wednesday night—wish you were here to go to it. My father keeps a jewelry store and I help him when I am not in school. I am in the seventh-year grade this year. Well, I think this is about long enough for the first time. Answer soon. From your friend,

LILAH BOLEY.

CHICAGO, ILL., Nov. 25, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is only the second letter that I hav written to the Children's Corner, but will try to write more frequently. There are quite a number of young folks who write to you, but not quite as many as there were when the Children's Corner was first in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav an allegory on the digestion of a caramel, or the journey of Miss Carrie Sweet through the body.* I will send it if you think it would do for the Children's Corner. My teacher thinks it very good. I often hav arguments with the schoolgirls, and once with two teachers and the principal. All of the scholars and teachers are Christians, and I am the only Freethinker among them—the only one that does thinking for myself; the rest let the minister and priest do theirs. I am in my last year of school; expect to graduate next June.

I will now close, hoping to communicate with some of the young folks of the Children's Corner about or above my own age, which is seventeen years.

Seeing the notice from Fred L. Hoffman, I will direct my letter to the place named.

Yours very truly, ALMA V. WINEMAN.

P.S.—Fred L. Hoffman, please address your letters to me.

MISS ALMA V. WINEMAN, 22 Washtenaw av., Chicago, Ill.

* You can send the allegory, and, if suitable, we will publish it in the Corner.—ED.

BRUNSWICK, GA., Nov. 24, 1887.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: Thanksging to-day by the order of the president. Not knowing exactly what to thank God for, I think the best way to spend this afternoon is to write to the Corner of ours, so kindly offered by our great friend THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I wish to tell you of a little incident that happened last night. At about three o'clock the fire-bell rang and pistol-shots were fired. House on fire. When I went out the whole sky was red, and in the near distance I saw a two-story frame house on fire. All was burnt, and the people saved nothing but themselvs. What shall they thank God for to-day? Probably, that they are not living at the North Pole so that they would hav to freeze, and that they saved their lives, but I don't know. I think they will feel everything else toward God but thankful.

To receive a letter from the South is a rare occurrence for our Corner, and I wish it had not to be myself to write, but some other admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER and friend of Miss Wixon. Very few Freethinkers are here, and a person has to risk much even to acknowledge his Infidelity. People are very ignorant down here (that means the majority), and awfully hateful toward those that differ in faith. But I do not feel discouraged. No, not for anything would I giv up my Freethought and Liberal opinions, and—well, those that think the same. Children, you will not always find it easy to declare your faith, but I ask you not to care. Remember that on you depends the future generation—that the way you think now and the way you are brought up will be the way you will probably go through life. Everyone can do his share and no one should think that her or his work won't amount to much, but fearless and with joy work for the grand movement for the emancipation of thought, for the struggle of universal mental Liberty.

There rests more responsibility on you children than you think. Who were the men that shaped this republic? Hamilton, John Adams, Franklin, Washington, Thomas Paine, Jefferson, Madison, etc., were nearly all young men. Some folks will tell you that now, as most of the old generals in the late war are dead, they do not know whom the safety of the country could depend on in case of war. I laugh about it. There hav always been, and always will be, great men and great minds when the opportunity demands it. There is no fear that there will not be a second Logan or Hancock, but perhaps there will be two for every one. Don't look backward; look always forward. Do not think as the majority of the people think, but think the way your own brain will lead you. Do what you think to be right, and if found to be wrong by the majority of the people, be noble and suffer the consequence. Most men believe what others tell them to believe, but I tell them to stop following churches, or creeds, or political parties, and think for themselvs.

But I am afraid to get too lengthy in my letter, and so shall hav to close. Closing, let me tell you that that religion which teaches you to despise others because they differ in opinion or ideas can never be good, but in itself is despicable. Before you is a grand work, a great revolution, nothing less than the breaking down of the power of the Christian church, and if the coming generation will accomplish this, it will immortalize itself. But to take part in this struggle everyone must be honest and true to himself and others. The future religion is based on truth and honesty, and therefore we hav to be honest and true ourselvs. Do what we teach, so that others will be convinced by our own deeds.

FRED L. HOFFMAN.

What the Old Hen Said.

Into the house he came running,
And begged me to cut off his curls,
Over his head richly clustered
As bright and as fair as a girl's.

"Why would you lose them, my darling?"
"Because our old hen," pouted he,
"Screams when we meet, 'Get your hair cut!
Get your hair cut!'—I know she means me!"

—George Cooper in Our Little Ones.

The Class in Scripture.

A lady asked one of the children in her Sunday-school class, "What was the sin of the Pharisees?" "Eating camels, ma'am," was the reply. The little girl had read that the Pharisees "strained at gnats and swallowed camels."

"In what condition was the patriarch Job at the end of his life?" questioned a teacher of the stolid-looking boy at the foot of the class. "Dead," was the quiet response.

"What is the outward and visible sign in baptism?" asked a lady of her Sunday-school class. There was silence for some seconds, and then a girl broke in triumphantly with, "The baby, please, ma'am."

"Do you know, mamma, I don't believe Solomon was so rich after all?" observed a sharp boy to his mother, who prided herself on her orthodoxy. "My child!" she exclaimed in pious horror, "what does the Bible say?" "That's just it," he answered. "It says that 'Solomon slept with his fathers.' Now, surely, if he had been rich he'd hav had a bed to himself."

A teacher, in trying to explain to her scholars the meaning of repentance, used this illustration: "Suppose a bad boy were to steal an orange, and his good mother should catch him with it, and take him by the hand gently and tell him how wicked it is, and how very, very grieved she was; don't you think, now, that the little boy ought to feel very sorry?" One of the scholars eagerly replied: "Yes, mum." "And why, Marmaduke?" "'Cause." "Because why, Marmaduke?" "Because he hadn't et the orange befo' his ma cotch him and tuck it away from him!"—Chambers's Journal.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

The Heathen's Lament.

Oh, my heart is sadly grieving over news received to-day—
It came by ocean cable to the shores of old Cathay:
At a far-off mission meeting, with most Christian wisdom crammed,
It's been settled that our fathers are irrevocably damned.

To the Christian New Jerusalem, with radiant streets of gold,
There's no entrance for the heathen without Jesus, we are told;
And though our fathers never heard of any such a man,
That cannot change the working of the everlasting plan.

Now, we're not so very captious, only ignorant and weak;
We would gladly be converted, we are teachable and meek;
But, because a man's a Hindoo, it doesn't follow as a rule
He must therefore be considered an unmitigated fool.

So, when a missionary of the gospel came to tell
If we didn't come to Jesus we must surely go to hell,
Old Rabjarkee rose and asked him, if a man had died in sin,
Never hearing of the savior, so's to get a passport in,

And then if, somewhat later, without favor of the board
He somehow got a tardy introduction to the Lord;
If he then with joy accepted him, and for his sins repented,
Might his future not be brighter than the board had represented?

The preacher felt at once the point that pierced his dark-skinned brother;
His heathen soul was troubled—he was thinking of his mother!
So he told him how the prodigal was welcomed at the door,
Without the slightest question why he hadn't come before.

And the poor old man was comforted, the tears stood in his eyes;
He grasped the missionary's hand and said in glad surprise,
"I believe in God, the father ever willing to forgiv;
I will henceforth love and worship him so long as I may liv."

But it seems that missionary made a terrible mistake,
And is no more counted worthy the bread of life to break;
So the board has called him back, and forbidden him to preach
E'en the possib e forgivness that he thinks the gospels teach.

So our hearts are sadly grieving o'er the news received to-day—
The news that came by cable to the shores of old Cathay,
That hereafter, to be valid, every pardon of the Lord
Must be countersigned by Secretary Alden of the board.

And we weep, for our dilemma is as bad as bad can be;
But—if heaven is only open to the scribe and pharisee,
Since the company's so much better, though the climate's not so well,
With our fathers and our mothers, we would rather go to hell. —Life.

O money! O money! thy praises I sing!
Thou art my consoler, my god, and my king.
'Tis for thee that I preach, 'tis for thee that I pray,
And make a collection twice every Lord's day.

I hav candles and all sorts of dresses to buy;
I wish you to know that my church is quite high—
High in its structure, its steeple, and wall;
So high that the Lord does not reach it at all.

I hav poor in my parish who need some relief;
I preach to their poverty, pray to their grief;
I send round the box to them morning and night,
And hope they'll remember the poor widow's mite.

This is the creed, and I'll not preach without it.
The heavens are closed to all that may doubt it.
This is the essence of this pleasant religion—
Come regular to church and be plucked like a pigeon.

Superstition Among the Bulgarians.

Olive Harper in Demorest's Monthly.

There are few industries in Bulgaria, even in the largest cities, and it seems a question how the people liv. The houses in the cities are in the main comfortable, though built in the Turkisk style; but the streets are narrow, ill-paved, and without sewerage or sidewalks. Churches abound, Greek predominating, and in every direction can be heard the peculiar droning of the singers in the Greek churches. Of a population of over 3,000,000 there are about 1,400,000 Bulgarians who are Greek in religion; and as there are many other nationalities who recognize this religion, three-fourths of the whole population belong to the Greek church.

Those who belong to the Greek church are probably worse priest-ridden than any people in the world. There are priests, deacons, and acolytes to be supported, and their families also must be provided for, as the Greek priests marry. At every turn, every event—harvest, planting, the killing of an animal, at births, weddings, christenings, betrothals, sickness, deaths, funerals, and prayers for the dead at stated intervals, in trouble or joy—the Greek priest must be present, and he must always be paid if it takes all and leaves the family hungry.

The Greek priest, when dressed for his functions, wears a gown of cloth of gold, and a scarf around his neck stiffly embroidered with gold thread and precious stones; and all the church vessels and altars and cloths are of the richest material and make. The churches are handsome, and decorated with costly things. The priest's family and wife are among the best provided for of any, though the priest has no more immunity than another Bulgarian from Turkish persecution; but the Turks seldom touch a church.

The priests sell candles and votiv offerings; they furnish blessings to order on planting seeds in the spring, on the birth of every domestic animal, and I verily believe on the hatching of a chicken, for all of which blessings they must be paid. No matter how poor the family, there is always a little shrine to the Paniah, or blessed mother, and a light burns forever before it.

The priests go into the farm-yards, with their paraphernalia for the blessing of the animals carried by deacons and acolytes, where the head priest sprinkles each animal with a few drops of holy water shaken from a sort of a spoon-shaped sprinkler which is pierced with little holes. Sometimes they hav a compact bunch of sea-fennel tied on a stick, which is used to sprinkle the animals or people with. They also bless the first-fruits of a tree, and the first handfuls of ripened grain or tuft of hay. All this religion is without doubt a great source of comfort and consolation to these poor people, but it would be almost impossible to enumerate one-half the petty extortions made by the priests.

Sickness is usually treated by a priest, who goes to the sufferer and writes some cabalistic words with chalk upon the wall. This is scraped off and given to the patient, who, if he livs, is grateful to the priest, and if he dies is buried by the priest, and his relativs pay for both services; and this is always very heavy, what with the anointing oil, the candles, the prayers, and the horrible droning chant of the boys and deacons, and the procession of all the church officers, who get paid for every step they take.

To cure hydrocephalus, the priest cuts a piece of red flannel in the form of a Greek cross, saturates it with alcohol, and laying it upon the little sufferer's stomach sets fire to it. If a blister comes in the form of the cross it is considered a sign the child will get well; if not, that it must die. As the alcohol burns from the surface of the flannel, the sign is usually adverse.

Bulgarian women are docil, affectionate wives, industrious and patient, and both men and women are faithful to their obligation. The men are sincerely attached to their wives and children, and old age is reverenced among them. Their evenings are spent in talking over the events of the day, their neighbors' troubles or griefs, the rumors of great events which hav reached their ears from some traveler, or in discussing ways and means, in which all hav a say, subject to the arbitration of the oldest among them. If any discord does arise, it is referred to the priest, who soon dissipates it. The priests do absorb the earnings of these poor people to an abominable extent, and rule them with a rod of iron; but their rule is one which keeps down discords in families, and makes them patient and resigned under their yoke, too much so in some cases.

Sundays they go to church twice, the men sitting on one side, the women on the other. It is possible for them to obtain a divorce, if deserved, the priest pronouncing the decree.

There are no holidays but religious ones, of which the principal are those of Easter and St. George. Easter is the greatest and most solemn, and on this occasion even the poorest has a dinner of fowl, lamb, or kid. At the feast of St. George, men, women, and children go out to the forests with bagpipes, and, crowning themselvs with flowers, dance upon the grass, and hav innocent games. In dancing they form a circle, each person taking hold of his neighbor's handkerchief, never the hand, and they are placed alternately, a man and woman. Dancing thus, they make one think of the ancient sculptures, and the appearance and movement of the dancers are quite classic.

A baptism is a curious ceremony as the Bulgarians do it, and the child who survives it is very lucky. One child was baptized during the writer's sojourn in Sofia, and, being invited to assist at the ceremony, she took her way to a mud-house that had four rooms and four windows, which was an indication that the family was quite well off for there. There were divans, covered with chintz, on three sides of the front room, which served also for beds during the night.

All the friends and relativs of the family were gathered, and the father received them. The mother and babe were invisible, as the child must not run the risk of the "evil eye" until protected by the sacrament. By and by a procession of two priests, two deacons, two acolytes, and several choir-boys came along chanting, bearing candles and symbols, except the priests, who bore crosses and other paraphernalia. The deacons brought the font, which was very handsome, of hammered gold, and with a capacity of about five gallons.

Three immense candles decorated with paper flowers and tinsel were stood at one end of the room, and in the middle of the triangle the font was placed. Cold water was drawn by the acolytes from a well outside, and the priest put some other water and a little salt in it from bottles. A small wax candle was given to each guest, who stood up, and as the priests passed around with their lighted candles everyone reached out and lighted their candle, which must be kept alight, for it is considered a great misfortune if a candle falls or goes out during a christening.

Then the godmother brought the baby, simply wrapped in a shawl, and when that was opened the child was taken out, completely naked. The chief priest took him in his big hands and anointed him all over with oil, and cut some hair from the crown of his head in the form of a cross. Then every separate part of the child's body was separately blessed, the choristers droning out doleful sounds meanwhile, and the baby howling with all the strength of his lungs.

The priest and godmother then walked three times around the font, and the priest took the screaming babe and dipped him three times, all over, into the icy water (it was November). It seemed as if the little creature would surely be drowned, and as he stopped crying at the second dip he gasped for breath. After every dip they made the sign of the cross and said some ritual, while the poor little creature shivered, and finally they gave him back to his godmother endowed with the name of Dimitri-Miltiades. He was then dressed in his christening-robe, which is a tawdry affair of lace and stiff book-muslin and open all the way down the back, as was the one petticoat they put upon him.

As soon as the ceremony is over, these garments are laid away and the child replaced in his swaddling-clothes, with its arms fastened down to its sides, which makes a perfect little mummy of him and permits no movement except of his head. These strapped-up babies are kept so for eight or ten months, and are then taken out, and the boys put at once into pantaloons. Girls are considered misfortunes by parents, and boys only are called "children:" girls are nothing.

After the christening-robe is put on the child, each guest receives a small piece of silver or copper money with a hole in it, as a memento, and a larger coin and a cross are sewn on the baby's cap, where they remain until he is a year old, when the cap is taken off and preserved. Often men will be found who wear their christening-cap with the cross and coin as amulets. The priests then gather up all the candles and take a collection from the guests and parents, partake of some refreshments, and leave, after which the guests slowly disperse.

A funeral among the Bulgarians is also a strange ceremony. If a priest is not present when a person dies, a messenger is sent at once for one, and his office is to close the dead one's eyes and anoint the body. They do not wash them. Then a Savanota, or woman whose business it is to dress the dead, arrives with the savana, or winding-sheet, which she furnishes, and she wraps this about the body very skilfully, like a surgeon's bandage. After this, the ordinary garments worn by the dead while alive are ripped apart and wrapped over the body, which is placed in a shallow coffin, usually in a very short time after death.

The funeral takes place within a few hours after death, and rarely from church, as that is a heavy expense. The coffins are very frail. The procession of priests is long or short, poor or magnificent, according to the wealth of the family, and there is never a hearse or vehicle. The coffin is carried along the streets with the lid off, so that every one can see the corpse. This is done no matter what illness was the cause of death. The priests walk along with crosses, candles, and other emblems in their hands, and with slow and dignified steps, while they all recite prayers; and almost everywhere the people kneel while the procession passes, and all cross themselvs and pray for the dead. The women of a family never go to a funeral, that is, in the procession, but as the body is carried out they gather at the door or windows and scream and bewail their loss, begging the dead one not to go away forever; and though the scene is strange it is full of pathos, and their words of sorrow are full of wild eloquence.

When the procession reaches the cemetery, it gathers around the grave, which is always shallow, and as soon as the last words are said, and the coffin closed and consigned to the dust, each one present throws in one shovelful of dirt, and it is thus filled up before they leave. The coffin is not inclosed in a box, for their idea is, that the sooner the body decays the sooner the soul is at rest. No standing headstone is permitted, but a slab can be laid over the grave. Nine days after the burial all of the family go to the grave, and there weep, and partake of a memorial feast made of boiled wheat, raisins, sugar, and cinnamon, small plates of which are also sent to all their acquaintances. The initial letter of the dead one's name is made with cinnamon on the top of these plates of wheat. Three months later there is another similar memmorial feast, and another a year later, and such as are able hav prayers said in church on those occasions. Those who cannot do that burn a few candles to the memory of the departed one. In the smallest villages and in the country the poor peasants do the same, but the women also go to the grave. Those who are able to do so giv food to the poor at such times. The dead are mourned sincerely and unaffectedly, for the Bulgarians love each other tenderly and well.

The whole race is superstitious to a degree, and the belief in charms and omens, and above all the "evil eye," is absolute; and in every house you will find a garlic suspended over the door to conteract any ill effects from envious persons. Every maiden and child must wear at least one blue bead as a safeguard, and the same holds good of horses and other animals; and they even rub garlic on their household goods, and copper pots, and pans to protect them from evil influences.

If by accident a black garment is passed over a child, that child will die; if a closet door is left open while any one sleeps, the bodily Satan they all believe in will surely find ingress thereby; if they lose anything, they tie a knot in a handkerchief and throw it on the floor to bind Satan's hands in it so they can find their lost article in spite of him; and if a person steps across a child on the floor, that child will never grow any more. There are so many signs and omens that the relation of them would fill a book; and from them we hav certainly drawn a good many of our superstitious beliefs. They hav a firm reliance on fortune-tellers and prophets, and make divinations by the breast-bone of a chicken, or the shoulder-blade of a lamb.

A Little Agnosticism Needed.

The Unitarian Review says: "The diminution of subscriptions is an argument which even an American board would appreciate. In this forcible way they may yet be led to see something to admire in the converted pagan chief who drew his foot out of the baptismal water when he learned that all his ancestors were probably in hell-pit. They may realize that such heathen can best be reached by a missionary who indulges at least a hope that the good and true men and women may be saved who, unfortunately, never heard of the American board and its monopoly hold on salvation.

"We are not admirers of Agnosticism as a creed; but we should suppose that a slight infusion of it, amounting to a modest confession of human ignorance of a few of the certainties of the infinit future, would not seriously injure the theologians of the board. A considerably greater acquaintance than most of them show with the religious history and the moral excellences of the nations they complacently turn over to perdition would also become them. A little less Christian conceit and a little more human kindness, brethren! The superior court judge of this commonwealth characterized the situation well, and showed himself a rational theologian no less than a well-deserving pillar of the law, when he said: 'Looking at the question from a judicial standpoint, as I am accustomed to look at these things, it seems to me of very little importance what verdict may be rendered at the meetings of the American board, for no assurance can be given that the verdict will stand; and, let it be what it will, there will certainly be a motion for a new trial.'"

The Pastor and the Newsboys.

The Rev. A. B. Simpson, of the Madison Avenue Tabernacle, this city, conceived that it would be at least a conspicuous piece of Christian charity to giv the New York newsboys a Thanksgiving supper in his church. He did so, with the following interesting results, as given by the New York Herald:

The three hundred and fifty newsboys of the city who had secured tickets for the Thanksgiving supper were there to be fed. There were two or three blue-coated guardians of the law at the door to preserve order, but they could not prevent them from howling like wild demons.

A choir of young ladies, assisted by an organist, opened the evening festivities by singing a hymn, after which the Rev. A. B. Simpson introduced Mr. John Cowperthwaite to the boys.

"What does the Bible say you shall do, boys," asked Mr. Cowperthwaite, "if a sinner tries to entice you?" A perfect Babel of replies, making the Bible say strange things, came in reply:

"Slug'm on the ear!" "Hit him with a brick!" "Gouge his eye out!" "Kill'm!" "Get a cop and hav'm tooked in!"

"Silence, boys, silence!" roared Mr. Cowperthwaite. It was at least three minutes before he could stop the flood of answers. When he did he said, "Hav any of you ever been in the Tombs?"

"Yes! yes!" howled the bad boys, who had a big majority, while an almost drowned chorus of "No! no!" came from odd corners.

"I received a note from one of my little Sunday-school boys many years ago," said the speaker, "from the Tombs prison. Now, why do you think he sent for me?"

"He tought you were a pollytichun!" came from a little black-haired youngster.

"No; he wanted me to get him out. How do you think I got him out?"

"Pulled him out," shouted a dozen, while more yelled, "Yer buzzed de judge."

"I gave him a good character, boys. If you all hav good characters and keep them, you'll never hav any difficulty in getting out of trouble."

It was now supper-time, and the bright-eyed young women and benevolent old ladies began to pass plates around heaped with cakes and turkey.

Then the fun of the evening began. Many of the boys snatched each other's portions, and squabbles ensued. The good-natured teachers would drag the boys apart and giv them fresh plates.

The boys filled up on cake and turkey, and when the bread was passed they began to fire it around the room. When the young villains got their coffee, a great many of them amused themselvs by squirting mouthfuls of it into the eyes and ears of neighbors.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Heathen Illustration of the Temptation.]

The Bundehesh (a sacred book of the Persians,) states that Ahuramazda after creating the first man and woman, Mashya and Mashyana, bade them "to be humble of heart; to observe the law; to be pure in their thoughts, pure in their speech, pure in their actions." But an evil demon came to them in the form of a Serpent, sent by Ahriman, the prince of devils, and gave them fruit of a wonderful tree, which imparted immortality. Evil inclinations then entered their hearts, and all their moral excellence was destroyed. Consequently they fell, and forfeited the eternal happiness for which they were destined. They killed beasts, and clothed themselves in their skins.

A MAN calling himself Lord Courtenay has been the lion of Newark, N. J., society for a few weeks. He is now exposed as an impostor, and Newark society is much lowered in its own estimation.

THE Interstate Commerce Commission has decided that railroads "must furnish colored people, who buy first-class tickets, accommodations equally safe and comfortable with other first-class passengers."

THE mayor and ten aldermen of Lincoln, Neb., were lodged in jail on the 28th ult. They had been charged with malfeasance, and an injunction was issued against them, disregarding which they were locked up.

DR. PARKER, the London clergyman, preached in Plymouth church last Sunday. He has refunded the proceeds of the Beecher eulogy to the amount of $700, which goes to the monument fund. Dr. Parker failed to fulfil a lecture engagement, December 2d, at Norwich, Conn., and will be sued by Manager Logee for breach of contract.

HERR MOST, the Anarchist, now in the Tombs for making unpopular remarks in a public meeting, complains that the jails of this city are much inferior in accommodation to those of European cities where he has been confined. The cells, he says, are insufficiently heated, and are infested with rats which insist upon sharing his bed with him.

DEACON ALLAN THOMPSON GILLILAND, from Clay county, Tenn., came to New York last week to invest in some counterfeit money, of which he had received advertisments. He fell into the hands of swindlers, and was arrested with them and placed in the house of detention. The deacon now fervently wishes he were back in Clay county, Tenn.

Gems of Thought.

THE same histories, creeds, and confessions, with the impartial records of other writers, make it also most pointedly manifest that there is no essential difference between the spirit and conduct of the Protestant reformers and those infernal and beastly cruelties practiced in the darkest ages of popery, and that they, as well as their Catholic ancestors, gloried in nothing more than in building up their Zion with blood.—D. M. Bennett.

EVERY Christian know that from Genesis to Revelation there is not a single precept that forbids polygamy to anybody not a bishop, and that the prohibition in the New Testament upon a bishop that he should be the husband of only one wife, implies that whether any man not a bishop should be the husband of more than one, is left to his own choice. Every Christian knows that polygamy was practiced throughout the Old Testament period without divine, human, prophetic, or priestly rebuke of any kind; and every scholar knows that in casual instances, though greatly discouraged by the antagonistic heathen influence of the Greeks and Romans, the practice obtained in Judea till after the opening of the Christian era.—V. B. Denslow. [NOTE.—As to the precept about a bishop's being "the husband of one wife," we hav it given twice, as if it were of the least consequence, viz., in 1 Tim. iii, 2, and in Titus i, 6. The original may be interpreted in three ways: (1) A bishop must be the husband of one wife at least; (2) If the first die, he may take a second, and so on; or (3), He must hav one only wife. This is but one instance of the uselessness of human language to express any idea so as not to be liable to be misunderstood—if men are determined to misunderstand it.—Hylax.]

JOSEPH GETS PROMOTED.

And he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had: and they cried before him, Bow the knee: and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt.—Gen. xli, 43.

Odds and Ends.

"YES," said Mrs. Bascom to her neighbor, Mrs. Ponsonby, "I always did admire Deacon Samuels. He is the most dignified-looking man when he is asleep that I ever saw."

THERE was a young fellow whose forehead
Was high and decidedly florehead.
He thought it was grand,
But, as we understand,
His acquaintances all thought it horehead.

AS William bent over her fair face he whispered, "Darling, if I should ask you in French if I might kiss you, what would you answer?" She, summoning up her scanty knowledge of the French, replied, "Billet doux!"

TEACHER (at the mission Sunday-school): "Yes, children, Daniel was cast into a den of lions, but not one of them dared touch him. How strange ——" Pupil (scornfully): "Aw, dat's nuthin'. I seen a duck do that act in der cirkis last year."

JIPSO: "I heard that Matthew Arnold was an Agnostic." McCorkle: "No, that is decidedly wrong, if a definition I heard recently as to what constitutes an Agnostic is correct." J.: "What is the definition?" McC.: "That an Agnostic is one who does not know everything, and does not pretend to."

MINISTER (to bereaved widow): "Yes, Mrs. Mildew, John was such a good man—always the same, and you could know where to find him at all times." Widow: "Yes, that's so." (Sobs.) Minister: "And then in money matters he was always so open-handed! I remember a time I needed money badly and John went down in his pocket for the whole sum. Ah, it was such a help!" Widow: "Has (sob) it (sob) ever been (sob) paid back?"

"HOW old was Noah when he died?" asked a butcher of one of the negro whitewashers on the market. "Now, you stop right dar!" was the emphatic reply. "Why, Josiah, what's the matter with you?" "I'se had 'sperience, sah—dat's what's de matter wid me." "How?" "Jist got fru serving a sentence of thirty days in de workhouse kase I couldn't agree wid de ole woman whether King Solomon had red or black hair. Doan' want no mo' Bible talk fur six months, sah—not a talk!"

"IT was the last request of the deceased," said a Kansas City minister in the course of the funeral sermon of one of that city's most activ real estate boomers, "that immediately after the services at the grave an auction sale of lots in his Prospect park addition be held, and for that purpose Colonel Inflater, the well-known real estate auctioneer, will be present and conduct the sales. A strange request, you will say, my friends, and a queer place for such a sale—in a cemetery. My own idea," continued the minister, as he propped up the back cover of the Bible with the hymn-book, "was to hav the procession go around by Prospect park with a brass band and hold the auction right on the lots before going to the cemetery at all; then buyers could see just what they were getting. But then, no two men ever conducted a real estate boom exactly alike, and the dying wish of the brother shall be complied with. Sing the 275th hymn, the 275th—'Away, vain earthly things.'"

TIMELY WISDOM.

They strolled along through the wood together,
A manly youth and a maiden fair,
Gathering leaves in the autumn weather,
Tinted with colors most rich and rare.

He said, "You are much like the autumn leaves,
With your cheeks of red and your hair of gold;
And your heart the frost that the leaf receives
Ere its hues are seen—for your heart is cold."

The maiden answered, "It may be so—
You've known me long, and perhaps know best—
But the frozen leaf soon thaws, you know,
After 'tis gathered and properly pressed."

"SIR," said the prisoner, "I did not pay this man for my refreshments because I know nothing of the value of money. I am a child of genius." "And what is your age?" asked the justice. "Forty-two years." "Then it is time you were weaned," and his honor gave him thirty days away from the bottle.

"I HAD intended, brethren," said a Texas pastor, "to preach a sermon this morning on the universality of the plan of salvation, but I hav just learned that Brother McBender has collected my last quarter's salary, and instead of paying it to me has taken it and run off with the wife of Brother Clugston. I will therefore invite your attention on this occasion to a few remarks from the text: 'These shall go away into everlasting punishment.'"

THE SIOUXS.

A wandering tribe, called the Siouxs,
Wear moccasins, having no shiouxs;
They are made of buckskin,
With the fleshy side in,
Embroidered with beads of bright hiouxs.

When out on the warpath, the Siouxs
March single file—never by twiouxs—
And by blazing the trees
Can return at their ease,
And their way in the forests ne'er liouxs.

All new-fashioned boats he eschiouxs,
And uses the birch-bark caniouxs:
They are handy and light,
And, inverted at night,
Giv shelter from storms and from diouxs.

The principal food of the Siouxs
Is Indian maize, which they briouxs,
Or hominy make,
Or mix a cake,
And eat it with pork as they chiouxs.

Now, doesn't this spelling look ciouxrious?
'Tis enough to make anyone fiouxrious!
So, a word to the wise:
Pray, our language revise
With orthography not so injiouxrious!

A TEACHER who, having gone through Euclid's demonstration (of the 47th proposition of the First Book), should add that the hypothenuse was quantitativly related to the sides in that manner, because the divine will had so ordered it, would impeach his own competence as a mathematician, and would confuse and offend the intelligence of his pupil; for, the pupil having once fairly apprehended the truth, it becomes to him quite beyond the power of any will, human or divine, to change it. When ethics shall hav become scientifically formulated, the suggestion of a divine will, as a source of moral law, will be felt to be equally impertinent.—E. D. Stark.

JUDGE BLACK probably thinks that the difference in the weight of rocks and clouds was created by law; that parallel lines fail to meet only because it is illegal; that diameter and circumference could hav been so made that it would be a greater distance across than around a circle; that a straight line could inclose a triangle if not prevented by law, and that a little legislation could make it possible for two bodies to occupy the same space at the same time. . . . The mind of every thoughtful man is forced to one of these two conclusions: either that the universe is self-existent, or that it was created by a self-existent being. To my mind, there are far more difficulties in the second hypothesis than in the first.—Ingersoll.

AND who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good? But and if ye suffer for righteousness's sake (that is, for doing good), happy are ye: and be not afraid of their terror, neither be troubled.—1 Peter iii, 13, 14.

THE Jewish Messenger says—and the statement is very suggestiv: "It is useless to deny that the majority of our people, especially the young, are not attracted to our religious shrines, except on rare occasions." The young Israelites do not stick to the faith of their fathers. Neither do they become Christians. They cease to be religious. And the chief cause of their apostasy is that the young Jew has no Sabbath. He is for the most part surrounded by such associations as keep him from the synagog on Saturday; and so he neglects religion and becomes an Infidel.—Family Treasury.

FEAR not that tyrants shall rule forever,
Or the priests of the bloody faith;
They stand on the brink of a mighty river
Whose waves they hav tainted with death.
It is fed from the depth of a thousand dells;
Around them it foams, and rages, and swells,
And their swords and scepters I floating see,
Like wrecks on the surge of eternity.

—Shelley.

I LACK words to express my sense of the incoherence, irrationality, and general shockingness of the common view of the atonement. Sin and holiness are no matters of imputation; penalty cannot be substitutional, and in none of God's works can we find a hint of anything so confused, awkward, incongruous, out of the divine style (so to speak), as this whole "scheme" elaborated. I would say in passing, in the thick darkness of the Dark Ages . . . Say what any man or all men will, of the poverty and fallibility of reason, whatever is plainly irrational we are bound to reject, wherever we may meet with it.—W. C. Tenney.

Notes and Clippings.

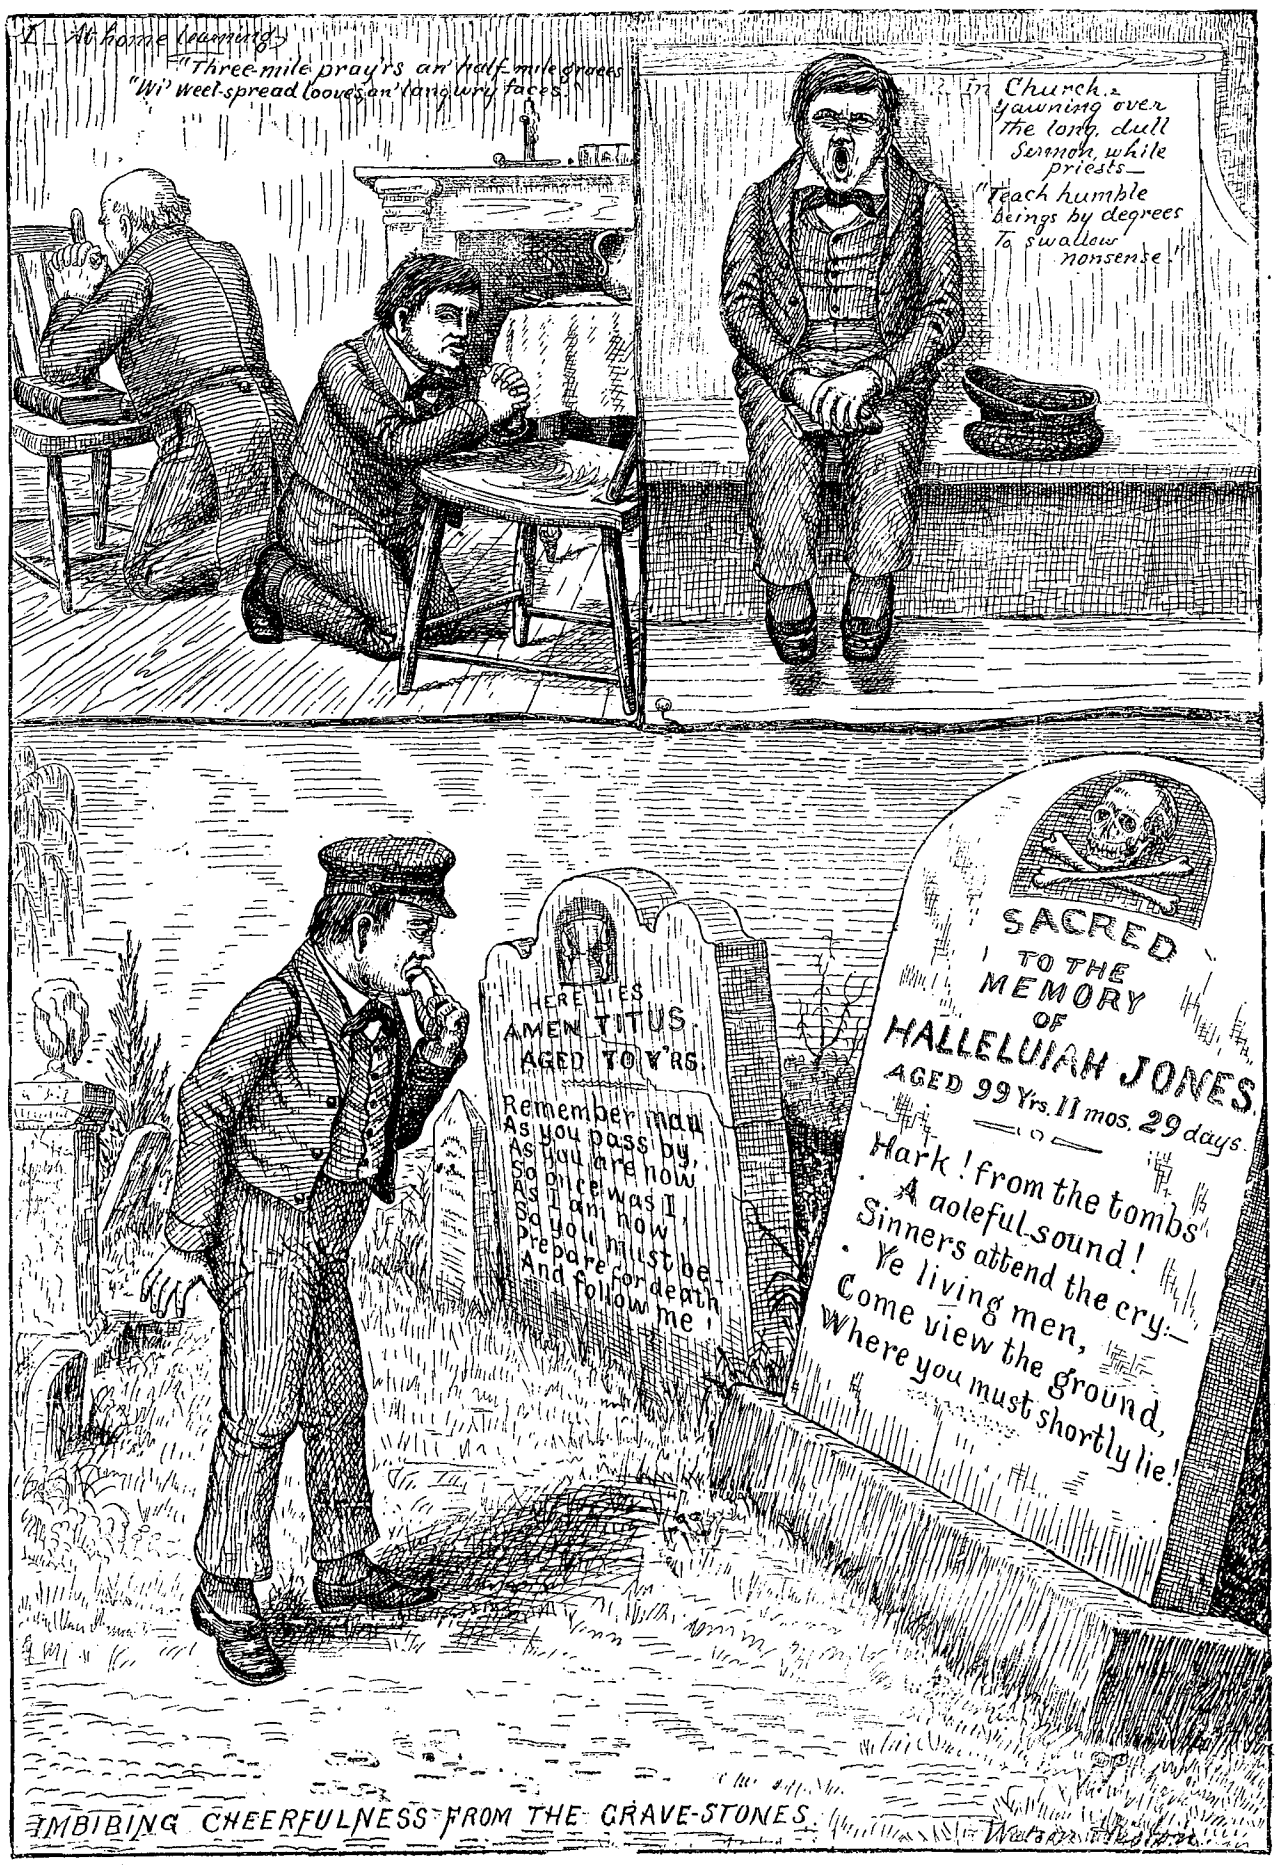
THE Roman Catholics hav built a new church at Varennes, Quebec, costing $100,000. We should like to know just how many farms and buildings hav been mortgaged to meet the assessments levied by the bishop for this purpose.

SISTERS of Mercy, says the Catholic Union and Times, are now engaged as teachers of the public schools of Ivesdale, Ill.



WE are now to hav a Roman Catholic chaplain in the United States navy. He will be a priest from the diocese of New York.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX advocates the ostracising of divorced women from refined society. Miss Ella is getting to feel entirely too big for her clothes. She has probably forgotten the fact that but for the charity of some poor men, one of whom livs in Cloud county, who paid for her schooling, she would not be the noisy browler she is. She seems to be as heartless as witty and talented.—The Blade, Concordia, Kan.

THE Rev. Morgan Hughes, vicar of Derwen, in North Wales, is causing great excitement by enforcing his claims to the full arrears of his tithes. He obtained bailiffs from a distant part of the country and suddenly distrained on haystacks at two farms. The town crier soon proclaimed the fact at Ruthin, and five hundred farmers and others at once set out to hunt the bailiffs, who, however, had disappeared. There was a large gathering on the day appointed for the sale of the haystacks. An effigy of the vicar in a dilapidated white shirt to represent his surplice was displayed on the top of one of the stacks, together with another curious effigy of the auctioneer. On the other farm a grotesque image of a gigantic tithe bailiff was placed on the stack, and a red flag was hoisted bearing the word "Disestablishment." Satirical verses by a local poet were also displayed. The auctioneer, however, thought discretion was the better part of valor, and failed to appear. Resolutions were passed condemning the rector and supporting Disestablishment.—London Freethinker.

THE Episcopalian church of Canon City, Col., does not appear to agree with its Eastern contemporaries on the subjects of dancing and card-playing. On the 2d of December it held a "Dance! dance! for the benefit of the Episcopal church, at St. Cloud Hotel, at which card-playing and a general good time" was enjoyed.

THE General Christian Conference now being held at Washington, D. C., under the auspices of the Evangelical Alliance, is producing a countless number of delightful and sapient maxims of government. As an instance, it being remarked by a member that "the cause of the estrangement of the masses from the church is the antagonism of the foreigners to our evangelical life," Rev. J. M. Foster urges that "a Christian nation should hav a Christian government, and this would solve the immigration problem."

SUNDAY RECREATIONS OF ORTHODOX BOYHOOD.

JOHN MOST, the Communist-Anarchist, who was tried for incendiary language used in a speech condemning the Illinois authorities for hanging the Chicago Anarchists, has been sentenced to one year's imprisonment in the penitentiary. A stay of execution, however, was granted pending an appeal to the appelate court. One of the best lawyers in the United States tells us that Most's conviction on an appeal to the prejudice of the jury surreptitiously introduced by the district attorney is an injustice which will probably result in a new trial being secured by the accused.

THE mystery of evil and consequent misery on the premises of an infinitly holy and infinitly kind being, who has also infinit power, we hav on our hands for explanation; and, until some theodicy, or something, has disposed of that, we may as well relegate lesser things to the relativ obscurity in which they belong.—Boston Congregationalist.

M. PASTEUR is studying a method of inoculating the New South Wales rabbits with a disease which will exterminate them, to gain a prize of £25,000 offered by the New South Wales government.

IN February last the Rev. J. J. Hoffman was dismissed from the pastorate of St. Peter's German Reformed church in Sheboygan, Wis. He refused to giv up the parsonage, and the people, failing to get any satisfaction in the courts, determined to take the matter into their own hands. And so the other day a crowd, including fifteen women of the congregation, forcibly put the pastor and his family into the street and sent the furniture following after them.

THE following report of a lively meeting, at which the speakers were old acquaintances of our readers, is from the New York Times: "Edward W. Searing, the Progressive Labor party candidate for district attorney in the last election, lectured on the 4th inst. on the 'Lessons of the Last Campaign.' In a very mild way he suggested that certain men in the party, among them Editor Shevitch, had devoted perhaps a little too much time to explaining that Anarchist did not mean Anarchist. The future would see the party succeed, he thought, if in later campaigns some one man be placed at the head of the party organization. Dr. Weeks and Mrs. Hinton spoke words of praise of the poor Chicago victims and of 'Mr. Most.' Captain Clark launched into an argument against Socialism, which he characterized as 'the serpent of old, now hissing and raising its head, that the heel of every honest man should crush.' He was interrupted by hisses and groans, with a few uncomplimentary remarks. For a moment the Socialistic audience seemed about to turn again and rend Captain Clark, but he speedily fled. As the door closed on his unfinished speech and vanishing form, Colonel Hinton shook his locks, and said: 'Why, do you know what that man is? He is a piratical old slave-trader! He ought not to be allowed to speak anywhere! He is an enemy of mankind, and every honest man should spit in his face.'"

THE Catholic church has never condemned slavery. It has never taught that it is wrongful in the individual to hold slaves where slavery is sanctioned by municipal law; it has never even taught that the system of slavery is in itself wrongful. Its teachings would doubtless condemn slave insurrection or incitement to slave insurrection, or any attempt to abolish slavery by illegal and violent means.—The Standard.

Life and Death—Hell and Heaven—God and Eternity.

If you want to put a Christian's pipe out, and witness a display of Christian forbearance, just insist upon his telling where hell is. Whenever a Christian tries to locate heaven or hell, his philosophy begins to limp. Though he cannot tell where hell is, if you press your question he will giv you to understand that you are on the most direct road to it. He will try to tell you that you are in nature's darkness, while God has opened his eyes to see things spiritually which are veiled from your sight. His philosophy can only be equaled by the old Dutchman's who fell up-stairs and stuck a knot-hole in his eye.

All the Christian knows about hell is that it is disagreeably hot, and full of brimstone. All he knows about heaven is that he will go there and meet his God (who is everywhere present) and walk the golden streets and wear a golden crown and play a golden harp, and that all who hav not been anointed with Christian goose-grease will never get there. All gold in heaven, all brimstone in hell. It seems to me that a God with a good head on him might avoid such extremes. No Christian will be permitted to talk to me about the goodness of a God when it is accompanied with his barbarous idea of hell.

It strikes me that a good unbeliever, full of loving kindness like Colonel Ingersoll, ought to fare about as well as the Puritans, who whipped women on their naked backs. But it doesn't seem to be according to God's plan.

A Christian told me the other day that heaven was a spiritual abode and could be understood and appreciated only by the spiritually minded. The idea of spiritual streets, and harps, and crowns of gold can hav no foundation in reason.

If heaven is a spiritual place, hell is a spiritual place. If the gold of heaven is spiritual, the fire and brimstone of hell are spiritual. The truth is, no such places exist. Instead of spiritual abodes, they are only abodes of the imagination, invented only to enslave the masses for the benefit of a religious aristocracy.

The old, barbarous idea of hell is now entertained by but few men of inquiring minds. Fifty years ago no sermon was complete unless hell was uncapped and the minds of the hearers harrowed up with a picture of the torments of the damned. Language is too feeble to express all that has been suffered on account of a belief in this hell of the Christians. Mothers hav wept for children, even helpless babes, whom they believed had been cast into hell. Sons and daughters hav wrung their hands in anguish because they believed that the kind old father and the tender old mother were suffering the torments of the damned.

Can the human mind conceive a more barbarous idea than that of a mother who has brought up a family of children and watched over them and cared for them with a heart so tender and a mind so affectionate, being rewarded for her affection and kindness with eternal punishment?

In early youth the Christian has his mind warped with these pictures of heaven and hell, and he is incapable of reasoning correctly. In the first place, it is an awful sin to question anything which God has done. He is a great God—a powerful God. "He is angry with the wicked every day," and would be very likely to send a wicked boy to hell who plays ball on Sunday.

To take all that has been taught and believed about God, it would be hard to tell whether he is an ass or an angel; whether he is a God of peace or war, or both; whether a child is born to be saved or damned—in short, if all the contradictions and absurdities could be united in one being, it would be a fit representativ of the Christian's God.

Thousands of Christians are down on their knees at the same time, asking God to answer contradictory petitions, some of them so absurd and ridiculous as to lead one to think that the petitioner was either an idiot or a lunatic. If I believed in a prayer-answering God, I would pray not to hav their prayers answered.

Ask Darwin, or Humboldt, or Draper about God, and he shakes his head dubiously. If you want to know all about God, ask not a scientist of deep research, but go to the little boy in Sunday-school and ask him who made him, and he will tell you "God." The Sunday-school miss and the little boy know all about God. The more ignorant they are the more positiv they are, and the more decided about matters which it is impossible for man to know.

But the Christian insists that "there must be a God, else how could we account for the sun and moon and all the planets?" Then back of these worlds there must be a creator, greater and more wonderful than the things created. If this being, greater than all of these worlds, could hav an existence without a creator or designer, may not the lesser things exist without a creator? In other words, if God made the sun and moon and world, who made God? If these worlds require a maker, so does God; and, then, who made the "maker?"

Christians generally know but little about the solar system. They devote so much time to God and heavenly things that they hav little time for such trifling matters. "God created the heaven and the earth" generally bounds their knowledge of astronomy.

One man forms his idea of God, and carves it in wood or stone and worships it. Another, a little more advanced, forms his idea of God, and though he may not represent it by wood or stone, he worships it the same as the other.

After some years of study and experience he finds out that some of his ideas about God are erroneous; immediately his God must be changed so as to agree with the advanced idea. Few realize how many changes their God has passed through. It is easy enough to tell how gods are made, but to tell how these imaginary gods could make worlds is a choker.

It is interesting to trace God in his career from a savage and irrational God up to something like a half-way consistent and civilized God.

He used to cover the land in darkness and stop the sun and moon, turn all the waters into blood, cover the country with frogs and lice, and

> Wi' mair o' horrible and awful,
> Which ev'n to name wad be unlawful.

You hav heard of no such pranks lately. He has sobered down into quite a steady-going God. Even since I can remember, he used to save a few and damn the many—not because the few were good, or the many bad, but he did it just for "his own glory." Even unoffending babes were the objects of his wrath, and millions were brought into existence only to see the light and be cast into hell. He is a better and decenter God to-day. It beats all how God improves as Christians outgrow their barbarous notions.

If the idea of God should be wiped from the human mind, would not the law of gravitation be just what it is now? Would not the daily and yearly revolutions of the planets be the same? Would not the tides continue to ebb and flow? Would not the seasons run their ceaseless rounds? With all of these phenomena God has no more to do than a puff of smoke.

For if it should so turn out that the sun and planets move in space in keeping with unalterable law, and if it be a fact that every seed sprouts and every animal livs in obedience to fixed principles, what use is there for a God?

If you cast a stone into the air, do you want a God to make it return to the earth again? The truth is, all the gods, little and big, could not prevent it.

There would be in nature nothing complex or requiring a God if we were familiar with all her laws. If the simplest processes of nature can be accomplished without a God, so can the most complex.

If a cabbage seed be planted in good soil and properly cared for, a large head of cabbage will be the result. But the help of all the Gods will not produce a large cabbage in barren soil which does not yield sufficient nourishment for the plant. If the help of God is not required to grow a head of cabbage, neither is it required to fashion a world.

The Christians' God is a strange compound, a sort of hybrid or tribrid composed of three parts. The first part is an old father God. The second part is a great ghost. The third part is divided into two equal parts, half ghost and half human, begotten by one-third of the whole God, and brought forth by a Jew girl. The whole God is eternal, yet one-third of it was born less than two thousand years ago. This is a perfect analysis of God according to Christian philosophy. And the Christian can undergo no torture equal to that of being deprived of this three-pronged, triple-headed God.

It would seem that the Christian clings to his God with a tenacity proportioned to the unreasonableness of the idea.

This divine monstrosity must accompany the Christian wherever he goes. He bows himself before this great ghostly nothing in the most servil manner. He thinks he cannot breathe or do anything without permission from this almighty "What is it?" which is less in substance than the lightest kind of gas.

And yet from this airy nothing was evolved not only the sun and planets, but all the shining orbs scattered throughout the boundless realms of space. Truly there is but one step between the sublime and the ridiculous.

In this world effects follow causes. Penalties follow the violations of law. Frost and fire affect the good and bad alike. Fire has no choice between saints and sinners. Good health is the reward for proper conditions. Atheists fare as well as Christians. God has no friends to reward, no enemies to punish. Man holds in his own hand all the rewards and punishments meted out to him.

Hav all the churches and cathedrals ever built increased the happiness of God? Hav all the prayers ever offered up added one iota to his enjoyment?

Has not every rational and humane effort put forth to better the condition of man been blest with good results and added to his happiness? If all men should endeavor to increase the happiness of the human family, would God fare any worse?

These considerations ought to satisfy every rational mind that there is no reward for human effort unless it be directed to the bettering of earthly conditions. Building temples and serving a visionary God is without reward, and is what ought to be known as ideal idolatry.

This narrow neck of land to which I hav referred (this life) is our home. All that we can enjoy or suffer must be confined to its narrow limits. Human endeavor ought to be turned to increasing the happiness of and banishing the sorrow from this world. Instead of turning our attention to God, whom we cannot help, and who cannot help us; instead of losing sight of all happiness here in anticipation of a heaven which will never be realized; instead of fretting about a fiery hell which does not exist, let us banish the hell on earth which "man's inhumanity to man" produces by cruel wars, and by oppressing and taking advantage of each other, and practice acts of kindness instead of cruelty.

Christianity, like the ever-changing moon, is constantly assuming new phases in order to keep step with the onward march of civilization. But it is always behind, never in advance. Three hundred years ago God was pleased when they burnt heretics. The study of the sciences gave a new impetus to civilization, and the brutality of such conduct was made apparent. And when the advance guard had set up another mile-stone to denote the progress which had been made, Christians found out that God was not pleased with hanging witches and whipping women. God has improved and Christians reformed in proportion as science has triumphed and civilization made progress.

Thus instead of Christianity molding the minds of the people and urging them on to nobler deeds and loftier thoughts, it is itself being molded and irresistibly forced to follow in the wake of science and civilization. The progress of the race is steady and sure, though, like the precession of the equinoxes, the motion is apparent only to the closest observers. Ultimately, science will discover that the world has no need of demons, saviors, or gods, and Christianity will be classed with other musty forms and ceremonies which hav retarded the world's advancement for a season, and then died.

Even now there is not nearly the use for a God that there was a hundred years ago. His hand used to be seen in everything sublime, terrible, and awful. The storm and the lightning, the earthquake and volcano, were special manifestations of his power. As these phenomena are more closely investigated, and their philosophy understood, it is found that no God is required to do nature's work.

When a boiler explodes the inference is that somebody has been careless, or there has been an oversight or mistake. But nobody asks if God let on the steam.

God does not interfere in the affairs of men as he did once. God is constantly changing for the better. He has sanctioned every barbarous Christian act for hundreds of years. He did not even rebuke the cruelties of the Inquisition. The priests declared that he gave sanction to the torturer. He is no such God now.

When the people come to realize that God is constantly changing—that the God of the Jews was a different god from the God of the present time—and that he grows more merciful and tolerant as the people outgrow their savage propensities, they will understand that God is simply a creature of the imagination, and exists nowhere only in the minds of men.

The fact that God and Christianity are constantly changing ought to act as an eye-opener to every thinking mind. Perfection cannot grow better. If God sanctioned the tortures of the Inquisition, he is in favor of them now. If Christianity was in error when it inflicted those tortures, it is liable to be wrong now, and cannot be taken as a guide in human action.

I conversed with a woman who had not been off her bed without help for fourteen years. Her constant theme was the goodness of God. I looked upon the pale, emaciated form and asked myself, If God is good, how long would this poor, patient sufferer be thus afflicted? It seemed to me to be the last link that Christianity could be capable of welding into its great chain of absurdity.

When the principles of science are taught in the schools and become the topic of conversation in the family and are applied to every dogmatic assertion, such ideas will no more be taught than hedgehogs will be bred for children to play with.

By stress of circumstances everyone must be compelled to admit that Christianity has never raised the minds of the people above the burning of heretics and the hanging of witches and infant damnation. Christianity was itself lifted above these savage thoughts and practices by an enlightenment not its own.

Has not the world been made better by being lifted above such a nightmare? Can it be possible that any were ever made better by such horrid beliefs in regard to God and humanity?

So long as an imaginary tyrant in the skies is worshiped man will be enslaved and belittled; so long as men strive for an imaginary heaven, human interests will be neglected and earth remain a scene of misery; so long as men are respected who teach these unnatural and delusiv doctrins, the lofty hights which I believe man is capable of attaining will never be reached. When the gaze of men is turned from heaven to earth they will begin to study the laws of nature and learn that all the gods cannot alter them, and the welfare of man will become the chief thought.

When we learn the great lesson that all the hell there is comes from our own carelessness, or from neglect, or design; when we learn that God and heaven are only fanciful pictures engraved upon the mind in early youth, we shall turn our attention to things of this life, and begin to trample down the thorns and thistles and plant flowers in their stead—we shall make this narrow country to which we are confined a fit abode for that being who, in his highest estate and perfected condition, will outrank all the gods, and whose welfare will become the ultimatum of human endeavor. If it be possible to bring about a better state of things, if selfishness and crime can be abolished, if want and misery can be banished, if man can be brought to that state of perfection (as I believe he can) that he will seek to do the right and avoid the wrong—would there be any need of heli? Would not every idea of justice be outraged if such beings were eternally tormented? And would they not get along without a God better than they would with such a God as they hav had for thousands of years? On the other hand, if the race can be brought up to such a high standard, will men be unfitted for a state of bliss if there is one? JOHN PECK.

The Gospel According to Common Sense.

"THE DIVINE LEGATION OF MOSES."

I hav borrowed this sub-heading from an English bishop long since dead, who will not be likely to complain of the plagiarism It might hav been different had I written of the mistakes of Moses, but then a man may be said to make a mistake when he fails in what he undertakes, and that certainly Moses did not do. He was probably the most successful humbug recorded in history, of whom Mohammed and Joe Smith were but weak imitations. He had, perhaps, a better cause than either of his successors, being the self-elected champion of an oppressed people, who, like the modern Irish, were longing for Home Rule. To this, Pharaoh, of whom the English Tory premier is an antitype, would not consent. And then commenced a series of miracles and plagues, which would be altogether incredible did not modern Spiritualism furnish us with a key as to the manner in which the miracles were performed. When at an "electro-biological" entertainment we see a number of persons presumably sane, and complete strangers to the operator, at his bidding believe that it burns, that it rains, that it freezes, that they are drinking from imaginary vessels, that they become intoxicated thereby, and so on, we can understand the frogs, lice, and rivers of blood that seemed to plague the Egyptians. That the magicians of Pharaoh were able to produce the same effects by their enchantments is conclusiv. They, however, found a master magician in Moses, who compelled his rivals to imagin that they were afflicted with boils, and unable to appear against him. Pharaoh was evidently one of the hard-headed sort; they could not impose upon him. I hav never been introduced to the arcana of Spiritualism. The presence of one unbeliever like myself is sufficient to spoil the whole affair. To see large pieces of furniture moved by invisible hands, to hear the scratching of a pencil under the table where no one is using it, to read the writing so miraculously procured, requires faith of which I do not possess the requisit grain. Such was evidently the case with Pharaoh. His usual retort to all these manifestations of an occult power amounted to, "You cannot humbug me." And then Moses tried another plan, as diabolically conceived as the Phœnix Park murders, but less clumsily carried out. The Israelites, largely scattered about as domestic servants in the houses of their Egyptian taskmasters, were instructed on a given night to murder the first-born of the family. Outdoor emissaries were largely employed as well, and that these might not mistake the houses at which the deed was to be performed, the Israelites were instructed to sprinkle their door-posts with blood, so that the "destroying angel" might pass them by. If he had been really a supernatural visitant, he would not hav required such a guide. They managed their work very adroitly, and after the manner of things, probably by strangulation, so as to leave no blood or bloody weapons as witnesses against them, and their victims were supposed to hav died a natural death. No wonder that the Egyptians were glad to get rid of their troublesome neighbors at any price, which will account for the loans of gold and silver to induce them to go.

Pharaoh, hard-headed to the last, thought when too late that it would be a good plan to exterminate them utterly. That he failed in the attempt is a matter of history which must be received with a good many grains of salt. The story that a large number of persons sojourned during forty years in a wilderness where there was no sustenance for man or beast is either altogether a myth or a gross exaggeration. Like the Mormon exodus, the beginning of their career was unpromising, and all the original emigrants died by famin or other causes. But the recuperativ power of fanaticism is astonishing. Moses did not liv to see them through, but he propounded a series of laws, some good and some bad, many of which remain in force to the present day. Where he got them from, is a question I will not undertake to answer. The God that spoke to Moses from the burning bush proclaimed himself to be the incomparable ego, and I hav a shrewd suspicion that Moses and his God were one and the same person. The partial biographer of Moses describes him as the meekest of men, but he was evidently the most ferocious. His own wife said he was "a bloody husband." He was undoubtedly a sanguinary lawgiver. To condemn a poor wretch to be stoned for gathering a few sticks on the Sabbath was the climax of cruelty. I am inclined to think that the God of Moses was a myth like Mrs. Harris, a stalking-horse, an inexorable Jorkins, to whom he attributed the revolting laws he was ashamed to promulgate on his own responsibility.

Like Mohammed, he was an advocate for street cleanliness, which is the one redeeming feature in their respectiv characters. The Jews were naturally a dirty lot, who could not be persuaded to wash themselvs unless it was inculcated as a religious duty. When Moses lifted up the brazen serpent in the wilderness, it was the apotheosis of common sense. Those who understood the symbol forthwith resorted to soap and water, which common sense tells us is the most effectual way to remove those cuticular parasites to which dirty people are liable.

Essenism and Christianity.

The Essenes, a sect of advanced Pharisees, were probably the immediate originators of Christianity.

Taking this as a text from an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER entitled, "The Pagan Origin of Christianity," the "Man of Sin" will now sermonize:

Josephus (Ant. xv, 10, §15) describes a notable Essene named Manahem, who was held in great esteem by Herod the Great, because when Herod was a child and going to school Manahem saluted him as king of the Jews, and prophesied for him a happy reign until toward its close. So when Herod became king he continued to honor all the Essenes.

Turn now to Acts xiii, 1, 2:

> Now there were in the church that was at Antioch certain prophets and teachers, as Barnabas, and Simeon that was called Niger, and Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen, which had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch, and Saul.

The name Manaen is unquestionably the same as Manahem. The Greek has no letter h, and the difference between the final letter n and m is doubtless only accidental. Furthermore, Canon Farrar, and other Christian scholars, recognize the identity of the two names. And some hav conjectured that the Manahen of Acts might hav been a son of Manahem the Essene. But the interval between the two would be too great. Herod was born about 73 years B.C., and was a boy when Manahem was an adult.

We will now parallel the Manahem of Josephus with the Manahen of Acts:

| Manahem of Josephus. | Manahen of Acts. |
|---|---|
| Was a prophet and Essene; | Was a prophet and teacher; |
| Knew Herod the Great when a boy; | Was brought up with Herod's son Antipas; |
| Is mentioned as living about three years after the great famin of 24–23 B.C. | Is mentioned just after the famin in the reign of Claudius, about A.D. 47. |

Are not those striking parallels? And how are we to account for them? Manahem the Essene a friend of Herod the Great, and Manahen the Christian who was brought up with Herod the tetrarch, that is, with Herod Antipas, a son of Herod the Great! The interval between the two Manahems, if we are to accept the chronology of Acts, is about 70 years. Josephus's dates are reliable; those of the book of Acts are false and conflicting. Josephus's history is quite free from corruption; the book of Acts is quite otherwise, the text having been more tampered with than any other book in the New Testament. And the compiler of the fabulous book, or a later scribe, sought to make the record fit the period between A.D. 29 and 63. It would not do, therefore, to allow the text to stand with Manahen contemporary with Herod the Great, so he interpolated "Herod the tetrarch," who governed Galilee and Perea from 4 B.C. until A.D. 39.

The fact is, that whatever historical truth is to be found in the fabulous book of Acts belongs to a period long before the time of Tiberius and Pontius Pilate. There was a Jesus who was stoned and hanged for sorcery about 75 years B.C., and among his disciples were the five prophets and teachers named in Acts xiii, 1, 2, to wit, Barnabas, Simeon, Lucius, Manahem, and Saul.

Lucius was, perhaps, Luke, who may hav written the nucleus of a gospel, Manahem was an Essene, and Saul was an advanced Pharisee. ANTICHRIST.

More Hopeless than Sodom.

Strange how priestcraft, leading sectarianism, warps and twists the New Testament by selecting a few texts and overlooking the whole. Were the work of any author treated as they treat the New Testament, it could be perverted in the same way. One positiv text they overlook, where Christ after advising a man to sell all he has and giv to the poor declares, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven." Plainly, then, no rich man can ever be saved, and so his followers understood it, for they were astounded, and asked: "Who then can be saved?" The reply is equally applicable to every like assertion as to punishment and election and eternal damnation: "With man this is impossible, but with God all things are possible." Yet the rich, luxuriously living priests of the sects complacently regard this text, while sentencing to everlasting horrors ninety-nine hundreths of the human race on the strength of one or two obscure texts of Paul about election, which plainly allude to this life alone, and especially to those Christians who, by a happy chance, were living in the time of Christ and his immediate followers. They were the elect, the chosen ones to spread the gospel, and as the whole theory of the condition of the future life is based on the idea of degrees of happiness or punishment, they should rejoice with joy unspeakable because of their assured exalted places in the kingdom hereafter. There is hardly a chapter of the gospels relating Christ's words that does not convey the idea of degrees of rewards and punishments as a matter of course. When the terrible injustice of punishing heathen and infants is suggested to these well-fed Pharisees, they cannot think that "with God all things are possible." They assert that we are as clay in the potter's hands; that God's judgments, however severe on the innocent, are just, although Paul says distinctly, "Where there is no law there is no penalty;" "That sin is not imputed where there is no law;" and speaking of unbelievers declares, "God concluded them all in unbelief that he might hav mercy upon all," and that "all Israel shall be saved." "Who hath known the mind of God or who hath been his counselor?" Had he known John Calvin this might not hav been asked. A Freethinker of culture listening to the wranglings of these sects, is perfectly amazed when he comes to read the New Testament as a whole, just as he would any other work, and sees what ignorance and prejudice hav made of it. Any one of several hundred texts, or some one narrativ of an event, is taken, and a creed is made, and people are told to adopt it as the only safety, in spite of the words of Christ and his actions that over and over again declare that "whatsoever ye would men should do to you do ye even so unto them, for this is the law and the prophets" (Matt. vii, 12). But you must love God. Answer: He who does as above proves his love of God. Love of man is love of God. No man can love his fellow-man, as directed by Christ, unless he hav all the qualities of a Christian or good man—meekness of spirit, mercy, charity, and all others. And, vice versa, he cannot be charitable, or meek, and the like, unless he loves his fellow-man.

Christ said, "Blessed are the merciful and pure in heart, for they shall obtain mercy and see God."

The Presbyterian church says, "Yes, provided they are of the elect, and are duly baptized, and observe the Sabbath day (on Sunday, as ordered by Constantine), and support our church, and are not heathen," etc.

Observe that Christ and the apostles, wherever they describe any conduct as assuring to the one who acts in accord with it a place in heaven, invariably describe conduct that is impossible to one who hates his fellow-man, or even to one who does not love his fellow.

"Love God and thy neighbor as thyself." These two are all; and this last is all, because it includes the first as the first does the last. So says Christ. "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance; all are in unbelief that all may be saved: where no law is there can be no transgression," says Paul. Yet the churches, taking a few verses plainly applying to temporal conditions, and others that are merely advisory as to conduct and conversation before the world, include nearly all the world in eternal damnation, and that, too, with penalties without degrees.

Plainly, "it shall be more tolerable for Sodom" at the judgment than for them. Plainly, "they shall be rewarded according to their works." Plainly, "they shall in nowise come out thence until they hav paid the uttermost farthing." Plainly, some of them shall be "least in the kingdom of heaven"—if they are not great in the kingdom of hell, where they may be detained until they hav paid the uttermost farthing.

None but the elect are saved, "yet the son of man came to seek and save that which was lost." "All power is given unto him in heaven and in earth," yet the meek, the pure in spirit, the humble, kindly lover of his fellow, whom he assured should see God and be greatest in his kingdom, are forever lost if not of the elect, if not of the church, if not dipped, if not sacrament partakers, if not this, that, or the other. "Neither do I condemn thee." Had she repented—joined the church? "Raise the dead." What! shall they only hav another opportunity at salvation? See what a commotion was raised among the Pharisees lately, because a few among them, kindly of heart, merciful in disposition, loving even the poor heathen, ventured to express a faint hope that even they who had never heard their gospel might be saved.

Oh, 'tis enough to make the very angels weep at seeing poor man cutting such fantastic tricks before high heaven! HOLT.

Revival of Religious Bigotry.

The Thanksgiving sermons preached in Chicago were, as the tailors say, "all of the same piece." It looked as though the numerous secretaries of the God-in-the-Constitution movement had furnished our divines with the mental pabulum necessary for so important an occasion, for all wanted God in our laws, for quite contradictory reasons, like a scarecrow in a cornfield, as one fellow put it, to "make the people tremble," but they all wanted him bad. Some spiritual bulldozers reverted to our "national perils," presuming that God didn't know what was necessary for their good, or fearing that he wasn't as fly as the devil, for, notwithstanding their thanks, some seriously intimated that his satanic majesty was stealing a march on the Lord of hosts, and something indicated that the latter would be left several laps behind ere he reached the home-stretch. So they gave him a lashing—with their tongues. Others slyly put their hands behind their backs and thanked him for "blessings;" some for one reason, but generally without reason; some wanted him for a background, another for a foreground, to our Constitution. In fact, there was nothing so absurd that it would not do for a pretext for thanking God. What "taffy" he did get, to be sure! If his almightiness didn't get some valuable pointers that day, for which he will ever be grateful to Chicago, the center of the universe, it will be a sign that he'd better install one of our city pastors to man the machine.

If the absurdity were all, we could well afford to laugh, but their traitorous utterances show how willing these Christian ministers were to "throttle the law;" to inaugurate religious ruin; to subvert American liberty, and really found a reign of scepter and surplice.

Of course such pulpit villainy is ably seconded by pious editors, for the good deacon on the Journal, that sanctimonious Chicago evening sheet, declares that a Christian thief is preferable, as a citizen, to an honest Infidel. Hear him:

> For this reason an immoral and lawless man, whose practices, habits, and life—who may even be a criminal as regards property rights or deeds of violence—if he has a theoretical belief in God, is a good man and a valuable member of society as compared with the Infidel who, however pure his life, denies the existence of deity, the truth of divine teachings, and the gospel that was taught by Jesus Christ.

There's Christian morals for you.

Then, that political prostitute of the Tribune, to tickle the Irish dynamiters, whose votes Blarney Blaine is after, in speaking of Anarchism, makes that a religious issue. As follows:

> The English and the Irish immigrants are free from it. The infection has no hold on the Protestant Germans, and is practically unknown among Roman Catholics of all nationalities. Very few of the Poles are infected, and the Scandinavians are wholly free from the madness of Anarchism. This peculiar mental and moral malady exists only among a small number of Infidel Germans and Poles, with a scattered following from other nationalities—God-disowning, law-defying, political desperadoes, who cannot command the sympathy or support of any considerable number of foreign-born people.

To think that there are men calling themselvs Freethinkers and Liberals who, "for business reasons," are so cowardly and contemptible as to giv largely to the church, and grudgingly, or not at all, to the cause of mental liberty, as represented by the American Secular Union; who are absolutely paying for the whips with which the enemy will scourge their backs in the near future, because anxious to cater for present popularity, if not averted by Freethought education and organization!

Verily we ask with Whittier:

> Is this the land our fathers loved,
> The freedom which they toiled to win?
> Is this the soil whereon they moved?
> Are these the graves they slumber in?
> Are we the sons by whom are borne
> The mantles which the dead hav worn?
> . . . . . .
> Shall tongues be mute when deeds are wrought
> Which well might shame extremest hell?
> Shall freemen lock the indignant thought?
> Shall Pity's bosom cease to swell?
> Shall honor bleed? Shall truth succumb?
> Shall pen, and press, and sword be dumb?
> . . . . . .
> By all above, around, below,
> Be our indignant answer: No!

Then answer, No! in the most effectiv way. Take H. L. Green's advice. He says in the Freethinkers' Magazine: "We again repeat that, in our opinion, the best thing that the Liberals can do is to giv the Secular Union their generous and undivided support for the next year, and if the present officers faithfully discharge their duties, and stand by the platform adopted at Chicago, then reëlect them, but if they fail, then put others in their places. And one thing let us not forget to do, and that is to hav a grand rally from all parts of the country at the next annual Congress." This is honest, generous, just advice. Will you giv this administration that support? If you do, you shall not regret it.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

KINGSTON, Mo., Nov. 25th, 26th, 27th.—This is the county seat of Caldwell county, eight miles south of Hamilton, which is the nearest railroad station. Two obstacles were in the way of the success of the lectures—first, a severe, cold storm; and, second, a teachers' institute. However, the novelty of the first Infidel lecture in the town attracted about forty persons on Friday evening; and their good report, despite the savage storm of sleet and severe cold, gave increase of attendance on Saturday evening. On Sunday the weather was still very severe, but the storm partly abated, and the interest aroused gave both afternoon and evening what was, under the circumstances, quite a large attendance.

The trinity of Freethought here consists of W. A. Colvin, T. C. Frost, and Hardin Steele. I made the acquaintance of many royally good folks, and enjoyed a visit to the hospitable home of Brother Colvin. He is a genuin Liberal, whose acts are in harmony with the principles he professes. He is an honor to any cause he espouses. The lectures resulted in quite a number of additions to the ranks of those who dare think for themselvs.

That zealous and faithful apostle of Freethought, J. E. Remsburg, was at Hamilton while I was at Kingston, but the weather was so severe that we could not meet. The eight miles of muddy road and the savage, cold wind kept us asunder.

The pure spirit of Christian love and justice was manifest at Hamilton. The hall is owned by a devout Presbyterian. He was very eager to secure his rent, but the friends informed me that on the Saturday evening at the hour announced for the lecture of Mr. Remsburg to begin the fires had not been lighted. This contemptible, mean design succeeded, for all but those warmly attached to the cause were frozen out. On Sunday, at 2:30, the time for the afternoon lecture, the hall doors were fast locked. The Liberals repaired to the drug-store, where friend Remsburg held forth to the loyal and faithful few. In the evening, the report having been industriously circulated, "The lectures hav been given up," attendance was made slim. But the dear Christians overreached themselvs, for their course of action has aroused a spirit of determined, persistent energy among the Liberals, and they are resolved to try it over, and make sure next time that the freezing-out game shall not be played on them.

CLINTON, HENRY Co., Mo., Nov. 29th, 30th, Dec. 1st.—S. E. Price was the only Liberal in this town who had vitality or zeal enough to endeavor to secure lectures. He and his good wife are Spiritualists, but thoroughly Liberal.

Friend Price and Mr. Bates, proprietor of the hall, met me, on arrival at Clinton, with the discouraging declaration that "they had hoped I would not come." Bates had written me to that effect, but his letter failed to reach me. They informed me that all the churches were working zealously for local option. Every one of the churches was holding early prayer meetings every evening, and adjourning at 7:30 to the court-house to hear Prohibition lectures. A committee of church folks had waited on Mr. Price to ask him to cancel engagement of the hall for me, and giv them possession at once, as the court-house would not hold the people who desired to attend their meetings, and the excitement was so great I could not possibly get an audience. Bates declared I could not get seven people to hear me, and advised me to let the Christians hav the hall. Mr. Price was of his opinion, but he preferred I should decide for myself. I seldom surrender without a struggle, and never to a combination of fanatics, so I told them, "If I cannot lecture to seven, I will to six."

The high esteem in which all the people hold friend Price enabled him by personal solicitation to induce nearly one hundred to attend that evening. Oh, dear! dear! but the church folks were wrathy. They had announced they would hold meetings at the hall instead of the Infidel. They bribed the poor, little, 7 x 9, silly paper, called the Democrat, to denounce me, and warn the people not to go to hear all that was good and sacred reviled.

Wednesday evening I had over three hundred intelligent ladies and gentlemen present, all of whom evinced the deepest interest. Thursday evening it poured of rain. The church folks were washed out; they had overdone the praying for cold water, and now had a young flood. It dampened their ardor; they held no meeting. There was over two hundred at the hall, and despite the fearful rain many ladies were present.

There was at each lecture eager demand for Liberal publications. I sold over $30 worth of books and pamphlets, and left Clinton jubilant at the glorious impetus given the gospel of humanity, despite all opposition. C. B. REYNOLDS.

The Liberal Club.

The platform of the Manhattan Liberal Club on the evening of the 9th was occupied by Samuel P. Putnam, president of the American Secular Union. Mr. Putnam was always a favorit of the Club, and he was received with open arms, so to speak. He spoke of the "Dangers Ahead" in the growing ecclesiastical legislation, and the formation of the National Reform party, whose object is the incorporation of God, the Bible, and Jesus Christ with the Constitution of the United States. Among the vice-presidents of this association are eighty reverends and bishops, ten college professors, nine justices of supreme court, two judges of superior court, etc. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is also allied with this ecclesiastical party. The leaders of the Union are vice-presidents in the reform party. Miss Willard, president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, has suggested the creation of a special department for the promotion of Sabbath observance, coöperating with the National Reform Association. This department is now established. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union by its speakers and writers is committed to a theological government, and is, therefore, by its vast membership promoting one of the dangers ahead. The workingmen, also, by a false understanding of the nature of Sabbath legislation, to a large extent unite with the church party for the passing of church laws. The Catholic church also combines with other ecclesiastical forces for the same object. There is therefore a gathering together of many instrumentalities for the support of the God-in-the-Constitution party. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and every true American citizen should be on his guard against these insidious and growing dangers to a free government. Herbert Spencer says, "Free institutions can be maintained only by citizens each of whom is instant to oppose every illegitimate act, every assumption of supremacy, every official excess of power, however trivial it may seem." With eight hundred millions of property exempt from taxation; with Sabbath and blasphemy laws in almost every state of the Union; with a party of wealth and position aiming to make Christianity the common law of the land, abetted by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union with a membership of nearly a million, the Catholic church, the workingmen, and the Prohibition party, there is imperativ need for the maintenance of a national Liberal organization like the American Secular Union, whose object shall be the total separation of church and state, and the establishment of a purely secular government.

Mr. Chavannes, of Tennessee, agreeing with all the points made by the speaker, noted also the danger arising from the Comstockian laws, and called attention to the importance of the work performed by the National Defense Association in maintaining free mails and free press against the encroachments of Comstock and his coadjutors.

Messrs. Oppenheimer, Weeks, Wakeman, Clark, Cohen, and Mrs. Leonard accepted the lecture as truthful and timely; but some criticisms were made, especially by Messrs. Oppenheimer and Wakeman, of the work of the American Secular Union as not being inclusiv of the many important reforms and social and intellectual movements of the day.

In reply, Mr. Putnam admitted the necessity of all those reforms, and that Liberalism should include everything that is for human welfare, but he insisted that no one organization could devote itself to this vast and general work. Liberalism is too great ever to be fully comprehended in one organization, and there should be not one organization, but many organizations, and each organization should be devoted to a specific object. The American Secular Union is for the total separation of church and state. This is its particular work. The National Defense Association is for free mails and free press; the Liberty League for free speech and free assembly. The great work of Liberalism for the intellectual, moral, social, and political advancement of the race can be best advanced by this differentiation of organization. All disagreements are thus avoided, and harmony preserved; vast numbers can unite together for the support of the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Connect with these some other issue, and division occurs. For other issues, let there be other organizations. We cannot organize for a general, but for particular purposes. In this way there is intensity of life and harmony of action.

A collection of about $12 was taken up at the close of the lecture, which was tendered to Mr. Putnam in remuneration of his services. But he desired to hav it placed in the fund of the American Secular Union for the general work. The amount, therefore, is placed in the hands of the treasurer, Mr. Eckhard.

Mr. Hill's Rejoinder.

Brother Hill is more than willing to giv in, provided he is wrong, and will, of course, make the necessary correction in his reading and figuring on the forthcoming 288 printed issue of the Bruno-Wakeman calendar; but before doing so he begs leave to offer the following, from the Encyclopedia Britannica, which bears directly upon the point at issue, and to which he respectfully calls Brother Parkhurst's attention. What was just published from that great authority bore only on the popularity of beginning a calendar with the figure 1, but this quotation bears directly on the mathematics of such commencement. The words are as follows:

In order to preserve uniformity in their computations astronomers denote the year which preceded the first of our era by 0, and the year previous to that as 1 B.C., but chronologers, in conformity with common notions, call the year preceding the era 1 B.C., and so on. By reckoning in this manner there is an interruption in the regular succession of numbers; and in the years preceding the era, the leap years, instead of falling on the 4th, 8th, 12th, etc., fall on the 1st, 5th 9th, etc.

This is taken from the article on chronology, and seems to me to state distinctly that, although popular, the figure 1 is wrong mathematically, because leaving room for such an "interruption" when working backward from an era. I await Brother Parkhurst's answer. GEO. N. HILL.

Books and Periodicals.

"The Factors of Organic Evolution," by Herbert Spencer, constitutes No. 94 of the Humboldt Library, and affords the opportunity of getting a great work for only a small sum—15 cents. It should be in the library of every Freethinker.

"The Diseases of Personality," by Th. Ribot, is No. 95 of the Humboldt Library. It is one of that large class of works which hav lately been published treating of Mind, and is by no means the least worthy of them of study. Price 15 cents.

The Popular Science Monthly for December contains articles by Professor Huxley, Grant Allen, and the duke of Argyll; and an interesting bit of autobiography entitled, "The Boyhood of Darwin," from the "Life and Letters" of the great naturalist.

"Wayside Jottings" is Mattie E. Hull's poems and essays collected and handsomely printed and bound. A great many friends of Mrs. Hull will peruse this volume with infinit satisfaction. The book is published by Moses Hull & Co., Des Moines, Ia., for $1.25.

"Natural Law in the Business World," by Henry Wood, is a conservativ argument directed against the economic heresies of the day. It will please the employers of labor and irritate the Socialists. It is, however, too old-fashioned for the present time. Price 30 cents, supplied from this office.

A. Knoflach, who has achieved such signal success in simplifying instruction in the German language, has begun the publication of a series of pamphlets, ultimately to be bound in one, to make Spanish equally easily intelligible. The numbers are 10 cents each, and sold at this office. Five numbers are out.

We hav just published a new edition of Prof. Felix L. Oswald's "Secret of the East." It is printed on heavy paper, wide margin, and finely and substantially bound. Of the merit of the book the admirers of Professor Oswald are well aware, and the fact that this is the third large edition attests it. The price remains at $1.

L. L. Whitlock has begun in Boston the publication of a monthly called the Soul. It is a handsome paper. Its avowed purpose is to find out if man has "a never-dying soul to save, and fit it for the sky." Inasmuch as the editor and contributors start out with the proposition that they hav, the paper can hardly be termed scientific.

We hav received a plea for home rule as against Rome rule, called, "Ultramontanism is Unlawful in the United States," by Adolf Hepner. Mr. Hepner is very unskilful in the use of the English language, but he means well, and his pamphlet contains good matter. It may be bought of Mr. Hepner for 10 cents, 709 Wood street, Philadelphia.

J. Mount Bleyer, M.D., has written a treatis on "Scientific Methods of Capital Punishment," and Fitzgerald, whose education as a priest made him an Atheist, has put it into his Humboldt Library, No. 93. The price is 10 cents. Mr. Bleyer believes in the use of electricity in speeding the parting guest whose longer stay in this world is undesirable.

"Christian Paradoxes: The Characters of a Believing Christian in Paradoxes and Seeming Contradictions," by Francis Bacon, is just what its voluminous title indicates. It is printed by Peter Eckler, who owns a job-printing office in this town, and turns out some of the handsomest specimens of typography that we ever saw. This little pamphlet of fourteen pages, containing a portrait of Francis Bacon, and selling for 5 cents, is no exception. Mr. Eckler contributes a preface, in which he considers whether Bacon was a Christian or not, and givs us enough facts about that "greatest, brightest, meanest of mankind" to make us hope he was. The Paradoxes are sarcastic, and leave one in doubt whether Bacon meant to sneer at Christian theology or to plainly expound it for the benefit of true believers. They certainly are entertaining reading.

"The Philosophy of Cure" is the first of six proposed works on "Human Culture and Cure," by E. D. Babbitt, "Dean of the New York College of Magnetics." His idea seems to be to cure diseases by light, heat, magnetism, etc., and the book is published to convince people of the possibility of the scheme. The part just issued is mechanically beautiful, and is sold by the "New York Solar Thermolume Co.," 39 West 27th street, this city.

John Page Hopps, a Unitarian preacher of England, has put into a pleasing pamphlet seven of his lectures upon the origin, structure, contents, and authority of the Old Testament. Mr. Hopps follows after the distinguished authors of the "Bible for Learners" and Matthew Arnold in his criticism of the Hebrew scriptures and religion. His book is mild and reverent, and will be acceptable to the Unitarians, though not sufficiently explicit to please the Radicals of this country.

Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Underwood hav resigned the editorial control of the Open Court. The reason is that Mr. Hegeler, the proprietor, desired to associate with them Dr. Paul Carus, his secretary, and future husband of his daughter, to which they objected. This will, probably, end the Open Court. While we cannot admire some things that Mr. Underwood has done, we hav never denied him great intellectual ability. For a publication like the Open Court he is eminently fitted as editor, though too labored in style for general work.

"Spiritual Healing Formula and Text-Book," by A. J. Swarts, is one of the claptrap results of the faith-cure craze. There is a field of psychic phenomena which it is the legitimate province of the scientist to investigate, but the empiric methods of those who find in the material action of the brain a "consuming fire by which we are changed from glory to glory by the Spirit, God," add nothing to the world's knowledge. The price of Mr. Swarts's book we do not know. It may be obtained of him at 161 LaSalle street, Chicago, Ill.

Our German readers will all want the "Freidenker Almanack" for 1888. It contains a great deal of useful information, splendid poetry, and high-toned literature, which is beyond any power of ours to describe. We know that it has a calendar, the poetry we can tell by the shape, and we can dimly perceive that what is doubtless one of its most interesting contributions bears on the subject of "Socialismus and Individualismus." The price of the Almanack is 25 cents, and it may be had of the Freidenker Publishing Co., Milwaukee, Wis.

Dyer D. Lum has resurrected the Alarm of Albert R. Parsons, and publishes it fortnightly at 169 Washington street, Chicago. It is needless to say that it is an Anarchist journal. Mr. Tucker, who poses as a sort of intellectual yard-stick by which to measure Anarchistic minds, says that "the paper keeps well up to the platform," from which we infer that it is a safe journal for an Anarchist to hav in the house. Mr. Lum is a very forcible writer, exceedingly bitter against constituted authorities, and grimly in earnest. The subscription price of the Alarm is $1.50 annually.

"Pope's Essay on Man, with Responding Essay," by Caleb S. Weeks, is a pamphlet published by the Fowler & Wells Co., in which Dr. Weeks givs a page from Pope and balances it by some reflections of his own. He calls his Essay, "Man Seen in the Deepening Dawn." By investing 50 cents the curious can see whether the second essay is an improvement in philosophy upon the first. Dr. Weeks, we may say, is one of the most interesting debaters—in the matter of his remarks—of the Liberal Club, and has embodied, he assures us, the best of his ideas in this poem.

The Agnostic Annual for 1888 has been lying on our counters for some time. The issue is of the same high quality as previous numbers, and has among its contributors Masters and Bachelors of Art, Fellows of Royal Societies, and Doctors of Philosophy, and common every-day people like Stewart Ross, Gerald Massey, and Thomas Mead, who know more than some whole colleges. The almanac characteristics hav been dropped, and the Annual is a bundle of essays and poems, which will interest studious and philosophical minds. Price 25 cents.

William Danmar, Station E., Brooklyn, N. Y., has published for 25 cents a pamphlet called, "The Tail of the Earth; or, The Location and Condition of the Spirit World." Mr. Danmar says: "The formation of galomal mass in individual organic bodies, which was caused by the struggle for galomal equilibrium, had necessarily to be accompanied by the development of a strong egoism of these bodies, who, for the sake of happiness or equilibrium, want to exist and prosper." We agree with the author in concluding that this places the question in regard to another individual life on an entirely new basis.

The Rev. L. A. Lambert, Roman Catholic priest at Waterloo, N. Y., crony of the Rev. Patrick Cronin, editor of the Buffalo Catholic Union and Times, author of "Notes on Ingersoll," who refused to meet Remsburg in debate when all expenses and a hundred dollars were guaranteed him by McArthur, has written another book which he anomalously entitles, "Tactics of Infidels." It is written in the same style as the "Notes on Ingersoll," and is made up of quotations from Colonel Ingersoll, the "Notes," Lacy's Reply to Lambert, with additional comments by Lambert. The price, $1.25, is altogether disproportional to its merits. The writer, who confounds "honest thought" and murderous acts, and argues as though they were one and the same, is not worth replying to.

"Outside the Gates; and Other Tales and Sketches," by a Band of Spirit Intelligences, through the Mediumship of Mary Theresa Shelhamer, has just been published by Colby & Rich, of Boston. The book is not exactly a novel, but the heroin is a spirit who "depicts her progress"—we copy from the advertisment—"in spirit-life from a state of unhappiness outside the heavenly gates to one of peace in the sunset land—developing on the way stories of individual lives and experiences, as well as descriptions of their condition and abodes of the spirit-land." Doubtless the book is as authentic as Revelation, and those who hav read Miss Shelhamer's lectures will probably desire this book. The price is $1.25, and, like all of Colby & Rich's publications, it may be obtained at this office.

The Rochester Brotherhood of Humanity, whose objects are "to discover the nature, the ministry, and the destiny of man, and to unfold the divinity within him, and more especially to discover and elucidate esoteric Christianity," has printed a small pamphlet on "Christos," with the allegation on the cover that the perfect man is the anthropomorphic God. The style of the work may be discovered from the concluding paragraph of the introduction: "God is ever near to the willing and contrite soul, for the divine voice cannot be heard in the whirlwind of passion and pride, but in the silence may be found the word, which was, which is, and which ever shall be, world without end." Survivors of that affirmation who desire more may address Mrs. J. W. Cable, 40 Ambrose street, Rochester, N. Y.

Our old friend, J. Pettey, of La Crosse, Wis., has compiled a volume of his essays, originally published in Freethought papers, principally THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator, under the modest title of "Freethought Miscellany." The book is adorned with Mr. Pettey's portrait. The essays were more interesting when written than now. Mr. Pettey is a very direct and pointed writer, as this quotation from his "review of a few sentences" from Mr. Putnam's "Problems of the Universe" will show: "You remind me of what a German once said, 'Some mens know somedings, but more almost noddings.' And further adds, 'Some professors mit pig heads hav too much talk, and not enough think,' which I think is the case with you." Those who desire more profound arguments of this sort should address J. Pettey, La Crosse, Wis.

We received some time since from Lee & Shepard the following:

"Lee & Shepard hav in press a work which will at once command a wide reading, for its timely discussion of a subject of intense interest to the present generation, by a distinguished author, whose works run through a field of inquiry regarding the Socialistic problem, as seen from the Socialistic point of view—'Danton in the French Revolution.' The book has been recently written by Laurence Gronlund, the author of 'The Coöperativ Commonwealth: An Exposition of Modern Socialism,' by a Socialist. The author claims that Danton's work really saved France, and he places the responsibility for the bloodshed from 1789 to 1792, not upon the Socialists, but upon those whom he terms 'counter-revolutionists.' This remarkable book will embrace the period from 1748 to the present time, and probes into the great social questions which now agitate society with characteristic vigor and ability. As no work of this kind by a Socialist has ever before been published in the United States, its appearance will be a literary event of considerable interest."

After saying that the book is now out, and for sale here for $1.25, that Mr. Gronlund is overestimated by his publishers and underestimated by the public, we hav nothing further to add to the notice.

One would think that sailors were about the last class of mechanics for which a journal could be published with any reasonable hope of getting it to its subscribers. But several numbers of the Pacific Coast Seaman's Journal hav reached us from San Francisco, and it shows evidences of prosperity. The Seaman's Union on the Pacific Coast is, perhaps, one of the best proofs that organization of artisans can, for a time at least, overcome the fundamental economic principle that wages are regulated by the "law of supply and demand." In England sailors ship for from twelve to twenty dollars per month. The latter price is paid to boatswains, carpenters, second or third mates. Seamen who rate A.B. get the former. On coasters around New York, seamen readily obtain twenty-five and thirty dollars per month. But on the Pacific Coast, for voyages of two weeks to two months, the men get forty-five dollars per month. This is due to their compact union and the good faith with which the sailors observe their obligations. The Seaman's Coast Journal is published by the Union in the interests of the men against villainous boarding-house-keepers, tyrannical captains, and unscrupulous owners. It is painful, however, to a patriotic American who remembers the ancient naval glory of his country, which was once celebrated in song and story, to observe that American sailors are not Americans at all. With the exception of the fishermen and coasters of New England, American sailors are Norwegians, Danes, Swedes, and Russian Finns, with an occasional Irishman, though our friend Patrick generally prefers the heavy labors and copious drinks of beer which fall to the lot of the longshoreman. That such a variety of nationalities can harmoniously dwell in one union, each working for all, seems a little strange, and argues good executiv management. Though not up to the typographical standard of Mr. Eckler, the Seaman's Coast Journal is creditable to the sailors of San Francisco, with the exception of the marine view at the head. The artist, who, we are informed, engraved the heading gratuitously, has evidently more good-will for the sailors than share of their knowledge. It is somewhat surprising to see a full-rigged ship and a schooner going exactly in opposit directions, each with the wind dead after her. The editor should haul one or the other of those vessels on the wind.

The Defender of Woman.

Robert Ingersoll needs no defense, from whatever point the attack may come. His words and his daily life are a bulwark that the misrepresentations of ignorance, malevolence, or bigotry can hav no effect upon. But we love to stand up for our friends, and Ingersoll is the friend of woman; in his highest flights he never fails to take her with him, to stand her beside him on his lofty pedestal, where he makes man ashamed of littleness, meanness, bigotry, and selfishness; always he seats her beside him on his throne (the only one he tolerates—the throne of intelligence), where he sways the great heart of the multitude by his wonderful eloquence. In his broadest, grandest views he never forgets her, and in the tributes he pays her, and the strong appeals he makes for her, there is no cringing, sensual adoration, only a reasonable and noble justice. She is a human being like himself, with the same wide capacities for pain or pleasure. "Woman has all the rights that man has, and one more," he says, "the right to be protected."

Mrs. Wilcox, writing of Robert Ingersoll at home, pays tribute to his genius and his faultless home life, but, while granting that he has done much good, givs it as her opinion that he has also done "a great deal of harm;" and in the face of all the fine, tender, lovely, human, exalting, and beautiful things he has said to inspire men to nobler ways of thinking and better ways of living, to a purer loving and a more tender giving, accuses him of using his splendid strength more in tearing down than in "building up pedestals for truth." "If," she says, "he would say more about the need of fine principles and less about the uselessness of piety; if he would giv us two words for morality to one against hell fire, he would do more good in the world. He givs us too much blue mass and not enough tonic."

One cannot believe that Mrs. Wilcox has read, or, better still, heard as it fell from his lips, "What Must We do to be Saved?" She cannot hav read "The Gods and other Lectures," "Ghosts," or, "The Rights of Man, Woman, and Child;" and can it be that she has read his reply to Mr. Field?

For everything he tears down Mr. Ingersoll substitutes that which is better. For the narrowness of dogma, generosity, good-fellowship; for the selfishness of creeds, deeds of kindness; for the cold, exclusiv religion of orthodoxy, the warm, all-embracing religion of humanity. "What Must We Do to Be Saved?" contains more "fine principles" than any other writing of the same length in the English language, the Sermon on the Mount not excepted. By "simile and comparison, by epigram and metaphor," by ridicule and pathetic appeal, Mr. Ingersoll in this lecture declares his belief in love, justice, and mercy, and plainly shows that it is the lack of these in the orthodox creed that makes him so bitter against it. He says: "They say, 'What do you propose? You hav torn down our hope; what do you propose to giv us in place of it?' I hav not torn it down. I hav only endeavored to trample out the ignorant and cruel fires of hell. I do not tear away the passage, 'God will be merciful to the merciful.' I do not destroy the promis, 'If you will forgiv others, God will forgiv you.' I would not for anything blot out the faintest star that shines in the horizon of human despair." Further on he says: "I believe in the gospel of cheerfulness, the gospel of good nature, the gospel of good health. Good health! I believe the time will come when the public thought will be so great and grand that it will be looked upon as infamous to perpetuate disease. I believe the time will come when men will not fill the future with consumption and insanity. I believe the time will come when men will feel under obligations to put the flags of health in the cheeks of their children. Even if I got to heaven and had a harp, I would hate to look back upon my children and see them diseased, deformed, crazed—all suffering the penalty of crimes that I had committed. I believe in the gospel of good living, good cooking; in the gospel of good clothes, good houses; in the gospel of soap and water. The school-house is my cathedral, the universe my Bible. I believe in the gospel of justice. That we must reap what we sow. I do not believe in forgivness. If I rob Mr. Smith and God forgivs me, how does that help Smith? If I by slander cover some poor girl with the leprosy of some imputed crime, and she withers away like a blighted flower; and afterward I get forgivness, how does that help her? If there is another world, we hav got to settle. No bankrupt court there. Pay down. For every crime you commit, you must answer to yourself and to the one you injure. And if you hav ever clothed another with unhappiness as with a garment of pain, you will never be quite as happy as though you had not done that thing. God cannot hate anybody who is capable of loving his neighbor; so I believe in this great gospel of generosity. Ah, but they say it won't do. You must believe. I say no. My gospel of health will prolong life; my gospel of intelligence, my gospel of loving, my gospel of good fellowship, will fill the world with happy homes. My doctrin will giv us health, wealth, and happiness. That is what I believe in. Giv us intelligence, and man will find that he cannot steal without robbing himself; he will find that he cannot murder without assassinating his own joy. He will find that every crime is a mistake He will find that only that man carries a cross who does wrong; and that for the man who does right the cross changes into wings that bear him upward forever. He will find that intelligent self-love embraces in its mighty arms all the human race."

Even these few words I hav quoted contain the new gospel that is to regenerate the world, and yet how small a part of all the fine, touching, and tender things he has said! I wish I could quote him entire; but it is enough to prove that for every rotten timber of doctrin Robert Ingersoll tumbles down he substitutes one that will endure while man has need of a faith; for his timbers all fit into the doctrin that love must rule the world. Intelligence, liberty, kindness, love, justice, mercy, and charity—these are the virtues he requires of men—these are the materials with which he builds.

He tells us again and again to make our homes so full of joy that there will be some to spare for our neighbors, and he tells us how to do this. He tells us not to waste the precious years of life in fruitless wrangling about eternity; not to let slip every opportunity "to scatter joy" by an absorbing worship of a God who is utterly deaf to our cries, since he has never manifested any interest in our affairs, or interfered in the least to change the course of events. Mrs. Wilcox believes in prayer. So do Frances Willard, Anna Gordon, Hannah Whitehall Smith, and a host of other angelic women, who prayed for Michigan, Texas, and Tennessee, in their recent struggle for Prohibition. But those states said, "Giv us whisky," and if God lent a hand on either side it must hav been to the saloon-keepers. Every Woman's Christian Temperance Union opens its meetings with prayer and praise; yet in every Union perhaps there are some women who hav been praying for half a lifetime for a drunken husband or son, beseeching God to giv the loved one strength to keep the pledge, and be saved; with breaking hearts they are praying still, but ah! God does not hear. The loved one goes on to his ruin, and will not be saved unless by the help of a man. And this is what Mr. Ingersoll would help us to see. If all the prayers that hav gone up from the heart of one mother over an erring son could be recorded, they would not only melt but break the heart of any good man; and if he had the power he would make that son the joy of his mother's heart. Yet in what instance hav these prayers ever had any effect upon an omnipotent God? Mr. Ingersoll would hav us reject the old superstition of a selfish God pleased by the suffering of poor, weak creatures who come they know not whence, and go they know not whither, and worse still, of a God appeased by the sacrifice of innocent creatures. Mr. Ingersoll would help us to see that it is better to build school-houses than fine churches; and all his teaching is to the end that a man's daily life is the only religion worth fostering. But for lack of time and space I cannot tell all the "fine principles" Mr. Ingersoll lays down; and who shall imitate his manner in urging their adoption by his fellow-men?

For what Mr. Ingersoll has said to elevate man and to do away with worn-out, pernicious creeds, I am profoundly grateful; but I am only human, and am therefore still more deeply grateful for what he has said in the cause of woman. It is impossible for me to express the deep indignation, the just scorn of all human justice, that I felt when the fact first dawned upon me that, on account of the mere accident of sex, I belonged to a degraded half of the human race. Nor is it possible to express the divine jealousy, and still more divine despair (that despair of which resistance to the death is born), with which I was seized, when, young and ardent in the cause of learning, I found that the acquisition of knowledge was so far considered the male prerogativ that all college doors were locked against women.

Later on, when I learned the pathetic story of my sex from history, through all the mournful past down to the civilization of the present, did my heart break—not quite, but almost. Bought and sold in marriage; refused the right of divorce; disqualified from holding property; hung and burnt for witchcraft; nearly every avenue not only to honor, fame, and culture, but to an honest livelihood, closed against her; subject to the law, but deprived of the ballot—these are the outlines of the sad history. My heart did not break, for my spirit rose in rebellion. I said it was not right; it is not right; it never can be right; and, in my humble way, I hav protested, and still protest, against any law or custom that tends to degrade woman. But I believe that the battle is nearly over, and that woman will win her freedom as man has won his; and for her vantage-ground to-day she has none who more deserve her thanks than Robert Ingersoll. Looking into the past, realizing and comprehending as few hav done the grand struggle of man against tyranny and oppression, he saw, also, as no man has seen, and only one woman—George Eliot—the pleading face of woman looking out from the horrors of wars and persecutions. And his plea for woman's advancement is as manly, honest, and earnest; as practical and full of good sense, as his plea for man. This is my excuse for attempting to defend one who needs no defense.

Chester, Neb., Nov. 14, 1887. EMILY BURTON.

Concerning the Times, and the Signs Thereof.

The capitalistic press depicts the sufferings of the white slaves of the mines, and of those of the metropolis, and yet insists that this is the most glorious country on the face of the earth, and that the social condition of things is a thing of beauty and a joy forever; something too sacred to be touched upon or questioned. For the troubles of the toilers, the only panacea which the World, with other capitalistic papers of the Democratic stripe, offers, is, in effect, this and nothing more: "Join the Democratic party and be happy. If you can't be happy then, you don't deserve to be."

The capitalistic press is continually prating of the glories of the ballot, and that, too, in face of the fact that ballots are bought at every election at from, say the price of a drink, up to dollars, more or less. Now, we hav had the ballot here in this country for a hundred years, and what is the upshot? Industrial white slavery, crushing monopoly, with hideous corruption in every governmental department of the country—national, state, and municipal. Where does the saving grace of the ballot come in? The writer fails to see where. Even if ballots were not merchandise, men would be coerced to vote as their masters, the monopolists, wished, and the ballot beaten. Were there no trading or coercion, and voters were not bound to the Juggernaut of machine politics, but voted according to their convictions, they would be betrayed, as they are to-day, as they ever hav been, by those they elect. Office appears to be the destroyer of honor and honesty. A man, never a more honest and honorable one before taking office, becomes therein a corruptionist. The ballot is a failure, and ever will be until all men are honest; as that time will never come, the outlook is not encouraging for those who put their faith in ballots.

"THE PUBLIC BE DAMNED!"

Thus the coarse, purse-proud millionaire, William H. Vanderbilt, who never made an honest dollar in his life, blatantly expressed himself one day to a reporter. "Them's my sentiments!" is the cry to-day of every overgrown capitalist, monopolist, and plutocrat in the land, and about every office-holder as well. Well, the public is a patient, long-suffering ass, but possibly it may, some time or other, kick; then the the plutocrats, et al., will hear something drop.

THE REAL ANARCHISTS.

It would seem that "sassiety," the classes generally, with the Goulds—embracing all those, and their name is Legion, who, though not the possessors of tens, scores, and hundreds of millions, are abundantly supplied with the disposition to become such by the dark ways and sharp tricks that hav characterized the career of the Mephistopheles of finance, and filled his coffers to overflowing with ill-gotten gains—are doing all in their power to bring about a change of government in this country, a change from republican to monarchical form.

In the eyes of millionaires there are millionaires enough in this country now, and they want what they term a "strong government" to protect their stolen hoards; and with "sassiety" and the classes at their back, the plutocrats are aiming at the empire. The empire is the heaven to which they are looking, and they are willing to go through the purgatory of despotism in order to reach their heaven. In every imaginable way they are working to bring about this despotism, and when they hav goaded the people to some tremendous overt act of blood, the "man on horseback"—say, some such man as "clubber" Williams—will spring to the front and, proclaiming himself dictator, inaugurate a despotic reign of "blood and iron," the empire coming later on, when the way is thoroughly paved with the skulls of the people.

The Anarchists to be feared in this country are the plutocrats, the classes generally, and "sassiety" itself. These are the real Anarchists, and not that little body of men that knocks the press silly. And if these real, Simon Pure Anarchists do not shortly bring about the condition of things that shall open the way for the "man on horseback," then the signs of the times are false and appearances only deceptions.

"THIS GLORIOUS REPUBLIC."

Why is it that this "glorious republic" requires so much bolstering? Every post-prandial gusher and every spread-eagle orator seems to feel in duty bound to iterate and reiterate that "this is the most glorious country under the sun!" And daily the diverse editors all over the land are impelled to utter like panegyrics.

If it be so "glorious," why does it need so much puffing? We don't paint the lily, neither do we gild refined gold. Why the need of so much paint and gilding for this "glorious land?" There would be no need, of course, were it half as "glorious" as it is painted, but it isn't. It is in a decidedly bad way, and growing no better very fast; hence the need of paint and gold-leaf liberally laid on; of bolstering praise and bloated panegyric. A look over this "glorious land" discloses conditions as follows:

Millionairism rampant.

Monopolies crushing the people.

"Combines"—by courtesy "trusts"—that rob the masses right and left.

"White slavery" in the mines.

"White slavery" in the cities.

Corruption on the bench, in every governmental department, and at the polls, the alleged "palladium of our liberties."

Ballots as merchandise, bought and sold.

Men coerced to vote by their employers.

"Corners" in the necessaries of life, and the masses suffering in consequence.

Government exacting taxes to the amount of $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 over and above its yearly expenses, and the people forced to pay the same.

Ten-million-dollar cathedrals rising here and there, and tens of thousands of poverty-stricken wretches sinking in despair.

Instead of trying to make things easy as possible for the people, the government racks its "brains" to discover methods by which to annoy the people. Vide the late asinin order of the post-office department.

Laws for the rich, and laws for the poor.

Justice travestied in every court in the land, when the culprits are rich men, or policemen.

But a big book might be written of the things that are teetotally wrong in this "glorious republic," and damned little good the writing of it would do, I imagin. The people seem to be mired in the slough of apathy, and their "servants" are in high feather on high ground. Will the fountains ever burst? Will the vials of wrath ever be opened? Not to-day, some other day, perchance.

"IS OUR PROSPERITY DANGEROUS?"

This conundrum was put forth the other day by the World, after remarks published in some Western paper of one Dr. Parker, an English gospel sharp, over here in the cause of Christ, ostensibly, but with an eye to business; shekels for himself. The D.D. thinks our prosperity is much too previous, as it were, and therefore dangerous. "Me too." The D.D. says we are going at too fast a gait. I agree with him—agree with a D.D.! Yes, I believe that this republican chariot of ours is rattling along at a pace that threatens a smash-up, with any ruts and rocks in the way, and we all know they are plenty. The running gear is sadly out of order, and the danger of a smash-up is imminent, and not far away, in the humble opinion of the writer.

The English D.D. fears a "collapse." Others do, among them the writer. Not because the D.D. does, but because he can't help it. When the Centennial was celebrated, the writer predicted that the American republic would never liv to see its bi-centennial, and still predicts to that effect. "There will be," says the English Bible-boomer, "a great collapse or a great disciplin." It will be "collapse," not "disciplin," in the humble opinion, etc. The republic is a great, big, overgrown abnormity—a giant that has grown altogether too quickly and loosely. It has a "big head"—the most pronounced case of "big head" on record, "imperial Rome" in its palmiest days not excepted—broad shoulders, indifferent arms, splendid torso, but wobbly pins. The superstructure is too much for the underpinning. Still, as a giant the giant is immense, albeit an abnormity. When it comes to "disciplin," he will not take kindly to it, having had all he means to put up with. He will kick, and that which may come as "disciplin" will not prove such, for in the end the giant will be dismembered, and so not "disciplined."

Clubbing the life out of a fellow, or shooting it out, is not "disciplining," except in police ethics.

No, this giant republic, weakly pinned and top-heavy, will not stand to see his bi-centennial within seventy-five years. If he does, I will cut any number of watermelons for those of my readers who may be on deck when the "bi" is celebrated. The writer believes that, by the year 1900, or 1910 at the farthest, the giant will hav "gone to grass," or be in a state of "grogginess" that surely will, sooner or later, send him there. Then, the giant republic having "collapsed," there will rise in its stead three empires, the western, greatest of all, and the eastern and southern. In time the western, by process of arms, will absorb the southern empire, the consolidation, in time, again, and by the aforesaid process, absorbing the eastern realm, when will blaze forth the greatest and grandest—power and splendor considered—empire the world has ever seen! Will it be for the welfare of the masses? Oh, no, Simple Simon! it will be wholly and particularly for the glory of the classes, who, as I hav before remarked, are doing all they can to bring about a consummation most devoutly wished by the majority of them.

Such are the views of a nativ American from way back, and one who, albeit a pronounced Pessimist, has not always been "left" in the matter of prediction. Don't forget to remind me, in 1976, of those watermelons—if I lose.

SI SLOKUM.

What Is the Use of Theology?

Theology is a pretended science—the science of the "incomprehensible." Hobbes rightly characterizes it as the "kingdom of darkness;" for he who would try to understand it must first put out his eyes, ignore all experience, and banish his reason forever; for in the realm of theology impossibilities are credible, absurdities are truisms, and reason is madness!

The theologian undertakes to explain this mysterious science.

Relying upon the credulity and fear of the ignorant, he comes forward and with the arrogance of a charlatan proclaims that to him all the mysteries of the universe are plain—unraveled—and the whole realm of heaven open to those who believe.

All the phenomena of the universe he declares to be due to a being whom he designates—God.

But while he pretends to know all about this mysterious personage, he informs you that you can never know anything, because God cannot be understood by a finite being, to whom the problem of deity must forever remain inscrutable. To the rational mind, this would be enough to demonstrate the uselessness of belief in such a being. For what evidence can man ever hav of the existence of a being who acts upon none of our senses? But to the credulous faith is sufficient.

Without faith, difficulties and doubts beset the human mind; but with faith all obstacles are removed.

Now, it is pretended by the theologian that, though no man can comprehend God, nevertheless every child born into the world is born with an innate idea of this "incomprehensible" being.

That this is not true, however, experience clearly demonstrates to any person who takes the trouble to examin the subject.

If every child has an innate idea of God, the Atheist's child, as well as the Theist's, should be born with an idea of deity; but it is found, upon investigation, that unless the child is instructed in the subject, it has not even the faintest shadow of an idea of the meaning of the word God.

Not only is this true, but eminent travelers, like the late Drs. Livingstone and Moffatt, hav reluctantly testified that they hav come across races not only wholly destitute of any idea of God, but with such a limited vocabulary of words as to be absolutely unable to express an idea of a supreme ruler of the universe. But I go so far as declaring that all men are without idea of God—if by God is meant an infinit being who exists in addition to the universe. The very idea is a contradiction in terms. If the universe is finite, whatever exists besides it must be finite also. In that case God would be a finite being.

If the universe is infinit—that is, without limit—the idea of the existence of God is excluded. On the other hand, if God is infinit, everything is God, and there is no universe, or the universe and God are one.

It is thus clear that we must hav either a finite universe and a finite God, or an infinit universe and no God, or an infinit God and no universe. There are no other alternativs.

Now, all our ideas are but the representation, through the medium of the senses, of objects that are believed to exist extraneous to the individual. Man receives certain sensations from objects, and these sensations he interprets in words. Of the real existence of these extraneous objects man cannot be positivly certain; but when, by constant examination and verification of his sensations, he finds that with like conditions like results always follow, he has the best of all grounds for believing that the phenomena of the universe are material, and not mental only.

Our daily experience teaches us that our intellectual life begins with the development of our senses, and becomes of service to us in forming a sound judgment in proportion to the cultivation of the brain.

A person born blind has no idea of color, nor has a deaf-mute an idea of sound; and since all ideas we hav are of the phenomena that are perpetually taking place about us, we hav and can hav no idea of anything that does not form part of these.

If it is still alleged that man can hav an idea of the supernatural, what is the faculty whereby such an idea is to be apprehended?

Man has no innate ideas. All his ideas are got from his surroundings—from his perception of phenomena, and from reflection on those perceptions. Martin Luther was quite right when he wrote the memorable sentence, "God is a blank sheet of paper upon which nothing is found but what you hav yourself written," and Xenophon supplemented this by saying that, "if horses and asses were to depict their gods, they would depict respectivly horses and asses."

The truth is, man sees his own image in the mirror of his mind, and before that image he bends the knee in adoration.

Now, theologians say that God is an infinit being and quite incomprehensible to man. Yet they affirm that it is man's highest duty to continually think of God, and not only this, but he is to base his conduct upon certain relations that are alleged to subsist between God and his creatures. But unless man knows something of the divine nature, how can he possibly base his actions towards his fellow-creatures upon it? Unless man knows that God is good, it would be folly to worship him; unless he knows that deity is wise, it would be madness for him to base his conduct upon any supposed relationship toward him.

If deity were an evil being, the man who acted up to his commands would act viciously, unless we can suppose goodness as emanating from an evil power.

On the other hand, it is pure assumption to say that "God is good" without evidence either of his existence or of his goodness.

Again, if God be infinit, what relation can the finite hav with him? If God is everywhere, God is everything. In that case man is a part of God, or God is a limited being in proportion as man is something.

The finite can hav no communication with the infinit. Man's duties therefore are toward finite creatures, namely, his fellow-men, and not toward an infinit being, who can very well do without his assistance.

Still Harping on My Daughter?

From the Galveston Daily News of November 24th.

The New York TRUTH SEEKER continues to belabor the News with untrue charges. "It upheld Sunday laws per se as just and right." "It forced its own employees to work on Sunday morning . . . and all day Sunday." "It took the ground of the Sabbatarians that Sunday laws are righteous because religious." "Texas law permits the sale of papers on Sunday, but not their manufacture." These are all misstatements. THE TRUTH SEEKER asks of the News: "Why did it go into court when the law applied to itself?" Answer: The News did not seek a court till its manager was arrested. It thought that the action of a constable was not necessarily "law." It then showed, by counsel, to the satisfaction of the district judge, that newspapers are exempt, as is ice-cream. Does THE TRUTH SEEKER ever take ice-cream in summer? Would it be well understood that one may sell ice-cream on Sunday, but that under such permission one must manufacture it on Saturday? THE TRUTH SEEKER, though worshiping majorityism, becomes philosophical when it distinguishes that "if the people will insist on arming Christians with laws against their liberty they must expect tyranny." That is to say, THE TRUTH SEEKER becomes superficially philosophical. The people do not insist upon any such thing specifically. But if THE TRUTH SEEKER wishes to get at the root of its own trouble as well as of the Sunday law trouble, it will not stop there. All results of legislation and administration by authority are contained in the grant of powers, including the opportunity to assume powers, in government. THE TRUTH SEEKER approving a Sabbatarian judge as a scourge to giv people a lesson unconsciously reproves THE TRUTH SEEKER complaining of a New Jersey anti-heretical judge, another scourge to giv Freethinkers a lesson—the same lesson. Does it protest that it is against all laws to distinguish and punish heresy? That is only one remove of the question. It is in favor of the general arbitrary authoritativ power which can take upon itself to make such laws. The people get Sabbatarian laws without knowing precisely how. A "balance of power" element may make them, for where the people most vaunt themselvs that the majority rules it is the few who convert the minority into a majority by selling out and going over, or taking advantage of indifference in representativs. Thus a minority generally rules. This fact fails of its proper effect upon THE TRUTH SEEKER. Its lesson plainly is that majority decisions are a choice of evils; that rulership, as a principle distinguished from voluntary participation, is ever to be avoided where it is possible to giv to each the separate control of his interests and his destiny, merely preserving the peace between the units. Interests, where inextricable, may conveniently be resolved by majority vote of those concerned. But the political sphere of a general arbitrary control defies all effectiv limitations upon power; hence people are constantly contributing to the arming of their oppressors, and this will naturally go on until government is reduced to the theory and practice of a defensiv agency emanating from the will of its self-constituent citizens, intelligently assuming its cost for its value to them in maintaining necessary conditions of order and protecting them against criminal aggressions.

From the same paper, of November 30th.

The New York TRUTH SEEKER hoped that there would always be judges with the temper to enforce obnoxious laws upon people who advocate them. It gratuitously assumed that the News advocated the continuance of an obnoxious law, and ignored that the News specifically pointed to an official responsibility upon sheriffs and other peace officers simply as officials. Nemesis reaches THE TRUTH SEEKER in an unexpected manner. It is a firm adherent of the government plan, which in fact has resulted in blasphemy laws and their enforcement. When Freethinker Reynolds was tried for blasphemy, THE TRUTH SEEKER was cruelly reminded that the judge had acted under the law. THE TRUTH SEEKER may claim to intend justice, but so do the persecutors, perhaps, as they understand justice, or think that they do. THE TRUTH SEEKER is in this trouble, that, "the state legislatures and courts and the general government pay no attention to the limitations put upon them by the national charter." That is to say, in the opinion of THE TRUTH SEEKER. They don't hav to. Now, if somebody had hoped that there would always be judges to administer blasphemy laws against THE TRUTH SEEKER so long as it is in favor of a system of rulership which is the source of blasphemy laws, it would hav got just the reply it merited. THE TRUTH SEEKER says that it goes in for justice. If it goes in for putting into men's hands power by which they can do injustice, how is it but sentimentally in favor of justice? The best means of obtaining justice may be a matter of opinion, but for all the results of a given system its advocates must stand responsible from the moment that, basing their action upon their opinion that it is the best, they force it upon others. Ought not the blasphemy laws to hav taught THE TRUTH SEEKER a lesson? Is it not taxed against its will to pay for the agencies of such men as Comstock, who may at any time interfere with its freedom

Destruction and Construction.

When it is laid to our charge, as it often is, that our labors as Liberal workers tend only to destroy, and not to build up; that we are removing the foundation of faith in which our ancestors found support, and on which they erected the present system of society, and suggesting nothing in its place, we are simply told that we are doing our duty. We are reminded that we are performing the task required of us, and carrying on the work of our generation.

As truth seekers we are not attempting to explore the heavens beyond our reach, as others hav done before us, to meet only with disappointment and failure. We are searching for knowledge on earth, digging for it beneath the surface of the world we liv in. And as, before you can erect a city, you must clear away the forests, and level the rocks that occupy the ground, so must you, ere you can build habitations in which mankind can dwell in comfort, freedom, and equality, sweep away the dense mass of ignorance and error that encumber the earth, and blast the rocks of superstition on which the churches hav been built.

Men whose ideas are in advance of the time they liv in, whose love and pity for humanity are touched by the woes they see around them, and often, maybe, hightened by the wrongs they feel themselvs, sometimes frame in their minds systems by which they imagin these evils can be remedied. They map out plans of improvement. They giv their ideas to the world, and the sick, the poor, and the suffering eagerly grasp at that which givs them hopes of relief. Who can blame them if they sometimes indulge in hopes of bliss they were born too early to enjoy? If they find consolation in the thought that, when their tongues hav been stilled in death and their hands hav crumbled into dust, their visions shall be realized, let them dream on happily and peacefully. Let them, in the silent hours of their night, behold the future that is not yet, and rise refreshed for the struggle that is here. But let them not neglect the labors of the day on which that future depends. He who plows the ground knows that in time of harvest the waving grain will await the reapers. We know that when we pluck up the rank weeds, and cut down the tall trees of false religions, we clear a space. To those who follow us it belongs to utilize it for the common good.

In the brain of man a thousand systems may be evolved for the benefit of his fellow-man. Those who preach such systems are like the husbandman in the parable. They cast forth the seed indeed, but how much of it is lost! Some falls upon stony ground, upon hearts petrified by superstition, that humanity cannot soften. Some falls among the weeds of absurd religious dogmas, and when the fresh sprout of truth just appears above the surface, the weeds grow up and choke it. Some falls by the wayside, and the birds, the black flock of hungry priests, pounce upon it, and convert it into food for themselvs. Only that which is cast upon good ground produces fruit. Let us first tear away from the world the noxious growths of religious systems. Let us root up the churches, and burn them in the fire of reason. Let us by the dynamite of logic blast the rocks of superstition that make the earth a steril soil. Then shall we find good ground, where we may sow, and plant, and build as our necessities require.

There was never yet a movement started to benefit mankind but the teachers of religion opposed it until it became too strong for them. Then they grabbed it, and, claiming it as an offspring of their own, did their worst to convert it to their own purposes.

Will the population of the earth, in times to come, be divided into social republics, where the state will care for all, and all be equal as brothers in one family? Will individualism be so developed, and our natural love of justice and right so extended and purified, that each man may be safely trusted to govern himself, and will govern himself to the best interests of the whole community? These are speculations that may at times amuse or cheer us. But to carry them out to a practical result is not the object of our time. There is destructiv work enough for generations yet. At present we can labor for human advancement best by removing the greatest obstacles it encounters, and these are the religions that infest society. When the rubbish has been burnt to ashes and blown to fragments, there will be clear ground. Then we may construct. Then we may erect a noble building in which humanity may shelter. Then we may sow seed which will bring forth fruit on which humanity may feed.

We Wonder.

We wonder if the Galveston Daily News knows where it is going to land in this controversy with THE TRUTH SEEKER over its action in regard to the Sunday laws of Texas? We wonder if the News knows that the doctrins it is teaching are the doctrins of the Boston Anarchists? We wonder if the News —the organ of the Texas Democracy, the friend of a president, the biggest newspaper published south of Mason & Dixon's line—knows that for trying to put into practice these Anarchistic ideas four men were hanged in Chicago? We wonder if the News knows that the logical result of its reasoning is the abolition of all government and all laws—even those Sunday laws so dear to its managerial heart and precious to its proprietorial pocket as affording it a practical monopoly of Sunday recreation? Yet that is the exact effect of the reasoning in the two articles we quote on another page.

The News also deviates from cold facts in one or two instances. It denies that it upheld Sunday laws per se, when the fact is the News deplored "continental" Sundays, and said in substance that if the Texas Sunday law was repealed civilization would go backward. If the News will set one of its reporters to searching its files, it will find this is so. We hav not, we regret to say, preserved our copies. The News denies, too, that it forces its own employees to labor on Sunday, against the statute in such case made and provided. If the News will explain how it can publish Sunday and Monday issues without labor on Sunday, we will accept its denial. Otherwise not. The News also calls our assertion that "Texas law permits the sale of papers on Sunday, but not their manufacture," a misstatement. How can it be when the law reads this wise: "The sale of newspapers shall be permissible?" But "any person who shall hereafter labor, or compel, force, or oblige his employees, workmen, or apprentices to labor on Sunday, shall be fined not less than ten nor more than fifty dollars." The fact is, the law does prohibit the manufacture of merchandise on Sunday, but Judge Cook has interpreted the law for the benefit of newspapers. The higher courts, however, may reverse this decision, for the opinion of one judge is no more law than the action of one constable.

But what we wonder at most is that the News persists in claiming that our opposition to blasphemy laws is parallel to its own action in resisting the enforcement of Sunday laws upon itself, while clamoring for their enforcement upon others. And it raises a fog-bank of words, strikingly resembling the Anarchistic sophistry of Dr. M. E. Lazarus, to prevent its readers from seeing the wide difference. If Freethinkers had ever claimed the right to suppress any person's religious utterances, then the News might chuckle when a Freethinker was hoist on his own petard. But Freethinkers deplore all interference with free speech, and denounce all suppression of it, holding that unless material mischief shall directly follow free speech, and as a consequence, such suppression is unjust. Therefore there can be no possible parallel between the words of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the action of the News.

Another source of wonderment is that the News reproves us for upholding government. Is the News willing to go the whole length of its logic? If so, it lands in Anarchy, and becomes an ally of those who would remove all government. Is that a position the great Democratic journal of the South is willing to take? The News says: "All results of legislation and administration by authority are contained in the grant of powers, including the opportunity to assume powers, in government. THE TRUTH SEEKER approving a Sabbatarian judge as a scourge to giv people a lesson unconsciously reproves THE TRUTH SEEKER complaining of a New Jersey anti-heretical judge, another scourge to giv Freethinkers a lesson—the same lesson." Now, our contention is that no delegated authority has the right to assume powers. It can exercise only those specifically delegated to it, and we claim that the United States and New Jersey authorities are both forbidden by their constitutions to punish heresy. And we also claim that the New Jersey legislature usurped a power not granted it by the people when it passed the blasphemy statute. The state legislature can exercise power given it by the state constitution when not in conflict with the federal Constitution. But it has no right to assume powers. Therefore our denunciation of the law and its enforcement is perfectly logical and consistent with our principles.

But how is with the News? That paper called upon the officials to enforce a Sunday law. The officials did so, and arrested the manager of the News. Then the News wanted to be exempted from the action of the law, and the judge obligingly allowed the claim. But the News went further, and upheld the law. We well remember, though we hav no file of the News, that it quoted the words of a religious advocate of Sunday laws and added, in substance, that the abolition of the Sunday laws would play the very devil with this country. With great solemnity the editor showed how the poor laborer would be robbed of all opportunity for recreation by hard-hearted employers, and immediately turned round and ordered his subordinates to prepare the Sunday and Monday issues of the News. Now, THE TRUTH SEEKER never asked for the enforcement of the blasphemy law. We never upheld it. We never wanted it enforced even on the Christians. We never argued that the law is good. If we had, then the cases would be parallel. As it is, they are not, and all the sophistry of all the Anarchists in the country cannot make them appear so. We uphold legal officers in exercising the powers really delegated to them; we oppose them when they assume powers and act unjustly. We believe, with Thomas Jefferson, that the best government is that which governs least, and we believe in holding our officers to a strict accountability when they they exceed the powers given them by our Constitutions. But we are not Anarchist enough to believe that republicanism is a failure, nor that the necessary and well-defined delegation of authority "defies all effectiv limitations upon power." We admit that the News has been voluntarily "contributing to the arming of its oppressors," but we deny that we hav voluntarily done so. We support the Constitution, but we deny that that instrument "includes the opportunity to assume powers." On the contrary, it restricts the government, and is designed to protect the people against the tyranny of strength that would inevitably follow its removal.

We wonder when the News will publicly proclaim its conversion to the Anarchistic philosophy.

Modest Ministers.

On the 28th ult., the clergy of the various Protestant denominations of Chicago held a meeting to consider the very general "Sabbath desecration" of the times. One of their number had prepared some brief papers, which he read, to be presented to the coming Washington conference, and by that body to be submitted to the persons appealed to. One paper is addressed to the House of Representatives, and says:

"The telegraph is now used to transmit all important news, and, therefore, there is no absolute necessity for running mails on the Sabbath. Consequently, the running of mails on that day is in violation of state laws."

The next paper is addressed to the directors of the railroads in the United States, and says:

"The increased rate of speed of travel and transportation, as compared with that used in the days of our fathers, has so multiplied the facilities of dispatching business that there is no necessity of running trains more than six days in a week; and that, therefore, all work done on Sunday, except of necessity or mercy, is in violation of our state laws; so that if a community of capital openly ignores statute laws, we need not be surprised when a community of laborers follow their example."

A paper to the directors of telegraph lines says:

"The electric forces, now utilized by our telegraphs, hav brought the people of the world into close proximity, and therefore there is no more necessity for transacting business by telegraph on the Sabbath than there is for people to keep their stores open."

The last paper is addressed to the proprietors of the public press of the United States, and says:

"The Sabbath is the dividing line between Christianity and heathenism; it is the bulwark that shields our Christian civilization against Anarchy, and every influence that tends to weaken the power of the Sabbath over the public conscience endangers the stability of our republican institutions. The business of publishing and selling newspapers on the Sabbath is in open violation of our state laws. We therefore respectfully request you to discontinue the publication of newspapers on Sunday."

About the time the ministers obtain all these demands, look out for the millennium, some darkness for the space of half an hour, and a general rustling of wings as the population of the United States goes upward.

Indignant Mr. Miller.

It is due to Mr. J. M. Miller, of Bay City, Mich. to print his letter on this editorial page. The reason will be seen on perusing the letter:

"BAY CITY, MICH., Dec. 5, 1887.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: My attention was called to an article in your paper of Nov. 12, 1887, under the head of, 'Prohibitionists the Priests' Last Hope,' in which you refer to Herman Raster's explanation of one of the resolutions in the Republican platform, and speak of J. M. Miller, the correspondent to whom Mr. Raster wrote that letter, as 'a distiller.' Now, I, the said J. M. Miller, wish to say to you that I never was in a distillery in my life, and for more than forty years hav not drunk of the accursed products of the still. On the contrary, my purpose was to get the truth before the people, that all well-wishers of good order and morality might see where our political parties were drifting to. It seemed to me to be an effort to import the beer-garden of continental Europe, with all its deleterious effects, and plant it here among us.

"If you were the truth seeker you profess to be, you would hav learned who and what J. M. Miller was before you tried to fasten a burning disgrace upon my humble name.

"I do not expect you to publish this; but I hav a right to expect—nay, demand—that the explanation be made as public as you hav made the slander—yes, I say slander.

"I shall remain, not a distiller, but a reformer, on the broad gage. J. M. MILLER."

We apologize to Mr. Miller for having said that he was a distiller. But we obtained our information from a letter written to a paper published a few score miles up the Hudson by a gentleman evidently as strong a Prohibitionist as Mr. Miller himself. We had, of course, no means of knowing where Mr. Miller lived, and feel greatly obliged to him for having disclosed his whereabouts, that we may do justice to all.

But the gist of our editorial, "The Prohibitionists the Priests' Last Hope," was not a discussion of Mr. Miller's vocation, but the fact that from neither of the present political parties could the priests hope for aid in restoring the puritanical Sunday laws, and they must, therefore, look to the Prohibition party. This view is strengthened by Mr. Miller's letter. He unmasked the Republicans, and drew from a member of the committee which drafted the resolutions the important information that the party fully and explicitly discountenanced all so-called temperance (Prohibitory) and Sunday laws. And as the Democratic party has always done the same; as the Henry George party wants to tax the churches; as the Union Labor party and Greenbackers of the West are heretical to a pleasing degree; as the Socialistic party of the East is composed principally of German Infidels and American Agnostics, we feel that we are fully justified in our conclusion that only in the ranks of the Prohibitionists will the priest find aid and comfort.

And here, perhaps, it may be proper to digress a little to answer Emily Burton, of Chester, Neb., who disputes our statement that the Protestant church is at one with the Prohibition party, and immediately proves us right by saying: "It is a well-known fact that the churches were dumb in relation to the crying sin of drunkenness until there was a temperance element in the country so strong that they were compelled for very shame to cease their lamentations over the shortcomings of the Jews, their eulogies upon Isaiah and St. Paul, their admiration of Job and Solomon, and to stand for the earnest, honest, practical need of the hour." She adds, also, that it was two thousand years before the church took hold of the temperance question. Exactly. We did not say that the Protestant church originated the Prohibition question. What we said meant that to-day the Protestant church furnishes the orators, the writers, and the voters for Prohibition. This is strictly true, as everyone knows who follows the movements of the different political parties. The Prohibitionists of this state are all pietists, and only pietists. The measure is inextricably mixed with the Sunday laws, and supported almost solely as a religious measure for preserving the Protestant Sabbath. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is a Protestant organization entirely, which has lately widened—or narrowed—to aiding in keeping the Bible in the public schools. The God-in-the-Constitution party has adopted the Prohibition issue, and the Prohibitionists of the East hav promised aid to the God-in-the-Constitution crowd. No matter what the state of affairs used to be, this is the condition now. Even the woman suffrage movement, at least here in New York, has been captured by the church. Its meetings are opened with prayer, and men with "Rev." before their names are about the only speakers. We repeat—and Emily Burton will agree with us if she studies contemporary events instead of ancient history—that Protestantism and Prohibition are one, united and inseparable. The churches hav adopted the temperance issue to aid them in enforcing the Sunday law in cities.

In conclusion, we assure Mr. Miller that we had no intention of doing him an injustice, and Mrs. Burton that we try to be sure of our facts, and to speak only the literal truth.

"My heart laments that virtue cannot liv
Out of the teeth of envy."

Converting the Hebrews.

The London Christian Society for the Conversion of the Hebrews held its annual meeting lately, and reported the purchase of a few Jews at about thirty thousand dollars each. The society professed to be encouraged by this showing, and as it probably knows as well as anyone the difficulty of getting Jews to swap their souls for cash, we cannot say that its cheerfulness is unwarranted. But, at the same time, thirty thousand dollars seems a big price to pay.

We hav in New York also a Society for the Conversion of the Hebrews, which is about equally successful with its London prototype, but lacks that society's frankness in stating the cost of its converts. Its last annual report shows that only seven New York Hebrews were in the religious market, and purchasable by the society. The society has a church in St. Mark's Place, with the Lord's Prayer over the pulpit in gilt Hebrew characters; it publishes a paper called the Hebrew Christian; it supports a salaried secretary, and a higher salaried agent, who poses as a converted rabbi; and Howard Crosby, D.D., Presbyterian, is the chairman of the advisory board which directs its affairs. The Rev. Mr. Freshman, the combined agent and minister, is a peculiar mortal. His enemies, who still are Jews, assert that he cannot read the prayer over his pulpit, though he certainly can write a report well calculated to draw ducats from the pockets of the faithful. But the society never reports to the world what is done with the ducats, and the charge is made that many of them go to support the converts, who are Christians for revenue only.

Mr. Freshman tells two stock stories illustrativ of the protectiv care of the Lord for those Hebrews who supplement their ancient by the newer Christian superstition. The society hired a room in Cooper Union unfurnished. How this deficiency in comfort was to be met Mr. Freshman did not know, but finally he determined to ask the Lord, which he did, per prayer. Scarcely had he arisen from his knees when a van backed up to the curbstone loaded with just the furniture desired for the room. Such exemplary promptness on the part of the Lord, intimates Mr. Freshman, is due to the fact that he is a converted Hebrew. On another occasion, fifty dollars were sadly needed to carry on his work. Again did he sink upon his knees, and rose to meet the postman bearing a letter inclosing a check for just that amount. After this, if we may believe Mr. Freshman, who shall say that prayer is not answered?

We met the other day a Jew who has paid some attention to the affairs of this society. This Jew has little confidence in Mr. Freshman, in his methods, or in the genuinness of the seven conversions reported. He has been, he says, to see Howard Crosby, to convince him that Mr. Freshman does not understand the Hebrew language, and is so far an impostor. He has visited the Independent office and seen Dr. Ward, to whom he explained that the society for the conversion of the Hebrews costs a great deal more than it is worth to the church. He has also visited the Christian Union with the commendable purpose of setting forth what he thinks about the society and its agent, but none of these parties will do more than listen to him—they will not investigate his charges, for fear, he says, of exposing to the world the poverty of a faith which has to buy its converts from a race upon whose miraculous career that faith is founded. This Jew thinks there is something wrong with a church which supports such sham institutions as societies for the conversion of the Hebrews.

Editorial Notes.

THE autographs of C. B. Reynolds and J. E. Remsburg adorn the same page of a Missouri hotel register. Both hav been at work in that state for several weeks.

A BOSTON jury has decided that a cigar is a drug, and therefore that an apothecary can sell one on Sunday without violating the law. This is one way to evade an odious law. A more manly way would be to repeal the statute.

THE American Society for Psychical Research has gathered some interesting statistics regarding the proportion of superstitious people to be found in a community possessing a fair amount of culture. It is found that one man in ten has a tendency to superstition, and that two women in ten are affected the same way. Judging by the comparativ number of men and women in the church, we should hav placed the proportion of superstitious women to superstitious men much higher.

THE new president of France will probably prove very acceptable to the church, as he is an ardent Roman Catholic and his wife is devoted to the church. Carnot was elected over stronger men as the result of intrigue. But if he undertakes to hand France back to Rome, he will find the Radicals very strong. It is significant, however, that the papal nuncio has received instructions from the Vatican to pay an early visit to the president, and to establish friendly relations at the outset with the new administration, by explicitly declaring the good-will of the holy see toward France. The good-will of the holy see is the good-will of the hungry wolf for the fat lamb.

THE Evangelical Alliance is in session at Washington, presided over by Justice Harlan, of the United States Supreme Court. One of the subjects discussed was "family purity and perils." Among the dangerous agencies at work overthrowing morality the clergy named the public schools, novels, the daily press, art, in painting, sculpture, and music, and the saloon. Nothing was said about the preachers, though they are the cause of more family immorality, and a greater peril to family purity, than any other agency named, except, possibly, the saloon. But the Evangelical Alliance is a council of fossilized hypocrits, dissatisfied with everything that does not make to their own glory and power.

AT the church of St. Vincent Ferrer, in this city, four infants were presented for baptism on Sunday, the 4th instant. One of them was a son of Edward L. May, of 301 East Sixty-second street. "What do you wish to name this child?" asked the officiating priest of the father. "Robert Ingersoll May," responded the proud parent. "What," askcd the priest in astonishment, "is not that a peculiar name to giv a child in this age? Can you not find another more appropriate?" "No," replied the father. "I like the name and I like the man." All present, says the World, had been very interested listeners of the colloquy, and wondered what would come next, when the priest, without another word, christened the baby "Robert Ingersoll May." When the friends of Colonel Ingersoll are found even in Roman Catholic churches, who shall say that the signs of the times do not indicate that the kingdom of man is at hand? Mrs. Ingersoll has bought that baby a mug which will make him the haughtiest of all infants; and Colonel Ingersoll has written the father a letter which ought to make him the proudest of all parents. The occasion, too, is worthy of an encyclical from the pope, for who can believe that Robert Ingersoll May will grow up a Catholic? The faithful should be warned.

W. F. JAMIESON is now bombarding orthodoxy in southern Colorado. The clergy began the fusilade, although Jamieson remained quiet all summer. They were not even willing that a Freethinker should liv in their neighborhood and be silent. He has just closed a course of six lectures in his own town, Monte Vista, the first ever given in the history of the place. The Christians labored with each other, and with other weak-minded persons, to keep away from the lectures, which were successful in spite of the efforts of the godly. We will soon hav a letter from the seat of war. Address Mr. Jamieson at Monte Vista, Col.

Letters from Friends.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Nov. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I charge that the churches having a bishop attached to them, wherever they may be, hav nothing more nor less than the pope's agents in disguise, and the people should understand this and treat them accordingly. I also charge the president of the United States with breaking our Constitution in support of these churches, utterly disregarding all others, which has and will cost the people their life's blood. Also, the queen of England has more faith in the pope than she has in the Protestant religion, of which the Church of England is only an assumed name to deceive the people. How could any church make a holy church out of an unholy one? It is nothing but the pope in disguise. I take this plan to inform the people, as the press is more or less dishonest and cannot be relied upon to serve them.

CHARLES SACH.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., Nov. 15, E.M. 287.

MR. EDITOR: Find stamps, and send me "Bible Morals," and "Crimes of Preachers."

Extract from the Milwaukee Sunday Telegraph, Nov. 13, 1887: "A Yankee Chaplain's Plain Talk.—I feel sure that all hatred, and bitterness, and animosity of revenge should be forever banished, if any still remain. These sentiments belong to devils, not men. [Right here this fool should hav stopped, but he did not, he continues] 'Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord.'" Thus, after turning over all these evil sentiments to the devils, alas! he must bring his "Lord" in for a share of them also. It seems impossible to keep this contumacious Lord out of bad company. Cleveland's orthodox messages prove to a certainty that he would not veto a bill, approved by Congress, to put his "almighty God" in the Constitution. Nevertheless, Blaine had his Burchard, and in 1888 Cleveland may find his also.

NELSON HUNT.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., Nov. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $7, for which please credit to John C. Hutzler $1.50 for six months' subscription, and 50 cents for pamphlets sent me; the balance ($5) is sent by Mr. H. Bohda for the benefit of the American Secular Union for the Propaganda Fund in the distribution of Freethought literature, and books, etc. You will oblige me by forwarding the same to E. A. Stevens, Secretary, 750 West Lake street, Chicago, Ill., with the request that if he has any literature to send, please mail the same to my address.

I desire to say to Brother Swan, of Kent, O., that he is a very lucky man, and that he need hav no fear of anyone ever attempting to take away his home. I am a poor man myself, and never wear but one shirt at a time, and no paper collar attached to it. If every man is as easily satisfied as he seems to be, we would all be willing slaves, for no man can go out West and take up goverment land unless he has some money, or help from somebody; if they could, there would not be so many failures as there hav been.

Yours respectfully, LOUIS WOLFES.

REDDICK, ILL., Nov. 29, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I am happy to state to the thinking world that Mr. Charles Watts, of Toronto, Ont., commenced a course of three lectures at the city hall, Saturday, Nov. 26, 287, to a well-filled hall. His lecture for Saturday at 7 P.M., headed, "Unbelief," was delivered in a masterly manner. It would hav been a thing of impossibility for an audience to be more quiet and orderly thoroughout. The clergy of the city were invited to ask questions or answer, but failed to do so. One of our pious townsmen made an attempt to reply to Mr. Watts, but sat down with mortification on his narrow head. Mr. Watts's description of Unbelief was grand in the extreme, and filled with sound logic, good sense, and deep thought. His delivery and tenor of thought convinced his hearers that he is a Secularist from careful study and education; and until evidence is furnished showing that he is wrong he will be one of the peerless. I can heartily indorse Mr. Watts to our friends wishing a good live worker and a course of thoroughgoing lectures, and am certain that should they secure his services they will be delighted with his efforts. To Mr. Watts and his Secular Thought are attached the best wishes of the people of Reddick and vicinity.

BELLEVUE, IDA., Nov. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Your kind and considerate note just received. I hav suffered such sad reverses in the last year or two that my mind has been diverted from the progress of Liberalism.

Having first the misfortune of being burnt out of a fine, new residence, my husband then sold out and went to the mines in Idaho, and two years thereafter he returned and brought me here last spring, when he failed in his mining operations and sought to find a better location in Nevada, while I remained here. Not hearing from him for some months, I wrote letters of inquiry and was informed of the sad news that Mr. Hutchinson had gone insane and been sent to the asylum at Stockton, Cal. He had expended all his money, and I am left here destitute, dependent upon my friends. I would like if some of THE TRUTH SEEKER friends will try and aid me by selling copies of my book, "Beyond the Veil," retaining enough of the sales to pay for expenses. I could not sell any of them here; not enough Liberals. I shall be glad to hav THE TRUTH SEEKER sent to me at this place, as I shall probably remain until spring. Please publish this letter and call attention to it, as I wish the friends to know that I hav not deserted the Liberal ranks, only fallen out by the wayside from press of adverse circumstances. I had hoped to hav heard Mr. Putnam when in this vicinity this fall, but only saw the cars that bore him on to Salt Lake city.

I hav seen but two or three copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER for over a year; hav just had one handed me with the good news of the honorable acquittal of our Aunt Elmina.

Three cheers for liberty of speech and triumph of common sense over despotism and barbarism.

MRS. LUNA HUTCHISON.

STANLEY, IA., Nov. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The book you sent me, "The Devil's Pulpit," came to hand. So you see I hav a pulpit of my own, and am not obliged to go to an orthodox church to borrow one. It is handy to hav one's own pulpit in the house. I hav not only "The Devil's Pulpit," but hav the Independent Pulpit of J. D. Shaw.

On the 20th of this month I went to West Union, twenty-five miles, to hear Charles Watts. He had a very fair and attentiv audience. On the 21st he lectured at the same place to a much larger audience, and they were well pleased; so much so that they tried to hav him stay over another night, but he, having an engagement at Maynard, could not do so. He also gave a lecture at Maynard on the 22d to a large and enthusiastic audience. On the 23d he lectured at Oelwein to a large concourse of people. Mr. Watts always invites discussion, but none came forward except at Oelwein. There he had some opposition, but they never touched his lectures. There were some persons at Maynard who came seventy-five miles to hear the lecture.

WM. REICHFIELD.

OSHAWA, ONT., Nov. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 12th is Colonel Ingersoll's reply to Dr. Field. I am very much pleased with it, and so are all my friends that I hav shown it to. Among my friends is a Methodist minister, and he says that the colonel is a very smart man, and that if there are any flaws or inconsistencies in the Christian religion, he is just the person to discover them.

I hav been reading Father Lambert, and also Mr. McGrudder's "Notes on Ingersoll," and think that Lambert must hav been studying McGrudder, as there are several parts the same. McGrudder's "Notes" was published in 1882, and Lambert's in 1883; hence my conclusions. Lambert thinks he has made a great point against the colonel where the colonel says that water does not run up-hill. I would like to see Father Lambert make some of his holy water run up-hill. In Lambert's work, page 115, he says that the devil is a damned liar. Will he please giv us a couple of places in the Bible where the devil has told any lies? On page 156 he says that Matthew givs the ancestors of Joseph, while Luke givs the ancestors of Mary the mother of God. I hav read both, and I cannot see that Lambert is right. If I am wrong, will he please put me right? In McGrudder, page 60, he says: "Let Mr. Ingersoll understand that there is not a single text in the Bible that, fairly interpreted, affords the least countenance to the revolting doctrin that he [the colonel] discards [the doctrin of eternal torment]; that it is unscriptural, and borrowed from the pagan mythology." Now, if Mr. McGrudder will only throw overboard a little more superstition he can join with me in singing:

(Tune: Coronation.)

All hail the power of Ingersoll's name!
Let Superstition prostrate fall!
Bring forth your Calvinistic creed,
And he'll expose it all.

BRISTOL, WISCONSIN, Nov. 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am mad clear through, but just whom to be mad at, I don't know. My TRUTH SEEKER has failed to reach me three different times this fall, while the other subscribers received theirs with great regularity. I look forward every week for my TRUTH SEEKER just as I expect my meals from day to day. I am wondering what the pictures are to be, or what the Editor will hav to say on the many exciting subjects of the day, or what your many friends of all shades of opinion will dilate upon, or what George will report of the sayings and doings of the Liberal Club—and now to be cut short of the reading of poor, persecuted Elmina's law-suit makes me mad, and I don't care who knows it. Anathemas sit on the scoundrel who steals my best of all papers, the wide-awake TRUTH SEEKER. I am glad beyond expression that Elmina went scot-free, even if it was brought about by a technicality. The judge seemed only too glad to unload so unsavory a case. Had he been a Benedict, I fear she would not hav escaped so easily. If the good Lord would only giv Anthony the medicin he gave Ananias and Sapphira for keeping a little of this world's goods back from the church, I know of one that would not shed a tear. But don't let this get out, for some fanatic might shoot the cuss, and then, under Judge Gary's rulings and the law of Illinois, I would be held equally guilty and go the same road the five men lately traveled in Chicago. I wonder if the great state of Illinois won't some day in the future be ashamed of the record she has made in this matter. But I hav occasion to rejoice that my paper containing Ingersoll's reply to Field reached me all right. It is a complete reply to Christian orthodoxy—a reply such as only Ingersoll, the best of reasoners, can make. Hoping you can explain, or, what is better, that my TRUTH SEEKER will always reach me, I remain, as ever, Yours, A. D. CORNWELL.

ONEIDA, KAN., Nov. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I notice that some of the newspaper publishers are being exercised over the probability of the annexation or admission of the territory of Utah as a state, which would, of course, giv us what we never hav had before, an ecclesiastical state despotism in one state, and the assumed "saintly" frauds would submit to anything Congress might impose on them, even the prohibition of polygamy, as a "ruse" only in order to be admitted. Then there would be a state religion in Utah, and that state religion the abominable foul institution that Mormonism is, and the national government could not prevent it, under the Constitution. A question it has found so difficult to deal with in a Mormon territory would be beyond a possibility of solution in a Mormon state, as no one would dispute. But why so exercised over our danger, to the neglect of another of such formidable magnitude comparativly? Has not the Romish church been clamoring for a hierarchy or ecclesiastical despotism throughout the whole United States for many years, and is not that sect increasing very rapidly? Is it not the most potent political "machine" or power in the country? It seems like straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel, does it not? Is not the locating of that "grand" propaganda university at Washington city a precursor to the establishing of a nuncio there also? "Cardinal" Simeoni, who is denominated the prefect of the Vatican propaganda, would, perhaps, be the chap who would require credentials from the old man who a short time ago arrogated to himself the title of Pope Leo XIII, Pontifex et Rex—that is, supreme pontiff and king; which was engraved on some medals to be presented at his show jubilee, which the Italian government seized, not being able to bear so much arrogance and pompous lordliness. They had not lost sight of Garibaldi yet, it is evident. These credentials he would present to the secretary of state, and if Mr. Bayard should accept them (which he certainly could not with any kind of good policy refuse), then he would be doing an act which commits this country to a recognition of the Romish church as a temporal power. If Romanism is to be admitted to recognition in the diplomatic councils of this country, a new feature would arise which would prove very detrimental to our boasted freedom. If a nuncio is admitted here, the religious prejudices of the people would be aroused, and there is no antagonism equal to that of religious differences, which all history verifies. Hence, would it not be as laudable for the press to wake up a little thought on Romanism? It is increasing so rapidly, and expending such vast amounts of money in building monasteries, convents, nunneries, etc., surrounded by such impenetrable parapets, walls into which poor, ignorant, weak-minded women are being allured by the 743 sacerdotal celibates telling them that it is for the greater glory of God, etc., that they should be kept imprisoned in those places among such a lot of bachelors as Bishop John Joseph Hogan describes in his diocese in a letter published on the 19th of last June. While being so exercised over Mormonism, why not at least divide interest with Romanism? If Mormonism is bad enough in its tendency and intent to establish a hierarchy in Utah as soon as possible, how is it with Romanism all over the land?

"AMERICA."

CHESTER, NEB., Nov. 23, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: A writer in THE TRUTH SEEKER for November 12th says: "The Prohibition party, the God-in-the-Constitution party, and the Protestant church are one!" and declares Prohibition to be the priests' last hope. It would be just as fair to claim that Christianity and civilization are one as that the Protestant church and Prohibition are one. It is a well-known fact that the churches were dumb in relation to the crying sin of drunkenness until there was a temperance element in the country so strong that they were compelled for very shame to cease their lamentations over the shortcomings of the Jews, their eulogies upon Isaiah and St. Paul, their admiration of Job and Solomon, and to stand for the earnest, honest, practical need of the hour. For long, very, very long indeed, nearly two thousand years, ministers of the gospel utterly ignored the question of temperance, refusing to desecrate their pulpits with anything so modern; refusing to lower their standard of priestly sanctity by anything so much of the earth, earthy, as drunkenness and its accompanying sorrows, miseries, and crimes. They preached Christ and him crucified; faith or hell-fire to the sinner; and quoted St. Paul to the women; but to the sleek guzzlers of their flocks not an offending word; to those guzzlers so far along as to be no longer sleek, but seedy, not a word; for the poor women who supported these seedy individuals and their children not a single plea. It was their part to act as if there were no guzzlers, within sound of their voice, at least. Their flocks, of course, had their failings; but guzzling was not to be tampered with. So far is it from the truth that the Protestant church and Prohibition are one that just the reverse is true; for the church did not demand Prohibition of the people, but the people demanded it of the church. To the last possible moment preachers shirked the burden of anything so practical and useful, so sorely needful, as the fight against intemperance. Being paid for the light work of choosing from the ancient history of the Jews a text sufficiently vague, from which to deplore a lack of faith, or urge a generous contribution for the wants of the church, it could hardly be expected of them to enter into the real fight with real evils.

Hitherto the church has opposed itself to every upward step that science has taken; but science has gone up notwithstanding, and pulled the church up after it; and been astounded time and again to hear the church claim all the credit. The church accepts now the theory that the earth moves; that volcanoes and earthquakes are the effect of inexorable law; and is almost ready to embrace the Darwinian theory of evolution. Indeed, the church has about concluded that discretion is the better part of valor, and hereafter will hardly set itself against the verdicts of science until after due consideration. But because of this shall we say that the church and science are one? All the past of man mingles with the present in shouting one grand "No!"

The progress of society, the circulation of the newspaper, the spread of enlightenment, are all demanding of cities, communities, states, and nations "sweeter manners, purer laws;" and Prohibition is only an effort on the part of the people to meet this demand. The movement is world-wide and confined to no one country; and if the churches are at the eleventh hour, from whatever motiv, identifying themselvs with the temperance work, it is the noblest, grandest effort they hav made since Christ went about making the blind to see, and the lame to walk. EMILY BURTON.

Nov. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: One of your subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER loaned me some of the numbers of 1886 and 1887. They are rich in scientific facts and sound logic, that are doing much to liberate the priest-ridden people from ignorance and superstition.

Its Editor, and its scores of contributors, sound reasoners on Freethought and free expression, are the 999 true apostles of modern times. They are the saviors that light up the darkness of blind theological faith.

I see in my wandering life but very few Liberal papers in the homes even of professed Liberals. Neither THE TRUTH SEEKER nor any Liberal paper is kept on any newsstand in this part of the country. The Gods rend the people through the mouth of Sam Jones, Talmage, and hosts of Bible-pounders.

In reading books about martyrs cruelly tortured and put to death, innocent women and babes murdered by Christian armies led by ministers as generals at God's command, I do not wonder at D. M. Bennett's sledge-hammer blows hurled at the Gods and the priestcraft all along the way of his editorial life. I am glad, Mr. Editor, to see you took up the cudgel when he laid it down at the ebb of his noble life.

You are giving telliug blows at the stories of the inspired saints, writers of the Bible, by taking your readers every week into Mr. W. Heston's art gallery. Won't Jesus's followers smile at the vivid scenes of the holy Bible as they pass through this art gallery?

The clerical cloth should giv thanks for the new name you hav so appropriately applied to their reverences—"sky-pilots."

Some of the Christian Liberals cry out with fear and indignation at the blows you are dealing through your paper. "Why, it will call down the wrath of the popular class upon us!" Christians hav always used the heretics as targets for spite and revenge, and feel they are doing God's will. Must the Infidel keep silent while they hurl their false anathemas at the people called heretics for their liberal sentiments? Nay, nay, beard the lion in his den.

Five of the Anarchists hav satisfied the demands called legal of twelve apostles (jurors) and judge, and now moss-covered people breathe easier and shout: "We've hung them up there in the name of the people!"

Hav they destroyed the seed of Anarchy by victims stretching hemp? These men hav been crucified upon the gallows. Does this settle the bill by legal murder? The command is: Thou shalt not kill.

The people are struggling to obtain justice. They may be mistaken in the wisest way to obtain it. Right and justice are seldom gained except by war and bloodshed.

Roll on, thou progressiv car, till dogmatic religions shall sink into sheol's sulphur vat, never to be resurrected! All hail to Eugene Macdonald, Watson Heston, and the army of laborers for free expression of thought, and to the noble and outspoken Robert Ingersoll, C. B. Reynolds, and S. P. Putnam!

I would like some of your free tracts to distribute among the faith-loving people. MRS. E. J. STOUGHTON.

KENT, O., Nov. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: To my mind there is no better proof of the advancement and civilization of our people than to know there are now more turncoats than formerly. Thirty years ago a man who changed his political or religious views, from whatever cause, was looked upon as weak-minded and unstable—a boy must think and vote as his father did. No neighbor of an opposit party, if ever so good a man, was worthy of the least known office. Now nearly everyone can read the daily papers, can hear the issues of the day discussed from all standpoints, and, after deciding which is right, vote according to the dictates of his own reason. Then a Democrat or a Republican was a Democrat or Republican still; a Methodist or a person of any other denomination was the same forever, and held the same ideas as taught his fathers before him.

Now we see at least a few who dare trust themselvs to hear some other side of the story. Even the Infidels are now allowed to call themselvs white Americau citizens, and their voice is heard throughout the land. While we rejoice to see such an age of progression, yet we regret to see the superstition and bigotry in the majority, for it is the majority that must rule our land. It is not among sectarians alone that we find people who are wont to stick to their former beliefs, but many of what we term Freethinkers are joined to some idol, and truth seems not to affect them. I hav tried to learn the teachings of nearly all the isms of the day, and fail to find any one that has not some noble and good ideas, even in the much-talked-of Anarchism. Where can be found more pure, happier, and endearing sentiments than in modern Spiritualism? The question is, Is it true? Let no one say nay until every means of proof has failed to demonstrate it either true or false.

This age is one of great advancement, and what we thought to be true yesterday we can hardly think true to-day. Science is struggling with the occult forces of Nature, and we are finding new laws and new methods of using them. Let this light shine forth in all truth, to elevate the spirit and moral worth of man. While I cannot fully agree with Mrs. Freeman, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 26th, as to the guilt of the Chicago Anarchists, I can see plainly the popish arm of power moving in our land. The worst enemy of our American citizenship and of our great republic is popery and priestcraft. The Old World has, in ages past, given us such a picture of priest-taught superstition that it cannot be forgotten. The cry of the martyrs has been made indelible in the blood of innocence.

In many instances we find the serpent's head has been crushed, and justice made to prevail; but, alas! the venom of the viper has shot forth to poison the virtues of other lands. America is a new land; its avenues are unprotected, and the Jesuits' cunning finds many weak places to plant the upas to poison the minds of the weak and innocent. It is here, on American soil, they intend to fight to the bitter end the separation of church and state. They are fast controling the legislativ, judicial, and executiv departments of state, and will make a determined stand to annihilate free schools and Freethought from our land, and substitute parochial schools instead. I feel that there is but one savior and hope whereby we can free ourselvs from the popish chains. I see Freethought and free schools expanding all over our noble land, and see many seeds of parochial schools blasted in the germ. Children drink in the sunlight of freedom, and wish to think for themselvs. I find the majority of our business men are sectarians only in name, to please their wives and to be on the popular side. We can look to them and the more enlightened part of Christians in the time of need.

We shall gain the battle, but the enemy is strong, and we must not be caught napping. Truth must and will prevail. Let everyone with honesty of purpose who wishes to see our country saved from the tyrannical control of church read and consider the great underlying truth at stake, and come out as a propagandist to awaken the great mass to a sense of their duty. No resistance of law, no force, until all peaceful means shall hav failed. To me, law is the sympathetic tie that binds each American citizen to the one great family known as the American republic. The God of Nature does nothing by force, but by his great laws he controls the universe. A. D. SWAN.

ON BOARD SPANISH STEAMER, MIGUEL M. PIVILLOS,
Sept. 29, 1887.

FELLOW TRUTH SEEKERS: This gloomy, damp, foggy 3 P.M. finds us seated at the table on board an ocean steamer, slowly and smoothly steaming down New York bay. I suspect that, so soon as we may hav crossed the bar and reached the bounding billows of the Atlantic, things may not be quite so smooth with us as they now are—though a good stirring up of the stomach may redound somewhat to the welfare of the passengers, of whom there are very few on board.

We, myself and son, George Samuel, expect to arrive at Barcelona, Spain, on or about the 25th prox., from which point we, under the vigilance of our noble pilot, Eugene, propose to let you all hear from us. We are somewhat sad on embarking again from the shores of our nativ land to know that we leave you all again writhing under the direful effects of another spell of hard times, with a bountiful supply of herds, flocks, and crops on every hand. Shylock has again fastened his fangs upon your prosperity by cornering $653,000,000 of your circulating medium, money, in our treasury at Washington, which is equal to about $11 per capita, leaving only about $7 per capita in circulation among you.

Uncle Sam has the bone (the soil), the flesh (the laboring people), and the circulating medium, or life blood (the money), which, were it all in circulation, would amount to about $18 per capita. Now, if a man hav eighteen drops of blood for every ounce of bone and flesh in his body, and if, under such condition, his health and vigor be just medium, and then if eleven drops of that blood for each ounce of that bone and flesh be, through the rupture of a blood-vessel in the lower part of the leg, let out into his boot, leaving only about seven drops of blood, for every ounce of bone and flesh, circulating throughout his body, I fancy he must stagger just as Uncle Sam must stagger, financially or commercially, till that money that is locked up in our treasury at Washington may hav again been put into circulation among the people.

I fancy that I now perceive that the Republico-rebel wing of the Democro-Republico-rebel party, the G. A. R., are going to endeavor to plunge the people into another horrid and bloody war. That wing of that party, through treason to its adherents, elected Grover Cleveland to the presidency in 1884, and on the 4th of March, 1885, they surrendered the reins of government into the hands of treacherous, traitorous, unconstitutionally pardoned rebels. Those rebels will, in 1888, as they did in 1860, permit that Republico-rebel wing to elect the president, and then, to be even with them, count him out eight to seven, and then, if it becomes necessary, use that $653,000,000 of our money that is in our treasury to fight him out, while the G. A. R. will rally to his support and try to fight him in. The only difference that I am able to discern between our last war and the one now approaching is that the other was sectional while this one will be neighbor against neighbor throughout the entire country, and our towns and cities will smoulder in ashes, and then, when the smoke may hav passed away, the surviving poor people will be industriously at work, at good pay, rebuilding. Now, is that the way our affairs should be managed? Remember that the most efficient weapon ever wielded by man, the ballot, is in the hands of the poor people, and, if they will but consider and vote for the laboring man's candidate, they will so effectually chop up both wings of the Democro-Republico-rebel party, and throw them into such confusion, that they cannot precipitate the people into a war. Will we do this, or will we suffer ourselvs to be driven about like a lot of geese, nay, buffeted about like a foot-ball between the two wings of the old party? Time alone must reveal the sagacity of the average American citizen.

In 1860 there were 303 electoral votes in the United States. In order to elect a candidate to the presidency his party had to concentrate upon him 152 of those electoral votes, which would hav been a half-vote over half of the whole, a bare majority, and not a vote to spare. The states in which slavery was tolerated had 120 electoral votes, and when they assembled in convention at Charleston, S. C., in April, 1860, they well knew that they must nominate there a man as candidate for the presidency who, besides carrying the "solid South" as a unit, could command, at least, 32 electoral votes in the Northern states to be added to the 120 of the Southern states, and thus complete a majority, the number of votes requisit to the election of the president. They also knew that it was generally conceded that when Mr. Stephen A. Douglass withdrew from the canvass in 1856, at Cincinnati, and cast his influence in favor of James Buchanan, that influence amounted to about 45 electoral votes in the Northern states; and that if Mr. Douglass could be nominated, harmoniously, by that Charleston convention in 1860, he would carry the Southern states as a unit, and wield an influence among the so-called Democrats of the North to an extent much greater than 45 electoral votes, because many of our fellow-citizens do not regard right or wrong when voting, if they can only be sure of voting on the winning side. Thus the Democro-rebel wing of the Democro-Republico-rebel party had a positiv certainty in the election of the president, had they only desired to do so. But no, they desired only to create an excuse under which they might succeed in leading the gawky element of their section into a bloody war that might, and did, afford ample fun for the bedbug element of that section of our country. In its incipiency the Republican party was honest, but the capitalistic tricksters managed to throng its ranks with such Buchananites as were the Grants and the Shermans, and then hav them to so manage military matters as to prolong the war, and increase the public debt to the end that the capitalistic element might levy a withering, blighting tribute upon the industries of our people in the form of interest upon money which the capitalist had loaned to the government to aid it to protect his own life, liberties, and property, so that it soon sank to the level of the Republico-rebel wing of the Democro-Republico-rebel party. The rank and file of this party hav been and now are honestly inclined, but they were such veritable gawkies that they never beheld the vast trickery that was concentrated, at the beginning of the slavemonger's rebellion, in that executiv order of Mr. Lincoln, calling out 75,000 men for ninety days to suppress a rebellion of 650,000 well-armed rebel troops fighting within their homes.

My fellow-gawkies, permit me to say to you that a Union that is not worth preserving promptly would far better be dissolved, and that the continual study of the capitalistic element is to the end that they may enslave the wealth-producing element.

By permiting rebels to vote, and by "removing disabilities," ha, ha, ha! ex post facto, unconstitutionally, and, therefore, in anarchy, the Republico-rebel wiug of the Democro-Republico-rebel party cheated and defrauded the rank and file of its members, and stung itself to death, as did the Democro-rebel wing of that party in 1860, and for the same purpose—war and bonds.

Whenever a political party stings itself to death wilfully, it should never again be reinstated; the new party's candidate should be sustained by the people, as they should hav voted for the grand old hero, Peter Cooper, in 1876.

In this letter I propose to try to attract your attention to a very fatal defect in our United States Constitution, and so important is it that I am at a loss for language in which to impress that importance upon the minds of the poor and the middle classes of our citizens. It is this: I think that Section 9 or 10 of Article I. of that document provides that no state shall emit bills of credit. According to the standard law lexicographer, Bouvier, a bill of credit is a promis to pay, emitted by a state, intended to circulate as money, bearing no interest, and redeemable at a future date. If the state were permitted to emit bills of credit whenever the money-changers might prevail upon our Congress to permit them to corner the money as they hav now done in our treasury at Washington, the state could emit bills of credit that might be made receivable for taxes, and, while not a legal tender, to circulate as money, and thus, in her sovereign capacity, she could throw the mantle of protection around the industries of her people, and save them from the blighting effects of a money panic. But, it was held by the framers of that Constitution that, were a state permitted to emit bills of credit, although it might alleviate the sufferings of her people while writhing under the effects of a money panic, she, in her consequent prosperity and happiness, might, unmindful of consequences, go on emitting bills of credit, and thereby hand down to posterity a great indebtedness in the form of bills of credit, and that thus generations yet unborn would be compelled to writhe under an onerous and burdensome taxation for the purpose of liquidating a debt with the contraction of which they had nothing to do, which would be a flagrant trespass upon the grounds of equity and duty to posterity.

Now, if those framers of that Constitution intended to prohibit the state from emitting bills of credit, and at the same time permit her to emit bonds—a kind of double and twisted interest-bearing bills of credit not intended to circulate as money and alleviate the sufferings of the people on account of any stress in the money market, but, on the contrary, to be locked up in the coffer of some shylock in Berlin, London, or New York, that, like a leech applied to a man already staggering from loss of circulating medium (blood), he may, by way of interest on those bonds, levy a withering, blighting tribute upon the withered prosperity of the people of the state owing the money under those bonds—then, it seems to me that the people could hav had no greater enemies than the framers of the Uuited States Constitution. But, my fellow truth seekers, I don't believe it. I don't think they ever intended that a state should emit a bond. I hold that all our state bonds are unconstitutional, null, and void, and should be repudiated by the people of the states, though I would never advise them to repudiate a just and lawful debt. GEORGE NEWTON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Farmers' Wives.

We hav sung of the joys of farmers' boys,
And the beauty of farmers' girls;
Of the farmer, too, in his overalls blue,
Dark eyes, and chestnut curls.
It's the strangest thing that none will sing
Of the wasted, martyred lives,
Of the pallid face, of the worn-out race
Of the weary farmers' wives.

When we recollect that the sad neglect,
And the ceaseless war and strain,
Giv a big per cent to the mad-house sent
With a worn-out spine and brain,
It's time to think of woman's ills,
As constantly she drives;
It's time to sing with a doleful ring
Of the pale-faced farmers' wives.

She is the first who wakes when daylight breaks,
And the last to sleep at night;
No noon-day hours, no rest through showers—
The weather is always right.
Like a blind horse bound to a ceaseless round,
No matter how hard she strives,
She is never through—there is lots to do
For the busy farmers' wives.

The brawny boys, through toil and noise,
Grow up to man's estate,
And one by one, toward the setting sun,
Pass through the old farm gate;
And the rosy girls, with smiles and curls,
Pass out to brighter lives,
And leave behind, with tear-drops blind,
The hopeless farmers' wives.

While the farmer's health and the farmer's wealth
Hav grown, he cannot tell
For his very life what ails his wife—
She is never of late quite well.
To his great surprise "she up and dies!"
He into his coffer dives;
In a rosewood box her form he locks,
And she sleeps with the farmers' wives.

Now, wouldn't it be financially
(Forgiv me if I ask it)
More wise to giv, while your wife doth liv,
A rest, than a rosewood casket?
Let her get out-doors when the sunshine pours,
In happy walks and drives;
You will find it worse to hire a hearse
For your worn-out farmers' wives.

And do not laugh at the epitaph
That I for her would write:
"O holy judge! what killed this drudge
Was keeping her milk pans bright.
For years she strove with a cooking stove,
With poor health long oppressed;
To her weary soul, even this poor hole
Will seem a heavenly rest."

"Ah-Goo."

Vot vas id mine baby vas trying to say,
Vhen I goes to hees crib at der break of der day?
Und oudt vrom der blanket peeps ten leedle toes,
So pink und so shveet as der fresh blooming rose,
Und twisting und curling dhemselvs all aboudt,
Shust like dhey was saying, "Ve vant to get oudt!"
Vhile dot baby look oup, mit dose bright eyes so plue,
Und don'd could say nodings; shust only:
"Ah-Goo!"

Vot vas id mine baby was dinking aboudt,
Vhen dot thumb goes so quick in his shveet leedle mout,
Und he looks right avay like he no understandt
Der reason he don'd could quite shvallow hees handt;
Und he digs mit dhose fingers righdt into hees eyes,
Vhich fills hees oldt fader mit fear and surbrise;
Und vhen mit dhose shimnasdic tricks he vas droo,
He lay back and crow, and say nix, budt,
"Ah-Goo!"

Vot makes dot shmall baby shmile vhen he's ashleep?
Does he dink he vas blaying mit some one "bo-peep?"
Der nurse say dose shmiles vas de sign he haf colic—
More like dot he dhreams he vas hafing some frolic;
I feeds dot oldt nurse mit creen abbles some day,
Und dhen eef she shmiles, I pelief vot she say;
Vhen dot baby got cramps he find somedhing to do
Oxcept shmile, und blay, und keep oup hees
"Ah-Goo!"

I ask me, somedimes, vhen I looks in dot crib,
"Vill dot plue-eyed baby, dot's pooling my hair, Know all vot I knows aboudt drouble und care?"
Dhen I dink off der vorldt, mit its pride und its sins,
Und I vish dot mineself und dot baby vas twins,
Und all der day long I haf nodings to do
But shust laugh und crow und keep saying,

Correspondence.

WARRENSBURG, Mo., Dec. 1, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a letter to let you know I am a little Freethinker boy, eight years old. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I read the letters in the Children's Corner. Papa is going to hav Mr. Reynolds here to lecture next week; we are all going to hear him. If you can read this letter, I would like to see it in print. This is my first letter to anybody. Good-bye for this time. JOHNNIE BOLTON.

FOWLER, O., Dec. 4, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I see there is a column for children, so I thought I would write you a few lines. I am ten years old, and never wrote very much. My mamma and papa do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but my grandpa does, and I like to read the papers. I think the pictures are nice; the monkey is too funny for anything. Well, I guess this is long enough for the first time. I hope there will be space in one corner for this. I remain,

Ever your friend, SELIA WALKER.

DENVER, COL., Dec. 3, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I enjoy our Corner so much that I often wish there was a Free-thou.ht paper all Corner.

But I havn't yet seen a letter in which mention is made of the books which our boys and girls read.

This may not seem such a great omission to all as it seems to me, to whom the very word "read" is fascinating in itself.

Just at present we are journeying through Europe with Bayard Taylor, as all must who read his "Views Afoot."

I often think that they who travel "on nothing certain a year" can appreciate what they see better, and tell us more about it, than they who travel at ease, and pretty often, I guess, only "to pass away time." For, as Bayard Taylor says, "the difficulties and inconveniences are soon forgotten, while the many pleasures are ever pleasant memories."

Then, there are Nathaniel Hawthorne's "True Stories" of Bejamin West, the great Quaker artist; Isaac Newton, the scientist; our own Benjamin Franklin, and a host of others who hav done so much to make this century what it is.

I am sure every boy and girl must love these stories, and also Hawthorne's "Wonder-book," "Great Stone Face," and "Snow Image." And there are Emerson's "Oracles." Was ever anything more true and beautiful than this stanza from his poem "Each and All?"

I thought the sparrow's note from heaven,
Singing at dawn on the alder bough.
I brought him home; in his nest at even,
He sings the same song, but it pleases not now.
For I did not bring home the river and sky;
He sang to my ear, they sang to my eye.

And these are but a grain from the inexhaustible mine which so many great men hav been preparing for us for so many years, and where I hope much "prospecting" may be done and reports made in our Corner.

LAURA PRICE STEWART (15 years).

[We would call particular attention to the above from one of our best, and, we would wish, more frequent correspondents. We trust her hint may arouse our boys and girls to write and tell us just what books they are reading. Books treating of travels, biography, history, poetry, are good reading for these long winter evenings, and, with pleasant, instructiv stories of standard merit, will help to while away many a weary hour. Let us hear from others of the books they are reading.—ED. C. C.]

ROBERT F. BELL, Sydney, N. S. W., Australia.—We know of no regular lesson-book for the use especially of Secular Sunday-schools. There are few such schools in the United States. The Truth Seeker Company has for sale a Liberal song-book that might answer your purpose, price 25 cents. Send to them for catalog of Liberal books. Mr. H. W. Smith, of Greenwich, Mass., has of late published a book of selections and songs for use in Liberal Sunday-schools. We hav not seen the book, but think it might be what you require for your classes.—ED. C. C.

The Indian and the Feather.

An Indian who had always been accustomed to rest his head on a stone, as he slept at night, heard that white men used pillows made of feathers, and that they were far better than those on which he and his father had been wont to sleep. He was very doubtful about this statement, but decided to try it for once in a small way. As night came on, therefore, he caught a bird, and plucking a feather he laid it on his pillow of stone. But his one night's experience with his one bothering feather decided him against the white man's rest, and he went back to his old method of sleeping with his head pillowed simply on a stone.

About the Porpoise.

And so you thought it was a fish. Why did you think so? Because it livs in the water?

But you must know that not all creatures are fish that find a home in the water.

But you say the porpoise has some ways like a fish. That may be, but he is an animal, nevertheless.

How do we know that?

Well, instead of gills, the porpoise has lungs, and he wants air to breathe in them. Fish hav gills simply, and can liv upon the oxygen gas that is in the water.

But you say the porpoise can liv beneath the water, the same as a fish. How is that?

I'll tell you how he does it.

Right on the top of his head there is an opening shaped like a half-moon. Coming up to the surface of the water, Pop! flies open this aperture, and out comes the air from the creature's lungs, and in rushes the new air, the cover closing over the "blow-hole," as it is called, so quickly that no water can come in, and down goes Mr. Porpoise again beneath the water, swimming along by means of his muscular tail, never stopping his course at all in his queer way of breathing.

Then, he belongs to the order of mammals.

You know the meaning of the word mammal, of course, for you hav been told it before.

Our sweet word mamma is derived from it.

The mother porpoise givs birth to her little ones the same as cats, dogs, and other mammals on land. The young of the fish, you know, are born from the egg or spawn. The porpoise nurses her babies, and only one is born at a time, while a great many fish babies are hatched from fish eggs.

The porpoise mamma has nice, sweet milk for her little ones, while baby-fishes eat insects and small grubs and mites.

So, by these differences, we know the porpoise is not a fish. It belongs to the family known as Cetacea, to which order also belong the various kinds of whales.

The porpoise has a large, round head, a good brain, and is said to be highly intelligent. It has a large jaw, and as many as eighty or ninety teeth. The oil extracted from the jaw of the porpoise is valuable.

What does it liv upon?

Fish mostly, as its home is in the water. It is fond of the fat fish, like mackerel, salmon, herring, and can eat twenty or thirty at one meal.

The flesh of the porpoise is very rich as food for man, and resembles that of the pig, and it is sometimes called, from a fancied resemblance to that animal, the hog-fish, sea-hog, puffing-pig, etc., and in the water they look like black pigs.

They are good-natured, merry creatures, and I hav heard my father tell many times of their playing in the water like children, and running races with the vessels. Quantities of fine oil are obtained from the porpoise, and its skin makes a nice kind of leather.

Porpoises like being near the shore, and on the European coasts, where they are quite common, are often seen rooting near the water's edge, with their odd-shaped noses or snouts.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—State the difference between the porpoise and the fish. By what means does the porpoise breathe? To what order does he belong? What word is derived from mammal? Do porpoises nurse their young? How are fishes born? What is the family name of the porpoise? What other water animals belong to this family? Describe the porpoise. What of its food? What is it sometimes called? For what is the porpoise valuable to man?

Words of Wisdom.

Nothing shows greater abjectness of spirit than a haughty demeanor toward inferiors.

No cord or cable can draw so forcibly, or bind so fast, as love can do with a single thread.

Many men claim to be firm in their principles when really they are only obstinate in their prejudices.

Ingratitude is, of all crimes, what in ourselvs we account the most venial—in others the most unpardonable.

The strongest friendships hav been formed in mutual adversity, as iron is most strongly united by the fiercest flame.

Polish is easily added if the foundations are strong; but no amount of gilding will be of use if your timber is not strong.

Sir Thomas More wrote in his journal: "I make it my business to wish as little as I can, except that I were wiser and better."

They who are most weary of life, and yet are most unwilling to die, are such as hav lived to no purpose, who hav rather breathed than lived.

As the sword of the best-tempered metal is most flexible, so the truly generous are most pliant and courteous in their behavior to their inferiors.

Marriage is the strictest tie of perpetual friendship, and there can be no friendship without confidence, and no confidence without integrity; and he must expect to be wretched who pays to beauty, riches, or politeness that regard which only virtue can claim.

Ah! when a man is dead, and you are sure that he is out of the way, you can afford to praise him. It is when men are living that we are not charitable. I hav not the least particle of prejudice against the thistles that were on my place last year. It is those that are there now that I don't like.

FOR Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. ## Obituary.

From the Boston Investigator.

Died, in Fall River, Mass., Nov. 20, 1887, after a long illness, Capt. Lemuel Hall, aged 69 years.

Captain Hall was a man of sterling character, whose loyalty, integrity, and upright conduct was acknowledged by all who knew him. He was a nativ of Cape Cod, and during his earlier years was a well-known sea-captain.

Naturally of a reflectiv turn of mind, he carefully examined the various creeds and dogmas of the world, and early arrived at the conclusion that myth and miracle were unnecessary for the advancement of humanity. For many years he has been known as a fearless, outspoken Liberal.

He was a great admirer of the principles advocated by the Investigator and TRUTH SEEKER, and was a long time subscriber to those papers. He was, also, a stockholder in the Paine Memorial Building. He had no sympathy with priests or churches, with hypocrisy or shams of any kind, and it was his well-known and frequently expressed request that Miss Susan H. Wixon, whom he held in high esteem, should be the speaker on the occasion of his funeral services. This wish, however, was disregarded, and a clergyman who could not voice the sentiments of the dead Liberal was employed in her stead.

His voiceless lips can never speak again, but his entire life is a perpetual reminder of the principles of truth, honor, and goodness.

Captain Hall was thrice married. He leaves a widow and two sons, besides a large circle of relativs and friends, to regret the loss of a noble man and most worthy and respected citizen, who faithfully and honorably filled every relation or position in life that he was called to occupy.

An honest man has gone to rest,
To rise or sleep, as heaven thinks best:
The staff of age, the guide of youth,
The friend of man and friend of truth.
Few hearts like his with tenderness so warmed,
Few heads like his with knowledge so informed;
If there is another world, he livs in bliss;
If there is none, he made the most of this.

Parochial and Public Schools.

From the Banner of Light.

From the movements that are openly making at the present time in and around Boston, and in other parts of Massachusetts as well, to establish parochial schools that shall draw away the pupils of the public schools and substitute an ecclesiastical for a purely non-ecclesiastical system of instruction, it is evident that there is a concerted plan on foot on the part of the Roman Catholic authorities to undermine the existing common school system, from which such beneficent results hav flowed, and to supplant it with one that owes its direct allegiance to the Roman hierarchy. From being secret and subtle the work has become open and avowed. The plan professedly is to empty the public schools of all the children of Catholic parents in attendance on them in localities where they are sufficiently numerous, and to set up in their place schools that are under the immediate and direct government of the Catholic priesthood, thus paralyzing the public school, and openly assailing the very principle of its establishment. In the adjacent city of Malden a school has been so much drawn upon in this way that the local Catholic priest has even rented the public school-house of the aldermen, and converted it into a parochial school.

It may be as well to remind the parents of children who are enrolled in the Catholic church, that while they are taxed for the support of the parochial school, they are by no means for that reason released from their obligation as common citizens to support the public school. This is a tax that is levied on all alike, rich and poor, the parents of many children and those who hav none. Education at the public cost, in which all alike bear a part without any exemption, is the corner-stone of our free system, and has long constituted one of its chief glories. If any holy father in the Catholic church undertakes to set up the claim that the support of a parochial school saves his followers from the support of the common schools, by parity of reasoning the rich childless man may set up his claim for exemption also, on the very same ground that he sends no children to the public schools, and therefore cannot be held for their support. Thus will be seen the insidiousness of the present attempt to break up the existing system of free schools entirely, and in their place to put an educational system for the young that is in no sense whatever free, that is governed and directed from Rome, and unrepublican to the last letter. And this is to be done in the name of religion exclusivly.

Of the threatening character of this deliberately concerted attempt to destroy our present public school system, which has wrought such excellent results for the principles of liberty, few persons of ordinary reflection need to be apprised. Those who are engaged in it are of course intelligent enough to know that the public school system is an established one, and cannot be supplanted by any other system whatever, religious or non-religious. It is as much a part of our republican system of government as the air we all breathe is a necessity to our physical existence. And these men, therefore, know that those parents whom they tax for the support of parochial schools are nowise absolved for that reason from the support of public schools. The latter are a responsibility imposed, as we hav already said, on all citizens alike. If it were possible to release one man from his share of the common obligation because of his religious belief, then another man might with equal justice be released from his share for precisely the same reason, thus putting Protestant against Catholic, and inevitably working the speedy destruction of the existing system of free schools. Doubtless that is what is aimed at, since no other result is possible. A war of sectaries is likewise certain to be precipitated.

Do the Protestant ministers and their followers realize the situation? Do they comprehend the fast-growing magnitude of the issue? Do they understand that by their insane determination to put God into the Constitution—as if they could put him into that instrument any more than he is in it already by formal declaration and consequent legislation—they are playing directly into the hands of the Roman hierarchy? If they do not know it without having it pointed out to them, they confess themselvs without common intelligence and perception. For if they are ready to set up a religious test for our existing free government, which now leaves all such tests to the individual conscience alone, they will find the Roman Catholics equally ready to set up the same test, first in reference to our system of public schools, then in reference to the legislation required to sustain their claim, and finally in reference to the general system of our free government in state and nation. A warfare will then hav been opened on purely sectarian grounds, miscalled religious, that will not end until it has shaken the foundations of our free government. What particular institutions will go down in the wreck which such a warfare will result in need not be left to conjecture. If anything of real and lasting value to the freedom of the human mind is left, it will only be because the Romish dynasty has itself grown liberal.

Is it a picture which our orthodox zealots like to contemplate—so much that is permanently precious risked and lost merely that they may erect a professedly religious rule within the bulwarks of our free constitutional system, of which opposing sectaries will only be too glad to avail themselvs? Even supposing that everything sought is gained to religion by the experiment, is it not palpable that the loss to human liberty is certain to be far greater than any religious gain can possibly counterbalance? And it seems but the blind fury of fanaticism to persist in this course, when nothing can be plainer than that the precipitation of a war of sects for the possession of our free government is absolutely sure to work the destruction of all real religion among our people, and thus make the last state of the case worse than the first. This stupendous risk the zealots of orthodoxy are willing to run, for no better and more sufficient reason than that they are determined to giv to our fundamental law a religious character and coloring which they fancy it lacks. As if every sincere and honest action of man were not inspired to a greater or less degree, and is thus indubitably religious. As if it were possible for men to do their highest and best work, as in the case of our matchless civil contract which we call our Constitution, and at the same time fall short of the truest religious requirements.

Prof. W. T. Harris, of St. Louis, well and widely known in connection with the public schools of that city and with the Concord School of Philosophy, recently read a paper before the Congregational Club, of Boston, on "The Part of Church and State in Education," in which he greatly clarified a much confused subject. From personal experience and studious observation he may be supposed to possess a thorough knowledge of it. He speaks of the existing tendency of the public school to emancipate itself from ecclesiastical authority, and thinks that the spirit of the school should be the scientific spirit, believing that all attempts at education would prove abortiv if made subject to church authority. Investigation is not to be controled by the church. The parochial school professedly represses inquiry. And, on the other hand, the attempt of an opposit Protestant party to keep the Bible in the public schools is hardly less dangerous, because it raises a side issue which is magnified far beyond its merits. The several branches of the Christian church are plainly severing their connection with the public schools, and the feeling is rapidly gaining strength that church and school should not be affiliated.

But this does not necessarily imply, in Dr. Harris's opinion, that the schools shall be godless, according to the unreflecting apprehensions of many people who exclusivly profess to be religious. The influence of the public schools is more activ to-day for morality than it ever was before, but instead of being a merely professional morality it is of the kind that shows itself in character and conduct more than in separate religious acts. The union of the church with the school is not in the church's line of business, which is at liberty to take up the best work which the school can do and proceed with it according to its ideas of a higher moral and spiritual education. The schools were established, not to teach morals, although a healthy morality is to be learned in them; not to inculcate religious ideas, although in no sense can they be called irreligious; but to educate young minds preparatory to their assuming the duties of citizenship. And therefore nothing could be more unfortunate than to thrust in the side issue of the Bible, which only givs the Romish priesthood the very pretext they need for appearing on the field in the name of their church.

That the sectarian issue is hastening to a final conclusion should be obvious to almost everyone. And orthodox zeal and sectarian bigotry are helping it on by undertaking the very work which its opponents of another sect would wish to hav them perform. The two parties, though professedly opposed, could not more effectually coöperate if they marched together under the same banner. Their purpose is certainly a common one, and therefore in the large sense they are united. They may appear to be contestants at the beginning, but they will not proceed far before it will become plain that they are practically working to the same end. Only let Protestants pause and reflect on the matter, if they will. This parochial school question is but the opening of the struggle. The next effort on the part of the Roman priesthood will be to control legislation in order to hold their position by escaping taxation for the support of the public school. In the balanced state of political parties, they hav calculated their chances to a nicety. And with their final control of legislation through party delinquency and corruption, it ought to be easy enough to see that the work which orthodox Protestantism is at present striving to perform for them, by changing the Constitution into an engin of religious authority, will be gladly accepted by Rome as having been performed on its behalf, when it finally comes into possession of political power by the balance of parties and turns its battery on constitutional freedom on this continent.

Unitarians Must Hav Cream Cakes.

A few weeks ago a lady in Newton was preparing to receive a number of Unitarian ministers who had come together in that pretty city on account of some conference or ministerial meeting. While the hostess was putting the finishing touches to the generous feast, which was modestly called a luncheon, the wife of one of the ministers happened to call. After admiring the array of good things which were prepared for "just ministers all alone," she suddenly cried out in an alarmed tone: "But, my dear Mrs. X., where are the cream cakes? Don't you know that a gathering of Unitarians without cream cakes would be almost as bad as a sewing circle with the tea left out?" Mrs. X. did not know it before, but a boy was hurried off immediately to the nearest bake-shop, and she has now for one of her watchwords, "Cream cakes for Unitarians."

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

The Bundehesh (a sacred book of the Persians,) states that Ahuramazda after creating the first man and woman, Mashya and Mashyana, bade them "to be humble of heart; to observe the law; to be pure in their thoughts, pure in their speech, pure in their actions." But an evil demon came to them in the form of a Serpent, sent by Ahriman, the prince of devils, and gave them fruit of a wonderful tree, which imparted immortality. Evil inclinations then entered their hearts, and all their moral excellence was destroyed. Consequently they fell, and forfeited the eternal happiness for which they were destined. They killed beasts, and clothed themselves in their skins.

News of the Week.

It is reported that the sessions of the common council of Philadelphia for the last three months hav been marked by flagrantly disgraceful proceedings, an utter indifference to business being shown and the time devoted to ribaldry and rowdyism.

The Knights of Labor are preparing to make a strong demand for the nationalization of the telegraph lines.

A revolt in the Knights of Labor, arising from dissensions of its leaders on many and varied matters, is reported.

Entertainments for the benefit of the families of the dead and the imprisoned Anarchists are being given by their fellow-believers in New York and Chicago.

Courtlandt Palmer addressed the Anti-Poverty Society of this city last Sunday evening, saying that the remedy for the present wretched state of the workingman lay in coöperation.

The Federation of Labor, a powerful trade union organization that has sprung to gigantic proportions within a year, opened its first national convention at Baltimore on the 13th.

The Rev. J. Grumbine, a Syracuse, N. Y., clergyman, has been requested to resign, on account of his connection with the United Labor party and his starting a periodical called Justice in support of George's doctrins.

The Republican national convention for 1888 will be held in June, at Chicago.

"Coal or blood!" is the cry of the farmers in western Kansas. The fuel famin is charged to the cupidity of the railway officials.

The European nations, already vast armed camps, are rapidly augmenting their armies. Austria now seems menaced by Russia.

Chas. L. Webster, a New York publisher, has been knighted by Pope Leo XIII. as a reward for the publication of a flattering life of the pope.

The negroes of the South are lately much exercised with superstitions similar to those that produced the Puritanical witch-burnings. At Minden, La., they secretly lynched Andrew Edwards, a negro 70 years of age, accusing him of being a "voudoo" and working them evil by his spells.

The Rev. Hugh Pentecost has awakened such indignation among the members of his Newark, N. J., congregation by preaching Anti-Poverty doctrins, pleading for the Chicago Anarchists, and reprimanding his rich hearers for departing from the teaching and practice of Christ, that he is forced to resign. He declares that he "is no longer in sympathy with the church as an organization, or even with evangelical Christianity."

President Cleveland devotes his annual message to a strong appeal for tariff reduction. Republicans are protesting hotly and enlisting on their side workers in such industries as would be immediately affected. Believers in Socialistic and similar radical measures for the relief of the wage-workers scoff at the measure as a thing of no real benefit to laborers whichever way it goes, and as a mere device to serve party ends, and to occupy the workers' minds and divert their attention from real issues.

A bill is to be introduced in the House of Representativs by Mr. Adams, of Chicago, providing that "when any district attorney of the United States shall hav information in writing from no less than three reputable citizens that any alien has aided, advised, or encouraged the destruction of property or murder of any officer of the law, or has attempted to overthrow the laws, or to excite domestic violence in any state, such information shall be transmitted at once to the president," who shall issue an order expelling the offender from the country.

Gems of Thought.

Protestantism is not a religion of progress, except so far as it is compelled to be by the advancement of science. Its warfare upon science has held the same ratio to that of the Catholics as hav its persecutions. Coming later by centuries into the world, it has not had the same opportunities, but the chances it has had it has not been slow to seize.—D. M. Bennett.

Religion, with good men, in modern progressiv nations, seems mostly to consist of two temporarily united elements—a gradually decaying supernaturalism based on myths and legends, and a continually developing morality deeply practical. Concerning the former, the bitterest strife and uncertainty hav always prevailed. Concerning the latter all agree, at least on all such elementary points as would be taught to children. Honesty, truthfulness, kindness, courage, and persistence in systematic right-doing, are taught by no one sect exclusivly. Why not, then, make your school religion as truly unsectarian as you claim it is, and teach only a wise and genial human morality of which all can approve?—Religion in Schools.

There are heroes and heroins in every walk of life who are making sacrifices daily, because they are faithful to the truth which is in them. They are unwilling to adopt the too prevalent custom of repeating words in which they hav no belief, and, moreover, they are earnestly desirous of helping onward the day of freedom from the narrow, bigoted dogmas which enslave so many minds. The question with them is not, Will it pay me in dollars and cents, or in social position and popularity, to be thus true to my own convictions? That question must, for the present, certainly be answered in the negativ. Bnt there is a higher motiv, that of devotion and loyalty to the truth and the hatred of error and superstition, which impels them, not only to reject dogmas no longer tenable, but to aid in ascertaining and disseminating truth and light.—Stoddard's New Faith.

In the year 1663, Galileo, now seventy years old, being brought before the Inquisition, was forced solemnly to disavow his belief in the earth's motion, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment, though the sentence was afterward mitigated and he was allowed to return to Florence. The court of Rome was very careful to publish this second recantation all over Europe, thinking, no doubt, that it was administering a complete antidote to the belief of the Copernican system. The sentence, indeed, appears to hav pressed very heavily on Galileo's mind, and he never afterward either talked or wrote on the subject of astronomy. Such was the triumph of his enemies, on whom ample vengeance would hav long ago been executed if the indignation and contempt of posterity could reach the mansions of the dead.—Prof. John Playfair.

From the sixth to the sixteenth century Roman ism [the sole representativ of Christianity during those long thousand years] was in the ascendant, its power was absolute, heresy of any kind barely disturbed it. Surely, then, these ages, all moving under the influence of the tiara, were ages of unrivaled glory, and Europe was a garden of wondrous and beautiful creations? Alas! human nature never sank so low. "The Dark Ages" is a feeble description of the state of things that then prevailed. Hildebraud, in a letter to the abbot of Cluny, says, "The Romans among whom I dwell are worse than Jews or pagans." King Alfred complained that there was not a priest from the Humber to the Thames who understood the liturgy in his mother-tongue, or who could translate the easiest piece of Latin; and that from the Thames to the sea, ecclesiastics were, if possible, more ignorant than their brethren in the north. —Dr. Cumming's Romanism Not the Patron but the Persecutor of Science.

Life is a mystery, death is a mystery. I am like the Chinese philosopher, Confucius, who, when he was asked, "What is death?" answered, "Life is such a mystery that I do not seek to know what is beyond it."—Whittier.

O woman! in our hours of ease,
Uncertain, coy, and hard to please,
And variable as the shade
By the light of aspen made;
When pain and anguish wring the brow,
A ministering angel thou!—Sir Walter Scott.

It is high time to break away from the old customs attending death-beds, death, and funerals, and substitute more rational ones. Not, as some rabid iconoclasts hav already occasionally attempted, by replacing one set of absurd ceremonials by another set equally absurd, but by obeying the plain dictates of common sense in doing away with all ceremonies not required by sanitary precautions, and by daring to lead the way in making it possible for the friends of the dead everywhere to consult their own feelings and wishes in the matter of burial, and thus make it possible in the future for private grief to be kept free from public intrusion, and mourners safe from merciless comment and criticism in consulting their own feelings.—Mrs. Sara A. Underwood.

GOING TO EGYPT AFTER CORN.

And Joseph's ten brethren went down to buy corn in Egypt.—Gen. xlii, 3.

Odds and Ends.

One of the leading lights of the Roman Catholic church is the proselyte.

Comstock's version reads: "Anthont soit qui mal y pense." In deference to Mr. Comstock the word nude will hereafter be printed n—de, and naked will appear as n—k—ed.

Colonel Ingersoll will always be in the minority. The trouble with Agnosticism is that there are too few men in the world who are willing to admit that they do not "know it all."

We expect to hear every day that Edison has introduced the electric spark into courting. It is doubtful, however, if it proves to be more satisfactory than the old-fashioned sparking.

A correspondent who is connected with the pound writes to say that Mr. Comstock endeavored to hav him drown a dog last August, because the poor beast had been seen on the street without pants.

"Now, isn't that a burning shame?" said Mrs. Seldom, as she pushed her spectacles up on her forehead and laid down the morning paper. "What's that, ma?" asked her youngest son. "Why, Emperor William gave an audience to Prince William yesterday. Think of that, my son—a whole audience given away like so many cattle. Its awful."

GETTING ON BRAVELY.

Citizen (to railroad official): "What has been done in regard to heating the cars with steam?"

Railroad official: "We hav been considering the subject in its different aspects."

Citizen: "Ah, that's encouraging; cold weather is almost here, you know! What result hav you reached?"

Railroad official: "Well—not any yet. You see, we havn't quite finished with the aspects."

The principal of a public school in Pennsylvania recently wrote to Nathaniel Hawthorne, asking for his autograph. He said that they proposed to hold a literary fair to get money for a school library. They evidently need a library. The ignorance of this principal reminds one of the society lady in London. "Who is this Dean Swift they were talking about?" she asked a friend. "I would like to invite him to one of my receptions." "Alas, madam," replied the other, "the dean did something that has shut him out of society." "Dear me! what was that?" "Well, about a hundred years ago he died."

CAPTURING THEM UNAWARES.

Mr. Longhair: "Are you the gentleman who writes reading notices which begin with something of startling interest and end up with a patent medicin advertisment?"

Writer: "I do work of that sort, occasionally, sir."

Mr. Longhair: "Well, I wish you would get me up something about a prize fight, or a trunk murder, or a church scandal, or anything the public are especially interested in, and then spring on them: 'Are you prepared to die?' 'What will you do to be saved?' 'Lay not up for yourselvs treasures upon earth,' etc. I'm a tract distributor."

THREE FOLLIES OF MEN.

The wise old Comtesse de —— used to remark that there were three follies of men which always amazed her. The first was climbing trees to shake fruit down, when if they waited long enough the fruit would fall of itself. The second was going to war to kill one another, when if they only waited they would all die naturally. The third was that they should run after women, when if they refrained from doing so the women would be sure to run after them.—Voltaire.

A LETTER TO ANTHONY COMSTOCK.

Pittsburgh, Pa., Nov. 21, 1887.

Dear Sir: I wish you would come and look at my art collection. I hav inaugurated a new departure, so to speak, which I cannot help thinking will meet with your hearty approbation.

The statue of Mercury standing in my hall, with his right hand extended as though he had just let go a curve ball, has hitherto been unclothed to an exaggerated extent. He has not even, until this winter, worn a coat of paint. Now, however, I hav procured for him a pair of trousers, of the wide, influential brand affected by our dudes. His new ulster is of the latest pattern, with a latitudinarian band around his waist.

It would make your eyes water to see my Apollo Belvedere in evening dress, with knickerbockers. A mackintosh is thrown loosely over his left shoulder, and his feet are encased in silk stockings; a great improvement over the air of openness with which he was formerly clothed.

But the new wardrobe of the lady members of my collection will delight you especially. As you doubtless know, the Greek Slave has hitherto not even had a porous plaster in (or on) her trunk. In fact, she has stood through all weathers in full dress carried to extremes and then thrown away. Now she rejoices in a tailor-made suit of exquisit workmanship, and a chest protector with pongee embroidery is covering a portion of her superficial area. Her hose is of the striped variety, and her feet wear the cutest little shoes you ever saw.

The Venus of Milo is another statue of the female brand which has hitherto had nothing to wear. I had some difficulty in providing her with clothes, owing to the unfortunate accident whereby she lost her arms. I hav, however, clothed her with an opaque Mother Hubbard, which will meet the requirements of the most fastidious. I would like you to look at her, though, and if you think best, I will get Dr. Mary Walker to construct a pair of trousers for her, or purchase a No. 6 bloomer.

Several other women works of art look quite trig in their new garments, provided with bustles, passamentaries, false hair, and other articles of feminin garmenture. Come and look at them any evening this week when you happen to hav leisure. Yours sincerely, Wm. H. Siviter.

P.S.—I forgot to state that I hav placed a pair of pantaloons on the limbs of such chairs as infest the art gallery. W. H. S.—Life.

Notes and Clippings.

Isn't it about time to organize a society for the suppression of the Society for the Suppression of Vice?—Life.

European nations are adopting an international copyright law, and efforts are being made by American authors to effect its adoption here.

The Universalist thinks Colonel Ingersoll's article in the North American Review, in reply to Dr. Field, is "an excellent looking-glass for orthodoxy," and says the use he makes of the Westminster Creed is crushing.

The pastor of an impoverished Dakota church addressed his congregation last Sunday as follows: "There is not a cent in the treasury, not a pound of coal in the bin, and we are several dollars in debt to girls for janitress work. Salvation and chills are a poor combination, and the camp-fires of holiness cannot be started with promises to pay."

The attempt to force upon the public schools of St. Louis an obligation to giv special instruction in the German language at an annual expense of $60,000 was recently voted down by a majority of 4,000 in a school board election. The platform of the majority was: "No language but the English should be taught at public expense in the schools."

The English Board of Trade has made a report in which it alleges that the number of paupers in the country now are only 24.7 to the 1,000, while in 1870 there were 40 to the 1,000, and that the total number has fallen from 900,000 to 697,000, while the population has increased by 5,700,000. In London, it is alleged, there are now only 21 paupers to 1,000 inhabitants.

The New Jersey Unionist says: "Among those who petitioned Governor Oglesby to let the Anarchists hang was the Rev. Dr. Hildreth, pastor of a Methodist church in Cleveland, O. It is sad, very sad, to be obliged to note the fact that the Rev. Hildreth is now under indictment for immorality, his accuser being the Rev. R. B. Pope of the same denomination."

There is a little negro in Macon named Barry Bowden, aged about twelve years, who has a most remarkable mouth. When fully open, the distance from the corner of the mouth to the lobe of the ear is less than half an inch. He puts his fist in his mouth with ease, and can hold two eggs in the mouth without any difficulty.—Savannah News. What a Methodist preacher he'd make!

In the diocese of Hartford, according to the latest statistics, there are thirty-four parochial schools for both boys and girls. Some fifteen thousand children receive therein a Catholic education under the charge of four hundred and fifty religious women. And when the children graduate they know how to read the catechism, count out money to giv to the priests, and that is about all.

The Boston Herald says: "Nothing could possibly be more pointedly against the spirit of Christ than the spirit of a protectiv tariff." The New York Sun comments: "What insufferable cant, irreverence, and moral snobbery it is to try to found Cobden on Christ!" It looks as though the tariff question will be as provocativ of bad blood and hifalutin writing as a sectarian discussion of religion.

It is reported from Illinois that the railroads of the state hav, after a fair trial, found it very bad policy to continue the excessiv local traffic rates that hav heretofore prevailed, and which were diverting jobbing to outside points. So they hav voluntarily begun to lower local rates within the state from twenty-five to forty per cent.

The book reviewer of the Herald thus philosophizes over Lea's "History of the Inquisition:" "By the way, speaking of the Inquisition, did you ever think that the excess of faith—that is, fanatical faith—is the cradle of intolerance and cruelty? If men had been indifferent about religion there would hav been no Inquisition. Agnosticism never builds such an institution. But when a man firmly believes that you will go to hell unless you accept his views he is bound to make you accept them, even if he uses the thumbscrew to do it. He does it because he loves you and wants to save you from the lake of fire and brimstone. That seems very queer and odd, and rather ludicrous, too, but it is true."

The National Women's Christian Temperance Union is circulating for signatures three petitions to Congress to be presented this month, asking for national legislation on the Sunday question. The American Sentinel says: "It is under cover of the demand for Sunday laws that this nation is to be put under the tyrannical heel of the national reform church and state movement. If you want to help establish church and state, and a man-made theocracy, here, then sign these petitions. If you don't want to engage in that enterprise, then giv these, and all similar petitions, the widest possible berth." There is some reason for the agitation of the American Sentinel. It has been reported as a fact that in the procession at the centennial celebration of the Constitution at Philadelphia last September, the National Reform Association asked to carry a banner with this inscription: "The Fifteenth amendment secures the rights of man. Let us hav another securing the rights of God." If this is not blasphemy it is pretty near it.—Galveston News.

The Interior (Presbyterian) says: "The logical antics of the disunionists North and South are as good as a circus, and also as bad. Here in the Presbyterian Quarterly (Atlanta) is a stately and prolix article by Dr. Vaughan, showing that reunion means Infidelity! and that it also means sin against the Holy Spirit! 'Organic union with the Northern church is also prohibited by a positiv command of the Holy Ghost, until that church can unite with us in the testimony which we are commanded in 1 Tim. vi, 1-5, to bear on the relations of masters and servants.' That is to say, the Holy Spirit forbids the union till the Northern church pronounces a high doctrinal eulogium on American slavery as it was, and lifts its voice in sweet accord with Dr. Dabney in mourning its untimely end. . . . Dr. Vaughan is matched in absurdity by his fellow-disunionists of the North—the Evangelist, Independent, and others. 'No color-line in the churches!' they cry. And how do they propose to effect that object? By making the color-line a line of sectarian division. By dividing the white and black Presbyterians of the South not only into separate churches, as now, but also into separate denominations. Both wings of the disunionists, North and South, unite in this demand."

Religious Problems.

There are moments in life when men say great and good things, and there are moments when the world feels the power of a noble speech, of a beautiful thought, and softens beneath its power or rises to lofty action under its influence. These moments are not to be weighed in the scale of common things, nor determined by the rule of ordinary measurement. They hav a rare and peculiar value. They are occasions for love and justice; they make the poetry of the heart and the poetry of the world.

I know full well that we cannot hide the hard, cold facts of life by covering them with pleasing disguises; but because human existence is mostly made up of dull commonplaces it does not lessen the effulgence nor dim the glory of those bright thoughts and fancies that go singing through the mind, leaving a trail of beauty behind them.

The personal charms that win us fade beneath chemical analysis, yet the declaration that "beauty is only skin-deep" cannot destroy its subtle power. So, the beautiful sentiments that will not fit our sciences or our philosophies, but shine above them like stars above the earth, still lead our hearts into places of deepest peace and move our hands to deeds of richest charity. Those words that admit of no scientific definition are still potent in their influence upon the human mind. Those terms are best that stand for the best things, and it matters little what name we giv our faith providing it makes us good and just.

You know what curious caricatures of objects may be seen in their shadows. Like these grotesque figures are man's attempts to define the objects of his faith. He has added the wings of a bird to the form of a woman and called it an angel, and has annexed the horns, hoofs, and tail of a beast to himself and called it a devil. There is a hint of the infinit range of human character in the vast distance which lies between the two pictures of angel and devil which man has, with unwitting fidelity, painted in his own image.

I admit that there is a great deal of exaggerated sentiment in the world that the world is no better for, but without the idealizing power of the imagination life would be but a barren existence. Reason might direct us to the hights of rational living, but fancy would strew our journey thither with flowers. I do not deny that facts hav their place and use, but we are in danger of putting a false value upon them. There are times when they are the dullest, most uninteresting things possible or imaginable, though at other times we must hav them to walk by or we may stumble and fall. It is not knowledge alone that is needed to develop the life of man. It may be desirable to know that the earth revolves on its axis, that the atmosphere is forty-five miles high, that the heat increases as we approach the earth's center, and it may answer some demand of our nature to hav revealed the secret of our origin, but the mind does not find its highest satisfaction in these things. The scientific probabilities which are offered as solutions of natural phenomena are not what men most need for happiness or peace. A breakfast of geology, a dinner of chemistry, a supper of botany, and a night's rest of astronomy will not insure the perfect man. Humanity livs on dreams, on hopes, on fancies and longings, as well as on knowledge, on facts, and truths. I do not believe in man's trying to get above the earth, but I do believe in his trying to get a little higher on the earth.

The mind is not satisfied with the solutions of the religious problems which the church offers. It rebels against the patents of ecclesiasticism, and refuses to accept a thing as divine because it bears a label of divinity. The endeavor to make of earth and heaven a two-volume treatis on orthodoxy, and to pass off upon the world the products of the animal and vegetable kingdoms as Christian tracts, must be given up. The attempt to issue the universe in a pocket edition is a failure.

When we realize that there are more stars in the heavens than there are human beings on the earth, and think of the immensity of these heavenly bodies and the vast distances which they travel through the realms of space, we hav to smile with a broad accent when we read the sixteenth verse of the first chapter of Genesis: "And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night; he made the stars also." A fiat creation would be like a boy blowing bubbles without any soap in the water. It would be an eternal addition of nothing; an infinit zero. But the intelligence of the world has ceased to read the biblical account of creation as a scientific treatis. It is not the action of the deity as a creator, but his deeds as a ruler of the earth, that offend our ideas of right and wrong.

The moral objections to the Christian idea of deity are graduated in the scale of condemnation from poetical blasphemy to downright Atheism, but because we decline to accept "the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob" as the correct solution of the problem of divinity, are we therefore blasphemers? Because we cannot honestly climb up the thirty-nine rounds of the Christian ladder of faith, does it make us thieves and robbers if we find peace some other way? The old notion of fear of God presupposed a belief in a God that was to be feared. This belief has gone from the rational mind. All there is left of this faith is illustrated in the answer of the boy to the question of his Sunday-school teacher if his father lived in fear of God. "Yes'm, I guess so," replied the boy; "he never goes out Sunday without he carries a gun." Those people who fear God do not know what they are afraid of. The more we know, the less we fear. You cannot frighten knowledge.

Superstition is ignorance afraid of its own shadow. Fear is like a bat; it comes out in the dark. Ghosts always walk at night. Old Nick was never seen in the daylight. The wizard hour does not fall at noon. Fear is born of falsehood; courage, of truth. Enlightenment clears up mystery, and investigation shows the ghost to be a scarecrow.

The foundation of the popular system of religious faith is the word "God." That we may not be misunderstood in our use of this term, we will say that we find the word "God" defined in Webster's Dictionary as "an object of worship;" also as "a being conceived of as possessing divine power, and to be propitiated by sacrifice, worship," etc. And again, this word is defined as "the supreme being," "Jehovah." It is worthy of comment that the learned compiler of this dictionary says, in reference to the word "God:" "As this word and 'good' are written exactly alike in Anglo-Saxon, it has been inferred that God was named from his goodness, but the corresponding words in most of the other languages are not the same, and it is believed no instance can be found of a name given to the supreme being from the attribute of goodness. It is probably an idea too remote from the rude conceptions of men in early ages. With the exception of the word Jehovah, the name of the supreme being appears usually to hav reference to his supremacy or power, and to be equivalent to lord, or ruler." We do not deny that the word "God" has to-day a moral and religious meaning which is derived from his supposed beneficence, but this idea is not the one that we find at the bottom of the Christian faith. I object very seriously to the attempt, which is being made by certain interested parties, to represent the God of Christianity better than he is. This word loses its terror when we realize that it stands for an unknown quantity. It is the attempt to account for what we cannot understand; the effort to explain the universe. The word "God" is a definition of human ignorance. It represents what we do not know. This word does not stand for a person, an object, or a thing. It is an idea of what we can hav no idea of, a thought of what one cannot think. People who use the word "God" do not know what they are talking about. This word fits nothing that has yet been discovered. Theology is the science of what no one knows anything about. It does not belong to the family of knowledge. When the hands of theology are laid on a man's head his brains are consecrated to do nothing. Every time a minister is made, a man is lost. Nothing disgraces American civilization more than the theology preached in Christian churches. It is worse than childish; it is old-womanish. The Dark Ages cast their shadows across the bright skies of the nineteenth century, and the relics of that benighted time, the priests, are still walking the streets like ghosts of bad deeds.

Every theology ends in a creed. A creed is the night-cap of religion. It is a sign that the intellect is asleep. When faith is in, sense is out. A man with a creed has bought the coffin for his mind. The rest of his life will be a funeral service for the dead. A creed is the grave of thought. When a person subscribes to certain articles of belief, he has no further use for his brains. It does not require any mental exercise to believe. Belief does not signify any process of intellectual assimilation or digestion. When a man joins a church, he makes his last will and testament. When reason abdicates in favor of credulity, crime becomes a saint, and folly a martyr. Too much faith makes a Pocasset tragedy. The foolishness of trying to make God intelligible to human understanding is shown in the creeds of Christendom. The dogma of the trinity ought not to pass to any further generation. It is not the "likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth."

This Christian doctrin of the Godhead is a sort of Fifteen puzzle. Everyone thought he could do it until he tried. He then found out what a fool he was to think that he could solve it. This is the way with believing the dogma of the trinity. You can believe it just so long as you do not try to understand it. The moment you undertake to give it a rational explanation you cannot make head nor tail of it. One needs to be entirely ignorant of mathematics to successfully grapple with this stupendous problem. You start by saying that God is one God. This is intelligible; but when you try to add two more Gods to one God and make the three Gods only one God, you end by saying, What a fool I was for believing such stupid nonsense! I pity the person who seriously believes the dogmas of the trinity. How he must hate the multiplication table! The Holy Ghost is another gem puzzle. It seems perfectly easy to tell what the Holy Ghost is until you begin, and then you commence to wonder what it can be. Until some one asks what the Holy Ghost is, you feel as well acquainted with him as though he had boarded in the same family with you for years; but this question sends him to the remotest parts of the earth, and he at once becomes a total stranger to you, and you think of the name as you recall a name that you hav read in some half-forgotten story.

You think that his photograph can be found in any library of Christian theology, but when you search for it there is nothing that bears his name, and when you are forced to tell what you know about this Holy Ghost you are obliged to confess that you know nothing; and, after a candid examination of the subject, you must also confess that you do not believe in any such thing. The Christian church tells us that the Holy Ghost is a mystery, and cannot be comprehended by the human mind. Here is one truth that the church has told. What is too mysterious to be comprehended by man is too profound to be of any benefit to him. Every holy mystery in this world is a fraud, and where the Christian church has taught that anything was too sacred to be touched by the hands of honest investigation, you may rest assured that some pious trickery was concealed. We want nothing to do with a church that is afraid to show its hand; that will not do things aboveboard. Truth does not need to be told in a dead language. When the church admits that its dogmas and rituals are mysterious, it confesses that they are intended to deceive. The church is a falsehood standing on a fable. There is no mystery about honesty. Truth, though naked, would call no blush to the brow. We should be ashamed of falsehood, no matter how richly she is dressed. Profession is not piety, any more than a cosmetic is complexion. When anything is too holy to be criticised, you may rest assured that it is paste and not a genuin diamond. What will not bear examination fears exposure. The salesman shows poor goods in a feeble light. No wonder churches are built to keep out the sun. It is thought to be blasphemous to speak of ecclesiastical idols with other than solemn speech, as such things are regarded as holy, and if we show up the absurdities of superstition we are said to be making fun of what is sacred. You cannot make fun of what is serious, nor can you ridicule what is true. The fact is, a great deal of the Christian faith is nonsense, and we cannot treat it seriously without being hypocrits. We name our locomotivs and snow-plows after the Greek gods, and there is no protest from the piety of this age against calling them Jupiter, Mercury, or Hercules. Some future generation will doubtless pay a similar compliment to the Christian divinities. Let us recollect that Socrates was put to death for showing less disrespect to the Grecian deities than we manifest toward them. What saves us from a similar fate is that the whole world stands to-day where Socrates stood two thousand years ago. Perhaps the race will catch up with Ingersoll in two thousand years more. It is not blasphemy for Christians to name a trotting-horse Mohammed, and yet three hundred million human beings look upon this name as the holiest name of earth.

The Christian objects of worship are no more sacred to us than the Moslem's prophet is to Catholic or Protestant. The mythology of Jew and Christian which is still reverenced by men and women is destined to be buried in the cemetery of literature with a book for a monument. Let us not be afraid to discuss religious questions, and examin into the faith of mankind, nor be surprised if we discover that man is not always as good or as bad as his religious pretensions would make him.

Men and women go to a church and say to the world that they hav faith in the God of the Bible who caused all the first-born of Egypt to be slain, and then go home and take their children to their hearts with a love and tenderness that show how much better they believe than they profess to. Men may keep the Christian theology in their churches, but they cannot take it into their homes. The God men obey is better than the God they worship. The family altar is the truest; the household deity the one most reverenced. I can see no sense in human beings saying in this age: "I believe in the fall of man, in total depravity, in vicarious atonement, and in the resurrection of the dead." They ought to be ashamed of such a faith. The attempt to save the Christian theology is costing the world not only its labor and its money; it is costing it its manhood and love of truth. It is not merely robbing the world's pockets and tables; it is robbing its heart and soul. A theology that is open to ridicule may as well be abandoned first as last, for it is sure to fall. Nothing can be kept sacred that the world laughs at. To call sacred such foolish fables as the creation of Adam and Eve, the Garden of Eden, the flood, and kindred stories would kill any religion where people were not too stupid to appreciate the ludicrous or too solemn to treat it with laughter. How loth men are to confess their ignorance! Let us all be honest, and acknowledge that we do not know whether there is a God or not, and that we use this name to represent the force in nature which we cannot understand and which is inscrutable to the human mind. L. K. WASHBURN.

Who Are the Christians?

The definition of the word Christian given by Webster is: "One who believes in the divinity of Christ; or one who inwardly and outwardly conforms to the doctrins of Christ." The latter clause of this definition is the one principally relied upon by our Christian adversaries when in a discussion upon the respectiv merits of Christianity and Freethought. Not long since a religious journal elaborated upon this definition, and said that, "in order to be a Christian, one must not only believe what was written concerning Christ in the New Testament, but must also obey his commandments; be a cheerful doer of his will," assuring its readers that it is a "very easy thing to be a Christian."

Knowing what was written concerning Christ, which one must believe, but considering that too great a demand upon my credulity, I knew I could not be a Christian so far as belief was required. But, being assured that it was a very easy thing to be a doer of Christ's will, I went diligently to work searching the scriptures to learn just what Christ willed for us to do, thinking it might be possible for one to be a practical Christian, if not a theoretical one.

I turn to the Sermon on the Mount—that discourse which is said to be the grandest ever delivered—said to contain the purest and noblest principles for the guidance of mankind in their daily life—and read from Matt. v, 34–37: "But I say unto you, swear not at all. . . . But let your communication be Yea, yea, and Nay, nay; and whatsoever is more than this cometh of evil." Right here I find that Christian practice does not conform to this injunction of their teacher.

All over Christendom it is the practice to administer oaths; believing that a witness is not competent to testify, or a juror to decide, or an officer to perform the duties of his office, until he has taken an "oath unto the Lord." And in many cases in our own "free America" the witness who does not believe in the phantasm of a God is debarred from giving testimony in a court of justice.

The Christians believe it would be unsafe to abolish the oath, and in its stead place the simple affirmation, as that is an Infidel doctrin, thereby neither believing nor doing what Christ says to do.

"But I say unto you, that ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." "And if any man will sue thee at the law and take away thy coat, giv him thy cloak also. . . . Giv to him that asketh thee, and to him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away" (Ibid, 39–42).

"Giv to everyone that asketh of thee; and of him that borrows of thee ask not thy goods again;" hope for nothing in return. The doctrin of non-resistance which Christ here enjoins has been taught for eighteen centuries, and for more than a thousand years it made kings and priests tyrants, and the great masses of mankind slaves—a slavery from which even now the most enlightened nations are not freed.

To resist not evil; to offer the other cheek if smitten, would be paying a premium upon crime and insolence. The willingness of Christians to let evil go unresisted is seen in the abundance of penitentiaries, jails, and workhouses all over Christian lands.

If you are sued and your coat taken, you must giv your prosecutor your cloak also. The result of the thousands of lawsuits in our country proves the readiness of Christians to do their master's will. The submissivness of Christian nations to insults from another Christian nation is seen in the millions of men kept ready for war in Europe, and the ingenuity diplayed in the invention of improved means of reducing one another to atoms.

To be a Christian, you must giv to every beggar that asks alms; and if a robber takes away your goods, you are not to demand their return; you are to lend, hoping for nothing in return. What a grand place a truly Christian nation would be for borrowers, beggars, and thieves!

Is the professed Christian willing to be guided by these rules of action? By no means. He knows that they would license all manner of vices and crimes. Christians declare Christ's ethical code the purest and noblest given for the guidance of man; and yet they know that his teaching could not be carried into practice without reducing society to a worse state than anarchy would. If any Christian should attempt to practice these precepts—be a doer of his will—he would be taken by his brother-Christians and placed in a lunatic asylum, just to show him there was considerable difference between the theories of the lowly Galilean and the practice of the nineteenth century.

"Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat and the body more than raiment? . . . Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. vi, 25–34).

The Christian who thinks that for his righteousness he will hav food, drink, and raiment added unto him will soon find himself very hungry and ragged.

Take no thought for the morrow; make no provision for the future, and let famin and pestilence once again devastate the earth. Care nothing for the things of this world; this life is not worth living for; do not beautify this earth, or contribute to the happiness of mankind, but cast all your thoughts upon the mansion in the skies; make no provision for this life, but prepare for the next. Fortunately most Christians seek first the things of this world, and afterward the kingdom of God. But were they true to their master they would depend upon God's bounty for the necessaries of life, and then they would be in a fit condition to sympathize with him who "had not where to lay his head."

"Lay not up for yourselvs treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal. But lay up for yourselvs treasures in heaven" (Matt. vi, 19, 20). The way Christians conform to this text is remarkable. None of them hav their thoughts on the carnal things of this world; none of them are struggling for wealth or political power. It is so easy to be a follower of Christ that the pursuit of these things is given up to the ungodly.

The good minister preaches entirely to save souls; but the most precious souls are where the salary is the largest; and unless worldly treasures are sufficiently supplied to let him liv in luxury and ease, the dear souls would be in danger of perishing from lack of spiritual sustenance. The church, whose record is so consistent, carries to its full extent the precept to giv to him that asketh, but she is the one that expects to do the asking, always begging and giving nothing in return—owning millions of dollars' worth of untaxed property—whose practice is in such strict conformity with this text that she is ever ready to "swap off treasures in heaven for cash down."

"But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you" (Matt. v, 44). No person can possibly love an enemy. We can only love one who is lovable to us; and certainly one who hates and persecutes us is not the person to excite love or admiration. It is impossible for us to force ourselvs to love anyone, and no follower of Christ can love his persecutor or enemy.

We should not harbor hatred; nor should we seek to revenge an injury; yet there is no reason why we should return benefits for injuries. To return good for evil, to return benefits for injuries, would be directly rewarding and encouraging wrong-doing. The hopes of forgivness and reward for injuries given would never prevent the commission of a crime. In every case where we are injured we should return justice unmixed with the spirit of revenge.

Is it not strange that you are commanded to love your enemies, and yet ordered to sever all family ties; to hate father, mother, brother, sister, to be a disciple of Christ's?

"Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them" (Luke xiv, 26). This, the only truly grand and noble rule of action found in Christ's Sermon on the Mount, is constantly ignored by professed Christians. In the scramble for position and profit it would seem that Christians hav never heard of the Golden Rule. The history of the church shows plainly that this rule is not, and never has been, regarded. The frightful massacre of Christians by Christians; the outrages practiced upon heathens; the persecution and ostracism of Infidels; the imprisonment of D. M. Bennett; the prosecution of C. B. Reynolds at Boonton, N. J., and the outrage upon Aunt Elmina show how Christians love their enemies, and that they do unto others as they would be done by.

Where is the believer that can stand these tests of his "outward and inward conformity to the doctrins of Christ?" Where is one who is a cheerful doer of his will? Alas! there is none; and if there ever were any, they hav sunk into obscurity like Lazarus and the "wise men of the East."

But these are by no means all the tests by which the true follower of Christ is to be tried. The true believer can do all the works Christ is said to hav done. In the sixteenth chapter of Mark, Christ speaks to his disciples, and says: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every living creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. And these signs shall follow them that believe: In my name they shall cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover."

Now, these are the works Christ says those who believe in him shall do. When any of the faithful can do these things, then we may know Christianity is true; but, unfortunately for them, the miracle-worker has degenerated into the juggler, who performs his tricks for the amusement of a pleasure-seeking audience.

Where is the Christian that can cast devils out of a modern Infidel? Where is there one that can drink down poison and not be hurt? It is certainly quite difficult for one who sees in nature an orderly sequence of events, an unbroken chain of affairs—who knows that every cause must produce a certain effect—to believe that by merely being "born again" the Christian is made proof against noxious serpents and deadly lotions. Where is there a follower of Christ that can lay hands on the sick and they recover?

There was a time when the Christian, if overtaken by accident or disease, hastened to the nearest monk's cell, and there, through the influence of the bones of some departed saint, expected a miracle to be performed. But now, when the Christian is overtaken by disease, he at once summons a physician, proving to the world that he does not believe in the words of his redeemer, and that he has more faith in physic than he has in prayer.

The modern Christian defender says that Christ was addressing the disciples, and that he only intended to giv them (the disciples) power to work miracles to prove to the world that he was the Christ. But anyone who will attempt such a construction of the plainest and most direct language, is either very ignorant, or guilty of wilful deception. For Christ speaks in the third person, and in terms that include all mankind. It is "he that believeth shall be saved," not you; it is "them that believe shall do these things," not you; as it should be if he intended to confer the power of working miracles upon the disciples only.

It is the hight of absurdity to try and explain away the difficulty of this text in this way, for the disciples already believed. The power of working miracles was no more intended for the disciples only than it was intended for them only when he said, "He that believeth not shall be damned."

It may seem unnecessary to comment upon such plainly constructed sentences, but modern theologians are making such ingenious attempts to explain away the difficulty of these texts that they deserve more than a passing notice, and I wish to reenforce the argument with a passage from St. John xiv, 12: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my father." Where is the man who can say he is a doer of Christ's will; who inwardly and outwardly conforms to the doctrins of Christ, and can prove his faith by his works? Where is one of the faithful but breaks all of these commandments? And still they expect to receive the reward of never-ending joy, and sing with the redeemed in the New Jerusalem. According to the definition of Christians, and the tests as applied by their own standard, it is impossible to be a follower of Christ. It is not enough to conform to the ceremony of worship, and support the preacher; for "he that breaketh even the least of these commandments, and shall teach men so, shall be least in the kingdom of heaven."

Another inspired writer (James xi, 10) says: "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." And anyone who pretends to know Christ and be a Christian, and does not obey his laws, is a liar, for 1 John xi, 4, says: "He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him."

Free Trade and the Workingman.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In an article on the "Federation of Mankind," published in your last week's issue, Mr. Holland says that the industrial prosperity of Great Britain during the past few years has been the result of her free-trade policy. Then, sir, how is it that at the present moment the working class all over England is suffering from starvation to such an extent that British statesmen are earnestly discussing the point whether it would not prove beneficial to the country to return to a moderate protection? If free trade is such a benefit to the country adopting it, why are so many men starving and so much dull trade prevailing? Goods are manufactured more cheaply upon the continent than in England, and in consequence of the latter's free trade, British markets are flooded with foreign goods to the exclusion of the home trade.

Something has to be done at the present crisis. Free trade has seemingly proved itself impotent; for as long as free trade can only number one champion, while the rest of the nations maintain a protectorate, that one nation will suffer in its trade. At least, so it appears to me. A BRITON.

Saint Cleveland.

Those restless Jesuits of the Protestant persuasion, the Evangelical Alliance, alias the National Reform Association, met in convention in Washington last week. Nearly two thousand of these oily-tongued, white-chokered, black-coated parasites were individually presented to the president, showing conclusivly that our age, our country, our government, are all assisting in bolstering up exploded beliefs, even with the prestige of their official positions. As custom makes it the duty of the executiv, in replying to deputations, to be diplomatic (otherwise, a convenient liar), more especially when a second term is being industriously "worked," despite the expiring efforts of the uncivil service, our great high priest Grover completely transcended the requirements of his office and party on this particular occasion.

Our would-be Saint Cleveland exhibits too great anxiety to pander to popular religious prejudice, by paying reverence to representativs of superstition, for one pledged to maintain and uphold the Constitution and laws of a country which the highest authorities, from Washington down, hav over and over declared is "in no sense a Christian nation."

When the Fifth Monarchy men of England proposed to overthrow Cromwell's protectorate and set up "King Jesus," an accomplished satirist wrote "Mercurious Pragmaticus," and in a single line laid down, it appears, the requirements of that and the present day, for verily

Our saints must rulers be.

The bald-headed latter-day saint who presides at the White House made a speech to the Alliance—prominent among whom was Felix R. Brunot, president of the de facto God in-the-Constitution party—the larger portion of which is what newspaper men denominate "hog wash." For instance, he spoke of their "noble mission," their "broad, undenominational fellowship," etc., and said he understood the purpose of the Alliance was the "application of Christian rules of conduct to the problems and exigencies of social and political life." Here is the cloven hoof! What has Christianity got to do with our "political life?" Would not politics and Christianity be the reign of church and state? Then who dares approvingly couple those diverse agencies, calling it a "noble mission?" Alas! for the realization of American liberty—the president of the United States. Tuliter qualiter. To represent this "broad, undenominational Christian fellowship," we shall expect to hear "Come, Holy Spirit, Heavenly Dove," the "Pater Noster," and "Te Deum Laudamus" chanted alternately in the White House morning mass, and Moody's gospel hymns for an afternoon diversion.

We had expected better things from Grover, believing he was far ahead of his party, but our hopes are shattered, when he bends so low as to cram four unmitigated falsehoods into one brief sentence. Hear our pious oracle: "All must admit that the reception of the teachings of Christianity result in the purest patriotism, in the most scrupulous fidelity to public trust, and in the best type of citizenship."

In the first place, Cleveland is well aware that "all" do not admit any such thing; that the world of scholars dispute and doubt the very existence of Christ, either as a man or as a divinity; that none of the so-called teachings of Christianity can be authentically attributed to him; that, in an ethical view, the teachings of the Talmud, the Koran, of Buddha, and others, are vastly superior to the majority of those incorporated in the creeds of Christianity. Knowing that the various sects of Christians hav been torturing in the past, and are willing to persecute in the present, all who differed from their sectarian dogmas, we are inclined to believe the president willfully misrepresents.

Secondly, the "purest patriotism" is represented by a name still honored by the public, used with pretended veneration by the president's party, and usually standing as a synonym for governmental reform—that of Thomas Jefferson; yet the sage of Monticello never accepted the teachings of Christ, he contemned them. Were there any purer patriots than Thomas Paine and Benjamin Franklin? Yet neither of these accepted the teachings of Christianity. To take a local illustration, we hav a lot of "boodlers," some in, some out of jail, but likely to escape merited punishment, as they nearly all are "good" church-members. They accept the "teachings of Christianity," of course they do, and accept bribes as a benefit to themselvs and the church; therefore they are purest patriots. They literally believe in "laying up treasures."

The third proposition, relativ to "scrupulous fidelity to public trust," is quite amusing, seeing that our Sunday-school superintendents, teachers, and Bible-class leaders are so rapidly engaging in their great Canadian colonization scheme. There is more Christianity in Canada, so their disappearance is excusable. Colonel Bolton, one of the leading lights of Christian laymen in this city, was recently retired to Joliet for systematically robbing the government while superintendent of a department in the post-office, by way of proving his fidelity to public trust. Will it not be remembered that certain persons who were so imbued with the "teachings of Christianity" that they were willing to risk their lives to uphold the divine institution of slavery, also robbed the United States treasury of all but fifteen cents in proof of their "scrupulous fidelity to public trust," and they happened to belong to the same political party as our president? It is known that Abraham Lincoln once wrote a pamphlet on the teachings of Christianity which would hav been characterized as ribald blasphemy, but his Infidel friend and partner, W. H. Herndon, prevailed on him not to publish it, as it would ruin his (Lincoln's) political career. However, "Honest Old Abe" was the cognomen he received for his "fidelity to public trust." The church, with its customary chicanery, has canonized Lincoln as a Christian martyr. Christianity having so few trustworty men to make a record, it claims all the prominent Infidels when they are dead.

As to the fourth and last falsehood, about the "best type of citizenship," we wish to respectfully refer the president to the statistical facts collected by Colonel Billings in his "Crimes of Preachers," for if acceptance of Christian teachings makes the average man a better citizen, the teachers should be the very best. Sad to relate, the figures show they are the very worst. This morning's paper (Chicago Herald, December 14th) reports two church rows in Cleveland (queer coincidence in the name). One is the Pope-Hildreth trial between two leading representativs of the Methodist pulpit. The report says:

A short time ago quite a sensation was produced by Rev. Mr. Pope's preferring charges of immorality against Dr. Hildreth. The trial is being held in the Taylor street Methodist Episcopal church, and the utmost precaution has been taken to keep the proceedings secret. There is a standing fight at each session between the doorkeepers and the newspaper men, but notwithstanding its secrecy, the result of the hearing each day is aired in the papers. The testimony of the prosecuting witnesses represented Hildreth as an accomplished male flirt. When witnesses for either side testify, attempts are made to vilify their characters and morals. The scandalous nature of the proceedings has incensed the members of the Taylor street Methodist Episcopal church, and they hav demanded that the investigation and trial be continued elsewhere. Their demand has not been granted, and the consequence is that the church has been split up into factions. Half of the trustees hav resigned. Pope has gained quite a reputation as a ministerial detectiv, and claims to hav a book of records dating back 114 years, containing all the misdeeds of ministers in the Methodist church. He has put forth every effort to procure testimony for the prosecution, and has scoured far and wide for witnesses, some of them having been brought from Canada. Since its commencement the trial has been adjourned several times in order to obtain more witnesses. The outcome is awaited with considerable interest. Hildreth is a pious-looking old gentleman on the shady side of life.

Another is a priest who is arraigned on sixteen specific charges of ministerial morality, which the report names "immorality"—not brought up by the unholy Infidels, but by his own congregation. A third is a Wisconsin Methodist minister who tried to defraud a widow out of a small property. Surely that is false. Ministers hav a reputation of caring for widows better than that. She must hav been very unattractiv. This is only one paper's record for one day, and it does not seem to be an extraordinarily good day for clerical scandals either. If Christianity produces the best citizens, how sad to contemplate that many become such just before they hav to forfeit their lives at the request of the law! What a pity that just as they are fitted for the best citizens they hav got to die! Perhaps it is best, to "save" them from backsliding.

Just imagin what a drop from the Infidel Jefferson in the White House to Grover Cleveland!

Oh, what a fall was there, my countrymen!

When Liberals organize, contribute, and agitate, like the Evangelical Alliance, they will attain results proportionate to their efforts. They must learn that numbers are respectability; that our numbers are sufficient, if organized, to command respectful attention and stop this governmental cant; that "in union there is strength;" that evolution, physical and intellectual, is the result of energy. What we want is to spread the light of mental liberty; to rescue our country from the hands of priest and despoiler. For this purpose we need funds. Every cent contributed will be rigidly accounted for. No one is trying to get rich off the American Secular Union. All can do something. Come, instead of spending money in senseless presents to perpetuate what is now a Christian institution, learn to donate something to liberty. In former times, men had to lay down their lives that progress might reach its present altitude. We hav merely to lay down a few dollars. Then let us do that, in future, willingly and generously.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

SEDALIA, Mo., Dec. 2d, 3d, 4th.—The Liberals of Sedalia are of the genuin, energetic, no-half-hearted-but-do-your-best-every-time kind. The Opera House was engaged by a theatrical troupe, and could only be had for Sunday. The proprietor charged $63 rent, although it is a large and handsome house; on Sunday, and for a lecture, the charge was exorbitant. I really believe Dr. Wood should be awarded the leather medal, of pig skin, as the stingiest creature in the town.

Friday and Saturday evenings, Dec. 2d and 3d, the lectures were delivered at the Hall. Attendance was small, only about one hundred. Saturday evening the hall was crowded; over forty were standing during the entire lecture. Sunday afternoon the Opera House was well filled, and in the evening it was crowded. By direction of the Liberal friends I announced a collection for the benefit of the poor of Sedalia, and over $40 was contributed. The Liberals paid every expense by private subscription, and the committee of management made up the amount to $50, every cent of which was given to the poor of Sedalia. I hope the Christians who profess so much will do as much, in proportion, as the Infidels of Sedalia to relieve the poor and needy. Thatcher, Gardella, and Airola are the noble trinity—the leading and inspiring spirits of an intelligent host of Liberals, a band of jolly good fellows, whom it is an honor and delight to know. But that the times are not propitious, a very strong local Secular Union could be organized, Certain it is that the self-sacrifice evinced by the Liberals of Sedalia givs evidence that they will when organized be a mighty power for good.

WARRENSBURG, Mo, Dec. 5th, 6th, 7th.—The pioneers and leading Liberals of this place are the jolly veteran A. T. Bolton and his eldest son, Chris. Bolton. They are intelligent, earnest, devoted workers for liberty and progress. The Opera House being engaged, they obtained use of the court-house for the three nights. My first lecture, "Life's Duties," astounded the Christians, a goodly number of whom ventured out. They had been assured by the parsons that Liberal lectures were a tirade of denunciation of all that was good, a tearing down of every barrier from vice, and ridiculing everything pertaining to virtue. But to the intense disgust of the devout brethren many of the Christians who heard the lecture admired the principles Liberals advocate, and declared if life's duties were performed as I presented them greater happiness must result to all classes than Christianity had ever attained. This was gall and wormwood to the devout bigots and fanatics. The next evening, despite a popular, low-price troupe at the theater, an operatic concert at one of the churches, and an Episcopalian bishop at another—three attractiv shows running opposition—the court-house was packed with an intelligent and appreciativ audience. Next morning the Christian bigots were wild, furious. They waited on the venerable old fossil who was holding court (the poor old judge is rabidly orthodox), and he promised to help. He held court that night, so I could not lecture. This purpose was kept secret till late in the afternoon. I determined to await over, and deliver my lecture next evening, the sheriff and prosecutor assuring Mr. Bolton there would be no likelihood of the judge holding court the next evening, as he was aged and quite feeble.

The Christians, learning I was staying over, and that there was such intense desire to hear on "The Bible: From Whence It Came, and What It Really Teaches," held a meeting, rallied all their forces, and rushed around, insisting that every member of a church of any influence should see the sheriff and use every inducement to hav him refuse to permit me to again lecture in the court-house, and they made sure there was no other place available. The sheriff weakened under the pressure, and in the afternoon we learned the court-house would be closed against us. Mr. Bolton saw the sheriff, who declared the pressure was more than he could withstand. He was sorry, but must refuse us. After consultation with Mr. Bolton and his son, I determined I would return on Thursday and Friday, December 29th and 30th, for I did not propose to be so easily defeated. There would be no court in session then; no excuse to refuse us the use of the court-house, since it had always been used for all sorts of meetings. But the sheriff refused; and Mr. Bolton, with heart of oak and sturdy persistence, regardless of cost to himself, at once engaged the Opera House for the two evenings, December 29th and 30th. And I shall be there. The opposition—the mean, subtle methods resorted to to shut out free speech—has awakened thought, and created interest and a spirit of investigation, among very many who else had remained indifferent. Thus do the schemes of the enemy recoil on themselvs, and the glorious cause of human progress and Freethought, with irresistible impetus, marches on to victory.

Our London Letter.

Although now and again a very optimistic parson may be found to speak favorably of the advance of the particular creed he fancies he holds, the majority of the clergy appear more inclined to take an opposit view of matters, and generally deplore the decline of religious enthusiasm, which was so marked a feature before the spread of education had enlightened the masses. The orthodox but prosy occupant of the pulpit has now, in most instances, a very limited congregation, and were it not for the endowments on so many churches and chapels, the pastor would speedily starve unless he turned what abilities he might possess to some other means of gaining a livelihood. What is called preaching the pure milk of the word will not keep a congregation together; the day when a four-hours sermon would be listened to with rapt attention is past, and a parson to be popular must introduce a certain amount of buffoonery in the pulpit, and introduce concerts, bazars, and other entertainments in lieu of the old-fashioned week-night prayer-meetings, which I well remember were very dull affairs indeed. The Rev. Dr. Dale recently gave it as his opinion that a preacher might be eloquent, learned, kind, or pathetic, but was not a suitable person to direct his flock until he had received Christ, and been qualified for the responsibilities of his office by the inspiration of the spirit of God. Unfortunately, the reverend doctor omitted to state how it could be proved that the preacher had received Christ, for everyone who wanted to fill such an office must be ready to make a declaration that he was the happy recipient of such a desirable possession. The doctor referred to the revivals in religious life during the days of Luther, Whitfield, Wesley, and said the power of the latter movement appeared to hav been spent, and wondered how and when God would reveal his great power again. It must appear very strange to a man who has trained himself to believe in the "great and precious promises" to find how unlikely it is that they will ever be kept. Such neglect on the part of their deity would be more discouraging than it now is, if payment was only made in proportion to the carrying out of the promises, and in that case the whole business would speedily collapse. The fact undoubtedly is that the Christian religion is nothing but a matter of money, and unless this is forthcoming in sufficient quantities, the scheme of redemption, and the inspiration of the spirit and similar mysteries, would hav to shift for themselvs, for no one would care about troubling after such unprofitable possessions.

The criminal statistics serve as an excellent index of the power of Christianity; when the latter was most current, crime was most prevalent; as Christianity declines and education increases, so crime sensibly diminishes, though it would be rash to suggest that the two will expire together; but it is quite certain that the gospel of humanity will reduce crime to a lower point than has ever yet been recorded.

Chronology.

I am much obliged to Brother Hill for calling my attention, in his letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 17th, to a proof of my position which I had overlooked. I did not consider the quotation which he makes (from the article Chronology in the Encyclopedia Britannica, page 619) as relevant to the issue, since it does not relate, as it struck me at the time, to the beginning of the era, or to the years after the beginning of the era, but wholly to the years before it began. It pointed out the difference between the astronomical mode of designating the years before the era and the common chronological mode.

Upon closer examination, however, I see that it is expressly stated that the year which astronomers denote by 0 is "the year which preceded the first of our era." This certainly cannot mean that it is the first year of our era which they denote by 0. On the contrary, astronomers and chronologers agree in calling the first year of our era A.D. 1; and the only discrepancy between them applies to the previous years. This very discrepancy furnishes one reason for introducing a scientific era, in the use of which there shall be no such interruption as the astronomers properly complain of.

So much for what has been, and is; but the adoption of the new era raises an important question as to what ought to be; and we are indebted to Brother Hill for raising the point squarely.

America was discovered in A.D. 1492; what year shall we call that? Surely we must not follow the chronologers' error of omitting the year 0. If we do not, and if we reckon backward, we shall hav to say Columbus discovered America on October 12, B.E. 108. What will that signify? That it will be 108 full years, after the completion of that year, before we reach the era. So the moment we go back of our era, we encounter the use of complete years, in relation to time that is not only not completed but not even begun.

My remedy for this would be to adopt the plan in universal use among mathematicians, of adding to negativ quantities a sufficient amount to make them positiv. Negativ logarithms hav long been disused. To provide for the wants of geologists and astronomers, we may add 1,000,000,000 years to the date, making 1492, 1,000,001,492, which will be 999,999,892 for the year of the discovery of America by the new era. For historical purposes it will never be necessary to write more than the four right-hand figures, making the date E.S. 9892. For scientific purposes, a prefixed 9 being understood to indicate past time, and a prefixed 0 indicating future time, it will only be necessary to write enough figures to distinguish between the two.

Colonel Ingersoll's Tribute to a Dead Friend.

From the New York World.

Mrs. Ida Knowles, of Peoria, died in this city on the 15th inst. She was the wife of Howard Knowles and a daughter of Richard H. Whiting. Col. Robert Ingersoll, being an intimate friend of the family, was invited to say a few words over the flower-covered bier on the eve of its removal to the West for interment. In compliance with this request, Colonel Ingersoll made one of those eloquent utterances for which he is celebrated. He said:

MY FRIENDS: Again we stand in the shadow of the great mystery—a shadow as deep and dark as when the tears of the first mother fell upon the pallid face of her lifeless babe—a mystery that has never yet been solved. We hav met in the presence of the sacred dead to speak a word of praise, of hope, of consolation. Another life of love is now a blessed memory—a lingering strain of music. The loving daughter, the pure and consecrated wife, the sincere friend, who with tender faithfulness discharged the duties of a life, has reached her journey's end.

A braver, a more serene, a more chivalric spirit—clasping the loved and by them clasped—never passed from life to enrich the realm of death. No field of war ever witnessed greater fortitude, more perfect, smiling courage, than this poor, weak, and helpless woman displayed upon the bed of pain and death. Her life was gentle and her death sublime. She loved the good, and all the good loved her. But there is this consolation: She can never suffer more; she can never feel again the chill of death; never part again from those she loves. Her heart can break no more. She has shed her last tear, and upon her stainless brow has been set the wondrous seal of everlasting peace.

When the Angel of Death—the masked and voiceless—enters the door of home, there come with her all the daughters of compassion, and of these Love and Hope remain forever.

You are about to take this dear dust home—to the home of her girlhood, and to the place that was once my home. You will lay her with neighbors that I hav loved, that are now at rest. You will lay her where my father sleeps.

All I can say is:

Lay her in the earth,
And from her fair and unpolluted flesh
Let violets spring.

I never knew, I never met, a braver spirit than the one that once inhabited this silent form of dreamless clay.

Two Apothegms.

"Education consists in getting rid of prejudice" (Wendell Phillips).

"The martyred saints are but a handful compared to the martyred sinners" (O. B. Frothingham).

These two apothegms I heard from the lips of the speakers many years ago, and they made a lasting impression upon my mind.

Books and Periodicals.

Caleb S. Weeks requests us to say that the price of his "Response to Pope's Essay on Man" is 25 cents, instead of 50 cents, as we put it. We apologize. The price was not marked on the book, and we gave it as 50 cents, not understanding how so much Ciceronian elegance could be afforded for less.

G. W. Foote, of the London Freethinker, has written a thick pamphlet, solid long primer, called "Bible Heroes." In it he recounts the history of Mr. Adam, Captain Noah, Father Abraham, Juggling Jacob, Master Joseph, Joseph's Brethren, Holy Moses, Parson Aaron, General Joshua, Jephthah & Co., and Professor Samson. The pamphlet is wittily written, and calculated to bring the aforesaid characters into evil repute with respectable folks. Mr. Foote gets his facts from the Bible, and if he has fallen into historical error the fault belongs not to him, but to King James's scribes. The price in United States currency is 50 cents. In England it sells for a shilling.

The New York Sun says: "The talented, learned, and gentle young Hindoo, Amrita Lal Roy, who resided for some years in this city, and who left here last year to return to India, recently started a paper in the English language in Calcutta called Hope. Mr. Roy is what is known as a man of advanced thought, and he joined the Knights of Labor. His essay in the North American Review on 'British Rule in India,' was a vigorous piece of criticism." During Amrita's stay in New York he was a compositor in THE TRUTH SEEKER office, where he imbibed a large amount of heresy, and won the affections of all. His evenings were spent at labor meetings, and, though too modest to take the platform, he was more competent to discuss labor questions than many of the self-assertiv speakers. May he regenerate the Hindoo race by his vigorous western ideas!

We blush as we copy the following:

"120 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK, Dec. 17, 1887.

"MY FRIEND MACDONALD: Whether you borrowed George's pen, or he took a seat at your desk, the combined wit and wisdom of the Macdonald brothers seems to hav entered into the notices of books and periodicals in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 17th. After laughing over one, I would return to the reading of something which had already amused me. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a live paper.

"Yours truly, E. B. FOOTE."

The delicate intimation contained in the foregoing, that the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is renowned for wisdom, is duly appreciated, as is the admiration of Dr. Foote for George. We regret to be obliged to state that when the notices were written our brother was on his way to the limitless West, where he proposes, in company with Samuel P. Putnam, to start a Freethought paper and grow up with the country, or walk back to New York. San Francisco is his destination.

W. Stewart Ross, better known as "Saladin," editor of the London Secular Review, has sent us Part V. of his "Woman: Her Glory, Her Shame, and Her God," which in weekly instalments has been printed in his paper. Like everything of Saladin's, it is knightly, invincible, and scholarly. But beginning abruptly at page 257 the preceding parts will be found necessary to intelligent reading. This part is a white-heat indictment of the Christian civilization which permits the vilest degradation of women in the cities, sinking her lower than the beasts, while pretending to hav elevated her, and a brief history of marriage customs in Scotland. The latter shows that the high illegitimacy rate in the land of cakes proceeds from customs gray with age, which the church made no effort to reform, and that it is only since Christianity itself is going that immorality is going also. This series of articles is written to show that the claim that Christianity has elevated woman is false, and surely the attempt is successful. The parts now ready sell for 30 cents each.

We hav just managed to get printed John Peck's "Christian Absurdities," which excited so much favorable comment from our friends as it ran as a serial through these columns some months ago. Not since Remsburg's "False Claims of the Church" appeared has anything hit the Liberal hosts so forcibly as this arraignment of Christianity by Mr. Peck, the "Learned Blacksmith" of Naples, who is one of the most convincing and witty writers in the country. In this pamphlet the doctrins and practices of the Christians are held up to scorn, and bold will be the churchman who denies the truth of the impeachment. The book has a purpose—to rid so much of the world as the author can reach of superstition, and we think its homely, witty sentences are admirably adapted for the purpose. It is nicely printed and bound, and sells, single copies, for 20 cents. To those desirous of using it for missionary work, six copies will be sent for $1. About five thousand a day ought to be distributed throughout the country for the next ten years.

"The Reason Why" is the title of a printed lecture, by Mrs. E. H. Cobb, on the mind-cure. Mental healing, she says, relies on God instead of matter, as "what is the source of life must also be the source of health." Medicin cures only where mind givs it power, or where mind does the work. Mrs. Cobb, it seems to us, reasons from false premises, and we cannot advise her employment by the sick. In another pamphlet, which she calls, "Start Right," she affirms the demonstration of "the conservation of spiritual energy or life." And, "as we liv only by receiving life from the divine, this conservation makes us inlets to the whole great reservoir of life, thus flooding us at every instant with an overpowering, but modest, confidence and self-control." In his Health Monthly for January, Dr. Foote notes a strong tendency on the part of such disciples of "Christian science" as Mrs. Cobb to become practitioners and teachers, and wonders where they all find material to practice upon. If Dr. Foote had paid more attention to the statistics of idiocy, he would find that a fool is born into the world about every minute, which is the only reason we can see why such pamphlets are written. The price of "The Reason Why" is 20 cents; of "Start Right," 25 cents; sold by the author, 38 Concord square, Boston, Mass.

THE Religious and Benevolent Association of Waco, Texas, celebrated its fifth anniversary on the 11th inst. Celebration lasted two days. This association was founded by J. D. Shaw, who is the regular speaker and editor, and publisher also, of the Independent Pulpit, a first-class monthly Freethought journal. The celebration brought out a large number of Liberals, strengthening the organization considerably. Owing to Mr. Shaw's popularity, the Waco Freethinkers are at the head of local organizations.

WE regret to announce that Helen H. Gardener is too ill to respond to invitations to lecture, or to conduct correspondence. Her heart is in the cause of liberty, but her body is too feeble to bear her to the front. Her friends will please note this as the reason, perhaps, of seeming neglect, and be assured that when she recovers, her voice will again be heard throughout the land.

Business Morality.

Business is occupation for gain—the employment undertaken to secure a livelihood or amass wealth. Such is the bad reputation at present of this department of life, that many think it is better defined in the words of the Dutchman: "Men goes about cheating each oder all day, and call dot pizness." Carlyle said we must all either toil or steal, by whatever name we may call it. Business may, therefore, be divided into two branches—toiling and stealing.

There are multitudes of honest toilers who make good and useful articles and perform valuable services to the community, and who can feel nightly, with the village blacksmith of Longfellow, "something attempted, something done, has earned a night's repose." Their reward is usually only a bare subsistence. The laborer, the mechanic, the artisan, seldom amass wealth; a comfortable livelihood is, as a rule, their highest attainment. There are other toilers who use their brains for the service of man and occasionally secure wealth or competency. The stealers are those who get gain without rendering a full equivalent to society, or who receive compensation for their services by subterfuge. There is a large intermediate class who serve the stealers and toil, perhaps, honestly for them. These, as a rule, are better paid than the toilers not connected with stealing, but they do not secure wealth until they rise to be master-stealers. The latter are the men that amass fortunes and liv in luxury. They are not consciously dishonest, and do not deserve the names of thieves and rogues that are often hurled at them; but they naturally accept existing customs which society tolerates, by which they get more than they giv. Some of these customs may be described, and then the foundation principles of business that permit such methods may be discussed.

The following are some of the many modes of stealing the means of livelihood.

The merchant buys to sell dearer. If he performs a service in holding or distributing goods and adds only the cost of a comfortable living, he may be classed with honest toilers. But if he does no good by his purchase, or withholds articles from consumption till he can extort exorbitant prices from needy men, he is a stealer. The men who corner markets, and those who make fictitious purchases and sales, merely gambling upon the chances of the rise and fall of prices, these are stealers, though the latter hav the just perception to call themselvs "scalpers," and a man on the exchange will jubilantly boast, "I hav taken ten scalps this morning." One of the most eminent merchants in England, a noted Christian philanthropist, paid a large sum for a private wire by which he got market quotations fifteen minutes in advance of the public announcements. His partner rushed to the "flags" and bought or sold as extensivly as possible for that quarter of an hour, and was accustomed to say jocosely, "Sam does the praying and I do the lying." An immense fortune was secured, but no service in any way equivalent was rendered to society; so it was stolen. Some merchants fail, buy in their stocks at twenty cents on the dollar, and undersell their competitors. Others enter goods at the custom houses with false valuations and thus steal the duties. A large firm is now in liquidation for the ostensible reason that it is undersold by those who import goods without paying full tribute. Commission agents and brokers take discounts or double brokerages or invoice goods at false prices. One of the largest commission houses in the East Indies complained of an employee, "He objects to charge our purchases at higher prices than we paid."

The ship agent works for a fraction of a commission and recoups himself with percentages from all the ship's bills that he pays. The stevedore, ship chandler, butcher, carter, and blacksmith contribute to his support, while the confiding and penurious shipowner, who has robbed the agent of his fair remuneration, rejoices in his supposed economy. The sea-captain, if he has the chance, acts as does the agent, or gets his clothing bill added to the cost of a topsail, his horse hire put into the butcher's accounts, and his hotel bill paid by the stevedore.

The coal-dealer givs light weights and poor quality. One of these when discharging a vessel puts the heavy loads of coal in his yard and sends up the next light load to a customer with the public scale ticket of the heavy load. He contracts to supply coal at lower prices than the mine-owners can do. He begins by delivering good coal, but soon every second or third cart brings in an inferior and cheaper article.

There is one trade, however, that appears to be truly benevolent and self-sacrificing. The owners of spice mills buy pepper for 16 cents a pound, grind it, pack it in an attractiv box, and sell it for 8 cents a pound. But this apparent exception may, perhaps, be explained away.

A large class of stealers are those who adulterate goods and thus gain money by false pretenses. The devices are innumerable. A few are the following: Milk is mixed with water, chalk, fat, glucose, and mashed brains. Coffee with flour, beans, sawdust, tan, baked horse livers, and chicory. Chicory, again, is adulterated with acorns, horse-chestnuts, and roots. Tea is mixed with willow and other leaves. In 1843 there were eight factories in London for facing spent tea leaves with rose-pink and black lead. Bread is made with the aid of alum or sulphate of copper. Flour is mixed with meal, inferior starches, chalk, and plaster. Butter, lard, and oils are made from cheap fats, water, salt, and farina. Fruit preserves are composed of carrots, turnips, and apples. Sugar contains glucose. Vinegar, sulphuric acid, arsenic, and corrosiv sublimate. Mustard, flour and tumeric. Pepper, sometimes, has not a trace of the real article, but is made of gypsum, mustard husk, and starch, while Cayenne pepper may contain brick dust and red lead. Beer sometimes contains Indian hemp, opium, strychnin, tobacco, logwood, vitriol, molasses, copperas, or multitudes of other substances. The Encyclopedia Britannica says, "A great part of the wine of France and Germany has ceased to be the juice of the grape at all." It is hard to get a sample of genuin wine. Books are published openly to explain methods of adulteration, and dealers, called brewers' druggists, supply the articles. Seeds are dyed and sold for better qualities. The adulteration of drugs is endless. Woolens are mixed with shoddy or mingo, forty million pounds being made annually in Yorkshire alone. Cottons are made heavy with sizing and China clay. Profits are thus stolen by deceit.

Stock speculation is a favorit means of stealing a livelihood or fortune in a conventionally respectable manner—betting on the market quotations, or sometimes, in addition, aiding the desired turn, as when Jay Gould locked up thirty million dollars and compelled needy men to sell shares cheap.

Mining speculations afford a favorit field for the stealers. The great fortunes of the Comstock lode were not mainly the result of the produce of minerals, but of the sale of shares. When a good vein was discovered it was, in some cases, carefully covered up, armed sentries prevented entrance to the mines, dividends were withheld, bad reports circulated, and, when the shares dropped in price, the managers bought them up. The rich deposits were then worked, marvelous results were declared, and when the shares were inflated to a great premium, the managers unloaded them upon the eager public.

Tariffs offer another field for stealing. The men who hav influence or address induce a financial minister or Congress to protect their businesses from foreign competition, thereby often compelling their countrymen to buy inferior goods at higher prices. Enormous fortunes are thus stolen from the people, but in such small sums from each individual that the theft is not complained of.

Other stealers patent a slight improvement on a long course of invention and secure the toil of past generations, compelling the world to pay tribute to them. The telephone is an example. Contractors get rock prices for dirt cuttings by misrepresentation, or receive allowances for false claims adroitly made. Lobbyists get railroad charters, never intending to use them except for sale to men who will construct a road. We hav seen in Canada from eighty to a hundred million dollars' worth of public property given to a few influential men to build a railroad which they already claim is earning profits; and the railroads of the United States hav received vast amounts from the people's heritage.

Lawyers, doctors, and ministers are known to take pay for insincere utterances. Newspapers thrive on lying advertisments. So on through every employment may be traced dishonest practice and deceit. The old maxim, "Honesty is the best policy," is discredited, and on every hand we hear it said, "A man cannot be honest if he would succeed in business." Observation shows that the large fortunes are not often secured by the honest, generous, and fair-dealing, but they more frequently fall to the lot of shrewd, hard, grasping, remorseless, unscrupulous men. The men starting in life with high aims and pure intentions find it impossible to compete with such people, and after a hard and virtuous struggle the necessities of their families compel them to follow the fashion and join the stealers.

Why do these fraudulent customs exist? Do people prefer to drink baked horse livers, to spread fat on alum-raised bread, and smear it with carrot preserve? Do they demand the privilege of sprinkling their food with brick-dust and red lead, and of refreshing themselvs by drinking strychnin, logwood, and ether, and by smoking cabbage leaves, molasses, and lampblack? No; the evil arises from the foundation principle of business, which is, competition for individual gain, instead of work for the general welfare. Business as at present conducted is a selfish strife for gain carried on in such rude fashion that the success of one necessarily means the misfortune of another. It is a transference of the brutal struggle for existence to more refined spheres of means. The brute gains his prey with his teeth, the savage with his spear, the chieftain with his sword, the highwayman with his pistol, the capitalist with finance. But Attila, Hengist, Dick Turpin, and Jay Gould are merely illustrations of the effect of civilization upon the same instinct of selfish aggrandizement. Must man ever go on in this warfare against his fellows? May not living be made secure while exercising efforts for the general welfare? Must competition never giv place to coöperation, and coöperation not become extended to communities, states, nations, or the world? A widespread feeling of abhorrence of the present system of fraud, extortion, and deceit is pervading the world. Men desire to be honest and benevolent, but the present competitiv system forces them to exploit the labor of others; to misrepresent, plot, undermine, oppose, and injure in order that the comforts of life may be secured.

ROBERT C. ADAMS.

To the Friends of Personal Liberty.

AN APPEAL FOR THE MORAL AND FINANCIAL SUPPORT OF AN ORGANIZATION ENGAGED IN RESISTING THE ENCROACHMENTS OF OUR CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. Chavannes, of Knoxville, Tennessee, lectured on the 2d day of December, 1887, before the Liberal Club of New York city. The subject of his lecture was, "Illegal Methods of Enforcing the Laws." The lecturer first stated that, while laws were a necessity of civilized life, it was of the utmost importance to the community that their scope should be clearly defined, and that they should be legally enforced.

One of our laws had been more abused in that respect than any other on the statute-book, to wit, the postal law, enacted to suppress the sending of obscene matter through the mails. This law is usually designated by the public as the Comstock law, and its illegal encroachment as Comstockism.

A new instance of Comstockism had come to the lecturer's knowledge, and he felt it his duty to make it known. A letter had been unlawfully intercepted, seized, and placed in the hands of the United States authorities.

Briefly stated, the facts were these: Mrs. Slenker, a woman well known as a faithful worker in behalf of humanity, and whose moral character stands so high that it enabled her, though an Abolitionist and an Infidel, to gain the esteem and friendship of all the inhabitants of her Virginia home, from the ministers of the gospel to the poorest negro, was engaged of late years in a private correspondence which Comstock believed to come under the meaning of the Comstock law. Decoy letters were sent to her, sufficient material was gathered to procure her indictment, and she was arrested and thrown into prison.

While in jail, her husband lifted her accumulated mail from the post-office, and, taking it with him unopened, started to bail her out. On the way he called at the house of Mr. Jordan, the United States marshal, who first asked him for Mrs. Slenker's letters, then asked him to open them, and next, deliberately reading the whole correspondence, he selected those letters which he desired, and returned the remainder to Mr. Slenker's possession. One of these intercepted letters, at least, is yet, to the personal knowledge of the lecturer, in the hands of the United States authorities.

Although the act was done by Mrs. Jordan, it was done at the instigation of Messrs. Barclay and McAffee, gentlemen who unite the position of post-office inspectors and of Comstock's coadjutors. Of this fact the lecturer satisfied himself by personal conversation with Mr. Jordan and Mrs. Slenker.

While the law was not directly violated, so as to bring the perpetrators within the easy reach of punishment, the intent of the laws enacted for the security of the inviolability of the mails was clearly violated, and it was done as a part of Comstock's methods of enforcing the law.

We might look upon it as a mistake or an accident, if it were not in keeping with all of Comstock's actions ever since he loomed into notoriety as the agent of the Society for the Prevention of Vice.

Mr. Knoedler's arrest is another case in point. The lecturer had no desire to defend art pictures. Before a refined and educated audience they need no defense. But he would state that according to his observations, whenever he visited homes where art pictures were found of the kind seized in Mr. Knoedler's store—that is, pictures of nude females, in artistic and not in lascivious positions, he always knew he was among refined and moral persons.

The animus of Comstock's methods was shown by his failing to arrest the owners of the pictures from which the photographs were taken, and only arresting those persons from whom he could make some capital for his own personal advantage. Comstock is not engaged in trying to enforce the will of the people, but in trying to turn certain laws, which he was largely instrumental in having enacted, to the advantage of the Society for the Prevention of Vice, and the pecuniary benefit to himself.

This unsatisfactory state of things, the lecturer argued, is due to two different factors. The first is the infinit wording of the law. This makes it impossible, whenever a case is brought to trial, to bring proof in court of the necessity of the work in hand, as in Mrs. Slenker's case, or in the case of medical works, or of the purity of the intention, as in the case of works of art. As the law stands it is simply a question of facts, and a man could be sent to prison for five years for mailing a copy of Shakspere, if a jury could be found to decide that certain portions of Shakspere are obscene. The fact is that there are no publishers of medical works, no dealers in old classics, no importers of art pictures or of statuary in the United States but what are subject to punishment if Comstock or any other person should prevail upon the public officers to institute a prosecution, and a jury be found to render a verdict in accord with the literal wording of the law.

The law ought to be amended to except: All medical or scientific publications; all recognized works of art, or copies thereof; all private correspondence.

This is clearly the will of the majority of the people, and it is the duty of our legislators to see that the laws conform to it.

The other factor to be eliminated is the unlawful methods pursued by Comstock and his coadjutors, and that can only be met by an organized resistance to their encroachments.

The latent dissatisfaction to these methods which exists among the most intelligent portion of the community must be concentrated and made effectiv.

There is already in New York city an organization which has, so far, offered the only effectual barriers to Comstock's methods. This is the National Defense Association. Single-handed, they hav met Comstock before the legislature and before the courts, and hav defeated him. They should be supported both morally and financially by all persons who believe that the time has come to prevent the laws being made an engin of persecution, not for the moral welfare of the community, but for the satisfaction of a private corporation, and the pecuniary benefit of its agents.

The lecturer believes that there is, all through the United States, a sufficient number of persons opposed to Comstockism to support an organized defense against it. He knows that the National Defense Association possesses the will and the ability to make that desire effectiv, and he appeals to his hearers, and to those in whose hands this report may fall, to do their part to arrest the growing evil.

It is not a case for protest; it is a case for action; and, however numerous the calls may be from other sources upon the means at our disposal and upon our moral support, if we are interested in opposing Comstockism, let us show it by our work, and pledge ourselvs that henceforth we will do something till the enemy has been met and the victory is ours.

Public Spirit as a Measure of Manhood.*

Was it not Plato who said, "The man who will discover the one in the many, him would I follow as a god?"

The loftiest minds of the world seem to be those who are most in love with the universal. There is a tendency in the human mind to seek the universal; the one in the many. All efforts at generalization are manifestations of this characteristic. The great generalizers of the word are its great philosophers. The great synthetic minds who originate the great synthetic systems of philosophy, whether in the world physical, psychical, social, or theological, or all these together, are the leading exemplars of this tendency, as also the true exemplars of the rest of mankind. Moses's universal Jehovah, Christ's universal love, Plato's universal model republic (for doubtless he so intended it), Humboldt's Cosmos, Newton's law of gravitation, Fourier's destiny proportional to passional attraction (which is the extension of Newton's law from the physical to the psychical and social worlds), and Spencer's universal law of evolution, together with the correlation of forces and the conservation of energy, are some leading specific examples. That Alexander, Cæsar, Napoleon, were great generals because they were great generalizers goes almost without saying.† Taken any particular domain of facts or phenomena, we classify and generalize them to find the law or principle which governs them, which constitutes science. Generalizing comes from reflection. At this point of reflection then commences a great difference between two classes of persons, namely, the uncultured and cultured. It is of vital importance to consider this divergence. As it is with the primitiv race and the primitiv man, the child, so it is the character of the undeveloped and untrained (uncultured and unreflecting) mind to deal in special facts and personal interests and to act from impulse and by "reflex action," and to be unplastic and unchangeable by individual experience; to be fixed in custom and given to imitation. (I am here using some of the language of Spencer.) Such a mind does not reflect; it cannot generalize or fix attention, or combine the action of faculties; it is without rational curiosity, has no notions of class abstraction, cause, uniformity, law, truth; and no proper sense of justice or sentiment of altruism. It is not impressionable, or expansiv, or progressiv. In keeping with this state of mind was the old conception of fixity in nature, of fixed types, as practical standards, with no notion of growth, evolution, extension; little of the historical method, and no notion that the law of evolution is the historical method extended. But the more developed, trained, and cultured mind acts in a freer, calmer, more reflectiv and deliberate, more systematic and rational way. It sees with finer eye, it understands with broader grasp. It is not only sensitiv to facts, but penetrates to their subtle relations, and seizes hold of the law thereof—sees the immutability of law, the reign of law. It is as grand and broad in synthesis as it is fine and penetrating in analysis. It arranges, it groups, it weighs, reflects, reasons, generalizes. It sees the one in the many and the many in the one. It has ideas of and understands the significancy of class, abstraction, cause, uniformity, law, truth—and recognizes progress with order in utilizing the historical method and in seeing what comes of it in the theory of evolution. Such minds hav, too, a keen sense of justice, of right, and duty, and of devotion; a love for the true, the beautiful, and the good; a sympathy for others, and an appreciation of the true spirit of altruism. In keeping with this class of mind are the new ideas of evolution and a perpetual—in the main—progress of life, superseding the old ideas of a fixed type. Especially is this true of politics and jurisprudence, for example, and it is now being extended to the question of conduct or ethics. And all this, on the one hand, to delineate the man of true public spirit, and, on the other, to point out where may be found the proper objects of his attention and care. The man of public spirit is one who is great enough to care about questions of truth and duty. It was men of public spirit who, upon reflection, seeing pauperism to be the cancer that it is upon the body social, hav attempted, and are now attempting, its removal by what has come to be known as "scientific charity." If, then, to do what is most needful to be done; if to do that which will result in the greatest good to the greatest number, is to be the standard of goodness, wisdom, and nobility, then is public spirit the highest standard as a measure of manhood. An Eastern proverb says:

They who gather wealth to giv to the poor,
Their memory shall be fragrant as roses;
But they who work with their fellows so that there be no poor,
All the perfumes of the garden cannot measure their sweetness.

RATIONAL AND EMOTIONAL CHARITY.

Either the words artificial and natural, or indirect and direct, might, with equal propriety, be used here instead of rational and emotional, as above. But the word artificial is here used in the sense (and this is its true sense) that art is rational control of natural phenomena or laws for human advantage; and so, too, therefore, the natural (natural phenomena or laws) are the raw material, so to speak, for art or invention to operate upon or with. (I am here using some of the language of Professor Ward.) Nature's remedy is direct and comparativly inefficient, and produces only effects not greater than the cause, so to speak. The indirect method is art, invention, superadded to nature, nature's forces controled by invention. The natural savage man attempts ends by direct means, by brute force. He is on the road to becoming an artificial and civilized man when he invents a canoe, etc., and becomes an artist, and thus adopts the indirect method of crossing the river or navigating the ocean. From the canoe to the steamship, the bow and arrow to the Krupp gun, the wheelbarrow to the locomotiv and railroad train, the stone ax to the most improved machinery; from the sickle to the reaper, the flail to the threshing machine; the telescope, microscope, spectroscope, and their wonderful revelations—all come from art, invention. Nature givs us the power of steam, but invention and art giv us the steam engin and the indirect method. The savage becomes civilized, then, through invention, and art, and the indirect method.

Now, besides this physical world and its natural laws, where invention and art hav done so much, there is this human world—the mental, spiritual, soul or psychic, and social world—with its phenomena and laws, where invention and art, by way of rational control, hav done so little, almost nothing, as yet, and where the unreflecting and undeveloped class, above described, do not yet conceive or concede the desirability or possibility of any such rational control, and who, accordingly, hav been practicing, and would so continue (if not themselvs controled), the direct natural "brute force" method by which so little has been or can be accomplished. For, in this matter of charity now before us, they act from instinct, from sympathy, by impulse, by reflex action and not from reflection, and so their charity is direct or emotional charity, and not rational charity. The psychic forces, social forces, impulsiv forces, may be, and are to be, rationally controled, as are the physical forces. Nature's method is here, as elsewhere, the direct and "brute force" method, and life has been an open struggle; in lower life there are no rights or duties. Our present system of industry, from a moral or social standpoint, is the direct, "brute force," coerciv method. Direct charity is of this character. Sympathy is impulsiv force like hunger or lust. Even religious or moral persuasion fails to reform the world. And so, this other class (the developed), also above described, seeing all this, are essaying to apply the rational method also among these higher laws and phenomena, and to deliberativly organize charity, not only as a part of their duty to their less fortunate fellows, but for their own interest, their own salvation.

Count Rumford, who was the first to apply the rational method to the abolition of pauperism and the matter of charity, and who actually succeeded in its abolition in Bavaria, where he was afforded an opportunity, has set an example of public spirit which has been in part attempted to be followed in England and, more recently, in this country,* for which we ought to hold him in high esteem and tender to his memory our lasting gratitude. We, too, should be proud of him as an American citizen, as he was. As such he was plain Mr. Thomson. The little kingdom of Bavaria was being almost swamped by pauperism when Mr. Thomson undertook to treat it, and the king was so well pleased with his success and his public spirit that he conferred upon him the above title.

The writer, after twenty years of observation, study, and assisting in experimenting, trying to learn of and to understand all the advanced schemes, projects, and propositions relativ to labor, industrial, and social reform, is now of the conviction that this inspiration, this movement in the direction of organized charity, "scientific charity," if consistently, logically, and persistently carried out, is calculated to do more for the immediate need of society than is any other movement now known to him. Meantime, it will, of course, be inferred, from what has preceded, that he holds the cause of pauperism, and largely of crime, to lie in the want of the proper organization of industry, of scientific industry, scientific from an economic, social, or moral standpoint; that is, in the want of the rational control of the selfish instincts or forces—selfishness, pride, vanity, sexual appetite, ambition, etc.; of the emotional impulsiv forces—love, hate, fear, hope, despair, veneration, benevolence, malevolence, sympathy, etc.—and of the psychic and social forces; the rational control, through invention and art, of the physical forces being already attained sufficient for the complete abolition and prevention of pauperism. The degree of public spirit manifested in this movement shows a recognition, by those taking part in it, of the solidarity of society and of the conception or fact that society is an organism, a social organism, as the individual man is an animal organism, with its organs and systems of organs and their functions, the health, balance, welfare, and perfect condition of which are absolutely essential to the health, welfare, etc., of the organism itself, and that therefore every part or organ, every class of persons—nay, every individual cell of this social organism—must be in health and harmony with its fellows, else the organism itself cannot be sound and healthy; and contrariwise, if the organism is not well-conditioned, its parts, or any one of them, cannot be. Who, then, that has arrived at even an "enlightened self-interest" degree of development and culture would not join in this movement? Public spirit has a conscience or moral intelligence that concerns itself about relations of humanity—human needs and human wants, and in righteousness. Moral progress in society is correlated with scientific method. Leisure comes from work, reflection from leisure, science from reflection; therefore civilization comes from work,

'Till each man finds his own in all men's good,
And all men work in noble brotherhood.

The more we concern ourselvs in truth and duty, the more we will convince our fellows that

This world is full of beauty
As that other world above,
And if man would do his duty
It might be full of love.

There is nothing to which the whole of this brief essay is more applicable than to scientific, and therefore artistic, currency reform (as one means of abolishing pauperism and of organizing industry), especially that phase of it now up before the world, and known as International Bimetalism.

By "reflection" it may be seen that I hav practiced while I hav preached the "indirect method."

W. M. BOUCHER.

* An indirect argument (among other things) to persuade people to join in the work of scientific monetary reform, particularly that phase of it now called "International Bimetalism."

† Public spirit is allied with—when not the same as—the spirit of such men, sentiments, and accomplishments.

* No special reference is here made to the so-called "Charities Organization" of this city. The writer has reason to believe that the originating managers of this particular affair do not at all appreciate the significance and importance of the scientific charity here advocated.

"Is your husband a Christian?" asked the minister. "I don't think so. He won't join the church." "That is very sad. Does he giv any reason for staying out of the fold?" "Yes. He's an official in the bank, and he says he can't afford to risk his reputation."

The Museums.

The following correspondence passed last week between Mayor Hewitt, chairman of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, and the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

To the Board of Estimate and Apportionment of the City of New York, Gentlemen: We desire to call your attention to a matter of public concern of which you hav control, hoping that you will do justice between the parties interested, who are, The People of New York and the Trustees of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the American Museum of Natural History. Our desire is that you will, as custodians of the money of New York, refuse to grant any further appropriations for the maintenance of the museums until they shall open their doors on Sundays. Our reason is, briefly, that it is unfair to the people to use their funds to support institutions from which they derive, practically, no benefit.

About two years ago a petition for Sunday opening was sent to the trustees of the museums containing about twelve thousand names, mostly those of our German citizens. Two years ago another petition was addressed to the same gentlemen bearing nearly ten thousand signatures of the representativ men of the city—statesmen, politicians, judges, police commissioners, district attorneys, lawyers, Congressmen, preachers, workingmen, employers—in short, all classes of enlightened citizens. The daily press of the city was almost unanimous in favor of the movement. At the last election, also, the Hon. George F. Langbein asked the votes of the citizens of the Seventh senatorial district for the reason that, when assemblyman, "he passed"—we quote from his circular—"the bill to compel the opening of the museums in Central Park on Sundays, and appropriating $20,000 a year for that purpose. This bill is now a law." And Senator Langbein adds: "This givs the poor man and his family, who work all the week, the enjoyment of the same benefits as the rich man in seeing the wonders and curiosities of these museums."

In spite of all this, however, these museums obstinately keep their doors closed on Sundays, the only day in the week when the laboring man can visit them.

We wish your honorable body would individually peruse the copies of the pamphlet we inclose to you, entitled: "The Museums in the Park. Why They Should be Open on Sundays." The arguments contained therein are, we believe, satisfactory to fair-minded men. By them you will see that two years ago the city was paying, in interest on bonds issued for the benefit of the museums and annual appropriations, $84,530. This has since been increased by several thousands of dollars necessary to pay interest on new bonds sold to enable the museums to make extensiv additions to the buildings. And the city is now paying over $100,000 annually to support two beneficent institutions which are rendered inaccessible to the people by a Puritanical obstinacy on the part of two or three prominent trustees. We appeal to you to right this gross injustice and to take such measures as shall either giv to the people what they pay for, or make those pay for the museums who enjoy them. If the museums are the private property of the trustees, let them support them. On the other hand, if the museums are the property of the people, they should be so managed that the people may reap the enjoyment to be derived from them. The buildings, at least, are the public's, and if the treasures therein are not, let them be removed, and museums under the exclusiv management of the city be organized. But we believe that some arrangement can be made with the present custodians of all the art-works the city owns when they find that you stand firm for fair play.

It is needless, we conceive, to enter upon elaborate argument as to the wisdom or unwisdom of this Sunday opening. That has been settled by the spirit of the time, the consensus of all liberal-minded men, and the benefits accruing from Sunday opening are acknowledged. New York is alone among great cities in having no museums of art accessible to the public upon the weekly rest-day. Even conservativ Philadelphia leads us in this moral reform, and Boston, Chicago, and other thriving cities hav long since passed Rip Van Winklian New York.

We ask you, therefore, to refuse further annual appropriations to these museums until their trustees shall obey the law and earn the subsidies they so eagerly receive.

REPLY.

Mayor's Office, New York, Dec. 16, 1887.

Eugene M. Macdonald, Esq., No. 28 Lafayette place, City:

Sir: I am in receipt of your favor of the 15th inst., asking me as chairman of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment to refrain from giving to the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the American Museum of Natural History any further appropriations for their support. You do not seem to be aware that the law in regard to these institutions is absolutely mandatory upon the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, who are required to appropriate $30,000 per annum for their support whether they are open on Sunday or not. Your request, therefore, is that the Board of Estimate and Apportionment shall disobey the law. As a good citizen, you will hardly expect public officers to refuse to do their duty. In regard to the opening of these museums on Sunday, I hav always insisted, with you, that they ought to be open, and as a trustee of the American Museum of Natural History I hav always voted for the proposition. My sincerity, therefore, will hardly be questioned by those who know the facts. You quote from Mr. Langbein a statement that the bill referred to by him compels the opening of the Central Park museums on Sundays. This statement is not correct. The bill referred to provides for an additional appropriation of $20,000, provided it is asked for by the museums, in which case the museums would be opened on Sundays. No such application, however, has been been made to the Board of Estimate and Apportionment. Therefore the condition to which you refer cannot be imposed upon the museums.

Yours respectfully,

Abram S. Hewitt, Mayor.

This seems to settle the matter so far as the municipal authorities are concerned. The city must go on appropriating $30,000 per year and paying interest on bonds to the tune of some $70,000, and the fanatical Mr. Jesup can hav his way in managing the museums. If New York city could govern itself this would soon be changed, for Mayor Hewitt and his colleagues on the Board of Estimate and Apportionment are, we believe, fully and energetically in favor of Sunday opening. But in this matter the rural deacon who gets elected by his church to the Assembly has more to say than the city officers, and more than the people who support the institutions named. That is one benefit accruing to New York from its present form of government.

We congratulate Mayor Hewitt upon the stand he, as mayor, and a trustee of one of the museums, has taken. It is worthy of the son-in-law of Peter Cooper, the philanthropist and heretic. And having got the city authorities on record, and knowing how impossible it is to influence Christian bigots like Jesup, whose vote seems to count more than all the other trustees of the museums, we advise those who desire to visit the museums on Sundays to first make a trip to Albany.

A Religion of Cruelty.

The advocates of Christianity claim for their religion that it is one of kindness and mercy. "God is love" is a text twice repeated by St. John, on which they delight to dwell. They preach divine goodness and tenderness, and insist that the highest development of these virtues upon earth is to be found in men where moral natures hav become most perfectly united to that of their divinity.

If "God is love," truly a strange record of his acts is that we meet with in the pages of the Bible which makes the assertion. A strange love it was which placed temptation in the path of those liable to err, and then barbarously punished their innocent descendants for all time because they fell. A strange love that sent his chosen people forth, a savage horde, among peaceful nations, to burn, to pillage, and destroy. A strange love that created man, knowing that sin would be a condition of his existence, yet attaching to it the penalty of everlasting torment.

If "God is love," in a wonderful way does he manifest it in his government of the world. We see it and feel it every day, every hour, of our lives. It is all around us and within us, that we may behold it, suffer by it, and worship it. By the couch of the sick, whose limbs are racked by pain, and lips parched in the agony of fever. By the grave over which the bereaved, the widow and the orphan, weep in vain. By the sad sea-wave, that seems mockingly to chant a dirge to the memory of dear ones lost beneath its surface. It is in the cell of the condemned, falsely condemned maybe, who watches the coming light as it steals through the iron bars of his prison, heralding the day that is to be his last. It is in the miserable hovel, where poverty makes life a burden. It is in the lonely chamber of many a just man who for his faithful adherence to honest principle is suffering for want of bread.

This is the love that Christianity offers us as the object of our adoration and imitation. This is to be our God and our model. No marvel if those who kneel at his altars become hardened in heart toward their fellow-creatures. No wonder if, instead of human kindness, mercy, and tenderness, we find among them Christian harshness, bitterness, and cruelty. We might expect it to be so, and it is so.

The man whose highest ambition and dearest hope is to win a place in heaven, where sorrow and pain are unknown, and from thence, gazing down upon a lake of fire, seeing there chained in eternal torments those who on earth comforted him in affliction, and relieved him in want, and seeing this to find in it a source of increased joy, has cast away the human love that should adorn every human breast, and placed between his heart and his fellow-men the cold, repelling armor of Christian cruelty.

Christianity is cruel, for it teaches its disciples to conform their natures to that of a cruel God. Men of naturally kind and gentle spirits hav sat in judgment on heretics, and condemned them to the stake. Such men sit in judgment on heretics to-day, and hav less pity for them than for a thief or murderer. If they cannot burn, they can ostracize; if they cannot stretch the body upon the rack, they can heap upon the head insult, abuse, and falsehood.

But it is not only the heretic and the Infidel that hav to suffer at their hands. "See how these Christians love one another." How the Christian employers cut down the wages of the Christian workman to the lowest point at which existence can be maintained. How the Christian ruler exercises his supremacy over a Christian people by depriving them of all the rights and privileges of manhood that might, by any possibility, prove a check to his authority. How the fat, sleek, well-fed Christian priest extorts from the hard earnings of his Christian dupes the means whereby he may enjoy increased luxury and ease. Then you may see how the worship of a cruel God hardens the heart of man.

There is yet a lower depth in the miry pit to which their religion drags them down. There is yet a meaner barbarism to which their barbarous deity has consigned them. There are on earth millions of creatures lower in the scale of intelligence, but sensitiv as we are. The God who commanded that these creatures should, merely for his own gratification, be slaughtered upon his altars, must take a savage joy in inflicting torment. The refinement of cruelty is exhibited in selecting the means of death most lingering and painful. And although as men became more civilized and gentle the God they imagined became so too, there is still enough of the old savage left in both to cause the beast, and bird, and fish many a bitter pang. If we hav made laws to protect animals, they are human laws, without foundation in canons of churches, or precepts of scripture. We once heard a very little child giv expression to the idea that it must be as great a sin to hurt a harmless beast as to inflict pain upon a man. His argument was that the beast was not such by his own selection. He was looked upon with horror by his elders, and told that there was a vast difference between a cat and a Christian. Roman Catholics teach that cruelty to animals is no sin, because God has given all the lower creatures to man for his own use, to do with them as he chose. It is to be discouraged, as tending to generate an unfeeling spirit which, becoming habitual, might be extended toward our fellow-Christians, but it is not in itself even a venial fault. It is not surprising that such teaching should bear its fruit. The innocent and helpless dumb brutes suffer worst treatment where the religion of Christ has most sway. From the Mohammedan and pagan people of the East they receive kindly consideration. Among the ultra-Christian peasantry of Italy and Ireland, they are tortured in a way calculated to chill the blood of the beholder. In the city of Rome, during the temporal power of the papacy, live geese were constantly carried about by pedlars of pens, who plucked a quill from their quivering limbs for every purchaser. In villages in the south of Ireland, where the man who missed attending mass on a Sunday or omitted his Easter confession and communion would be shunned as a leper, there is witnessed the most barbarous inhumanity practiced on helpless beasts. As nations become humanized out of their faith, they advance in the great quality of mercy to those beneath them. Bull-baitings, bear-baitings, cock and dog fights, were common sports when Christianity held the upper hand. Every blow that Infidelity has dealt it has been a blessing to the suffering animals. Only in the realms of his most Catholic and most juvenil majesty of Spain, and in priest-ridden Mexico, are bull-fights still common. Even in Rome, since it has become secularized, a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals has been established.

To help make this world happy, we must show kindness, mercy, and pity to all who dwell on it. Our fellow-men are entitled to all we can giv them, irrespectiv of their agreement or disagreement with our opinions in religion, politics, or any other matter. Our dumb neighbors must come in for their full share. If some must be slain for food, and others destroyed on account of their noxious or dangerous qualities, let us rather deplore the necessity than take pleasure in the act. Let us seek, as far as possible, to rob death of its attendant pains and terrors. Thus shall we cultivate and refine the true human spirit, and purge it from the savage propensities that hav been too long fostered by the worship of cruel Gods.

The Evangelical Alliance.

The Evangelical Alliance which met recently in Washington was a revelation to the country of the impractical but fanatical character of the Protestant clergy. The gist of the speeches made was that unless the people of this country submitted themselvs materially and spiritually, body and soul, legally and morally, to the Protestant wing of Christianity the nation would go direct to sheol, and that very soon. No more arrogant gathering has been held since the Council of Trent settled all past and future problems. The speakers seem possessed with the idea that in each individual paper could be found the sum of human wisdom and the philosophy which should tranquilize the world. Mr. William E. Dodge started in by saying:

"The times call for an applied Christianity that can meet all the needs and relations of man to man.

"Christian men understand that a religion worth the name must bring cheer into every home, hope into every life, bring into close touch and sympathy and mutual confidence all classes, must kill self-seeking and self-indulgences, and at any cost of time, money, or comfort, its followers must liv as Christ lived on earth, with the people and for the people."

Dr. Daniel Dorchester, of Boston, thus explained the source of evil:

"At least fifty-four per cent of the population of our fifty largest towns are foreigners of the first or second degree. There are, indeed, many who would be valuable material for any state, but making liberal allowance for these, the balance is heavily on the other side. They constitute the chief stronghold of political corruption, Socialism, Sabbath-breaking, and venomously Nihilistic aims."

Rev. J. M. Foster said:

"A Christian nation should hav a Christian government, and this would solve the immigration problem."

Simeon G. Baldwin said:

"I think the Greek and Roman, and ancient nations generally, were wisest in making the father the priest. In this respect the Roman Catholic church does better than others."

A voice: "I don't recognize it as a Christian church at all."

"I hav found in work I hav done in Connecticut in connection with Mr. Dike that the Catholic church has often given us most efficient help," responded Mr. Baldwin.

President Donge said:

"The Alliance has always co-operated heartily with the Catholic church for all that is good, although it has been obliged to protest against the ultramontane attack upon our public schools."

Rev. Dr. MacArthur said:

"The time is fast approaching when the advocates of the saloon will be ostracized from good society. They will be obliged to form a political party of their own, and the popular vote will be a political power that will crush them as soon as united action is taken by the best classes of our citizens."

President Angell said:

"It has been unjustly charged that the church is not a friend to the poor. Facts show her to be their best friend.

"The church is a mediator and teacher to rebuke the oppressor and instruct the laboring classes."

Ex-Mayor Low of Brooklyn said:

"Pools and trusts do not aim at the benefit of labor, but of stockholders, and they should not wonder at the hostility of labor and of society at large. There is here a great opportunity for the church to act as a mediator."

The Rev. Dr. Storrs said:

"I do not think there is any reason for thinking that Christianity has not divine and divinely directed resources adequate for the emergency. The great thing needed is to gather up and concentrate our power. This is an old and a wholly practical counsel. Every great political, social, and religious enterprise demands such coöperation. It is needed to keep us devoted, courageous, hopeful. The isolated are apt to become moody and acrid. The whole is greater than the sum of its parts in all warfare, and preëminently so in warfare for Christ."

Bishop Harris said:

"The Bible, the Sabbath, and liberty of conscience must be defended, with Christ as our leader indeed, but with our own activ coöperation as well, or we shall go the way of other nations whose early history has been fair and promising. We would be cowards and traitors if we did not recognize and fight the old but now freshly awakened forces of public and social disorder."

The Rev. Washington Gladden said:

"We must recognize the peril to our industries and to the government if the present widespread discontent develops into Anarchism. We must throttle that by law, but we must use prevention to keep it from coming to that. The unreasonable demands of the workingman must be, as far as possible, modified by reason and love, and this only the church can do successfully."

After getting off these smart sentences the Alliance adjourned to the White House and told President Cleveland how deeply affectionate was the regard of the Protestent clergy for him and his beautiful wife, and urged him to coöperate with the Alliance in the cause of Christianity. The president proved himself equal to the hypocritical occasion, and said:

"I am glad to meet so large a delegation from the Evangelical Alliance of the United States. I understand the purpose of this Alliance to be the application of Christian rules of conduct to the problems and exigencies of social and political life. Such a movement cannot fail to produce the most valuable results. All must admit that the reception of the teachings of Christianity results in the purest patriotism, in the most scrupulous fidelity to public trust, and in the best type of citizenship. Those who manage the affairs of government are by this means reminded that the law of God demands that they should be courageously true to the interests of the people, and that the ruler of the universe will require of them a strict account of their stewardship. The people, too, are thus taught that their happiness and welfare will be best promoted by a conscientious regard for the interest of a common brotherhood, and that the success of a government by the people depends upon the morality, the justice, and the honesty of the people. Your noble mission, if undertaken in a broad and generous spirit, will surely arrest the attention and respectful consideration of your fellow-citizens; and your endeavors, consecrated by benevolence and patriotic love, must exert a powerful influence in the enlightenment and improvement of our people, in illustrating the strength and stability of our institutions, and in advancing the prosperity and greatness of our beloved land."

And then the members of the Alliance went home satisfied that they were the saints of the Lord, to whom belongs the earth and its fulness.

Sauce for the Goose is Not Sauce for the Gander.

The Rev. Justin D. Fulton, Baptist, formerly of Brooklyn, has written a book which he entitles, "Why Priests Should Wed." It purports to be an exposure of the infamies of convents and the confessional, and relates many noxious facts. The Rand-Avery Printing Co., of Boston, undertook to print it, but when the copy was given out to female compositors they refused to work upon it, and the Rand-Avery Company stopped work and notified the Rev. Mr. Fulton that they did not publish obscene books. This made Mr. Fulton angry, and he wrote to his friend Anthony Comstock. Mr. Comstock thereupon writes him in reply that, after an examination of the book, he believes Dr. Fulton's motivs and intentions absolutely honest and right, and that the facts collected are absolutely true, supported by living witnesses.

Now, we want to know what right Mr. Comstock has to take into account Mr. Fulton's motivs or intentions in judging of his book? Every United States court into which Comstock has inveigled a victim has decided that the intentions of authors are not to be considered by juries. No expert testimony has ever been allowed. D. M. Bennett, E. H. Heywood, and others hav been sent to prison in this way. Judge Paul, who tried Mrs. Slenker, would not allow her intentions to be weighed. The jury could only consider whether the "tendency of the matter is to deprave and corrupt the morals of those whose minds are open to such influence, and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall. It is within the law if it would suggest impure and libidinous thoughts in the young and the inexperienced." So ruled Judge Benedict, and he has been followed by all the rest. Now, if an exposé of the Romish confessional, written by a sensational and prejudiced Protestant preacher, will not excite libidinous thoughts in the young, we do not know what will, unless it be the Old Testament! We are willing to grant that Comstock is an expert in obscenity, though deplorably ignorant of general literature, and he undoubtedly knows the rulings of the courts. His letter to Fulton, then, exposes to the public his arrogant assumption of the office of literary censor, and his high and mighty character. His religious friends can print all the obscenity they want to, provided their motivs are good, but heretical writers and artists must not write valuable treatises nor exhibit classic pictures in which a word or painted line may possibly offend the good Saint Anthony! That is the sum and substance of his "decision."

If the general public like this sort of thing, it is just the sort of thing the general public ought to hav. But for one, we desire to enter an indignant protest against allowing Anthony Comstock, or any one else, to exercise this irresponsible power.

THE Sun of this city tells this joke on our esteemed Spiritual contemporary: "Luther Colby, the veteran editor of the Banner of Light, the oldest journal devoted to Spiritualism in this country, has recently spent several days in New York. Mr. Colby is a medium, and his attendant ghost is one Ocean Brave, a very large, powerful, but invisible Indian. Last Sunday morning an ex-judge, well known in New York, called on Mr. Colby at his hotel, and found him sitting on his bed in an apparently disturbed state of mind. 'I can't go out to-day, judge; impossible,' said Mr. Colby. 'What's the matter?' inquired the judge. 'Matter! Why, Ocean Brave has been up to his old tricks. He has stolen my vest again, and it's the second time.' Then Mr. Colby arose with a woebegone expression on his countenance—he bears a striking resemblance to the best likeness extant of Mr. Pickwick—and began to search through the bed-clothes for his lost vest. He turned down the blankets, shook out the sheets, looked under the mattress, but found no vest. Then he grew wrathy, and, shaking his fist at the point in empty space where Ocean Brave was supposed to be, cried out: 'D—n you, Ocean Brave! tell me where that vest is, or I'll never speak to you again.' Then he went to the bureau and pulled out every drawer, and pushed each one back with a bang. He searched under the wash-bowl and through a small closet. No vest. Then he sat down in a very sad sort of way and said: 'Judge, it's no use. I can't go out to-day. This is the meanest trick he has served me.' Once more Mr. Colby clenched his fist and shook it in close proximity to the place where the face of the playful Indian was supposed to be. 'Now, then, Ocean Brave,' said he, 'I giv you fair warning. Tell me at once where that vest is, or you and I part company forever.' A moment of intense expectancy, and then upon the face of the editor of the Banner of Light there slowly dawned the light of a broad smile. The smile was gradually eclipsed by the gentle withdrawal of Mr. Colby's shirt. The vest was there, put on over the undershirt, and all nicely buttoned up. 'I knew I could make him tell,' said Colby."

Letters from Friends.

HAVANA, ILL., Nov. 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Having taken your valuable paper now over a year, allow me to say that I am well pleased with it, and the longer I take it the more I like it. I am glad we hav a man strong enough in principle and energy to show up the untruthfulness of Christianity. It takes a man that has respect for the truth and right, and my wish is that you may long liv to edit the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. And I hope Mr. Heston's store-house of pictures will never be exhausted. Was glad to hear Aunt Elmina is free again.

Yours, J. A. WEABER.

OPHIR, CAL., Dec. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav neither the education nor the command of words to explain my feelings in regard to the Chicago tragedy which came to pass on the 11th of November last. I do not side in with Anarchy, but I do say that all people are entitled to justice, regardless of religious opinions, and that free speech should be better protected from Comstockism than it is at the present time. It appears to me as if Governor Oglesby has taken items or advice from the silent counselor, the Bible, in Deut. xiii, 6-9, and 2 Sam. xxi, 1-9, in regard to these helpless victims. We out here in California hav our opinion of such a governor, and especially of such a sheriff, who would not allow the condemned men a word from the gallows to their fellow-beings. It seems as though this was a step into despotism and intolerance instead of justice and humanity. I hope the time may soon come when justice and humanity will rule, instead of a Bible of intolerance and a persecuting God to do the ruling. Long may the grand old TRUTH SEEKER liv, for the grand work it is doing. And a Happy New Year to Watson Heston.

LEWIS KAISER.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., Dec. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I send amount to pay up to first of January, 1889. It has been a long time since I wrote a letter to the good old TRUTH SEEKER, one of the best papers ever published. The illustrations are immense, as they convey instruction to the student of history and theology—a little too much for the health of the latter. There are many thoughts bolting into my mind that I would be glad to write, but, for want of time, must desist. I hav been of the opinion all the time that you take a proper view of the Anarchists' case. They were simply murdered.

We need not claim to hav a good government as long as capital punishment exists. There is nothing humane in taking the life of our fellow-being.

It is very interesting to read the travels of our Brothers Putnam and Reynolds; and as for Brothers Bell, Andrew, and Remsburg, I hav had the pleasure to hav them with us in times past, and those who cannot enjoy such company are not fit for this world; and if there should happen to be a future, they would be a poor acquisition over there.

WM. A. THOMPSON.

ABILENE, KAN., Nov. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: This is the worst priest-ridden town in the state. There are some few Liberals here, but, with one or two exceptions, they dare not say their soul is their own. I see that in other towns they hav societies for the promotion of Freethought and hav lecturers visit them. There are Putnam, and Reynolds, and Remsburg, and several others who are making things red-hot in other towns. Why can't some of them come here and giv the old ship of Zion a shot or two? I had a letter from Remsburg some time ago, but had to be away from home at that time, and I would not hav known how to go to work to start the ball rolling if I had been here.

Will you please tell us how to start things along? There is nothing here but "Jesus! Jesus!"—three or four meetings hallooing every night in the week.

The Salvation Army has been in full blast for five or six months and no let up to it, and, last but not least, the Free Methodists hav opened up in the next room to me, and it makes me tired. Please to show us how to start something else, if it is only a Punch and Judy show—anything for a change. Every man has a preacher a-straddle of his neck.

Yours truly, A. G. ELLSWORTH.

GLENS FALLS, N. Y., Nov. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to ask our Materialist friends if evolution, after toiling for millions of years to bring us up to where we just begin to understand a little something, is going to stop short in her work long enough to drop us out of existence. If so, I think the whole business is the most useless work that can be imagined, the most stupendous nonsense that can be conceived. I think it would need a deity to hatch up anything so perfectly useless, so perfectly horrible, as to bring living beings into life to suffer as man and beast both hav to for a term of years, and then hav it end there. There is no language that I can use to express my contempt, if that is the case, when I think what I hav been through—and my case is mild compared with millions of others. A cyclone of suffering, of sorrow, and despair, and then let it end there, with no redress, only go to sleep and forget it! If that is all there is for me, I am afraid I shall be a blasphemer. And even that privilege will be denied me, I presume. Wall, so mote it be.

I am for knowledge, justice, truth, and mercy to all the human race; no putting anyone to death. Let nature do her own work; let barbarism be done away with; let the whole human race learn to be brothers and sisters, and love and care for each other, is the wish of Your unworthy servant, C. C. HOLCOMB.

P.S.—Before the human race reaches better conditions, I think they will hav to learn to stop eating flesh of beasts. That keeps us savage and brutal toward everything. There are no wild beasts that ever destroyed each other as the human race hav their kind. The reason why is because we eat flesh and keep up the fiendish nature that is born in us. H.

EATON RAPIDS, MICH., Dec. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Seeing in your last paper the letter of the Silverton Secular Society reminded me that ours should be noticed through your columns.

While C. B. Reynolds was here last March he organized such an association at our place, to be known as the Eaton Rapids (Mich.) Secular Society. He said to us that our first two months would be the hardest part of our work, but, thanks to him and the good members, we hav a society that we are proud of. We meet every two weeks, at 2 o'clock Sunday afternoons, at the homes of the members; hav readings, lectures, and good singing, also short speeches. We hav one dozen singing-books, "The Song Greeting," and as we hav two singing teachers we hav plenty of music.

Last Sunday we met at the pleasant home of Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Potter, and had a pleasant time. The Baptist minister of our place was in attendance (he is one of the ones that can see good among Liberals), and gave us a few minutes' speech; said he thought honest and earnest men and women were a good in society, and we seemed to be such; gave us good cheer, and hoped we would prosper in our gatherings. Now, I call this a good sign of the times.

We hav a roll-call of the members, and nearly everyone responds with a good quotation; last Sunday one little eight-year-old member responded with this, "The schoolhouse is my cathedral."

Sunday, December 18th, we meet at W. S. Henderson's, on Broad street, and we anticipate a good time.

The 29th of January next they will meet at A. Atwood's, Plain street. As this will be the birthday of one of our pioneers of Freethought we want to make it a day to be remembered; and I will say that the many readers of this letter are invited to be present, and especially Mrs. A. E. N. Rich, of Jackson, if this letter should fall in her hands. We would love to hear one of her beautiful poems recited at that time. Now, this is an invitation to all those within a hundred miles of Eaton Rapids. Yours truly, MRS. R. E. ATWOOD,
Sec. E. R. Sec. Society.

KENT, O., Dec. 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In answer to J. K. Magie, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 3d, allow me to say that I feel obliged for his statements, as every lover of the truth wishes to hear both sides of a question. I think, however, the brother is a little off in some of his conclusions. I am only fifty years old, never edited a newspaper, nor gained a residence in Chicago, but I was there on business from March until July, during all the strike and Haymarket trouble. I was on the square or near it nearly every day while there, saw the crowd, the class of people, etc., but did not hear any speeches. If all who advocated the taking of the law into their own hands were Anarchists, there must hav been many times the number mentioned by my friend Magie. I saw a red flag mysteriously make its appearance in a shop where I was getting work done.

As I understand the law, it is not necessary for a man to be guilty of either making or throwing a bomb himself, but to advocate and advise the same makes him equally guilty with the more brave man (forgiv the term used) who does so throw it. Then the question is, Did the convicted Anarchists so advise? Not taking Webster to define Anarchy, but circulars now before me from Anarchists themselvs, I read: "What is Anarchy? Answer: It is a state of society wherein no one interferes with the action of his neighbors; where liberty is untrammeled by law; where license does not exist; where force is not the regulator of actions." It then goes on to show that no man should be held subject to law.

Consequently, as the Chicago convicts did not deny being Anarchists, and even hurrahed for Anarchy on the gallows, we know they must believe in doing away with law. But as there has already been much said pro and con about this affair, I do not wish to take up space in our valuable TRUTH SEEKER, but will say that without doubt the clergy, and especially Catholicism, had much to do in tampering with justice. I am glad Brother Magie is not one of the Anarchists (although they hav some good ideas), but an advocate of Freethought. I hope to liv to see the people so educated that we may not wish to break or do away with any law on our statutes, but until such time I for one shall say, disobey none of the laws of our noble country, but make better laws as fast as possible. The creator of all things works by laws, and takes time to perfect everything that is created, and can man do any better? A. D. SWAN.

KANKAKEE, ILL., Nov. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: During the last twenty years I hav been reading the Bible, and I find so many difficulties coming up in every direction that I would be glad to find some person that could giv me a key that would unlock the mysteries in reading the so-called holy Bible. If I call on an orthodox Christian, he will ask me if I believe the Bible to be the inspired word of God. I tell him that I cannot believe that it is inspired. Then he tells me that he does not want to talk with me on this subject. I came into my office this Sabbath morning and commenced reading of an act of this Holy Ghost as recorded in the Bible that shows him up in a bad light to me. We read that a sin committed against the father or against the son can be forgiven in this world, but that a sin committed against the Holy Ghost cannot be forgiven in this world or the world to come, and no man can tell you what this sin is. He wants you to go it blind through this life, so that he can hav the exquisit pleasure of giving you hell in the next world. We hav had a few in our asylum insane that believed that they had committed this sin, and now there was no hope for them. All persons that really believe this doctrin will be sent to the asylum. Will some good Christian be kind enough to name some good acts that this Holy Ghost has done for humanity, if he knows of any?

We read in the Bible that Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are all one. Then I would like to know how the killing of Jesus affected the other two. How are we to understand the language Jesus used, if the three are all one, when he said, "O father! if it be possible let this cup pass. But not mine, but thy will be done," showing clearly they had two wills? The holy record says, Matt. i, 20: "Thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife, for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost." Then I would like to ask some one to explain to me why Jesus is called God's only son, if he was the son of the Holy Ghost. Ministers hav told me that I must read it in this way: Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, all being one, overshadowed the Virgin Mary, and Jesus was the result. Then I hav to believe that Jesus was his own father. Now, if these things hav a spiritual meaning, please giv us the spiritual. Fraternally, H. S. HALL.

CLEVELAND, O., Nov. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Without any thought as to the guilt or innocence of Mrs. Slenker, I am constrained to take issue with one of your editorial comments on her trial. Why should any judge take a case from the jury? I am aware it is frequently done. Lately in this city a judge in a damage suit brought by a poor man against a rich company took such action, giving verdict in favor of the company. I know nothing as to the merits of the case, but the principle is wrong.

So in a great many other cases where the people think their rights are safe, even the poorest, they are mistaken. Take, for instance, our homestead exemption laws, lien laws, etc.—what value are half of them without legislators and judges who do not play into the hands of monopoly to nullify them? Take, for instance, a poor man who finds himself unable to meet his obligations; he finds on coming to settle up that his creditors can take his home from him without any trouble. The note he signs always contains a clause something like this: "We hereby waive all homestead and exemption laws whatever," etc. Of course, a man might refuse to sign such a note, but would find it hard work to get any credit if he did not. All blanks (in this state, at least) hav it printed on them in small type. If a man can sign away his rights and courts sanction it as legal, what guarantee of justice are they? In his distress he will sign them. Our usury laws also come under the same condemnation. Anyone wishing to borrow a hundred dollars pays, so the note says, six per cent—in reality, twenty-five to thirty; frequently fifty per cent—interest. The way it is done is probably too well known to need illustration, yet there are some people who go blindly along—like Christians—taking everything for granted that they are brought up to believe; they never learn till they are bit. They read the face of the law, but don't go behind the returns. They bear not one another's burdens. If they hav to take a hand at carrying some time, they may wish they had, especially when they would hav had to only exert a little mental work for the enlightenment of their fellow-beings, and their fellow-voters in particular; for what is the use of voting men into office that they may be enforcers of laws that they secretly hate and sneer at?

This is a discursiv letter, so let me air some more of my ideas. I wonder what is the Bible meaning of usury, and if ministers and their congregations know or care. Do they know when, where, and how it became changed from its primitiv meaning? I wonder how long the authorities and the press will watch and publish records of Knights of Labor assemblies and their constitutions, and let the Knights of St. John go, an armed treasonable organization.

And I wonder how long it will be before people get enough intelligence into them to know that a logical statement does not need the backing of a good character. This last idea is because the mass of fools, when you are dutifully trying to do your duty by beating some sense into their heads about religion or politics, if you giv a quotation from what they think a suspicious source, will say, "Oh, that's nothing, for that man was such and such a man." If it was a matter of veracity, there would be some sense in their usual objection.

How can this letter be better brought to a close (though I hav not said half that I would wish to) than by expressing my delight that our three principal newsdealers now keep THE TRUTH SEEKER on sale, and to find that my home town contains so able a Freethinker as John P. Guild, whose able letter in your paper gave me much delight? M. F. G.

CHICAGO, ILL., Dec. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: To A. D. Swan, Kent, O., I wish to extend the right hand of fellowship. He voices my sentiments most admirably.

The object of this letter is to enter a vigorous protest against the teaching and preaching of Anarchism in the rooms of the Chicago Secular Union.

Some two or three weeks ago, Mr. Wallace, of Abingdon, Ill., delivered a lecture on the usury system, which was a clear, forcible, and logical lecture, instructiv and highly entertaining. Mr. Wallace is a fluent speaker, and handles this subject in a masterly manner, and, I judge, has made it a study for years, and is perfectly honest and consistent in his views.

Thus much for the lecture and the lecturer. To certain of the critics I beg to take exception. One critic jumped to his feet, and, with a wild flourish of arms, blurted out that he was straight on the road to the gallows—to which I heartily applauded, "Godspeed!" Among the thousand and one brainless remarks he made was this, that "this government was the most tyrannical of any government on the face of the earth." I brand that as an infamous lie, and a libel on the intelligence of the members that compose the Chicago Secular Union. To this kind of blatant, brainless bunkum I, for one, object. Are we to confine ourselvs to the Nine Demands of Liberalism, or are we to use them as a cloak to cover, foster, and encourage the villainous doctrins of Anarchism? If so, I want to know it. I believe the Nine Demands to be broad enough and grand enough that every Liberal in the land can take an infinit pride in claiming them as his platform. If Anarchism is to be taught in the Chicago Secular Union, I predict for it a short life. Anarchism has ruined every organization that has been contaminated by its slimy touch.

The Henry George movement in New York that two years ago rolled up a grand total of 68,000 votes has fallen away to one-half that number. That noble organization, the Knights of Labor, that at one time could proudly show a membership roll of 700,000 names, has dwindled down to a comparativly small order. And just as surely as that infernal doctrin, the acme of madness, the consummation of all that is wild, visionary, and villainous, the doctrin of Anarchism, obtains a foothold in the Chicago Secular Union, just so surely will that Union be torn asunder and disgraced.

Yours for all true Liberal principles, LIBERAL.

ORANGE CITY, IA., NOV. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please to find the sum of $3, for which send me your paper one year. I hav been taking it two years from a news-stand, but it seems that my Infidel paper never came on time, although the others did, and I suspected that the administration might be Christian. Well, I suppose it will come correctly now, if Comstock does not jerk you up for sending out lewd, obscene, or objectionable matter through the mail.

In all your attacks on various sects it seems to me that you never struck a blow at the Dutch Reformed church, and of all the sects I hav met I think them almost the worst, the Roman Catholic pest excepted. Here in this settlement of Hollanders we are favored with seven churches in which the Dutch Reformed Lord is addressed in the Holland language, and one where he seems be more civilized, and to hav got up to common English. This church acts as an immigration society, and you can understand what class they bring over—only the worst religious dregs. Ever since 1871 hav I lived among my countrymen in the United States, but must own that, taking them as a specimen of the people, I hav been ashamed that I was a Dutchman.

I hav admired your brave championship of personal rights and liberty in the Anarchists' case; and hav been much surprised that, in this so-called free country, none of the secular papers dared to speak what was right. However, in our civilization money is every time considered of more account than life, and that probably is the solution.

LEXINGTON, KY., NOV. 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: "Gaih," of the Cincinnati Enquirer, remarks that a "consensus of the competent" can be trusted to arrange matters for the people. Does he remember how long Samuel Adams pondered over the adoption of the federal Constitution, his profound judgment perplexed and unable to arrive at any decision? A glorious farmer, Jonathan Smith, gave his opinion, and the famous meeting at the Green Dragon tavern took place, where the question was discussed by workingmen, shipwrights, brass-founders, and mechanics. Matters then seemed to take a solid shape, and Samuel Adams was heard to say that the mass of the people understood their own interests. Thus the affair reached a speedy conclusion. Bold men were they, who believed that they could fashion and improve a government. They had good lungs, and were able to breathe the air of freedom.

We hav lately listened to fine discourses in the Catholic church in this place. The priests here hav a great and well-deserved reputation for piety and good works. Father Ward presented an able exposition of the doctrin of the real presence of Christ in the sacrament. Knowing that religious arguments would not sustain him, he planted himself on Materialistic ground, or rather, over the gulf that separates soul from sense. But as this has never been bridged—that is, we hear, we know not how; we see, we know not how, therefore we are required to believe that Christ's body is changed into bread, though the modus operandi cannot be made clear to us. Not to put too fine a point to it, a reductio ad absurdam is all that is left of Father Ward's fine-spun argument.

People are beginning to shun the Prohibitionists, and substitute simple temperance lectures. Miss Huffman has lately addressed us, a graceful lady and fluent speaker. She throws the whole work of reform into the hands of church-members, and secondly, complains that they are inefficient and not reliable, giving offices to liquor-dealers. What a charming statesman she would make! I think I could do better myself, for I know that most Infidels would keep their promises. The Christian heaven may be made of adamant and gold, but I prefer common sense and common humanity.

There is a feeble reason that outweighs all the grand arguments adduced in support of Christianity; that causes the learned to forget the rigid logic used on other occasions; that induces thousands to make long faces when total depravity is mentioned; that causes them to forget how shabby they look, kneeling, entreating God to transfer them to a beautiful place, when he makes up his jewels; that induces them to pray for rain, also that God will cure the small-pox and yellow fever, and save them from earthquakes while they are sinking into the bowels of the earth; that causes a widow to fling her soul into the arms of God (but the bank is the only sacred place where her money can be trusted, and then she only asks, "Are they honest men?"). What is it that makes a man a martyr to the church, the priest, the Bible; that makes the ashes of penitence, the dust of humility, the whine of the exhorter, the chant, the sermon, exercise a power over all his actions, faculties, and emotions? Why is the world given up to an assortment of notions discountenanced by reason, though placed often by the wise above sense and judgment? Why is religion a sort of ghoul that deadens with a spell all our better feelings? Why, oh, why? It is because the poor, mistaken mother puts this diabolical system of chicanery into the lullaby rhyme to soothe our slumbers; because before we were seven years old we were lost to common sense, decent regard for the truth; made to swallow the vilest poisons, sugar-coated.

No one will deny that the government does not manifest sufficient interest in education, which, of course, is all that saves the nation. It is a crime to withhold the money, allowing babes to work in factories. They should also be taught the principles of strict justice, for it is well known that unfair trials hav become a feature of the age; the judge being the man who should be condemned by the clergymen, for it is their business to improve the spirit of the law, and they hav the power to do this. Broad is the road that leads to the court of the Star Chamber.

Awake! arise! or be forever fallen!

ALHAZA.

CLEOPATRA, MO., DEC. 5, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I want to say, first to all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, then to all the world of humanity, that I am still coursing along the wave-washed shores of human wants and human woes. But I realize that I am failing; that I can not so readily reinforce my liberty-loving friends in their struggles against error's legions and bloated tyrants. Twenty-six years ago I was among people who sold women and children, and for the crime of saying it was wrong Christians spit in my face, saying, "You are a —— Abolitionist," with threats of tar and feathers and rope. Then I was able to go for them for four years. Years since that I hav met some of those Christians, and they would say they were heartily ashamed of their treatment to me. I hav often wondered why their God that they brag of as all wisdom and knowledge and power, ever present, could not giv them a better understanding of their relations to creatures like themselvs. But on investigation I hav found they were and are just like the God they worship, cruel, revengeful, and tyrannical. Truly, as friend Putnam says, the more Gods we hav the more woes we hav to combat. Oh, I so often think that you all can't help but say: What heathens we are, that we must hav a government that we must fight for, or about! What kind of government hav we that we should treat each other so about our government? Alas! are we not worse than the heathen? What should we all say now? 1887 has given us large experience. We hav had time in which to sum up testimony and the ruling of courts—to view the field of political and Christian tyranny.

I see the Chicago Interocean says Illinois has fourteen thousand convicts at Joliet, and on the 24th of November their chaplain ministered to them pretty much all the forenoon spiritual things; then came what the reporter called the substantial in the way of turkeys. And what a grand time they had with their convicts, and how they all rejoiced, I thought. Then I looked over again, and thought, there is one class of convicts bragging about how successful they were to take care of another class of convicts. Well, my friends, it is wrong to teach these intellectual children that the innocent must die to save the guilty. Yet we hire some seventy-eight thousand such teachers in our nation to instil into undeveloped minds and children that a perfect man-God, innocent, had to be put to death to save the guilty. Contrast such teaching with the teaching of so-called heathen nations and see if it suffers by the comparison. Oh! let us all say that such teaching is enough to bring the blush of shame on the cheek of the darkest heathen that ever lived.

I don't mind doing and working toward something better, but it is so hard to hav to wait. J. W. DAY.

BRATTLEBORO, VT., NOV. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3. For one, I am particularly pleased to know that the illustrations are to be continued in THE TRUTH SEEKER. They are more potent than words. Let the good work go on. Do not falter. The wheels of progress cannot be blocked. Science is doing more to civilize the world than all the religions ever invented. Why, had Edison been alive one hundred, or even fifty years ago, and been able to do with electricity what he can to-day, he would hav suffered death either at the stake or on the gibbet, but, thanks to the general prevalence of Freethought, free schools, and a free press, that is impossible just at the present time. Still, there are other dangers to be considered, and, speaking from observation and personal experience, I should say that politics and religion are somewhat to be feared, from the fact that the clergy and politicians are mutually agreed so far as their own interests are concerned. Your editorial, "Giv Thanks," in a recent number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, is timely, and "hits the nail square on the head." It ought to be read by every minister in the land, for what more foolish customs are there than the observance of the two days commonly called Fast Day and Thanksgiving, when people are requested by the politicians and the clergy to starve on the former day and make gluttons of themselvs on the latter? Of the two days, however, poor people can better observe the first, for they can fast on that day more easily than they can "eat, drink, and be merry" on the other. Thanksgiving Day, or a day for thanks-giving and praise to the almighty, so-called, is an unmitigated humbug and an imposition on sensible people who hav outgrown priestly dictation and puritanical tyranny and superstition. As a day, however, for family reunion it is all well enough, but the silly, childish, heathenish idea that we are under any obligations to some imaginary up-in-the-air being for turkey, cranberry sauce, chicken pie, plum-pudding, etc., is the hight of absurdity itself; for who ever knew the Christian's God to provide a free dinner for poor people or anyone else? Poor folks go hungry that day the same as on other days. What hav they, then, to be thankful for? Through the efforts of the clergy and a few women, Thanksgiving has become a national holiday, and the sky-pilots can well afford to belch wind to their imaginary God for giving them the dupes necessary to carry out their imbecil plans. In lieu of Thanksgiving Day, I would suggest a day to be called Family Reunion Day—a day for the assembling of relativs and friends at home—for the purpose of visiting and talking over old times with those most dear to us. In order, also, to make it a day of comfort and joy, I would hav all the long-faced go-to-hell-sure ministers excluded, as their unwelcome presence would only cause a depression of spirits, and seriously interfere with the appetites of those lotting on a good square meal. Yours, etc., A. L. FRISBIE.

NIDGETOWN, ONT., DEC. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Charles Watts, editor Secular Thought, Toronto, delivered three lectures in the Opera Hall at this place on the evenings of Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of the present week, the subjects being, "Secularism, Destructiv and Constructiv," "Unbelief: What It Is and What It Has Done," and, "Thomas Paine, the Political and Religious Reformer."

To your readers who hav heard Mr. Watts, I need not say that he is considered by competent judges here to be the ablest platform speaker who ever appeared before a public audience at this place.

The town being small, with a population of only three thousand, and the field being new in regard to Secular work it was thought that but little interest would be taken in the matter. I am pleased to say, however, that such was not the case. The attendance was large at the first lecture, and continually increased to the close of the series. Mr. Watts secured the sympathy and close attention of his hearers at the outset, and fully maintained his hold on their feelings to the end. He has done us a vast amount of good by exposing the worthlessness of the pretensions of priestcraft, and by showing conclusivly that all along, on theological questions, people's minds hav been crammed with myths and fables instead of sound information.

The clergy were specially invited to attend, but none had sufficient courage to come out and "defend the faith that is in them."

The good work commenced here will not be allowed to drop for want of earnest effort to carry it on. Your readers are therefore certain to hear more from this stronghold of orthodoxy in the near future. B. L. CHIPMAN.

PITTSBURGH, PA., NOV. 23, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I accidentally came across your paper in a book-store, and was so much pleased with same that I concluded to subscribe. I bought a few back numbers here, and, after perusing same carefully, gave them to some of my friends, and hav the satisfaction of knowing that THE TRUTH SEEKER has started them thinking.

About six or seven years ago I heard Col. R. G. Ingersoll lecture here. He made a deep impression on me, as indeed he must on all who hear him. It was the first dawn of day to me; the first star in the heavens of truth and reason. I was unable to at once grasp the truth of a doctrin so vastly different from what I had been taught from childhood, but after thinking and reasoning for myself, reading the Bible carefully and knowingly for the first time in my life, having the aid of books by Ingersoll and others to brush away the cobwebs of superstition, fear, and sentiment, I hav become and will continue to be a stanch believer in the cause of liberty, reason, and humanity.

Moody, the evangelist, has commenced a course of lectures, which will continue for one month. He is drawing immense crowds, as it is a free show. Among some of the statements he made that struck me as rather absurd I append the following:

"Turn your business over to your sons, and spend your now for God."

"I hav always had a great admiration for those four men who carried the palsied man to Jesus in the house at Capernaum. As soon as I get to heaven I intend to look up those four men."

From the confident way in which Mr. Moody frequently expressed himself as to going to heaven, I hav no doubt that he, even now, can hear the flutter of wings and the jingling of harps. I suppose that, if the doctrin of Mr. Moody, the Bible, and Christianity are true, I am equally as sure of finding myself in the other place. If so, I, too, shall look up a "big four"—a four who not alone helped one man in case of distress, but a four to whom all humanity is indebted for light—a light that is slowly and surely dispelling the clouds of superstition and credulity—viz., Shakspere, Humboldt, Paine, and Voltaire. I might even meet Mr. Moody there, and in all probability I shall see Ingersoll there, although I hope not alone to see him but to hear him many times before journeying on that broad and well-trodden path that leads to that land where it never snows.

If Colonel Ingersoll intends to giv a series of lectures this winter, as I hav heard, I hope he will not overlook this lucky but old-fogy town of Pittsburgh. With all her natural advantages, her people are still in the hands of the Philistines; or, in other words, the Law and Order Society, which has complete control of the entire city.

Hoping for a better state of affairs in the near future, I am,

Very truly yours, J. A. GALVIN.

A Problem.

Sandy and Ned were brothers;
Ned was older than Sandy;
And they were busy dividing
A stick of peppermint candy.

Ned was earnestly trying
To make the division true,
And he marked the place with a fish-hook
Where the stick ought to break in two.

But, alas, for little Sandy
And his poor painstaking brother!
It was a long and short division—
One piece longer than the other.

Ned gravely looked at the pieces,
And their quite unequal length,
And he wrestled with the problem
With all his mental strength.

And, at last, he said: "O Sandy!
I can make it come out right,
If I take the piece that's longest,
And bite off just one bite."

Their four eyes beamed and brightened
At this plan, so very handy,
Of disposing of the problem
And distributing the candy.

So Ned ate the pieces even—
'Twas the simplest way to do it;
And he cheated little Sandy—
And they neither of them knew it.

Prize Essay.

WHY AM I A LIBERAL?

Before attempting a direct answer to the above question, I shall endeavor to outline the origin and growth of orthodoxy, Liberalism's opposing element. Orthodoxy is a dogmatic adherence to any fixed opinion—Christians call it "faith." Guided by it, you must not dare to question the existence of a God; you must not dare to dispute the inspiration of the Bible or the divinity of Christ; you must blindly, and without investigation, believe whatever the priest chooses to insist on your believing, or else incur the danger of eternal damnation and the rancor and hate of the adherents of the beautiful doctrins of the Nazarene soul-destroyer. For there is nothing which characterizes the average Christian more than bigotry and intolerance, the twin relics of the Dark Ages. With the rise of the Christian religion, we can also chronologize the growth of this fanaticism. It advanced with Christianity into power during the second and third centuries, reached its highest point about the sixteenth century, and has been, since then, declining, with the belief in the infallibility of the church. It has called Liberalism into existence. Had it never become dominant, there would hav been no need of opposition. Thus Liberalism, like the majority of great inventions and noble conceptions of humanity, was the child of necessity. When primitiv man roamed in company with savage beasts through the dense jungles and gigantic tropical forests of the prehistoric world, he was little better than these his ferocious companions. But, existing as he did in a form which had been endowed by nature with superior abilities, he survived the ephemeral period of his fellow-creatures' existence, and while their bones studded the rocks and filled yawning chasms and caves, the indomitable law that the fit will survive and the weak perish led him on through countless ages to the high state of civilization in which he now exists. However, during the early period of his existence upon the globe, as his simple mind and unsophisticated nature beheld the wonderful phenomena of nature he was moved in turn by curiosity and fear. This first induced him to inquire the cause of the earthquake, of the flood, and of all the multifarious evil and beneficent manifestations he witnessed and felt; while the second bowed his head and bent his knees in his worship of these mysteries which were so far beyond his understanding. And when the first gleams of science burst upon this primeval nature-worship, they were quickly seized by some desirous of gaining an ascendency over the minds of their fellow-men, and utilized to work miracles as proofs of their divine mission. This made the ancient temples the store-houses of all the scientific lore of the "olden time," and retarded progressiv civilization for at least two thousand years. It doomed the simple adoration of Nature and inaugurated instead the esoteric polytheism of India, Egypt, and Greece, which, like unto the "greedy rosmarine," absorbed the dew of scientific knowledge to further the promulgation of its own interests.

In order to fully comprehend the enormity of knowledge sheltered by the sacred altars, it should be known that the sciences of optics, hydrostatics, pyrotechnics, meteorology, astronomy, pneumatics, and acoustics were known to a large extent to the priests and magicians. Chemistry and alchemy flourished even until the latter part of the Middle Ages. The magnet, the air-gun, galvanism, and steam were all known to the priests, and with the aid of all this knowledge they kept for ages the human mind in bondage. When at last the age of reason was inaugurated by the Peripatetic philosophers, by the Academicians, by the Pythagoreans, and the disciples of Anaxagoras, Socrates, Zeno, Epicurus, and others, it was quickly strangled by the reincarnation of all ancient superstition, the anti-naturalism of the Galilean would-be reformer, and by the bigotism, hate, and cruelty of his fanatic followers. This new thraldom marked the death of all science, of all knowledge, for a period of over fifteen hundred years. It was opposed to everything which savored not of another world. Its rapid rise marked the decline of the once powerful Roman empire and the degradation and mental reaction of the Greeks, while the improvident doctrins it inculcated caused a period of never-ceasing famin and pestilence. The malevolent hate inspired by the meek Jesus and his disciples was the foundation-stone of numerous wars and persecutions. This gigantic imposition, which even now flourishes, is the cause of Liberalism. The murder of Hypatia, of Vanini, and Bruno all had their share in furthering the mental uprising which, execrating the detestable doctrins and practices of Christianity (in general, for the Protestant church, originally opposed to Catholicism, soon became as bad as the root it sprang from, and, in my opinion, the burning of Servetus, the persecution of witches, Quakers, and Catholics during its frondescence, were not indicativ of the pretended dereliction of intolerance) and looking forward to a period of mental liberty consistent with man's high nature, opposed the orthodox sentiments of the ignorant multitude and, pushing onward to a higher goal than an imaginary heaven, formed Liberalism upon the ruins of the glory and power of Roman and Greek civilization. Orthodoxy makes man its servant; Liberalism serves him. Orthodoxy upholds ancient superstitions as infallible; Liberalism holds high the beacon light of reason and recommends it as the only safe guide of man. The one is stagnant; the other progressiv. One is bigoted, while the other lauds tolerance as a virtue rare. One preaches secular truth; the other adheres to would-be-divine falsehood. Orthodoxy has given us lascivious popes and immoral kings; Liberalism, scientists and historians. Orthodoxy has laid waste the one-time paradise of southern Europe; Liberalism is fast retrieving it. And to-day everybody in favor of universal mental liberty, in favor of truth and progress, in favor of peace and the cultivation of the liberal arts and sciences, has renounced the dogmatic theology of the past and adopted the progressiv tenets of Liberalism. These are the reasons why I am a Liberal.

Counsels to the Young.

You were made to be clean and neat in your person and in your dress, and gentlemanly and ladylike in your manners. If you hav not been bitten by a mad dog, don't be afraid of fresh water. There is enough water in the world to keep everybody clean; but there is a great deal of it that never finds its right place. Take as much as you need. The people of the West boast of their great rivers—I would rather they would boast of using a large tubful of their water every day. Contract no such rule as chewing or smoking tobacco. So long as a man chews or smokes, though a very Chesterfield in everything else that pertains to his appearance, he can never be quite a gentleman. You were made to be kind, and generous, and magnanimous. If there is a boy in the school who has a club foot, don't let him know that you ever saw it. If there is a poor boy with ragged clothes, don't talk about rags when he is in hearing. If there is a lame boy, assign him some part of the game which does not require running. If there is a hungry boy, giv him a part of your dinner. If there is a dull one, help him get his lessons. If there is a bright one, be not envious of him; for if one boy is proud of his talents, and another is envious of them, there are two great wrongs, and no more talent than before. If a larger or stronger boy has injured you, and is sorry for it, forgiv him, and request the teacher not to punish him. All the school will show by their countenances how much better it is to hav a great soul than a great fist. You were made to learn. Be sure you learn something every day. When you go to bed at night, if you cannot think of something new which you hav learned during the day, spring up and find a book, and get an idea before you sleep. If you were to stop eating, would not your bodies pine and famish? If you stop conning, your minds will pine and famish too. You all desire that your bodies should thrive and grow, until you become as tall and large as your father or mother, or other people. You would not like to stop growing where you are now—at three feet high, or four feet, or even at five. But if you do not feed your minds as well as your bodies, they will stop growing; and one of the poorest, meanest, most despicable things I hav ever seen in the world is a little mind in a great body. Suppose there was a museum in your neighborhood, full of rare and splendid curiosities, would you not like to go and see it? Would you not think it unkind if you were forbidden to visit it? The creation is a museum, all full and crowded with wonders, and beauties, and glories. One door, and only one, is open by which you can enter this magnificent temple. It is the door of knowledge. The learned laborer, the learned peasant, or slave, is ever made welcome at this door, while the ignorant, though kings, are shut out.

Correspondence.

BOSTON, MASS., Dec. 14, 287.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: I desire to thank you for that excellent sketch of the life and services of the noble-hearted and liberal-minded Frances Wright which appeared in the last TRUTH SEEKER. Inclosed I send a children's article, written by a colored man down South, entitled, "Counsels to the Young," which I think will meet also with your approbation, as it does with my own, most unqualifiedly.

Hastily, but very truly, yours,

GEO. N. HILL.

[We thank our friend for his kind appreciation of our efforts, and agree with him so well in approval of the article mentioned that we copy it elsewhere. It is full of good sense and wise counsel, and Brother Hill will please accept our thanks for taking the trouble to forward it.—ED. C. C.]

CHICAGO, ILL., Dec. 10, 1887.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Madam: I am more than pleased with the result, and consider the essays to be far superior to anything I had imagined. I only wish that I was sufficiently well supplied with the world's goods, I would gladly make each competitor a suitable present; but, as my resources are limited, I am compelled to confine myself within my means.

I hardly know what to say in regard to the merits of the respectiv essays. They are all so good that it is difficult to decide in what order they should be placed. However, I will make a selection, subject to your revision, as I shall rely entirely on your wider knowledge of such matters: Geo. H. Siebel, Pittsburgh, Pa., first prize; Margaret Colvin, Omaha, Neb., second; Laura Price Stewart, Denver, Col., third; and to little Celie James,* Zaliski, O., I wish to tender my heartiest thanks for her noble little effort.

I trust you will rearrange this list in any manner you deem advisable.

I inclose herewith an express money order for $6, and hav forwarded by express to your address all essays I received. I am,

Yours respectfully, B. H. MARLETT.

[By the above letter it will be seen to whom hav been awarded the three prizes offered by B. H. Marlett, of Chicago, for best essays on the subject, "Why I Am a Liberal." The essays, seventeen in number, are all creditable, and show that we hav intelligent, wide-awake, and thoughtful children in our ranks. The essays will all be printed in their order, and we thank all who hav responded so nobly to Mr. Marlett's kind offer. And, in this connection, we would ask our children to write occasional essays for the Corner, on any topic interesting to them, such as Love of Nature; Why Should We Be Kind to Animals? The Value of Living; What is True Happiness? and similar subjects. We will cheerfully print the thoughts of the children, no matter how crudely expressed. Nobody expects a child to write like a grown person, but by thinking and reading the mind is improved.—ED. C. C.]

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

The Modern Feast of Belshazzar.

In banquet hall's resplendent light,
Revealing viands served on gold,
There shine a thousand gems as bright
As graced Belshazzar's feast of old.
And music's sweet and low refrain
Falls softly on the perfumed air,
And speaking eyes return again
A love that lips would fain declare.
There coyish maid and haughty dame
Display to roving eyes their charms,
And fluttering o'er love's garish flame
They eager list its fond alarms.
Presides with pride our finance king,
And there with dué humility
His courtiers sit, and to him bring
Reports of their servility.
The pulpit, press, the bench, the bar,
Outvie with each in servitude;
Great riches is their guiding star,
And poverty but turpitude.
The rotund priest recounts with pride
How freemen's rights to vote at will
Hav been by churchly power denied,
And pliant fools proved asses still.
"The press, O king! has boldly told
A thousand lies per diem for thee,
And well has earned thy shining gold,
Thou king of moneyocracy!"
"Ex parte decisions," shouts the bench,
"Hav shielded thee behind the law
To honest nostrils loud the stench,
Yet still supreme thy ravenous maw."
"Thou knowest, O great king! the bar
Are mute admirers of thy skill;
Thy gold they've scented from afar;
Command them at thy sweetest will."
The king of gold, with twinkling eye,
Now smiling rises to respond,
When objects strange he doth espy,
Which strike him with amazement dumb.
For, see! within an open door
A motley crowd are filing in,
With faces wan and raiment poor,
Victims of want, of wrong, and sin.
The miner grim, the factory hand,
And artisans of every trade
In mute appeal in silence stand,
By rank injustice paupers made.
"Out of my sight," ere yet he spake,
Or echoed through that lordly hall,
The stoutest hearts were made to quake;
For, see! from yonder paneled wall,
A figure of historic name
Emerges from its polished face,
Amid supernal light aflame,
Reveals the savior of our race.
A death-like hush falls over all,
And ashy lips and staring eyes,
As on that Godlike form they fall
In abject trembling, mute surprise;
And now, O wonder and amaze!
Is slowly lifted arm and hand,
And with a lightning glance of rage
He points with gesture of command
To tablets on the wall, which sprung
In human sight conjoint with him,
On which were words for ages sung
By Christian saints absolved from sin.

INSCRIPTIONS ON THE TABLETS.
"Feed my lambs."
"Ye cannot serve God and mammon."
"O ye hypocrits! ye can discern the face of the sky, but can ye not discern the signs of the times?"
"For I say unto you that, except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter the kingdom of heaven."
"What is a man profited if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul, or what shall a man giv in exchange for his soul?"

And then his voice fell on the ear,
And bowed was every knee,
And fell the penitential tear,
But not in mockery.

"Ye vipers! and for thee I died,
For thee I suffered on the cross;
Your clan for ages hav but lied,
And deemed my love as worthless dross.
For, see! my father's children cry,
Are hungered, and ye feed them not;
They faint, they starve, despairing die,
And praise ye God 'tis not your lot.
Know, then, 'tis I that bend the neck,
And groan o'er unrequited task;
'Tis I your murderous course will check,
Tear from your face the Christian mask.
See! death is claiming every hour
The victims of unnatural greed;
And yet you revel in your power,
With not a thought for others' need.
Where is the love ye bear for me
Ye sing in song, ye mouth in prayer,
While millions liv in misery,
All children of my father's care?
I love them all; the lowliest one
My spirit bears through life's brief hour;
Offense to them is to God's son
The deadliest insult in thy power.
Your churches and cathedrals all,
Without my human love,
Your heavenly father doth appal—
Are cursed from above.
Then quick expel that primal wrong,
That rank injustice to the race,
That God's fair earth is for the strong,
And not for all a biding place.
Ye are but tenants for a day,
And love's the only current coin
Your father asks of you to pay;
Why from the weak will ye purloin?
Eternal justice reared the earth,
And ruleth through infinity;
The earth's for all that's granted birth,
Speak nature and divinity.
Expunge your laws that from the slime
Of selfishness uprose;
Though they hav stood uncounted time,
They're heaven's infernal foes.
And now farewell! This cowering mass
Cry justice, and from thee.
Giv it, as you hope to pass
Safe through eternity."

He vanished with the motley train,
And those who saw now deem
It but a mirage of the brain
And unsubstantial dream.

WM. ALLEN SMITH.

Obituary.

DIED.—Oct. 28, 1887, Salem Lewis, Aged 50 years.

Just at the noon of life he has fallen asleep. But he has left behind something for us to admire, something for us to imitate—a noble, true manhood; an upright, honest life. Quiet and unassuming, though firm in his convictions, he believed in no future punishments and asked not for any future rewards, yet ever held that each one should bear the consequences of his acts.

He tried to pluck from this world all the enjoyment that he could, ever holding aloft the motto, "The time to be happy is now, and the place to be happy is here."

Fighting disease for seven years, yet his brave and cheerful spirit shone over the wreck and ruin of his body like morning on the desert.

Having done his duty as a citizen, as a son, as a brother, as a husband and father, he had no fears of death, because, to one of his belief, death is as natural as life.

Standing at his open grave I could but think: If death ends all with thee, it is well; or if it be the opening of a life beyond, thy noble manhood, thine uprightness of character, thine honesty of purpose, are by far a nobler passport than any church or creed can giv.

Farewell, Salem! May the record of thy life be to us a guiding star, and ever, as we visit thy grave, may we reverently feel, here lies one who dared to die as he had lived, a fearless, honest, upright man.

He liveth long who liveth well,
And, be his station low or high,
He who the most good deeds can tell
Livs longest, though he soonest die.

Greene, N. Y. J. H. LENDERSON.

RIVERTON, IA., Nov. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I desire to inform our Liberal friends, especially our sympathetic and personal ones, of a sad occurrence—the death of my wife, whose confidence and love I was so fortunate as to possess. Some seven weeks ago she left our home to visit her parents, brother, sisters, and friends, and, through unforeseen events upon the route, became exposed to trials that aggravated an abnormal condition of the heart and by which she caught cold. As a result, a series of acute troubles followed, and death, that insidious extinguisher of life's light, came in to finish. The result to me is hard to express. I had prepared an address for delivery at her grave, but, my arrival being too late, I was not enabled to giv it. A. K. MOTT.

A New Work on Lincoln.

There is no name dearer to the American heart than that of Abraham Lincoln. Lincoln is especially admired by Liberals because he was wise enough and brave enough to discard the popular creed. Numerous biographies of this man hav appeared, but with the exception of Lamon's Life, all of them are grossly inaccurate in many particulars. The Life of Lincoln now appearing in the Century is probably destined to become the standard biography. It is a work of great merit, and is in the main a truthful record of the life of the great emancipator. But this work is devoted principally to his public career. Early in 1888 a new work, dealing chiefly with the inside life of Lincoln, will appear. It has been written by Hon. W. H. Herndon, and no man living is better fitted for such a task. Mr. Herndon was Lincoln's lifelong friend, and for more than twenty years his law partner; the partnership existing up to the time of Lincoln's death. Mr. Herndon has been most shamefully maligned and persecuted by the church for what he has already published in regard to Lincoln's religious opinions, and I hope the Liberals of this country will endeavor to counteract this opposition as far as possible by extending the circulation of the forthcoming book. J. E. REMSBURG.

These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:
THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.
FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.
SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.
REASON IS THE LAMP OF THE MIND.
THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.
UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.
THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.
NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.
THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.
The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.
For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,
The Present and the Future Republic of North America.
BY A CAPITALIST.
A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Heathen Illustration of the Temptation.]

The Bundehesh (a sacred book of the Persians,) states that Ahuramazda after creating the first man and woman, Mashya and Mashyana, bade them "to be humble of heart; to observe the law; to be pure in their thoughts, pure in their speech, pure in their actions." But an evil demon came to them in the form of a Serpent, sent by Ahriman, the prince of devils, and gave them fruit of a wonderful tree, which imparted immortality. Evil inclinations then entered their hearts, and all their moral excellence was destroyed. Consequently they fell, and forfeited the eternal happiness for which they were destined. They killed beasts, and clothed themselves in their skins.

BIBLE MYTHS shows this to be the origin of the Hebrew story.

News of the Week.

MR. KEELY, who has for years experimented with a new mechanical force supposed to be generated from air and water, continues to promis immediate disclosure of his "greatest motiv force ever known, and one that it will cost absolutely nothing to produce."

IT is proposed to reduce letter postage to one cent.

THOSE dealers still handling oleomargarine are being apprehended.

BRAZILIAN planters owning 2,500 slaves hav resolved to free them.

BOYCOTTS are still continued with their former frequency and effect, but more secretly.

VIOLENT feuds and assaults, and in some cases murders, are numerous throughout the country between the Prohibitionists and the Anti's.

BISMARCK, while describing the support of the present vast army as an intolerable burden, calls upon the Reichstag for additional supplies.

THE fiftieth anniversary of the elevation of Pope Leo XIII. to the priesthood was celebrated at Pittsburgh, Pa., on the 18th by a monster parade.

THE English Tory ministry seems anxious to establish regular diplomatic relations with the Vatican, for the purpose, the Irish emancipators say, of "bartering Irish rights."

THE Pennsylvania law, just passed, levying high liquor license and requiring as sureties against law-breaking bonds so high that few can giv them, is lessening the number of saloons.

THERE is feeling in London against the Board of Works, excited by exposure of its corruption. It refuses an inquiry into the case of one Robertson, who keeps horses, carriages, and a splendid mansion on £400 a year, and whose malversations are proved and admitted by all.

BILLS hav been introduced in the new Congress providing that that body pass uniform marriage and divorce laws; that it prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquors; that it reject immigrants not having sufficient means to support themselvs and families six months, and that a postal telegraph be established.

THE Federation of Labor has hit upon the plan of extending the use of the union-label to goods of all kinds that can bear a label. This, they think, will accomplish their ends without strike or direct boycott, as it will cause a powerful demand for union-made goods, and non-union goods will not be sold.

THE book written by Parsons in jail is about to be published. An extract from Macaulay prophesying a contest between the rich and the poor in America is a text to the first part. The second part is prefaced by an extract from John Ruskin denouncing the capitalists of Europe as thieves and the cause of all wars.

LAST Sunday, in London, one Linnell, a member of the radical labor parties, who died from injuries inflicted by the police in suppressing the recent Trafalgar square labor demonstrations, was followed to the grave by an immense procession. The coffin was covered with a red flag, and violent Socialistic speeches were made.

A BILL has been introduced in the German parliament authorizing the expulsion of all Socialists who hav incurred penalties for violations of the Anti-Socialist law, or by belonging to secret societies, which is forbidden by existing laws. In accordance with the provisions of this bill most of the Socialist members of the Reichstag may be expelled from Germany. The bill also permits the punishment of any one taking part in a Socialist Congress.

JOSEPH RECOGNIZES HIS BRETHREN.

And Joseph saw his brethren, and he knew them, but made himself strange unto them, and spake roughly unto them; and he said unto them, Whence come ye? And they said, From the land of Canaan, to buy food.—Gen. xlii, 7.

Odds and Ends.

MACON Prohibition: "The Atlanta election was a Waterloo." Macon Anti: "No, it was a whisky-loo."

ROBBIE: "Mamma, doesn't it make your hands warm to spank me?" Mamma: "Why, yes, Robbie, it does" Robbie: "Wouldn't it do just as well then, mamma, to go and hold 'em over the register."

"AH, my son," said the minister, "I'm glad to see you in the Sunday-school at last. Is this your first Sunday?" "Yes, sir." "How do you like it?" "Oh, guess I kin stand it until after the Christmas tree."

THE Boston Transcript believes the first mention of playing cards is found in the Bible, i.e., "when Neb euchred Nezzar." An impression prevailed that it was when Satan played the deuce in the garden of Eden—beat a pair, as it were.—Norristown Herald.

THE Columbus (Ga.) Enquirer-Sun says: "A Baptist minister brought suit against the membership of his church for the amount due him as pastor, and was defeated. He now makes a criminal case of it by having the parties arrested on the charge of getting religion under false pretense."

"IF I should tell you, dear," he said, "that my love for you had grown cold; that I had ceased to care for you, and that the happy time when I shall claim you as my ownest own will never, never be, would it really be a trial to you, darling?" "Yes, George," shyly admitted the girl, "it would be a breach of promis trial."

WIFE (returned from church): "You should hav heard Mr. Goodman's sermon this morning, my dear. I don't know when anything has made such a profound impression upon me." Husband: "Did you walk home?" Wife: "No, I took a street-car; and do you know, John, the conductor never asked me for my fare. Wasn't I lucky?"

PROHIBITIONIST: "There, sir, Mr. De Wine, look at that man. Did you ever see such a rum-soaked specimen?" De Wine: "I never did. He's a wreck, sure enough. Been a hard drinker all his life, evidently. See here, my good man, hav you any home to go to?" Dilapidated specimen: "No, sir, I'm a stranger among strangers." "Where did you come from?" "I just come from Maine."

"WHAT curious substance hav you in that vessel?' asked Society, meeting a stranger coming out of the dissecting room. "Brains," replied Truth. "Brains which I hav just taken from a poor dead scholar." "Let me look at them," said Society, eagerly. "I never saw any before. Let me look at them; how are they worn?" "In the head," replied Truth. "Ont of sight?" asked Society. "Entirely." "Take them away; I hav no use for such ornaments." And so Truth went on into the college with her brains, and Society went on her way without any.

THE Boston Post says that Governor Taylor of Tennessee recently told of a colored clergyman who preached a sermon on the text: "And the multitudes came to him, and he healed them of divers diseases." Said he: "My dying congregation, this is a terrible text. Disease is in the world. The smallpox slays its hundreds, the cholera its thousands, and the yellow fever its tens of thousands; but, in the language of the text, if you take the divers, you are gone. These earthly doctors can cure the smallpox, cholera, and yellow fever if they get there in time, but nobody but the good Lord can cure the divers."

THE MAN HE WANTED.

"Do you suspect any of the clerks?" asked the detectiv, who had been called in to investigate a robbery.

"Decidedly not," replied the merchant. "The only one who has the handling of the money is above any suspicion. He is such an exemplary young man that he curtails his time for luncheon so as to be able to read the Bible he keeps in his desk."

"Point him out to me," cried the detectiv, rubbing his hands with delight; "he's the very man I want."

"FATHER," said Rollo, "why do baseball pitchers get so much larger salaries than preachers?" "Sh!" said Rollo's father (who is a deacon), cautiously, "come here into the back room behind the door. Sh! Sometimes—only sometimes, mind you—it is because the pitcher trains longer, always finds his sermon in his text, never pitches for political effect, never tries to pitch when he and all his congregation are morally and physically satisfied that he can't; and, in fact, if he can't pitch, there isn't a church in America that would giv him a place in the battery, even if he offered to come without salary and pay his own expenses. See?" Rollo said that he thought his father had got some of his technical terms a little mixed, but, on the whole, he caught on. Sometimes, you see, Rollo is a little slow, and Rollo's father does not always express himself very clearly. But still. However. Nevertheless.

A LOT of people were staring yesterday forenoon into the sunny window of a curiosity shop on Clay street. The attraction was a lot of little nuts spread on a sheet of paper. They were popping about like things of life. "What are they?" asked an Eastern lady. "Chestnuts," ventured an old Californian. "The proper name for them," said a member of the Academy of Sciences, "is spirit beans. They're also sometimes called electric beans. There is nothing mysterious about them. They grow in Mexico and Central America. A variety of the ichneumon pierces an almost microscopic hole in the nut with its oviposator and deposits the eggs. From the egg comes a grub that feeds upon the interior of the nut until a space is formed. It is the convulsiv motions of the grub which produces the action that astonishes you. Until revived by the heat, the grub lies dormant. If allowed to develop naturally, it would eat its way out and become an ichneumon fly, a sort of winged beetle." "Any charge," inquired the old Californian. "None," said the member of the Academy of Sciences. "Some time, however," he added, "you might like to drop round and see me," and he handed the old Californian a saloon card.

Gems of Thought.

LET us regard the men of science, teachers of Nature, the expounders of her laws, the demonstrators of her forces, those who show us the danger in violating her exactions, as our best friends. Let us learn their lessons, let us study their works, let us studiously seek all the information they hav to impart.—D. M. Bennett.

THE highest and greatest commandment laid on man is to endeavor to obtain right and justice for all—which means happiness for all. This endeavor—this obtaining right and justice for all—the standard of whose world-wide and resistless progress will ultimately be the utilitarian era alone—not as caricatured by mockers of imagined pigs, but as continuously improved, verified, altered, and elevated by rational, really benevolent, far-seeing minds—this aim, this tendency, it is that renders worthy of highest honor the patient search for truth, and, when truth is found, the determined struggle against all tyrannies and lies, whether grossly obvious in fire and chains and murder, or more dangerously concealed in bad social usages and beliefs.—The Ten Commandments, by W. P. Ball.

WHEN Moses told the children of Israel that he received the two tables of the Commandments from the hands of God, they were not obliged to believe him, because they had no other authority for it than his telling them so. The Commandments carry no internal evidences of divinity with them; they contain some good moral precepts, such as any man, qualified to be a lawgiver, could produce himself, without having recourse to supernatural intervention.—Paine's Age of Reason.

THOUGH it should turn out that the ascent of man has been not only from the lowest savagery, but from the lowest animal forms, I see not how that would abate our reverence for him one particle. Hav we not always more respect for those who rise in the world than for those who remain stationary or who decline? "The fall of man"—that was a degradation. The rise of man—no matter from what original condition—that is an honor. Resentment of Darwin's theory, as degrading to mankind, comes with an ill grace from those who hold the Calvinistic creed, the purport of which is (I quote the words of Calvin himself) that a man is totally depraved, "entirely despoiled and destitute of everything connected with eternal life, so that even our natural faculties are all depraved and contaminated."—Chadwick's Higher Reverence.

FOR to him that is joined to all the living there is hope; for a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the living know that they shall die: but the dead know not anything; neither hav they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love and their hatred and their envy is now perished; neither hav they any more a portion forever in anything that is done under the sun.—Ecclesiastes ix, 4 6.

MAN is so constituted, the Materialist [Freethinker, Secularist, scientist, Agnostic, Infidel, etc.] holds, that he has faculties and powers, by the exercise of which he can acquire knowledge and better his condition, without any book revelation to guide him. The disciplin and development of mind that result from his efforts to get knowledge are more valuable than his mere acquirements. Man has become what he is, we hold, by the use of his powers to better his condition. It is evident to us that all the wisdom in the Old Testament was learned by man's observation and experience. Man is more advanced now than formerly, and while he accepts what a larger experience and a more enlightened reason approve, he rejects as erroneous and foolish much that was cherished in ancient times. Observation, experience, and reason, and not a book-revelation, embodying the errors, as well as the wisdom, of the past, are the highest and best guides for man.—Underwood's Materialism and Christianity.

SERENE will be our days and bright,
And happy will our nature be,
When love is an unerring light,
And joy its own security.
—Wordsworth.

DR. PATTON, the prosecutor and persecutor of David Swing—one of the most talented and most forward-looking of American divines—writes, in the Independent, on "The Responsibilities of a Creator." This is a moral aspect of the universe that has often been overlooked by Calvinistic writers. And the trouble is that, when the question is fairly faced, Calvinism, as a system, goes to pieces, and the truths which it contained must find other form. "At the judgment day," says Dr. Patton, "God will submit his own conduct to the judgment of his rational universe." [Here Dr. Patton has surely stolen Colonel Ingersoll's thunder?] But we need not wait for that visionary and improbable day to arrive; for the conduct of the creator is daily submitted to the judgment of the rational universe, and human education consists in the double task of learning what that conduct is, and then in adjusting life to its beneficent laws.—Christian Register.

HOW SOME OF THE SAINTS AMUSE THEMSELVS.

FIRST ANGEL: "Look, sweet saint, yonder lies my father in the flames!"
SECOND ANGEL: "Yes, and there is my little babe."
BOTH ANGELS IN CHORUS: "Oh, isn't this bliss? Hallelujah!"

Notes and Clippings.

AT the recent Methodist conference in Danville, Va., when it came to appointing committees, a motion was made to appoint one on temperance. "No, sir," said Bishop Key, of Georgia. "We do not appoint committees on temperance. We hav passed temperance down in my country, and now call it Prohibition." A committee on Prohibition was appointed.

THE eternal damnation of those who hav not accepted Christ is not an unsettled question with the Baptist Watchman. "It is a question," it says, "of the most tremendous practical moment, and one to which the scriptures giv a plain and decisiv, though a fearful, answer. 'For as many as hav sinned without law, shall also perish without law.' . . . While I was musing the fire burnt—and while so-called Christian teachers are musing about possibilities of future probation, the fire of death burns on."

THE Rev. Dr. D. C. Kelby, of Nashville, whose remarks in connection with the Emma Abbott episode were construed to be a defense of the theater, was so beset by his Methodist brethren that he has published a card in which he "regrets and withdraws" previous statements and declares that he is "opposed to any attendance at theaters by members of our church, and upholds our ministers in the correction of this evil by public and private admonition, and by patient but firm administration of disciplin."

"THE little child familiar with the Christian catechism is really more enlightened on truths that should come home to every rational mind than the most profound philosophers of pagan antiquity, or even of the so-called philosophers of our own times. He has mastered the great problem of life. He knows his origin, his sublime destiny, and the means of attaining it." This utterance, remarks Mr. B. R. Tucker, is not from Puck, but from an article by that gifted amateur humorist, Cardinal Gibbons, in the North American Review.

WM. W. JORDAN, a faith doctor, has been living in Selma, Ala., for twelve months, and has in that time acquired great influence over the negroes, whom he told that he had come to redeem the Jews. He arranged for a Passover feast at the house of two negro women in the outskirts of the city this morning, and told them that a sacrifice was necessary. Frances Driver said she was willing to offer herself as a sacrifice, and laid her head on the table. Jordan thereupon took a sword and struck her several times on the neck and stabbed her a number of times, killing her instantly. The body was then dragged out into the street by the two other women. A white woman witnessed the affair and gave the alarm. Jordan and two of his disciples hav been arrested.

ONE morning last week when Cleveland, O., was being showered with little slips of paper on one side of which was printed in red ink the single word, "HELL," and on the other side in black letters, "Go TO Music Hall to-night," a prominent Christian gentleman crossing the square on his way to his place of business was accosted and shown the "Hell" side of one of these dodgers, and it made him talk right out. Said he: "A man who will get out such an advertisment as that ought to be arrested for blasphemy. It is an outrage on decency." The good man was then shown the reverse side of the paper, when, after a moment's pause, his words were as follows: "Ahem—well—I don't know—possibly allowance must be made—Munhall & Towner, good men—little late—good morning."

THE Boston Budget says: "There is, after all, a good deal of satisfaction in being superstitious. To be able to charge all puzzling and inexplicable occurrences to invisible superstitious agency is a convenient method of getting rid of troublesome doubts or wearisome inquiry into hidden causes. A poor solution of a difficulty may not, to a profound thinker, be better than none, but it is infinitly more comforting to ordinary human beings. Men feel, moreover, that in acknowledging that there may be truth in astrology, charlatanism, and all the rest, they hav been in a manner brought into a mystic brotherhood, and most people hav a certain secret notion that the very confession of faith is in some way a sort of propitiatory offering to unseen powers. Mystery has always a fascination for man, and almost any scheme of deception can succeed if it can but veil itself into a semi-obscurity and pique the awe-struck curiosity of the ignorant. A very small basis of truth serves as a sufficient basis upon which to erect a very substantial structure of delusion, as the history of innumerable quacks and impostors has testified through all the centuries since civilization began. It is not so much that men like to be deceived as that they enjoy deceiving themselvs under the pretense that they stand in the presence of some inscrutable mystery before which, since human reason is sure to prove unavailing, it is foolish to attempt to be reasonable or logical at all. To be freed from thinking is, after all, the delight which ensnares more of mankind than any other temptation." Does the Budget offer this as a theory to account for the prevalence of Christianity?

W. H. BENSON, 1225 Filbert street, Philadelphia, announces that he is about to found a Socialist church, the members of which will believe in God and a life hereafter. All members will be requested to take the following oath: I hereby solemnly swear that I will not rob, cheat, strike, tell lies about, communicate disease to, nor injure in any way a fellow-member of this church. I also swear that I will drink distilled and fermented liquors with great care and moderation. I also swear that I will not lend money to, nor borrow money from, a member of this church, except as a regular business transaction. I also swear that, as far as I am able, I will keep my body, clothes, and dwelling in a clean and healthy condition. I also swear that I will giv to this church, every year, one per cent of my income, provided said one per cent is not more than $50

Religious Problems.

The religious problems which demand the attention of man to-day are those which relate to humanity more than to divinity. The religion of the dead which worshiped gods is outgrown; we want the religion of the living which helps man. Men will cease to build churches and temples when they learn what they are built for. They will cease to believe the creeds of churches when they learn to trust their own reason and common sense. When men cease to fear God they will cease to worship him. We want no more objects of worship. We have thrown away our offerings; we have wasted our libations by pouring them upon altars. The world has lost much and gained little by worship. If what has been done for gods had all been done for men, I dare not say how fair our world would be. I care not with how tender thoughts we remember the dead, nor with what lofty words we reverence the world's heroes, but I would not have our thoughts led by superstition, nor our reverence employed to arrest the world's progress. There has always been a tendency in humanity to worship, which is only a desire to stop. The world, as it stands worshiping God to-day, is like mankind grouped around a statue or a picture in stupid wonder. Our force is not to be spent in admiration, but in the race for the admirable. When men stop to worship they seem to say in their action, We give it up.

Let us not forget that the altar was first a tomb—a place for dead men. It is no place for live men to-day. We should not know where to find God if we wished to ask his help. He is never where he is wanted. He is always too late to prevent an accident. He is only a coroner. We are told that "God will wipe all tears from our eyes." We can do that ourselves. How much better it would be to prevent our tears than to dry them—to stop the train before it takes its leap of death than to go to the funeral of the victims! Faith in God is good for nothing when there is a flaw in the bridge. I do not know whether it is Atheism to say that man has no other power but his own to depend upon, but I know it is a fact. Faith in God is a continual disappointment. It ends in despair, or in faith in man.

The world is turning away from worship. This is the assurance that a nobler duty is to be undertaken. Man can still bow his head in veneration of worth, but he does not care to be kept on his knees to a mummy.

When a nation bears a great man—one whose soul refuses to walk in the old ruts of custom, and whose nature is too large to be bound by the creed lines of the popular faith—it generally sees a particular divinity in such a man, and pronounces him either a prophet or messiah, and sets up his words as the commands of God. This has been the great error of the world. Every nation erects the effigy of some great life at the threshold of its territory, and nails a pious horseshoe over its every door to protect it from the spirit of reformation. It demands that all men shall worship its idol. How Arabia and Turkey cling to a festering corpse! How Europe and America still hold the cold hand of human idolatry! How China and India strain to their bosoms the dead form of a dead faith!

The world will never throb with new life until the spell of worship is broken. Nothing holds mankind down so much as veneration for its idols. Shake off the lethargy that worship has brought upon the soul. Live like men, and you need not worship gods. When we live true to the soul we cease to ask for anything. Worship is denial of self. Let us have no disputes about divinity. Let God take care of himself. The light of the stars proves their existence. The universe needs no counsel of defense. That which is evident need not be explained.

The great question for us to answer is not what God wants, but what man needs. Let us live to ourselves. Worship is interruption. Let our life satisfy. Worship is apology. If we are doing our best, what need to excuse our work? What good does it do to praise God? That is the truest love which obeys, not that which adores. We want willing hands, not lifted ones. Worship is superfluous. It adds nothing to the soul. It increases our cares, not our virtues. The test of everything is, Does it help man?

I challenge the church to prove its claim to man's support. It throws a shadow upon the earth, instead of letting more light upon it. The priest is in man's way. Worship is a compliment to the deity that he does not need, and a burden upon man which he is not able to bear. Nature does not worship. She grows. Worship is opposition to reform. It palsies the world's thought. It means stagnation. It is difficult to get advocated what will correct society, because mankind spends so much time in the church that it has no time to spend in the theater of improvement. Worship is hypocrisy's disguise. What a train of splendid deceit marches up the aisles of the church! What a mask is worship, but the world can see through it. When falsehood kneels in praise of truth; when extortion and cruelty call God father; when meanness and vice are the disciples of Jesus; and when crime and sin say, "Thy will be done," the name of religion is a blush on the forehead of the world.

The world's deeds are better than the church's faith. The layman's knowledge is ahead of the minister's sermon. The virtue which the noble soul is striving to attain makes the salvation offered to the believer mean and contemptible.

The institution that pretends to be the guardian of religion is a reproach to our enlightenment and a stain upon the age. The Christian scheme of saving man is a priestly device to trade upon immorality and sin. The church keeps the world ignorant, and hence sinful, for the sake of ecclesiastical plunder. There is nothing more in the way of religion than the church. If the church had persecuted only vicious men, ignorant men, immoral men, and those opposed to knowledge and liberty, we might frame some kind of excuse for it; some half-decent apology might be made in its behalf; but to persecute upright men and women, those who were moral and true, who were educated and earnest in their desire to spread the blessings of knowledge, and who lived to make the world free and fair, obliges us to denounce it as the foe of knowledge, truth, and liberty. Be it known and remembered that the pilgrims who came to these shores preferred facing icy waters and a wilderness to the fierce hate of the church; that they dreaded the red savage less than the white Christian, whose terrible deeds of persecution could make the heart of man quake with fear. The person who lives to please the church will not do much to benefit the world. The world and the church make different demands upon humanity; they pull in opposite directions. Man is seeking to know more that he may improve the earth he lives on, but the church teaches that faith is better for man than knowledge, as knowledge will only help him here, while faith will save him hereafter.

I should not want to bet much on a man being saved by faith. Faith is a way for a man to escape paying his debts; it is offering three cents on the dollar. A salvation of this kind is cheating somebody. In the scales of justice the smallest act of kindness weighs more than the largest confession of faith. Theological faith would get no rating by any commercial agency in the land. It would be marked N.G.

Theology can be run on a smaller capital than would be necessary to fit out a traveling tinker. It is the only business that can live on faith. There is something wrong somewhere, when faith can do so much for us in another world, and so little for us in this world. It looks as though somebody was lying. Eternal happiness to be purchased by faith, but not a Christian on earth would exchange his goods for it. Faith may make man an angel hereafter, but it would make him a tramp here. Work may not be accepted at the door of heaven, but it is honored on earth. The priest lives on the faith of others, not on his own.

This word has made too much noise. Faith is to be seen, not heard. Whenever faith has met a fact, it has gone down before it. This word has been the face of every imposition.

The gospel not according to Matthew says, Have faith that anything will be done, and it will not be done.

The man that reckons on being saved by faith is going to get left. You cannot pass yourself for more than you are worth. You cannot make the bottom stay on top, any more than the Irishman could have his cellar upstairs.

There is not one real, true, live word in the Christian vocabulary of salvation. Eden, the stage on which was performed the tragedy of original sin, is a dead word; devil, the name of the scaly gentleman who took the leading part in this tragedy, is a dead word; hell, the abode of all those who descended from the original sinners, is a dead word; Christ, the title of the man who offered to ransom the human race and save men and women from hell, is a dead word; atonement, the word that stands for the expiation to be made by Christ, is a dead word. These words that the Christian church uses in its exhortations to mankind have no heart of truth in them. They stand for no facts; they represent no realities. Take away these dead words from the Christian preacher, and you take away his powder, shot, and wads. Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there were no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on the earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching.

I know that those who are outside of the Christian church are looked upon as having a mere vagabond religion, or none at all, but we need not be afraid of unjust opinions. America needs to-day a thousand men who dare to speak the truth. We want the courage which will face the fate of saying what is true, and of doing what is right.

We best serve the purpose of life by doing whatever lies within our power to make life true and beautiful.

In the eyes of orthodoxy a Liberal is a revolutionist, a Communist, a violator of law, and a destroyer of all religious things. He is regarded as a dangerous character, as seeking to overthrow human government on earth and the divine government in the skies. But the Liberal is maligned. He is a reformer, not a revolutionist; a preserver of peace, not a destroyer; an advocate of law, not a transgressor. He is an innovator, not a violator. He attacks nothing that is right, nothing that is true. Though he has no reverence for what the church calls holy, his would be the last hand raised to strike the sacred things of the heart. Though he has no belief in the popular superstitions, his would be the last voice to decry the influence of moral ideas. Though he has no worship to offer the church's Gods, his would be the last soul to refuse assistance to man, or honor to a noble humanity.

The Liberal would put life for belief, action for acting, and sincerity for pious pretension.

It is no uncommon thing for men and women to attend a church where are taught the Christian doctrines who do not believe what they hear. It is a fact that a large number of people go Sunday after Sunday to a Christian church who regard Christianity as irrational and untenable as a special revelation. It is the popular hypocrisy of society to go to church and believe nothing of what you hear. There is an easy and agreeable way of excusing such dishonesty by saying they go for the music and singing. A good choir covers a lot of bad theology. I do not blame anybody for denying that they go to church to hear orthodoxy preached. That music has greater charms than the average sermon I can well believe, but it strikes me that a person that will go to an orthodox church for the sake of hearing the singing must agree with the boy who was punished for eating the jelly, "that he got a good deal of licking for a mighty little jelly." One of the saddest sights in society is the hypocrisy in religious matters, the apparent absence of all respect for one's own religious opinions.

Freedom is the one condition necessary to the solution of those religious problems which relate to human welfare; and for man to reach his natural destiny, the whole world must be free to his hands, to his feet, to his mind, and to his soul. That part of the earth that the light of liberty has illumined is the brightest spot on the globe, and man is happiest, noblest, manliest, where he is freest. There is nothing more needed to-day than a Declaration of Religious Independence. We need to assert with the force of full faith in man: We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created religiously equal; that they are endowed with certain religious rights; that among these are the rights to believe what is reasonable and to disbelieve what is unreasonable; to hold such ideas of the universe as accord with our knowledge, and to reject such notions as seem absurd and childish; to oppose all that tends to keep man in ignorance and fear; to teach whatever is calculated to improve the physical, mental, and moral state of humanity, and to make life bright with joy and hope. We need to declare that we are free from all the creeds of Christendom. To be free is all that man can ask for; he must do the rest.

We demand freedom from all priestly authority and control. We want no pet dogma, no pet man. We have no faith in a cross for human wrongs, or a Christ for human sins. No man is wise enough to tell everybody how to live, nor good enough for everyone to follow. We do not believe in salvation after death.

The time to learn to swim is before we get drowned. The time to save man is when there is something to save. It is our duty to so arrange the conditions of life that man cannot get lost. Safety is what we want, not a savior. We must subjugate circumstances and make every soul master of its own destiny. The knowledge to determine events is the power to control them. The world must be taught how to direct the issues of life. The religious necessity is not a revival of interest in the Christian doctrines, but an education that shall enable man to prevent what brings disaster to himself and misery to others. We also need the wisdom of conscience. It is well to heed what starts a pain in the body or mind. Conscience is the needle of the moral compass which points toward the pole-star of right. It indicates the fixed north in the heavens of endeavor. A great many people are wrecked and ruined because they do not know that there is any way to live and enjoy life and avoid wreck and ruin. They must be told better.

The tree of the knowledge of good and evil ought to be set on every man's estate, and its fruits be free to all, and the old trees of ignorance and superstition, whose timber has been used in the building of churches, should be uprooted and burnt, root, trunk, branch, and leaf. It is time knowledge was made a saint, and ignorance a demon. The old notion that man does not need to know much if he only has religion, does not tally with the ideas of this century.

Religion is a good thing for man, but man can be religious without being tied by some sectarian halter to the feed-trough of a denomination and fed on the creed of a church. He must accept no substitute of belief for the right performance of duty; no trick of worship or delusion of prayer for those religious actions that are necessary for man to show and man to receive, and which, in their nature, are like the falling dews of heaven upon the dying grasses of earth. We want a religion that encircles human life with an atmosphere of moral sweetness, as the flower is surrounded with the perfume of its own loveliness.

I take it that religion, if it means one thing more than another, means work, higher and better work for a higher and better life on earth; work of head and hand, of heart and soul; for head and hand, for heart and soul; work to lighten the burdens of the world; work for human emancipation, for human happiness, for human elevation; high work and noble work, to do the best that our natures call for, to answer our longings, to defend our rights, and to defeat vice and wrong-doing. ## The Golden Rule in Trade.

There is a general admission that business morality is not what it should be. To outstrip competitors in the strife for wealth men resort to numberless methods of artifice and deceit. The ancients praised poverty, but, as Mr. Macgrawler said to Paul Clifford, "that was the poverty of other people." The dread of poverty now impels men to get riches—honestly if they can—but get riches. A remedy for this state of things would be found in the application of the Golden Rule to trade. 500 B C., Confucius, when asked if there was one word which would serve as a rule of conduct for all of life, replied, "Is not reciprocity such a word? What you do not want done to yourself do not do to others." In its modern form, "Do unto others as you would hav others do unto you," this maxim is called the Golden Rule; but it is better expressed in the words, Do unto others as it is right you should wish others to do unto you. The adoption of this principle would banish injustice from the world.

Why is it not more generally applied? It has been inculcated by all sages and teachers for two thousand years, and yet selfishness predominates in every sphere of life. Thales, 600 B.C., instructed men to love their enemies, but to-day the nations of the world are armed for battle, men enact revengeful strife in trade, and few enemies are loved, except such as the Indian told the missionary that he loved —rum and cider.

The Golden Rule has failed of adoption because the inducement has been insufficient. The rewards hav been promised in a future life, and too slight assurance has been given of present welfare. Honesty has not been proved to be the best policy to gain wealth. Grasping, unscrupulous men, or those whose businesses are benefited by tariffs, bounties, and exemptions at the expense of other occupations, are the ones that thrive the most, and those who are deprived of these and other inequitable advantages are incited to get even by immoral means. The old theology teaches man's depravity, but it is false. Men, as a rule, desire to be good, but necessity makes them bad.

In order to insure well-doing it must appeal to self-interest here and now. It needs to be shown that the truest selfishness is promoted by a regard for others. It must become necessary to do right in order to secure good in the present. But the prevailing system of unrestricted competition in trade, and of engaging men for wages, to produce goods for the profit of employers, is opposed to the idea of reciprocity, and while it lasts the Golden Rule will not bear sway. It is not enough to preach morality and giv education; prosperity must be assured to the well-doer. The great Chinese sage was asked by a disciple, "Since the people are so numerous, what more is needed?" Confucius replied, "Make them well off." "After that what else?" "Instruct them." This is the great truth that needs to be revived. Economic reform must precede political and moral reform. A good living must be assured to all industrious men before they can be cured of dishonesty and undue selfishness. It is useless to preach to distressed people. First giv them a chance to supply their needs, then educate them, for necessity knows no law. An equal opportunity must be given to everyone to get food, shelter, clothing, education, and health; differences of natural capacity will determin the degree to which opportunity is used, but the inequalities will depend on ability and character, not on artificial restriction, as is now the case.

But how can this opportunity be given to all? How can the people be made well off? Equity demands that a man's work shall be for his own benefit, not for the profit of an employer. The system of slavery gave a living to the worker and took all the produce. The wage system givs enough of the produce to the worker to let him pay for a living and keeps all the rest. The change that is needed is to make the people their own employers and let the full proceeds of labor go to the workers. This is the coming system, the abolition of employer, monopolist, and private capitalist; the change from competition to coöperation by municipal, national, and universal combination. This seemingly far-off day may be hastened by some of the following measures: Universal adult suffrage, male and female; free secular education; the destruction of all unwholesome dwellings and the erection of sanitary and comfortable houses; short hours of labor; the abolition of monopoly and privilege in connection with land, transit, production, and distribution; and this last must be first and greatest. Let the people seize every opportunity to take to themselvs the control of industries; as they now work the post-office, let them acquire, one by one, all other serviceable occupations, so that they shall no longer be run by individuals competitivly for their own gain. When this is done, the workers can receive the equitable results of toil.

We cannot expect this change to come in a day. We must recognize the methods of evolution and work in the line of natural progress; be hopeful and patient, believing that the average condition of men has been equal to their knowledge and character; but let us be prepared for the revolutions which will come "in the fulness of time," when men are wise enough to know what they need, intelligent enough to secure it, and good enough to preserve it.

The Golden Rule can never be applied to trade while its object is individual profit. The competitiv strife for gain not only leads to immoral practices, but is immoral in its essence. Selfishness is its principle, extortion is its method, and its success involves injury to others. It is civilized brutality and refined barbarism; force and slavery in newer forms. How is it possible for the brute chasing its prey, or the master governing his slave, to exercise the Golden Rule? It would mean sparing the victim and freeing the servant. Two dogs competing for a bone cannot do as they would be done by; but two dogs coöperating in hunting and dividing the result can exercise the Golden Rule toward each other. So, merchants struggling to get the best of a bargain, employers beating down the wages of the producers, or speculators "booming" a market, are necessarily opposed to the spirit of "reciprocity;" but let them combine for mutual aid and benefit and they can act in harmony and good-will to each other.

This stage of coöperation is fast being consummated. The strife of competition has become so fierce and disastrous that there is a general tendency to combine operations, and let each industry be controled by a central "trust," that shall operate it for mutual benefit. But this is coöperation, reciprocity, the Golden Rule spirit, among employers only. Their object is to wring more wealth out of the rest of the community.

Another step will be taken; let workers and employers coöperate in profit making and sharing. Then the Golden Rule will be practiced among the members of each occupation; but they will not be able to exercise it towards those from whom they are always trying to extort higher prices. A final step remains to be taken before we can do to all men as we should wish them to do to us. It is reciprocity between producer and consumer; competitiv business for the profit of an individual or a class must be changed into coöperativ effort for the mutual supply of needs. No longer must the cry be, "Every man for himself," but, "Each for all and all for each." Until this change comes it will be useless to preach morality. Men may be exhorted to love their neighbors, and exercise generosity, helpfulness, and consideration; but, while the earning of support for their families depends upon supplanting their neighbors in business, the advice will be futil. Men cannot be good while competing for gain. A system must be adopted which will change strife into reciprocity. Economic measures must prevail which will remove the possibility of getting gain unfairly, and make the path to prosperity a way of rectitude. The savior of mankind will not be a preacher of righteousness, but a social economist, who will show how it is possible for men both to liv well and do well.

Robert C. Adams.

God.

The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.

The Bible says, "God came from Teman, and the holy one from Mount Paran." This sentence limits God and makes him finite. It circumscribes him and makes him a person, an entity, and, therefore, a nonentity; for if he is a person he is confined to a body, spiritual or corporeal, it matters not. Who introduced God to the earth? The apostles said: "Jesus Christ, the only begotten son, he hath declared him." And yet over two thousand years before Moses talked to him face to face, as a man talketh to his neighbor, and, on one certain occasion, God only permitted Moses to see his hinder parts. Admitting this to be true, how did Moses know that he was talking with God? Who introduced them?

For four thousand years millions of hired attorneys and special pleaders hav been trying to prove there is a God, and the churches to-day hav them by the hundred thousand endeavoring to prove something above nature, and, so far, hav utterly failed.

If Jesus Christ declared him to the world, who declared Christ to the world? Why the silence of historians who wrote at the time of Christ, and were contemporaries with him—Suetonius, Pliny, Tacitus, and Josephus, writing history in the first century? If Christ made the stir that is claimed for him in the gospels, healing the sick, raising the dead, walking on the sea, tried by the Jewish Sanhedrim, condemned, tried before Pilate, condemned and crucified, rising from the dead, and many of the saints rising with him, and coming into the city and showing themselvs—if all these things took place, why did all these historians pass over it in silence and devote whole pages to the cutting of a ditch through Jerusalem?

A saint just said to me, "Josephus speaks of Christ." Let us look at that passage. It is found in none of the copies of Josephus before the fourth century. It contains the whole church creed. It teaches the fatherhood of God, the sonship of Christ, the eternal procession of the Holy Ghost, the resurrection of the dead, and the life everlasting, besides stating that Jesus was the Christ, and yet there is not more than twenty lines in the account as we find it in Josephus. The forger was Eusebius, who condensed the Athanasian creed, formulated in 325, and adopted by the church, into this passage.

I hav read a book called, "The Christ of History," but there is not a solitary quotation from any history that such a man ever existed. Even the author was too wise to quote the forged passage in Josephus. There is no Christ of history. It is the most astounding thing in all the world that such a being should liv and die in our world, rise again; meet with his disciples at fish-bakes on the sea of Galilee, upon the mountains, and walk the streets of Jerusalem; meet in upper rooms, where he showed his pierced hands and side; walk out in the country on a Sabbath day to Emmaus; lead the brethren out to Bethany, three miles east of Jerusalem, five hundred in number, and ascend into heaven, and nobody write it up till two hundred years after.

And this is the man Christ that revealed God to men. My opinion is that no such being as Jesus Christ of the gospels ever lived in our world.

Archimedes said, giv him "whereon to stand and a lever long enough, and he would move the world." Imagin Archimedes out on a lever 200,000,000 miles long, with the moon for a fulcrum, lifting the earth. By this he demonstrates an eternal law. Imagin, if you please, a bodiless God—a spirit without body or parts—handling and controling a boundless, endless world, full of millions of suns and countless millions of planets, like our own, without even a lever. Archimedes needed a lever to move one, but a spirit cannot only control an endless universe, but made it in the beginning out of nothing, not using even a lever, but he spoke, and it stood fast. He said, "Let there be light, and there was light," and a sun appeared 1,000,000 miles in diameter and 90,000,000 distant. It came from nothing, of course, and can be reduced to nothing; that is, if orthodoxy is true. Imagin the deity, dressed in the latest style, on a cold winter night, handling such levers as Archimedes needed, lifting worlds out of their sleepy ruts, and wheeling and bowling great suns here and there.

But the moral part of the argument is, if there is a God, he is not a good being, but a bad God. Jesus his son said, "By their fruits ye shall know them." Let us judge the almighty by this standard. All churches admit that God is almighty; that he made the universe out of nothing.

If this is true, evil did not exist in the beginning, and God made it. He could hav made a world without evil and without death in it. Man could hav been made with eternal life and eternal happiness just as well as to let him liv awhile and then kill him. But, instead of making a world full of sunshine, love, happiness, and eternal life, God preferred to get up a world full of sorrow, sin, shame, and death, and eternal damnation to follow. He could not help, according to the law he made, damning the whole human race, and, as he did not want to damn a few of his favorits, he deliberately committed adultery—or incest, for Mary was his daughter—became the father of an only son, and then murdered him on the cross to save the sweet-scented elect, leaving the sinner without excuse so he could damn him with a good grace, and as the smoke of their torment ascends upward forever, the saints in heaven can look over the battlements at the lost and sing: "Hallelujah! hallelujah!" "Holy, Holy, Holy Lord God Almighty!" "Lord of Hosts, just and holy are all thy judgments!" According to the church God made a portion of the race on purpose to damn them, and the few on purpose to save them. I do not see how they can trust such a God. If he preferred a world full of liars, deceitful beings—"none good, no, not one," says the Bible—a world full of murderers, thieves, cut-throats; jails, penitentiaries, and churches; poorhouses, asylums, and soldiers' homes; preachers, politicians, and priests, lying about each other and cutting each other's theological throats about questions of which it is utterly impossible to find a solution, or to even know anything of the why and the wherefore, the beginning or the end—if God preferred this kind of a world now, what kind of a world will he prefer in the next stage of existence, or second scene of the first act? If orthodoxy is true, the next world must, of necessity, be an unjust world, composed of two departments, a vast and eternal penitentiary, and an eternal palace.

Is it possible that there can be no joy without sorrow; that no mirth can exist without tears; that God and his happy heaven must be built on the widows' and the orphans' homeless condition; that heaven's foundation must be the prison walls of the lost; that an eternal penitentiary, where hope is shut out, is necessary to secure happiness to God's elect? Oh, shame!

But let us accept the truth. There are but three things in existence: space, matter, and force. These are eternal. Space is boundless and endless; matter is eternal, and force is never at rest.

From these three sisters come everything living and dead, and a prophecy of all to be. In these are the giant and the dwarf, the Shakspere and the Sweet Singer of Michigan. Nature knows no friend, no foe, but goes on with her eternal work. Without beginning and without end her work goes on forever. But our work is to make this world better and fit to liv in, and to fill it full of flowers and song to hide death and sorrow from our sight.

Another Letter to Dr. Field.

From the North American Review.

MY DEAR MR. FIELD: With great pleasure I hav read your second letter, in which you seem to admit that men may differ even about religion without being responsible for that difference; that every man has the right to read the Bible for himself, state freely the conclusion at which he arrives, and that it is not only his privilege, but his duty, to speak the truth; that Christians can hardly be happy in heaven while those they loved on earth are suffering with the lost; that it is not a crime to investigate, to think, to reason, to observe, and to be governed by evidence; that credulity is not a virtue, and that the open mouth of ignorant wonder is not the only entrance to paradise; that belief is not necessary to salvation, and that no man can justly be made to suffer eternal pain for having expressed an intellectual conviction.

You seem to admit that no man can justly be held responsible for his thoughts; that the brain thinks without asking our consent, and that we believe or disbelieve without an effort of the will.

I congratulate you upon the advance that you hav made. You not only admit that we hav the right to think, but that we hav the right to express our honest thoughts. You admit that the Christian world no longer believes in the fagot, the dungeon, and the thumb-screw. Has the Christian world outgrown its God? Has man become more merciful than his maker? If man will not torture his fellow-man on account of a difference of opinion, will a God of infinit love torture one of his children for what is called the sin of unbelief? Has man outgrown the Inquisition, and will God forever be the warden of a penitentiary? The walls of the old dungeons hav fallen, and light now visits the cell where brave men perished in darkness. Is Jehovah to keep the cells of perdition in repair forever, and are his children to be the eternal prisoners?

It seems hard for you to appreciate the mental condition of one who regards all gods as substantially the same; that is to say, who thinks of them all as myths and phantoms born of the imagination, characters in the religious fictions of the race. To you it probably seems strange that a man should think far more of Jupiter than of Jehovah. Regarding them both as creations of the mind, I choose between them, and I prefer the god of the Greeks, on the same principle that I prefer Portia to Iago; and yet I regard them, one and all, as children of the imagination, as phantoms born of human fears and human hopes.

Surely nothing was further from my mind than to hurt the feelings of any one by speaking of the Presbyterian God. I simply intended to speak of the God of the Presbyterians. Certainly the God of the Presbyterian is not the God of the Catholic, nor is he the God of the Mohammedan or Hindoo. He is a special creation suited only to certain minds. These minds hav naturally come together, and they form what we call the Presbyterian church. As a matter of fact, no two churches can by any possibility hav precisely the same God; neither can any two human beings conceive of precisely the same deity. In every man's God there is, to say the least, a part of that man. The lower the man, the lower his conception of God. The higher the man, the grander his deity must be. The savage who adorns his body with a belt from which hang the scalps of enemies slain in battle, has no conception of a loving, of a forgiving God; his God, of necessity, must be as revengeful, as heartless, as infamous as the God of John Calvin.

You do not exactly appreciate my feeling. I do not hate Presbyterians; I hate Presbyterianism. I hate with all my heart the creed of that church, and I most heartily despise the God described in the Confession of Faith. But some of the best friends I hav in the world are afflicted with the mental malady known as Presbyterianism. They are victims of the consolation growing out of the belief that a vast majority of their fellow-men are doomed to suffer eternal torment, to the end that their creator may be eternally glorified. I hav said many times, and I say again, that I do not despise a man because he has the rheumatism; I despise the rheumatism because it has a man.

But I do insist that the Presbyterians hav assumed to appropriate to themselvs their supreme being, and that they hav claimed, and that they do claim, to be the "special objects of his favor." They do claim to be the very elect, and they do insist that God looks upon them as the objects of his special care. They do claim that the light of Nature, without the torch of the Presbyterian creed, is insufficient to guide any soul to the gate of heaven. They do insist that even those who never heard of Christ, or never heard of the God of the Presbyterians, will be eternally lost; and they not only claim this, but that their fate will illustrate not only the justice but the mercy of God. Not only so, but they insist that the morality of an unbeliever is displeasing to God, and that the love of an unconverted mother for her helpless child is nothing less than sin.

When I meet a man who really believes the Presbyterian creed, I think of the Laocoön. I feel as though looking upon a human being helpless in the coils of an immense and poisonous serpent. But I congratulate you with all my heart that you hav repudiated this infamous, this savage creed; that you now admit that reason was given us to be exercised; that God will not torture any man for entertaining an honest doubt, and that in the world to come "every man will be judged according to the deeds done in the body."

Let me quote your exact language: "I believe that in the future world every man will be judged according to the deeds done in the body." Do you not see that you hav bidden farewell to the Presbyterian church? In that sentence, you hav thrown away the atonement, you hav denied the efficacy of the blood of Jesus Christ, and you hav denied the necessity of belief. If we are to be judged by the deeds done in the body, that is the end of the Presbyterian scheme of salvation. I sincerely congratulate you for having repudiated the savagery of Calvinism.

It also gave me great pleasure to find that you hav thrown away, with a kind of glad shudder, that infamy of infamies, the dogma of eternal pain. I hav denounced that inhuman belief; I hav denounced every creed that had coiled within it that viper; I hav denounced every man who preached it, the book that contains it, and with all my heart the God who threatens it; and at last I hav the happiness of seeing the editor of the New York Evangelist admit that devout Christians do not believe that lie, and quote with approbation the words of a minister of the Church of England to the effect that all men will be finally recovered and made happy.

Do you find this doctrin of hope in the Presbyterian creed? Is this star, that sheds light on every grave, found in your Bible? Did Christ hav in his mind the shining truth that all the children of men will at last be filled with joy, when he uttered these comforting words, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels?" Do you find in this flame the bud of hope, or the flower of promis?

You suggest that it is possible that "the incurably bad will be annihilated," and you say that such a fate can hav no terrors for me, as I look upon annihilation as the common lot of all. Let us examin this position. Why should a God of infinit wisdom create men and women whom he knew would be "incurably bad?" What would you say of a mechanic who was forced to destroy his own productions on the ground that they were "incurably bad?" Would you say that he was an infinitly wise mechanic? Does infinit justice annihilate the work of infinit wisdom? Does God, like an ignorant doctor, bury his mistakes?

Besides, what right hav you to say that "I look upon annihilation as the common lot of all?" Was there any such thought in my Reply? Did you find it in any published words of mine? Do you find anything in what I hav written tending to show that I believe in annihilation? Is it not true that I say now, and that I hav always said, that I do not know? Does a lack of knowledge as to the fate of the human soul imply a belief in annihilation? Does it not equally imply a belief in immortality?

You hav been—at least until recently—a believer in the inspiration of the Bible and in the truth of its every word. What do you say to the following: "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they hav all one breath; so that a man hath no preëminence above a beast." You will see that the inspired writer is not satisfied with admitting that he does not know. "As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away; so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more." Was it not cruel for an inspired man to attack a sacred belief?

You seem surprised that I should speak of the doctrin of eternal pain as "the black thunder-cloud that darkens all the horizon, casting its mighty shadows over the life that now is and that which is to come." If that doctrin be true, what else is there worthy of engaging the attention of the human mind? It is the blackness that extinguishes every star. It is the abyss in which every hope must perish. It leaves a universe without justice and without mercy—a future without one ray of light, and a present with nothing but fear. It makes heaven an impossibility, God an infinit monster, and man an eternal victim. Nothing can redeem a religion in which this dogma is found. Clustered about it are all the snakes of the Furies.

But you hav abandoned this infamy, and you hav admitted that we are to be judged according to the deeds done in the body. Nothing can be nearer self-evident than the fact that a finite being cannot commit an infinit sin; neither can a finite being do an infinitly good deed. That is to say, no one can deserve for any act eternal pain, and no one for any deed can deserve eternal joy. If we are to be judged by the deeds done in the body, the old orthodox hell and heaven both become impossible.

So, too, you hav recognized the great and splendid truth that sin cannot be predicated of an intellectual conviction. This is the first great step toward the liberty of soul. You admit that there is no morality and no immorality in belief—that is to say, in the simple operation of the mind in weighing evidence, in observing facts, and in drawing conclusions. You admit that these things are without sin, and without guilt. Had all men so believed there never could hav been religious persecution—the Inquisition could not hav been built, and the idea of eternal pain never could hav polluted the human heart.

Yon hav been driven to the passions for the purpose of finding what you are pleased to call "sin," and "responsibility;" and you say, speaking of a human being, "but if he is warped by passion so that he cannot see things truly, then is he responsible." One would suppose that the use of the word "cannot" is inconsistent with the idea of responsibility. What is passion? There are certain desires, swift, thrilling, that quicken the action of the heart—desires that fill the brain with blood, with fire and flame—desires that bear the same relation to judgment that storms and waves bear to the compass on a ship. Is passion necessarily produced? Is there an adequate cause for every effect? Can you by any possibility think of an effect without a cause, and can you by any possibility think of an effect that is not a cause, or can you think of a cause that is not an effect? Is not the history of real civilization the slow and gradual emancipation of the intellect, of the judgment, from the mastery of passion? Is not that man civilized whose reason sits the crowned monarch of his brain—whose passions are his servants?

Who knows the strength of the temptation to another? Who knows how little has been resisted by those who stand, how much has been resisted by those who fall? Who knows whether the victor or the victim made the bravest and the most gallant fight? In judging of our fellow-men we must take into consideration the circumstances of ancestry, of race, of nationality, of employment, of opportunity, of education, and of the thousand influences that tend to mold or mar the character of man. Such a view is the mother of charity, and makes the God of the Presbyterians impossible.

At last you hav seen the impossibility of forgivness. That is to say, you perceive that after forgivness the crime remains, and its children, called consequences, still liv. You recognize the lack of philosophy in that doctrin. You still believe in what you call "the forgivness of sins," but you admit that forgivness cannot reverse the course of nature, and cannot prevent the operation of natural law. You also admit that if a man livs after death, he preserves his personal identity, his memory, and that the consequences of his actions will follow him through all the eternal years. You admit that consequences are immortal. After making this admission, of what use is the old idea of the forgivness of sins? How can the criminal be washed clean and pure in the blood of another? In spite of this forgivness, in spite of this blood, you hav taken the ground that consequences, like the dogs of Actæon, follow even a Presbyterian, even one of the elect, within the heavenly gates. If you wish to be logical, you must also admit that the consequences of good deeds, like winged angels, follow even the Atheist within the gates of hell.

You hav had the courage of your convictions, and you hav said that we are to be judged according to the deeds done in the body. By that judgment I am willing to abide. But, whether willing or not, I must abide, because there is no power, no God, that can step between me and the consequences of my acts. I wish no heaven that I hav not earned, no happiness to which I am not entitled. I do not wish to become an immortal pauper; neither am I willing to extend unworthy hands for alms.

My dear Mr. Field, you hav outgrown your creed —as every Presbyterian must who grows at all. You are far better than the spirit of the Old Testament; far better, in my judgment, even than the spirit of the New. The creed that you hav left behind, that you hav repudiated, teaches that a man may be guilty of every crime—that he may hav driven his wife to insanity, that his example may hav led his children to the penitentiary, or to the gallows, and that yet, at the eleventh hour, he may, by what is called "repentance," be washed absolutely pure by the blood of another, and receive and wear upon his brow the laurels of eternal peace. Not only so, but that creed has taught that this wretch in heaven could look back on the poor earth and see the wife, whom he swore to love and cherish, in the mad-house, surrounded by imaginary serpents, struggling in the darkness of night, made insane by his heartlessness —that creed has taught and teaches that he could look back and see his children in prison cells, or on the scaffold with the noose about their necks, and that these visions would not bring a shade of sadness to his redeemed and happy face. It is this doctrin, it is this dogma—so bestial, so savage, as to beggar all the languages of men—that I hav denounced. All the words of hatred, loathing, and contempt, found in all the dialects and tongues of men, are not sufficient to express my hatred, my contempt, and my loathing of this creed.

You say that it is impossible for you not to believe in the existence of God. With this statement I find no fault. Your mind is so that a belief in the existence of a supreme being givs satisfaction and content. Of course, you are entitled to no credit for this belief, as you ought not to be rewarded for believing that which you cannot help believing; neither should I be punished for failing to believe that which I cannot believe.

You believe because you see in the world around you such an adaptation of means to ends that you are satisfied there is design. I admit that when Robinson Crusoe saw in the sand the print of a human foot, like and yet unlike his own, he was justified in drawing the conclusion that a human being had been there. The inference was drawn from his own experience, and was within the scope of his own mind. But I do not agree with you that he "knew" a human being had been there; he had only sufficient evidence upon which to found a belief. He did not know the footsteps of all animals; he could not hav known that no animal except man could hav made that footprint. In order to hav known that it was the foot of a man, he must hav known that no other animal was capable of making it, and he must hav known that no other being had produced in the sand the likeness of this human foot.

You see what you call evidences of intelligence in the universe, and you draw the conclusion that there must be an infinit intelligence. Your conclusion is far wider than your premis. Let us suppose, as Mr. Hume supposed, that there is a pair of scales, one end of which is in darkness, and you find that a pound weight, or a ten-pound weight, placed upon that end of the scale in the light is raised; hav you the right to say that there is an infinit weight on the end in darkness, or are you compelled to say only that there is weight enough on the end in darkness to raise the weight on the end in light?

It is illogical to say, because of the existence of this earth and of what you can see in and about it, that there must be an infinit intelligence. You do not know that even the creation of this world, and of all planets discovered, required an infinit power, or infinit wisdom. I admit that it is impossible for me to look at a watch and draw the inference that there was no design in its construction, or that it only happened. I could not regard it as a product of some freak of nature, neither could I imagin that its various parts were brought together and set in motion by chance. I am not a believer in chance. But there is a vast difference between what man has made and the materials of which he has constructed the things he has made. You find a watch, and you say that it exhibits, or shows design. You insist that it is so wonderful it must hav had a designer—in other words, that it is too wonderful not to hav been constructed. You then find the watchmaker, and you say with regard to him that he, too, must hav had a designer, for he is more wonderful than the watch. In imagination you go from the watchmaker to the being you call God, and you say he designed the watchmaker, but he himself was not designed, because he is too wonderful to hav been designed. And yet in the case of the watch and of the watchmaker, it was the wonder that suggested design, while in the case of the maker of the watchmaker the wonder denied a designer. Do you not see that this argument devours itself? If wonder suggests a designer, can it go on increasing until it denies that which it suggested?

You must remember, too, that the argument of design is applicable to all. You are not at liberty to stop at sunrise and sunset and all that adds to the happiness of man; you must go further. You must admit that an infinitly wise and merciful God designed the fangs of serpents, the machinery by which the poison is distilled, the ducts by which it is carried to the fang, and that the same intelligence impressed this serpent with a desire to deposit this deadly virus in the flesh of man. You must believe that an infinitly wise God so constructed this world that, in the process of cooling, earthquakes would be caused—earthquakes that devour and overwhelm cities and states. Do you see any design in the volcano that sends its rivers of lava over the fields and the homes of men? Do you really think that a perfectly good being designed the invisible parasites that infest the air, that inhabit the water, and that finally attack and destroy the health and life of man? Do you see the same design in cancers that you do in wheat and corn? Did God invent tumors for the brain? Was it his ingenuity that so designed the human race that millions of people should be born deaf and dumb—that millions should be idiotic? Did he knowingly plant in the blood or brain the seeds of insanity? Did he cultivate those seeds? Do you see any design in this?

Man calls that good which increases his happiness, and that evil which givs him pain. In the olden time, back of the good he placed a God; back of the evil a devil; but now the orthodox world is driven to admit that the God is the author of all.

For my part, I see no goodness in the pestilence —no mercy in the bolt that leaps from the cloud and leaves the mark of death on the breast of a loving mother. I see no generosity in famin, no goodness in disease, no mercy in want and agony. And yet you say that the being who created parasites that liv only by inflicting pain—the being responsible for all the sufferings of mankind—you say that he has "a tenderness compared to which all human love is faint and cold." Yet according to the doctrin of the orthodox world, this being of infinit love and tenderness so created nature that its light misleads, and left a vast majority of the human race to blindly grope their way to endless pain.

You insist that a knowledge of God—a belief in God—is the foundation of social order; and yet this God of infinit tenderness has left for thousands and thousands of years nearly all of his children without a revelation. Why should infinit goodness leave the existence of God in doubt? Why should he see millions in savagery destroying the lives of each other, eating the flesh of each other, and keep his existence a secret from man? Why did he allow the savages to depend on sunrise and sunset and clouds? Why did he leave this great truth to a few half-crazed prophets, or to a cruel, heartless, and ignorant church? The sentence, "There is a God," could hav been imprinted on every blade of grass, on every leaf, on every star. An infinit God has no excuse for leaving his children in doubt and darkness.

There is still another point. You know that for thousands of ages men worshiped wild beasts as God. You know that for countless generations they knelt by coiled serpents, believing those serpents to be Gods. Why did the real God secrete himself and allow his poor, ignorant, savage children to imagin that he was a beast, a serpent? Why did this God allow mothers to sacrifice their babes? Why did he not emerge from the darkness? Why did he not say to the poor mother, "Do not sacrifice your babe; keep it in your arms; press it to your bosom; let it be the solace of your declining years. I take no delight in the death of children; I am not what you suppose me to be; I am not a beast; I am not a serpent; I am full of love, and kindness, and mercy, and I want my children to be happy in this world?" Did the God who allowed a mother to sacrifice her babe through the mistaken idea that he, the God, demanded the sacrifice, feel a tenderness toward that mother "compared to which all human love is faint and cold?" Would a good father allow some of his children to kill others of his children to please him?

There is still another question. Why should God, a being of infinit tenderness, leave the question of immortality in doubt? How is it that there is nothing in the Old Testament on this subject? Why is it that he who made all the constellations did not put in his heaven the star of hope? How do you account for the fact that you do not find in the Old Testament, from the first mistake in Genesis to the last curse in Malachi, a funeral service? Is it not strange that some one in the Old Testament did not stand by an open grave of father or mother and say, "We shall meet again?" Was it because the divinely inspired men did not know?

You taunt me by saying that I know no more of the immortality of the soul than Cicero knew. I admit it. I know no more than the lowest savage, no more than a doctor of divinity—that is to say, nothing.

Is it not, however, a curious fact that there is less belief in the immortality of the soul in Christian countries than in heathen lands—that the belief in immortality in an orthodox church is faint, and cold, and speculativ, compared with that belief in India, in China, or in the Pacific Isles? Compare the belief in immortality in America, of Christians, with that of the followers of Mohammed. Do not Christians weep above their dead? Does a belief in immortality keep back their tears? After all, the promises are so far away, and the dead are so near—the echoes of words said to hav been spoken more than eighteen centuries ago are lost in the sounds of the clods that fall on the coffin. And yet, compared with the orthodox hell, compared with the prison-house of God, how ecstatic is the grave—the grave without a sigh, without a tear, without a dream, without a fear! Compared with the immortality promised by the Presbyterian creed, how beautiful annihilation seems! To be nothing—how much better than to be a convict forever! To be unconscious dust—how much better than to be a heartless angel!

There is not, there never has been, there never will be, any consolation in orthodox Christianity. It offers no consolation to any good and loving man. I prefer the consolation of Nature, the consolation of hope, the consolation springing from human affection. I prefer the simple desire to liv and love forever.

Of course, it would be a consolation to know that we hav an "almighty friend" in heaven; but an almighty friend who cares nothing for us, who allows us to be stricken by his lightning, frozen by his winter, starved by his famin, and at last imprisoned in his hell, is a friend I do not care to hav.

I remember "the poor slave mother who sat alone in her cabin, having been robbed of her children;" and, my dear Mr. Field, I also remember that the people who robbed her justified the robbery by reading passages from the sacred scriptures. I remember that while the mother wept, the robbers, some of whom were Christians, read this: "Buy of the heathen round about, and they shall be your bondmen and bondwomen forever." I remember, too, that the robbers read: "Servants be obedient unto your masters;" and they said this passage is the only message from the heart of God to the scarred back of the slave. I remember this, and I remember, also, that the poor slave mother upon her knees in wild and wailing accents called on the "almighty friend," and I remember that her prayer was never heard, and that her sobs died in the negligent air.

You ask me whether I would "rob this poor woman of such a friend?" My answer is this: I would giv her liberty; I would break her chains. But let me ask you, did an "almighty friend" see the woman he loved "with a tenderness compared to which all human love is faint and cold," and the woman who loved him, robbed of her children? What was the "almighty friend" worth to her? She preferred her babe.

How could the "almighty friend" see his poor children pursued by hounds—his children whose only crime was the love of liberty—how could he see that, and take sides with the hounds? Do you believe that the "almighty friend" then governed the world? Do you really think that he

> Bade the slave-ship speed from coast to coast,
> Fanned by the wings of the Holy Ghost?

Do you believe that the "almighty friend" saw all of the tragedies that were enacted in the jungles of Africa—that he watched the wretched slave-ships, saw the miseries of the middle passage, heard the blows of all the whips, saw all the streams of blood, all the agonized faces of women, all the tears that were shed? Do you believe that he saw and knew all these things, and that he, the "almighty friend," looked coldly down and stretched no hand to save?

You persist, however, in endeavoring to account for the miseries of the world by taking the ground that happiness is not the end of life. You say that "the real end of life is character, and that no disciplin can be too severe which leads us to suffer and be strong." Upon this subject you use the following language: "If you could hav your way you would make everybody happy; there would be no more poverty, and no more sickness or pain." And this, you say, is "a child's picture, hardly worthy of a stalwart man." Let me read you another "child's picture," which you will find in the twenty-first chapter of Revelation, supposed to hav been written by St. John, the Divine: "And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain."

If you visited some woman living in a tenement, supporting by her poor labor a little family—a poor woman on the edge of famin, sewing, it may be, her eyes blinded by tears—would you tell her that "the world is not a playground in which men are to be petted and indulged like children?" Would you tell her that to think of a world without poverty, without tears, without pain, is a "child's picture?" If she asked you for a little assistance, would you refuse it on the ground that by being helped she might lose character? Would you tell her: "God does not wish to hav you happy; happiness is a very foolish end; character is what you want, and God has put you here with these helpless, starving babes, and he

A Strange Tale With a Yard-Long Moral.

Washington Correspondence of the New York Herald.

The story which is sent you herewith is one of the strangest that can be imagined, and one which no American can read without pride in his countrymen, who, wherever they go, know how to set up an orderly society and maintain peace and the security of persons and property.

There is a tract of land lying south of Kansas and Colorado, and between the Indian territory and New Mexico, which has been known for many years as "No Man's Land." It has this name because by errors in surveys, by exclusions in acts of Congress fixing boundaries, and by general neglect and inadvertence it lies outside of any organized state or territory of the United States. It is really a "No Man's Land," for no courts hav jurisdiction within its bounds; no laws extend over or apply to it; its lands cannot be owned, because Congress has not authorized their sale. "No Man's Land" is simply a spot on the map.

A tolerably large spot, for it contains 3,687,360 acres, being 167 miles long by 34 1-2 wide. It is fertil, well watered, has valuable deposits of coal, a fine climate, and, being almost all good land, a government report says that it has the raw material for 23,000 farms of 160 acres each.

It was for years a huge cattle run. It contains at present 10,000 American farmers, who hav sent one of their number, Mr. O. G. Chase, here to ask Congress in their name to giv them a territorial government, with the laws and protection of the flag which they are so totally and singularly without. They hav agreed to call their territory Cimarron, from its principal river, and if Congress is as kind to them as their good conduct deserves, the present winter will see established the territory of Cimarron.

These ten thousand Americans went into No Man's Land, knowing that the land they settled on and cultivated they could get no legal title to unless Congress would act for their protection; knowing that no crime, not even murder, committed in No Man's Land could be punished, because no courts, no law officers, no laws, took cognizance of what was done in No Man's Land. They had no authority to form a government; no power to levy taxes for the simplest or most necessary purposes; no power to make laws which any inhabitant need obey. Chaos was their enforced condition.

Mr. O. G. Chase, the delegate they hav sent here to speak for them, is a well-built and intelligent man—a typical American, an old Kansas settler. His account of "Cimarron," which follows, tells what the people of No Man's Land hav done and what they hope for from Congress.

Q. How many people are there in the territory of Cimarron? A. About ten thousand, estimated.

Q. Mostly Americans? A. There is an unusual proportion of nativ-born citizens there; more than in any territory I hav ever been in.

Q. How long since they first began to go in there to settle? A. Not exceeding two years. A year ago there were not over four or five hundred people there.

Q. Before that was it entirely uninhabited? A. Before that it was only inhabited by cattle-men. Two years ago most of the stock was frozen out by an excessivly cold winter.

Q. In the two years hav your people built houses, churches, and schools, in the American fashion? A. Only within the last year. There were not people enough there to build schools and churches two years ago. The people are nearly all farmers. Those living in the towns own land, and are arranging to cultivate the same next spring. When a farmer goes in there with his family and picks out a piece of land he takes 160 acres.

Q. How does he know he has taken 160 acres? A. The territory has been surveyed into townships, and from those corners we can stake out the sections.

Q. What do the people do to liv? Simply sell their grain and stock? A. They hav not been there long enough to sell anything. Not fifty farmers were there early enough last year to raise crops. But wheat grows excellently, and fine crops of corn are raised, and it is a fine country for other cereals, such as oats, canary, and millet. Canary is a very good crop—worth more than wheat. It is generally imported to this country, but we can raise it out there abundantly.

Q. Are the people living in houses or dug-outs? A. In good log-houses in the country. In the towns the houses are mostly frames.

Q. Of course nobody has any right to the land? A. Nothing but a squatter right.

Q. And there is no government? A. Only a provisional government, known there as a territorial council; it is hardly a government. In November, 1886, we got up a petition calling for a mass meeting in Beaver to take steps looking to the organization of a council for the purpose of beginning some shadow of government, as we were entirely without any law. The result of that mass meeting was an election called for February 22d last for the selection of nine members to a council, three from each meridian district, to meet in Beaver on March 4th. We had no printing office in the territory at the time. The tickets were all written, and the poll books were written. The election was held in an orderly manner. About eighty votes were cast in Beaver. Nine good, representativ men were elected. O. D. Chase was made president, and Merritt Magann made secretary.

Q. Then what did you do in this council? A. The first act that was passed was an act to regulate the rights of matrimony, authorizing ordained ministers within the territory to marry persons upon a certificate obtained from the secretary of the territorial council, who was Mr. Magann, and the ministers were requested in solemnizing the rite of matrimony to return the certificate to the secretary for record.

Q. Has that act been taken advantage of? A. Yes, they hav tried that with beneficial results. The second act was legalizing mechanics' loans on buildings, and the third was an act relativ to chattel mortgages, so that the people might obtain money, which I hav myself tried and found successful. We could not borrow on the land, because, of course, we hav no titles. The fourth act was in reference to opening and protecting public highways and bridges.

Q. Hav you any criminal code? A. We hav, of course, no laws at all. We can only act by general agreement. For instance, we hav agreed on a regulation for squatter rights. It is this: If a man undertakes to hold a claim—the squatter claim is 160 acres—he may do so, but any one person claiming or controling any more than 160 acres shall forfeit both claims to the first families coming into the territory wanting such land. We also adopted a resolution calling for another election to be held Nov. 8, 1887, for nine senatorial councilmen and fourteen delegate councilmen. We retained the name "councilmen" so that it might not be thought we were assuming the duties of a strictly legislativ body. The territory was divided by the same councilmen into three senatorial districts by meridian lines, and seven delegate districts by township lines. That election was held on the 8th of last month, and twenty-three good, representativ men were elected, who met in Beaver December 5th, and are now in session. At the same election O. D. Chase was chosen a delegate to represent the territory in the fiftieth Congress, and I hav accordingly come to Washington to do what I can to get territorial government for the ten thousand people who liv in that territory. There will be fifty thousand people there next year, because if territorial government is organized for us it is anticipated that at least fifty thousand people will go in there within another year.

Q. You hav not made any attempt as yet to frame a constitution, I suppose? A. No, sir. We took an oath that we would support the Constitution of the United States, and we thought that was enough for a beginning.

Q. Is there general peace and order among the ten thousand people? A. Yes, sir. So far we hav been fortunate enough to maintain peace and good order, and our families feel as safe there as they would in Washington city. We hav had horse-thieves among us who undertook to locate there and run our horses into Kansas and sell them. I believe one-half of the horses hav been stolen from the farmers during the last year and taken into other states and sold.

Q. Hav you caught any of those fellows? A. Yes. Last March two of them were caught and shot down. There was a coroner's inquest held over the bodies, and it was decided that they were bad citizens and were removed for the public good, and the law-abiding people then breathed easier. You could hear that remark all over the territory. The bodies were boxed up and sent to their friends. Another gang assembled in the territory last October and a quarrel arose, between the horse-thieves and the gamblers. The gamblers began to kill the thieves to save their own lives, but in their efforts to do that they only succeeded in getting one of them. They shot him on the street, and the others fled from the town. That night the gamblers left, for fear the thieves would return and kill them, and in that way we got rid of them. Since then we hav had perfect peace—hav never had a quarrel or fight in our town. We hav a city marshal by the name of Mundell, located in Beaver. We pay him $50 a month.

Q. How do you raise that money? A. The business men pay it. The merchants pay $2 a month, and the saloons are taxed $3 a month each. We hav disarmed everybody except the marshal. We make it a penal offense to carry weapons. Mayor Thomas presides over a council that was elected for Beaver in August.

Q. What do you pay the mayor? A. Only his fees. He acts as probate judge.

Q. Do you find it easy to collect money enough from the people to defray the small expenses of government throughout your territory? A. Yes, sir; they are all willing to contribute. We hav a school also, for the support of which we tax the saloons $2 a month, and the business men generally pay $1 a month for that purpose. There is an average of fifty scholars in Beaver. What I say of Beaver is true with respect to the whole territory. We very seldom hear of a fight anywhere in the territory between individuals. The only crime that is likely to be called to the notice of the people is the squatting on too much land, or on other people's land. That was first attempted to be settled by arbitration. Those arbitrators were selected from neighbors, and either party, being dissatisfied with their decision, has an appeal from the first arbitration by paying $5 into the public treasury, for five arbiters, each party selecting two and the four selecting a fifth arbiter. That is the highest court we hav. The decision of the five arbiters is final.

Q. Has there been a case on the part of a man to resist a verdict that has gone against him? A. I do not think there has been a case reported. We hav settled a great many troubles.

Q. How do you collect debts, or do you do that? A. Well, take for instance the case of Mrs. Pockingburgh. She came to Beaver last March, having in her possession notes to the amount of $900 against a man living in the vicinity of Beaver for borrowed money. She saw him several times. He sent her to the hotel in Beaver, telling her he would pay her board until he raised the money for her. The landlord boarded her one week and then refused to take this man for the board bill. She then applied to the citizens for redress, producing the notes as evidence of his indebtedness. The citizens met and appointed a sheriff, who seized five tons of barbed wire that this man had just imported from the United States, and advertised it for sale. It was sold and the proceeds turned over to the lady. It did not pay the debt in full, but she, being satisfied, gave up the notes to the man and returned to her home in the States. The citizens of Beaver afterward received letters from people in the state from which this man came asking for a copy of the laws of No Man's Land under which this debt was collected, on the ground that under their laws they had failed to collect of this man for twenty years.

Q. Hav you any lawyers in the territory? A. I do not think there is a lawyer in the territory. We hav no use for them at all.

Q. What mail facilities do you get in No Man's Land? A. There are two mails carried from the Santa Fé road about eighty miles into the territory, one making its stop at Beaver and the other at Optima, a weekly mail to Optima and tri-weekly to Beaver.

Q. What do the people of the territory do to get their mail? A. Some of them go a hundred miles to get their letters. We hav organized a private mail service east and west, but it is not regular. It is paid by private subscription. We need a mail route from east to west clear through from Anglewood, Kan., to Madison, N. M. That is from railroad to railroad on each side, which would accomodate the largest number of people.

Q. How did the settlement of No Man's Land come about? A. No Man's Land was originally a part of Texas, but in 1850 it was ceded to the United States, and the act ratified by Congress and legislature of Texas.

Q. How does it come that this little corner of the world has been left without the jurisdiction of any of the states or territories surrounding it, and without law? A. The peculiarity of the case is that from that time to this no action has been taken by the Congress of the United States extending the jurisdiction of the government over it.

Q. How many acres has No Man's Land? A. Three million six hundred and seventy thousand six hundred and forty acres. At least ninety degrees of it is agricultural land without irrigation. The climate is excellent and the altitude about 2,500 feet on the average. It is watered by the North Canadian or Beaver river, as it is known there, taking its rise in the Rabbit Ear mountains in New Mexico and flowing entirely through the territory, nearly in the center; also by the Cimarron river on the north and its branches, which runs from west to east along the Colorado border adjacent to the territory. The Paladora river flows from Hansford county, Texas, into the center of the territory of Cimarron, entering the Beaver about forty miles west of the eastern country. The upper parts of our streams are deep and narrow, filled with plenty of fish and clear, cold, running water, and any quantity of never-failing springs along the banks—soft, fresh water. We hav beds of bituminous coal, building stone, sandstone, marble, and chalk quarries. The marble is broken on the surface, but no doubt as you go down in the quarry it will be solid and good. Cattle are rolling fat all winter without attention, running on the range. The cattle running on the ranges giv just as good beef as you hav in this city.

Q. There was a bill passed by both Houses of Congress last winter annexing you to the federal district for judicial purposes only and fixing a land office in the state of Kansas and opening the land to settlement under the general land laws of the United States, but the bill was not signed by the president. How was this measure received by your people? A. That bill was not understood by our people. Some claimed that it placed us under the state laws of Kansas; others, that it would giv a United States court within the territory, and others, that we would hav to go to Topeka, a distance of about three hundred miles, for judicial purposes. But when the bill was thoroughly understood, all the people, except those who had private interests to subserve, were thankful that the bill had not been signed by the president. It would hav afforded no substantial relief, and only placed us in the same condition as the Indian territory holds to Kansas, Arkansas, and Texas at present. It did not establish the right of the settlers. The effect of that bill, if it had been signed by the president, would hav been to drive out of the territory one-half of the present population, because it furnished no protection to their rights, but would hav given an opportunity for capitalists holding scrip purchased for that purpose to obtain the land in large tracts without occupancy or inhabitancy, or without ever having seen it, for that matter. Our people want territorial government, with the privilege of electing their officers the same as other territories hav, because we want laws established, not now having any lawful government. And we want such a law for the settlement of land titles as will protect our farmers and settlers in their 160-acre holdings, and keep land-grabbers away from us. One hundred and sixty acres is enough for any family; and, under our own regulations, no one can hold more. Nor can one hold less, unless he livs on it or cultivates it. We do not want land speculators to hav the upper hand with us.

What Can Be Done?

The infamy has been consummated. Liberty is strangled. Justice is travestied; hope of legal protection crushed out of the hearts of thousands, while the ruling classes are jubilant, or at least would be, were not their cowardly, craven souls the abode of constant terror of what they imagin will be perpetrated upon them; fears born of their own guilty deservings.

The brave men that went to their fates with a sublime courage that has no parallel in history—two to their living grâves, and the five to their terrible deaths—call loudly upon other workers for the amelioration of the condition of the despoiled millions to gird on their armor anew and with greater energy and zeal carry forward the work they were compelled to lay down at so unseasonable an hour.

These men, our brothers, were convicted in advance of trial, were condemned against evidence of innocence, the petitions of hundreds of thousands of their fellow-citizens for commutation of sentence unheeded, the poor privilege when standing upon the trap with manacled limbs and haltered neck to say a last word to the ungrateful world before leaving it—a privilege never in the history of our nation denied the vilest criminal and one that a lynching mob or horde of savages would grant its victim before compelling him to take his exit from life—this privilege denied.

Spies spoke truly when from behind his cap he said, "The time will come when our silence will be more powerful than the voices you strangle to-day."

Cowardly state that would thus throttle free speech, even on the gallows, hang men for opinions, outrage justice, and make our country a reproach to the very name of republic!

Where were the senses of the judges, jurors, and sheriffs that they did not know that the spirit of unrest under the injustice perpetrated upon the despoiled classes could not be stilled by adding another and more outrageous wrong upon them in the cruel murder of their friends and leaders?

Socrates was compelled to drink the hemlock, but his philosophy survived him. Galileo was forced to retract his heresy to save his life, but a few years after the people said he was right, that the world moved. Bruno was burnt at the stake, and now we are to build him a monument. Joan de Arc died for her convictions at the hands of those she had risked her life to save. John Brown was hung, but his death, instead of stopping, hastened the day of deliverance to the slave.

But the pages of history fail to furnish an instance—the state of enlightenment considered—of such gross injustice and thirst for blood as characterized the ruling classes who strangled on one sad day four men innocent of any crime and sent two others to the penitentiary for life; at the same time incarcerating a wife and two innocent children in a noisome prison cell because demanding a last interview with their loved one, as had been promised them by the officials.

Their moral heroism and unfailing courage sustained them to the last. The Nazarene is said to hav cried out, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" but the last words heard from them were, "Let me speak! O men of America—— May I speak? Sheriff Matson, let the voice of the people be heard! Oh——" and that inhuman wretch, Matson, whose name should be handed down in history branded with eternal infamy, stopped his breath and satiated his love of vengeance by watching the lingering deaths of these victims of hate in their purposely prolonged agony for fourteen minutes, almost a quarter of an hour, when no reason existed, except a desire for torture. Why were the arrangements not such as to hav made death instantaneous?

O my country! your crimes hav been great, but in cold-blooded cruelty this last outrage exceeds them all.

It is not enough that you hav taken from the people the free gifts of nature and transferred them to soulless corporations whom you hav given the power and means to rob manhood of its independence and fasten fetters on the limbs of labor; to steal from the people their homes, driving them into dark and filthy abodes, into whose grim and damp apartments no ray of sunshine ever enters; to grind the flesh and bones of men and women and children and convert them into palatial homes and bank accounts. You hav condemned the masses to pay taxes in support of hypocritical priests who mouth prayers in every department of governmental affairs. You hav exempted hundreds of millions of church property from paying its just share of taxation for the support of the government it demands protection from, thus entailing a greater burden upon the poor. You hav placed the mothers of the nation on the same political plane with criminals, lunatics, and idiots, taxing them to help support the infamy, at the same time flaunting the infamous lie in their faces that "this is a government of the people, by the people, for the people."

You hav set spies upon the track of every honest investigator of new truths in the most important domain of thought, and woe to the individual that discovers a fact not already indorsed by the church and Grundies.

With obscenity laws, blasphemy laws, conspiracy laws; with fines, imprisonment, and death as penalties; with Comstock the vicious to supervise the mails; with ignorant policemen to judge what is proper to be uttered at a public meeting, or whether one shall be held at all; with Pinkertons to protect the interests of the rich and shoot at their pleasure men, women, and children; with private detectivs on hand at every occasion to interfere with citizens' rights, you trample under foot the fundamental principles upon which we hav achieved all that is of worth, and which rights are guaranteed by our Constitution—"freedom of speech, of the press, and the right of peaceable assemblage."

With all these wrongs by you inflicted, you ask us to worship at your shrine. Can you expect it? What will the harvest be? JULIET H. SEVERANCE.

Some Thoughts on the Penal Code.

IN THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 10th I find the following section of the penal code under which John Most was indicted, found guilty, and sentenced to the penitentiary:

> Whenever three or more persons assemble with intent to commit any unlawful act by force, or assemble with intent to carry out any purpose in such a manner as to disturb the public peace, or, being assembled, attempt or threaten any act tending toward a breach of the peace or an injury to persons or property, or any unlawful act, such an assembly is unlawful, and every person participating therein by his presence, aid, or instigation is guilty of a misdemeanor.

I did not read the proceedings of the trial, and hence cannot tell whether the two others were found guilty under this section or not. I hav seen no account of the trial or reference to the same which mentions any other person as guilty except John Most. Under the section quoted, I should hold that there must be three guilty men or none. In law one man cannot make a riot or form a conspiracy. It must be proven that one or more other persons were unlawfully engaged in the riot or conspiracy in order to convict. In this instance the statute made it necessary to prove that at least three persons were present with intent to commit an unlawful act by force. Most was convicted by reason of his speech. If no other speeches were made by which unlawful intent could be proved, then Most stood alone, and the meeting was not an unlawful assembly under the law. To be unlawful, the fact must be established that at least three persons were guilty of intent to commit an unlawful act.

The section also declares that every person participating in the unlawful assembly by his presence is guilty. If the meeting in question was an unlawful assembly, then the reporter and two policemen, by whose testimony Most was convicted, were also guilty.

Being a temperance man, I sometimes attend temperance meetings. I hav frequently heard in such meetings violent harangs, going so far as to justify the burning of saloons, and suggesting the destruction of liquors by pouring them upon the ground. If I should happen to drop into such a meeting in your state, and listen to such talk, how could I hope to escape the penitentiary, being a temperance man, especially if the jury loved their grog?

In other years I was an antislavery man, and am none the less so now. I hav attended hundreds of meetings protesting against slavery, when to hold such meetings was to "disturb the public peace." Under the law quoted, if I had been convicted of every offense, I should end my days in the penitentiary.

I am a Republican, profiting by our wholesome tariff laws. The Democrats, as I understand, propose the coming summer to get up meetings which threaten to interfere with those laws, and thus injure my property and the property of my Republican neighbors. It makes us mad to hear them talk, and I am inclined to think, if they should hav the audacity to hold a public meeting hereabouts, it would provoke a breach of the peace, and if your law prevailed in this state we could send them all to the penitentiary.

Now, there may be some who think my interpretation of the law and my illustrations are not correct or fair. If so, I differ with them. It would be a very easy thing under that law for temperance men to suppress saloon men, or saloon men to suppress temperance men, or for Republicans to suppress Democrats, or Democrats to suppress Republicans. The law was designed to place in the hands of existing authorities the power to suppress all meetings designed to overthrow or change existing laws or institutions. It is only a question of which power is in possession of the government machine. History is full of illustrations going to show that whenever "the powers that be" see a rising or growing sentiment, looking to a radical change in the existing order of things, they are ever prompt with laws to suppress it. My paternal ancestor was banished from Scotland two hundred years ago because he was a Presbyterian. He was convicted of treason, and his life was spared only because of his youth. In the church troubles of that time an archbishop was assassinated, and it was proven on the trial that the young man, upon hearing of the news many miles away, expressed satisfaction. This was enough. The real assassins were never caught, but more than five hundred persons were convicted for sympathy with the act. But with all their hangings and banishments Presbyterianism was not suppressed. THE TRUTH SEEKER has done as much to suppress it as any influence I am aware of.

Some forty-five years ago my mother had a cousin who was a young divinity student at a college in Illinois. A slave escaped from Missouri with a knowledge that this young student would aid him on his way to freedom. The young man was enticed over into St. Louis, and he was arrested, convicted, and sentenced to twelve years in the penitentiary for aiding this slave to escape. It was in vain that his counsel pleaded that Missouri had no jurisdiction of an offense committed in Illinois. He served four years, and, a new governor coming in, he was pardoned. But, strange to relate, his imprisonment did him no good, any more than the many imprisonments of Herr Most hav benefited him. He became an antislavery lecturer, hating slavery even more than before his imprisonment.

It is lawful, I believe, to abate a nuisance, and it seems to me it would be more in harmony with law and precedent for some grand jury to declare Most a nuisance and then for some policeman to abate him, rather than convict him under such a law as is quoted. Some thirty years ago or more, when the Democrats were in power, some pestiferous Abolitionists from Massachusetts armed themselvs with Sharpe's rifles and went out to Kansas, where they started a town which they called Lawrence, and erected a hotel which they called the Free State Hotel. All this was calculated to disturb the peace of the loyal citizens of Missouri, something less than a hundred miles away. They went before the grand jury and had the hotel declared a nuisance, and the marshal of the territory was ordered to abate it, and he did it. It was built of stone and would not burn, so the marshal procured a cannon of sufficient size and knocked it to pieces. Where there is a will there is a way.

There is nothing that this country needs just now more than a recurrence to the principles upon which this government was founded. Our fathers had a lively knowledge and appreciation of the bloody struggles through which their fathers had fought and suffered to establish what they called religious liberty. In earlier days it was treason to think evil of the king, or to train for heaven except in accordance with prescribed forms. Our fathers repudiated the arbitrary methods of ancient governments and religions and endeavored to giv emphasis to the idea of extreme toleration in difference of opinion concerning politics or religion. It was thus that they declared in the Declaration of Independence that the people had the right to alter or abolish their government as they should see fit. It was thus that they put it into the Constitution that treason should consist, not merely of words or thoughts, but of some overt act. It was thus that they declared that the right of the people to peaceably assemble, to bear arms, and to write or speak should not be infringed. These fundamental principles are the surest and safest guarantee of the strength and perpetuity of the government. The South denied the right of free speech, which hastened the loss of their power and of their pet institution. Let the people of this country beware lest by an unwise and arbitrary restriction of the rights of free speech and free thought we pervert the government and breed Anarchy. J. K. MAGIE.

Why?

In considering the results of the recent controversy arising from Canon Taylor's assertion that Islam, as a missionary religion, is more successful than Christianity, the Sun of this city finds that these very interesting facts hav been incontestably proved. "It has," it says, "been abundantly proven in this debate that Islam, in Africa, is an aggressiv, conquering force that now dominates half the continent, and is constantly advancing in a large part of the remainder. It has also been shown that the religion of Mohammed is a great blessing to the nativs of Africa, eradicating, as it does, the practices of cannibalism, human sacrifices, and intemperance, destroying the belief in witchcraft and fetichism, and rearing schools, mosques, and manufactories in the large cities of the Soudan. In the vast region south of the Sahara, in which Islam is now supreme, there are sixty millions of water-drinkers among whom the rum question can never arise."

The Sun adds: "The energies of Christian missions should now be exerted to securely plant their truer and higher faith in all the new fields which Mohammedanism has invaded, in order that they may not only vie with Islam in contributing to the welfare of man, but also overcome such evils as slavery and polygamy, which Islam encourages."

With all due respect for the limitless wisdom of Mr. C. A. Dana, we should like to be told why the Christians should endeavor to convert the Mohammedans. A theologian, of course, would say that it is because the Moslems cannot get to heaven without recognizing Christ as the true savior, but that opinion can scarcely be held by a secular newspaper, which considers the material advantages only of religion, the same as it considers the benefits of a railroad, or a patent fertilizer. The spiritual side is secondary, and of small importance.

Why, then, should Christianity be superimposed upon the nativs of Africa? Why should the Bible be substituted for the Koran? Mohammedanism has destroyed sacrifices; the Bible will carry to the negroes the examples of Abraham and of Jephthah. The Koran prohibits the use of strong drink; the Bible commands it, and, in dealing with heathen, Christianity has always sent rum and religion together. And the mixture has destroyed thousands upon thousands of simple heathen. Why must the sixty million of sober water-drinkers receive missionaries from lands filled with drunkards holding the very faith of the missionaries themselvs? Islam has destroyed the belief in witchcraft; why, then, should its converts be pestered with the emissaries of a religion baptized in the blood of witches? Think of a missionary from Boston reading to a civilized African the eighteenth verse of the twenty-second chapter of Exodus! And if the destruction of fetichism is a good thing, why send to people who do not believe in it missionaries of a faith which givs charms against all sorts of accidents and diseases to its devotees? Open the vestments of the Roman Catholics of the world and see if the Bible has done for them what the Koran has for the sixty million of water-drinkers in Africa.

Ah, but Christianity must be taken to Africa that slavery and polygamy, which Islam encourages, may be overcome. The Christian who could write that, with the history of Christian countries before him, and Utah just back of him, must be insensible to progress. Mormonism points to the Bible as authority for plural marriage, and every Christian preacher in the whole South, and three-quarters of those in the North, supported slavery as a divine institution, and justified their sermons by Bible texts. England abolished slavery in her colonies as a political measure, without reference to religion; and the Abolitionists of the United States were heretics. Civilization, not Christianity, overcame slavery.

The fact is, the people make the religion, not the religion the people.

Comstock and the Baptist Ministers.

Anthony Comstock has received what he called a "cruel stab" from the Baptist ministers, who refused to pass a resolution containing the words, "we believe in Anthony Comstock," and substituted therefor words indorsing only the objects of his society. This is indeed being wounded in the house of his friends, for Soapboiler Colgate, Comstock's backer, is a fierce Baptist, and shows his humility by serving on Sundays as usher in a Baptist church at Orange, N. J. Therefore he might, with reason, expect that the Baptist clergy would uphold him and his henchman.

The occasion was the Baptist Monday Conference, at which Anthony was invited to address the preachers on "Art and Morals." "The necessity for discussing this subject," said Anthony, as reported by the Herald, "is apparent to most of you, from the gross misrepresentation in the press about the action of the Society for the Suppression of Vice in bringing certain pictures into court under due process of law. That was a matter of necessity. I am here to make no special defense of our action in that matter. I simply desire to present some questions of law." He continued:

"Art does not stand first; morals stand first in law and in importance to the general welfare of the community. It was held as long ago as 1726, in England, that whatever tends to corrupt morals is indictable. Prior to that time obscenity came under the ban of ecclesiastical law. In the case of the Queen against Hecklin, whose book on the Confessional was avowedly written in the interest of the Protestant religion by a member of an anti-Romanist society to expose the outrages of auricular confession, the courts declared the book obscene, and Chief-Justice Cockburn, in his opinion, said: 'The tendency of the matter published is to deprave the minds of those by whom it is read, as its suggestions are of a lewd and libidinous character.' Every test of obscenity has been coupled with the words 'tend or tendency.' The matter need not be absolutely against morals. Is the interest of those who import and sell lewd French photographs paramount to your homes? Better that artists take back seats than your children be debauched. I believe the very artists who protested against the action of our society did it in ignorance, and that not one of them inquired before he condemned." Mr. Comstock then proceeded to cite decisions and rulings by the courts in his favor, and he said these decisions must be respected. "I may hav no judgment and no discretion, according to the newspapers, but the law is plain."

Comstock then cited further the case of the state of New York against Mueller, and of the United States against D. M. Bennett, the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and quoted the decision of Judge Blatchford, which defines as obscene "anything which tends to deprave the minds of those open to such influences." From this it will be seen that Comstock and Colgate intend to take society back to 1726, and destroy everything which they think may tend to immorality. And inasmuch as the Protestants of that period were severe, sour, dried-up bigots and fanatics, what they would object to would include about all the luxuries of our present civilization. It used to be thought by them that ribbons on a woman's bonnet, or ornamentation on her dress, unduly excited the men, and tended to corrupt their morals. The women, therefore, would hav been indictable, and indeed, under the sumptuary laws many were indicted. Colgate and Comstock seem to be relics of that age.

However, we must congratulate the Baptist ministers for not indorsing Comstock. Had they known more of the inside working of his society, we imagin some of them would hav hesitated before indorsing that.

A New Association.

The Brick Lane Branch of the United Grand Junction Ebenezer Temperance Association, whose doings are so graphically reported in the "Pickwick Papers," has a rival association in Chicago, calling itself the "Christian Conference," and holding anointing services corresponding in a marked manner with the tea-drinking of its English prototype. The Christian Conference advertises to heal the halt, the lame, and the blind, without medicin, without money, and without price. Its divine healing is not metaphysics, nor is it Christian science. What it is may be inferred from the following card, which is a ticket of admission to an anointing service. It was surreptitiously obtained by a Chicago Herald reporter, as the tickets for himself and Samivel to the meeting of the Brick Lane Branch of the United Grand Junction Ebenezer Temperance Association were obtained by the elder Mr. Weller:

CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE—ANOINTING SERVICE.
"IS ANY SICK AMONG YOU?"
That is certainly addressed to ME. What shall I do?
The answer is clear and definit.
Hear and obey.
"Let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord, and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if he hav committed sins they shall be forgiven him. Pray one for another that ye may be healed."—James v, 14-16.
"He healed ALL that were sick. He healed them EVERY ONE." "Jesus, moved with compassion, said, I WILL."
"THE SAME YESTERDAY, TO-DAY, AND FOREVER."
Praise his name.
"I BELIEVE GOD, that it shall be even as he said unto me."—Paul.
FULL SALVATION, COMPLETE REDEMPTION, JESUS ONLY.
"Jesus saves even me."

The reports made at this meeting are fully as encouraging as those made by the committee of the aforesaid temperance association. We condense from the Chicago News:

"The Rev. Dr. Lyman Palmer related an instance of a young man who was suffering from a pulmonary affection. His life was despaired of, and in renouncing medical aid he resorted to prayer for restoration. The Lord healed him instantly (cheers). Besides restoring health, an insatiable desire for strong drink that had ever been the bane of the young man's life was taken away (great applause)."

"Peter Peterson is a ship carpenter. He was severely wounded in the leg by an ax missing its mark. He immediately knelt, and prayed to God to stop the flow of blood and heal the wound. He was instantly healed (appreciativ movement in the audience). His wife, who had suffered eighteen years, was also instantly cured (tremendous cheering)."

"Mrs. Stevens, of Oshkosh, had suffered two years from a severe case of scrofula. All aid from medical sources was despaired of. She was unable to feed herself. One day she read James v, 14, 15. From that moment she believed the Lord would heal her (this attestation of sublime faith was received with bowed heads by the audience)."

"Curvature of the spine confined Miss Minnie Smith, of Dayton, O., to her bed for eighteen years. She was unable to move her limbs, but was inspired one day to call in a number of believers to pray for her restoration to health. While the earnest petitions were ascending heavenward, Miss Smith heard a voice. It said, 'Stretch forth thy leg.' She put forth the withered limb (this announcement of Miss Smith's indelicate exposure was received with a sigh by an elderly spinster, who soon recovered, however), arose from her bed, and walked. Exceptional health has been her companion ever since (tremendous applause)."

"E. W. Jenney, of Oak Park, prayed to be delivered from a severe attack of inflammatory rheumatism. Although unable to sleep, he refused all medical attendance, and relied solely on prayer (loud manifestations of approval of his heroism). He was restored (triumphant cheers)."

"'I suffered for two years with a complication of diseases,' said Mrs. H. A. Weber, of Austin. 'I was under medical care (deep sighs, and a groan from a man who owed his doctor), when I decided to put my case into the hands of the Lord (enthusiastic approval). In March I suffered from a severe hemorrhage. I prayed to God to heal me. "According to your faith be it unto you," came the reply, and since then I hav continually gained strength and health (cheers).'"

"An Orchard Beach woman had suffered for three and a half years with a disease in the limbs. She was unable to walk without crutches. An abscess had formed on the hip, and one limb was several inches shorter than the other. She had implicit faith in the Lord. While the audience was singing a song of praise, she sprang from her seat, threw aside her crutches, and exclaimed, 'I'm healed!' (whirlwind of cheers). Her limb was restored instantly to its natural length (this case was considered so remarkable that the report was closed at once)."

The speaker of the evening, the Rev. Mr. Simpson, then announced that he would answer questions. "What do you think of Christian science?" The speaker, says the Herald, fell upon the doctrin as heavily as Jake Kilrain fell upon Jem Smith in their recent effort to find the pugilistic supremacy of America or England. He dealt it blows that will take at least two more pamphlets by Mrs. Cobb and Mr. Swartz to efface. In response to further queries, Mr. Simpson said he never used mustard plasters; with the help of the Lord he could do three times as much work as formerly, which shows the Lord to be equal at least to two day-laborers; that he wouldn't get married twice to the same person, once being generally enough, and sometimes too many; that God can whiff directly into a person's lungs the breath of healing and rest; that the Lord can cause an amputated finger to grow; that the Emperor Justinian relates that some martyrs in north Africa, whose tongues were cut out, were subsequently enabled to converse without the organ of speech; and that the crown prince of Germany should hav faith and entire reliance in God. He refused to humiliate his prophetic insight by telling what he thought of Mr. Blaine, or whether Mr. Cleveland would be reëlected, or whether local Will Turpie would stay in the senate "for keeps," or whether (what is of great importance to that bustling town) Chicago would get the Democratic convention. Eighty-eight believing Christians were then anointed with ten cents' worth of oil, "in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," after which they hobbled out of the building in the same condition physically, but more spiritually exhilarated than when they entered it.

It seems to us that in these reports of the Chicago papers we detect a trace of levity, but we trust they hav set nothing down unbecoming to the noble character of the services. The afflictions of the sick and the exalted value of Christianity should not be trifled with. If miracles were performed in the time of Jesus, why not in the time of Simpson?

More Testimony to Faith-Cure.

The following experiences in faith-cure are related by a daily paper of this city:

"Charles Mason Squier was a bookbinder in the employ of the American Bible Society. He lived at the Berachah Home, Fourth avenue and Sixty-first street, this city, eighteen months. The Valley of Berachah, beloved readers, was the place Jehoshaphat and his people assembled at to thank the Lord that he had made their enemies destroy each other, thus enabling them to strip the dead bodies of riches and precious jewels. Mr. Simpson, the head of the institution, is the Chicago preacher. Mr. Squier was pointed to as a shining example of the faith-cure power. Sunday night, December 18, 1887, Mr. Squier hanged himself to a hook in a closet in his room in the house named after the valley where Jehoshaphat thanked God."

"A girl living at Rutherford Park, N. J., was placed in a faith-cure "home" at Grenville, N. J. She soon became insane. She took poison and died."

"Miss Violet Hopkins, of Jersey City, became convinced that faith would cure sickness. When attacked with pneumonia some months since, she insisted upon going to a faith-cure establishment in Bergen county, N. J., to be cured. She has now been taken back to her home with an incurable consumption, and will die soon."

Following immediately after the establishment of a faith-cure "home" in Chicago, these testimonies partake of the nature of the invaluable.

Systematic Theology.

The subjoined paragraph, which is the conclusion of an article on "Christian Perfection," by Daniel Steele, professor of systematic theology in Boston University, in the Christian Advocate, should, says the editor of that journal, be read twice:

"A theological error in deadly antagonism to purity of heart is rapidly spreading in England and America. It is the doctrin of imputed instead of imparted personal holiness, together with the necessary co-existence of the flesh and the spirit, the old man and the new, till death. An intellectual assent, without previous repentance, to the fact of the condemnation of sin on the cross, gains a perfect and inalienable standing in Christ, irrespectiv of the grossest subsequent sins."

That is to say, Christ's personal holiness does not necessarily giv, or impute, holiness to believers in him, but it must be imparted to each one separately; and whomsoever says otherwise, let him be anathema by the Rev. Dr. Steele, professor of systematic theology of Boston University. And further, whoever says that when a Methodist is born again, or suffers regeneration, he still has left in him any of the old man, let him be likewise anathema by direction of the aforesaid Professor Steele. And still further, whoever asserts that by merely believing that Jesus died for sinners he can, without repenting, get to heaven, even though he commits other sinful acts, let him be debarred from the true fold—which is, of course, the Methodist—by order of the professor of systematic theology of Boston University. No man shall hav a perfect and inalienable standing in Christ on any such terms. It's preposterous to think it. Unbelievers must not only believe, but they must repent of their unbelief, put the old Adam—which is the flesh—away entirely, and be filled with the spirit, before they can make their calling and election sure. Any other scheme would not be of John Wesley, and consequently must be of the devil.

Everyone must cordially agree with Dr. Buckley that the paragraph should be read twice. We read it four times before grasping its immense significance, though we are something of an expert in Methodism, having in years agone seen three different and distinct Methodist girls home from prayer-meeting in one evening.

Irreligion at the National Capital.

The Rev. Dr. Hershey, of the Sixth Presbyterian church in Washington, wants not only to hav the Bible read in the public schools, but to hav chaplains appointed. The necessity of this he urges because he has been told that only one-tenth of the teachers in the public schools of Washington are Christians!

Four years ago our correspondent "Antichrist" made the startling statement that eight of the nine judges of the Supreme Court of the United States were Infidels. The allegation was controverted by the religous press. Parson Talmage's paper, the Christian at Work, said that Chief-Justice Waite was an Episcopalian, Justice Blatchford the same, Bradley a Dutch Reformed, Gray a Channing Unitarian, and Field a true-blue Presbyterian.

"Antichrist" in rejoinder said that the allegation that eight of the nine judges were Infidels applied to the court as constituted before the retirement of Justice Strong; and he presented evidence to support his allegation in regard to three of the above-named Christian judges which would hav been sufficient to exclude an ordinary man from church-membership. The other two judges had been appointed to fill vacancies since Justice Strong retired.

Exactly how the court now stands religiously may not be easy to ascertain; certainly not quite eight to one, as before the retirement of Judge Strong, because one of the Agnostics, Justice Woods, has died. And now if the Christian at Work will canvass the public school teachers of Washington, the result may be that nearly as large a proportion of them are church-members as of the judges on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States. But, anyway, we presume Dr. Hershey would not withdraw his motion, because the mover of the resolution would expect to receive the first appointment as chaplain to the public schools of Washington.

The Iron-founder's and the Judge's Troubles.

Because Courtlandt Palmer wrote to the New York Tribune that the Chicago Anarchists did not deserve death, Mr. Andrew Carnegie and Judge Barrett resigned from the Nineteenth Century Club, of which Mr. Palmer is the president. Mr. Carnegie is the millionaire iron-founder of Pennsylvania, and Judge Barrett has achieved distinction on the bench in this city. Mr. Carnegie took occasion, when invited to address the club, to make Mr. Palmer's views a subject for discussion, and said many unpleasant things in a personal way. Mr. Barrett is the judge whose decisions in the Sharp case hav been reversed by the Court of Appeals.

Mr. Palmer's views upon the Anarchist cases is that they were executed far more because they were Anarchists than because they were murderers. He considers them as laboring for a good end—the abolition of poverty—and that from their standpoint they were honest thinkers. He does not commend their means nor indorse their standpoint, but believes they were martyrs to their principles, and says that if the Supreme Court of Illinois had possessed the courage of the Court of Appeals of New York, it would hav acted in the Anarchists' case as the latter did in Sharp's. Mr. Palmer considers, too, that his private views are not the business of the club, nor of Mr. Carnegie, nor of Judge Barrett. The motto of the club is, Toleration, Courtesy, and Courage, and, he says, just as Mr. Carnegie has been lacking in the second of these, so Judge Barrett has been found wanting in the third.

The daily papers hav been devoting much space to this dispute in the upper-ten-dom of heresy, and thus far the honors are resting with Mr. Palmer, the former president of the American Secular Union. Mr. Carnegie was rude; Mr. Palmer was gentle, and heaped coals of fire upon the great iron man's head by refusing to accept his resignation. Judge Barrett was afraid to be identified with a club whose president did not yield to popular clamor; Mr. Palmer was sorry, but could not yield his convictions to even so distinguished a judicial officer as Judge Barrett. And the club itself moves to larger quarters, and prospers in membership and influence, educating swelldom in something besides germans and the proper way of disposing of a napkin at the dinner table.

One interesting fact brought out by the discussion in the newspapers is that the lecture committee of the club is searching for a minister of reputation possessing sufficient courage to meet Col. Robert G. Ingersoll on its platform. If Archbishop Corrigan, or Cardinal Gibbons, or Dr. John Hall, or Howard Crosby would accept, what an event it would be! Future chroniclers would begin a paragraph in their nineteenth century history something like this: "From the date of the meeting of the Nineteenth Century Club, at which R. G. Ingersoll and —— debated Christian theology, Christianity perceptibly declined. In about a decade it was extinct."

Editorial Notes.

THOMAS S. RANDALL, of Chicago, says the seceding element in the Knights of Labor of that city hav been "captured by and are now in recognized subordination to the Secular Union." E. A. Stevens has been elected foreman of the assembly.

THE Marlboro (Mass.) Times has an editor who doesn't fear God. Commenting on a petition circulated in the town for a strict enforcement of the Sunday laws, the editor says: "The Sabbath which the Jewish God commanded to be kept holy is not the one our statutes refer to, being at the opposit end of the week, and being intended to commemorate the rest God took after his great six days' work, the first work he ever did in his life, and which naturally rather knocked him out."

THE Rev. Mr. Waddell, Methodist, preached a sermon on Bible temperance at Mt. Forrest, Ont., on the same day that the Rev. Mr. Macdonnell, Episcopalian, preached one at Toronto on the same subject. Mr. Waddell held that the Old Testament forbids the use of strong drink; Mr. Macdonnell took the opposit view. Therefore, those Canadians desirous of knowing just what the Old Testament does teach must procure E. C. Walker's pamphlet on the subject.

THE Kirksville, Mo., Journal, of November 24th, has this item: "A. J. Huffman, living ten or twelve miles southwest of this place, was arrested on information charging him with violating the Sunday law by digging a well. He was tried before Justice Richey, and fined one dollar and costs, amounting in all to about eighteen dollars. He went to jail." This is one of those outrages which every fair-minded man must vigorously denounce. Some Freethinker near there should look into this matter, and if Mr. Huffman is not yet liberated, see what can be done for him.

MRS. M. A. FREEMAN is making a lecture route through Iowa and Nebraska, and is anxious to correspond with individuals and societies desirous of having one or more Liberal lectures in their town. Mrs. Freeman is a very agreeable woman and a talented lecturer, General Trumbull, of Chicago, holding that there are not in this whole country three women of equal genius. Mr. Stevens, the secretary of the American Secular Union, speaks of her with words of highest praise, to which we may add our own encomium, having had the pleasure of listening to her at Cleveland. Her address is 175 South Halsey street, Chicago, Ill., and her terms are reasonable.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Religious Herald (Congregational), George Thompson, writes from Ohio that there is the same decay of religion in that state that has been noted in rural New England. He speaks particularly of that garden spot known as the Western Reserve. He says he has been largely over it in the last seven or eight years, and notes remarkable changes even in that time. "In many places," he reports, "the people work on Sunday as on other days—plowing, cutting, and drawing in hay and grain, etc. And Sabbath-visiting is alarmingly common. In places where were churches well sustained fifty years ago, there are no religious influences, no preaching, and the people are largely Spiritualists, Universalists, Infidels, Atheists, and blasphemers, etc. In many places very feeble churches are struggling to keep up the appearance of life, while worldliness and pleasure-seeking run riot. Many who once went to church go no more. In a number of places I saw Congregational churches turned into barns, and no organization remains. In one section are four small Congregational churches in four towns adjoining, and all without a pastor. It makes my heart ache to see and say these things, but they are true. I hav seen them." He notes that the Baptists and Methodists especially hav lost, and declares that it is only a matter of time when both these churches must become extinct in that section, which is encouraging, if true, and shows that the people are awakening to a sense of duty toward this world. But what kind of an Infidel or Christian is a "blasphemer?"

Letters from Friends.

VICTOR, Nov. 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I was raised a Catholic, but that was knocked out of me by reading of the massacre of the French Huguenots. I hav been a Liberal ever since. I hav a tussle with the preachers every little while, but they go away and say, "You go to hell!" I would rather go where our best men all went than to go to heaven where all good Catholics go. Yours for truth, M. KERCHNER.

FORT ANN, N. Y., Nov. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to get up a club, but as I am the only person in the place that reads Liberal literature, I could not help you any in that direction.

We each and every one of us ought to get up a vote of thanks to Heston for his pictures. If I do laugh but once in the week, it is the time the paper comes. I am what you would call a backwoods woman, living ten miles from a post-office, but hav been in New York once, and called at THE TRUTH SEEKER office with Mrs. Burnz. Keep up your paper by all means, even if you meet with discouragements. The fact that it has penetrated such a back place as this ought to be encouraging, even if it is poor, humble me that reads it. As the Christians say, Another precious soul won—another convert to the god of Truth.

I shall want your ANNUAL for 1888.

MRS. EMERY GIBBARD.

LAFAYETTE, OR., Nov. 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It is with pleasure I inclose $3 for the renewal of my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. There is no paper I take the reading of which givs me more pleasure.

I came to Oregon in 1853, from Clay county, Mo. I brought the Investigator, and Paine's, Voltaire's, and a number of other Liberal books with me to this country. I circulated the works through the county, and got quite a number to subscribe for the paper. The sky-pilots of the country set up the cry that I was an agent of the devil, and would hav taken my life had they dared.

I hav always preached Freethought, and taught my children to read and think for themselvs.

Samuel Putnam gave a number of lectures in this vicinity last fall. It was quite a treat to the Liberals here.

I hav just finished reading Helen Gardener's book entitled, "Men, Women, and Gods." I think it one of the most valuable and interesting contributions to Liberal literature.

Success to your grand paper. May it liv long, and spread the gospel of humanity throughout the world.

Yours truly, L. P. YOUNGER.

GOLDTHWAITE, TEX., Dec. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: This is one of the most thriving little towns on the G. C. & Santa Fé railroad—the western branch of said road. The town was mapped out, and lots sold two years ago, amounting in the aggregate to $25,000. A depot and round-house loomed up, and Goldthwaite became by the voice of the people the county-seat of Mills county. She now presents to the world a magnificent Methodist church, and almost within kissing distance stands a Baptist church. From the pulpit of each edifice orthodoxy oozes out in full blast. Each denomination is willing to allow the younger and feeble branches to come in and cast their sins on Jesus. Old debtors come in to worship and glorify God because the statute law of Texas is about to bar and shield them by limitation, and they are jubilant through the magnetism of shaking hands, etc.—so much so that a few of the most impulsiv hav been endowed with an inspiration that some kind of a musical instrument is required to attract the attention of the God they worship. A subscription is in circulation for that purpose. Cannot you sign about $15 now?

GEO. WHITAKER.

CINCINNATI, O., Dec. 10, 1887.

BROTHER MACDONALD: Can it be possible that a reader, subscriber, or a correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER should want to know anything about the old Cincinnati Materialist, Thos. Winter? And yet I perceive in the issue of Dec. 8, 1887, "Letters from Friends," that one level-headed and right-minded man of the Buckeye State wants to know a little of the old Infidel; and right here I will say, I deal not in politics or hangings, murders, or crimes of any sort, but all my thoughts, words, and efforts are concentrated in the downfall of superstition, I care not by what name it is called. If it be founded on anything supernatural, it is opposed to naturalism or Materialism—which words hav one and the same meaning—and I for one do use all rightful power and method to neutralize or destroy the widespread and evil effects of priestly frauds imposed on the multitudes of credulous people. Every promulgator of what is anti-natural is a deceiver, a crank, or a willful and intentional plunderer. All such take advantage of the weak-minded and unthinking public. Sir, Materialism is truth, and truth must and will triumph over all superstitions and false statements, whether ancient or modern. There is no religious fanaticism or spookism in the Materialistic philosophy; all is clear, all is sound, and free from deceit or lucre. Its grand and noble principles will be an established fact when all superstitious rubbish called religion is swept from this planet, together with all the ignorance thereof. The time is coming when the millions of intelligent persons who must and will supersede the short-sighted, dismal, and miserable Theists will laugh loud and long when they think of the past folly and absurd creeds and mummeries of this and past ages. How they hav been gulled and humbugged by the swarms of idle drones, and pedlers of lies and glaring deceptions, and unblushing cheats!

Dear readers, I shall not liv to see this wondrous change of wisdom and glorious sense of the people. I am approaching the age of eighty years. But come it must. In lapse of time ignorant superstition must pass away, and solid Materialism will prevail, filling the earth with joy, love, prosperity, and general happiness. THOS. WINTER.

SHELBY, MICH., Dec. 12, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I hav a question to ask, and maybe two. If every subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER should add one to his own subscription, would the subscription list reach ten thousand? Please do not think I am meddling with that which does not concern me, because no true Freethinker can feel other than deep and honest concern for such a cause, and a desire to learn all he can in reference to it, and I hav been a subscriber long enough to make me feel as though I had a large investment in a child that has fought as hard for life and received the rough handling THE TRUTH SEEKER has. I do hope the young one may grow up to be a man, and a sturdy one, and if every present subscriber would add one each year, and a paying one, how long would it be before there would be a propagandist establishment so large that creed, bigotry, and tradition could not and would not undertake its annihilation? Judging by my own neighborhood, if all others are like it, the good time is quite a way off yet, and Catholic ignorance and Protestant intolerance show a deal of hard work in the future of Freethought. Your wood-cuts are each one a Liberal lecture of itself, and, oh, Lord! doesn't Rome howl with holy horror? The whole pack of religionists are becoming constitutional grumblers. Now go on with THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Respectfully, J. M. LOGAN, M.D.

BAY VIEW, FLA., Nov. 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me pamphlets according to the inclosed list. The reason that I hav chosen these pamphlets is that I am an outspoken Infidel, as the Christians call me, and hav had an argument with several, and I wish to giv them something to think about. One, a Sunday-school superintendent, said that we Infidels had no institutions of learning, and had no halls of our own to hold our meetings in, so I want to hav more facts, and postponed any definit argument to a stated time so as to meet his statements. If you will be so kind as to send me the names of such schools, or any institutions of learning conducted by Freethinkers, and state where they are situated, I shall be more than obliged.

J. H. KINSMAN.

[Freethinkers own a number of buildings throughout the country, in which meetings are regularly held—a splendid one at Boston; a good one at Waco, Tex.; also, at Liberal, Mo., and Silverton, Or. In this city and in many other places throughout the country Freethinkers do not believe in putting thousands of dollars into a building used only one day in seven, and consequently they hire halls for Sunday which are used on other days. There is a Freethinkers' school at Liberal, Mo., but no other distinctivly Infidel one that we know of. The public schools are good enough for us, and every scientific college in the land is turning out Infidels by the score.—ED. T. S.]

MT. PLEASANT, TEX., Dec. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The following from the Hartford Courant is worth comparing with some of Ingersoll's sayings, to show the truth of them: "So long as Grover Cleveland is president, he is entitled by every respectable citizen to receive personal respect. Not to accord it to him is to lower our own dignity. The demonstrations made by hot-headed Western members of the G. A. R. in regard to the president's visit to St. Louis were disgraceful, and the slight to the president at Wheeling is lamentable." Compare it with this: "The trouble with most people is, they bow to what is called authority; they hav a certain reverence for the old because it is old."

I think the latter expresses the cause of all our troubles. Even Infidels object to Anarchists, Freelovers, writings on the sexual relations, Communism, Watson Heston's pictures, that "hurt the feelings of the Christians," etc. If we would allow everything to run its course freely, the good would come to the front and the bad would run in narrow channels.

And another thing. Is it not time the Liberals of this country were going into politics? When such cases as Reynolds's, Aunt Elmina's, the Harmans', and hanging Anarchists, also confiscating Mormon property, are transpiring, shall we, with the Secular Union as a nucleus and the Nine Demands as a platform, stand idle and see the liberty the good old Infidels made it possible for us to hav trampled under foot, and laws passed that it will take years to hav annulled? We hav Ingersoll, the fittest man for the position of president there is in the United States, and Putnam, or some of our good women, if they can hold the office, for vice-president.

Friends, let us not fail to hav a candidate in the next contest, and you will be surprised at our strength.

E. E. PARK.

BRADFORD, PA., Dec. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Your correspondent from Georgia thinks it a pity the world must be cursed by a bigot, when referring to the persecution of Aunt Elmina. The good people of New York are cursed with a great reformer. The writer inquires how long it would take for a number like him to kill or imprison the Freethinkers of this free country. Our laws need remodeling for the sake of humanity. The idea that law will stuff people with morals is simply ridiculous.

A good man was persecuted almost to death. No one ever enlightened the world as much by a journey around the earth as Bennett. The information given by him was a marvel.

The great informer can't be confined to the metropolis, but his emissaries must invade Jersey and Virginia, seeking whom they may devour. Will the people of New York indorse his doings? I ask one and all, without regard to sect, faith, or belief, to stamp their seal of disapprobation on this hypocritical informer. I fancy he would hav us believe that a man and his darling bride should retire without changing their clothes to avoid obscenity and to promote good morals. What nonsense! Let us study the perfections of nature, and the more beauty we discover the better.

I cannot do justice to a vilifier of character. Please don't bring him before me. I will send him up, sure, as a nuisance, if the evidence warrants it. His idea of obscenity is preposterous. I hope better men will do him justice while agitating this subject, until New York, at least, is relieved of one who is filled with hate, and whose malice would reinstate the Inquisition again.

I circulated Ingersoll's "Reply" to Field in order to procure subscribers. His masterly production is worth the subscription price for any intelligent reader.

Sincerely, O. H. WHEELER.

PUGET SOUND CO-OPERATIVE COLONY,
PORT ANGELES, CLALLAM CO., W. T., Dec. 5, 1887.

MR. MACDONALD, Dear Sir: It may be of some interest to you to know that, while you are working in the interest of humanity on one line, we are making a practical demonstration of, or working out the solution of, the labor problem, and showing the feasibility of integral co-operation and the equitable distribution of wages. We hav been incorporated since May, 1887. We are satisfied that the principle upon which we hav based our enterprise is the correct one, and we hav one very excellent reason for knowing that this is a fact, which reason or test is, that we hav the enmity of the Associated Press and of the religious press. We deprecate the judicial murder at Chicago, hence we ought all of us to be hung. We are nothing but a nest of Infidel Anarchists anyhow, and other like complimentary names are given to us. We cla'm that universal mental liberty shall be the rule of government in our commonwealth; that public halls, open at all hours during the day and evening, in which the discussion of any and all subjects may be had, shall be free to all. We hold that buildings set apart for use only a few hours of each week are a fruitful source of waste and a great cause of poverty, and one which we cannot afford to support. We are trying to demonstrate, and I believe we shall succeed in doing so, that the moral character of a Christian and an Infidel are based upon precisely the same principle; that honesty, integrity, humanitarian principles and uprightness of character and all the better attributes actuate both classes exactly alike.

We find the class of Christians in whose hearts really rests the love of humanity are broad enough to accept our universal mental liberty creed, and put their shoulder to the wheel alongside the Infidel, to help to better the present-life conditions of the people, and by that means, perhaps, giv them a better opportunity to fit themselvs for the higher life when it comes to them. We are banded together, Christian, Infidel, Catholic, Spiritualist (but not a bigot), in a commonwealth, to insure to the laborer the product of his labor; the man who builds a carriage shall not be compelled to walk; the shoemaker's children shall not go barefoot; the seamstress shall be clothed; the equitable distribution of labor and a just compensation therefor shall giv all a chance to liv. A few capitalists shall not control capital, nor a few laborers crowd aside the rest. The world moves and "the people's advents are coming."

Fraternally, and for U. M. L., LAURA E. HALL.

WAVERLY, WASH. TERR., Dec. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We see on the top of our court-houses the emblem of justice represented by a female blindfolded, and holding a pair of balances in her hand. I think the emblem might now be called a mockery, and discarded as insignificant of any meaning. Men can be tried, found guilty, and hung for the honest expression of their thoughts. Can such be justice? I was a firm believer in the majesty of the law when the same did not interfere with the individual happiness of anyone. But now men can be called Anarchists if they advocate equal justice to the poor as well as the rich, and accused of throwing bombs when the act might hav been done by their enemies. Why not catch and hang the one that did the deed, and not sacrifice innocent life, perhaps, to satisfy a howling monopoly? O men! when will you learn to be honest, and not hang every reformer that may advocate a right or a theory that would benefit the masses? In your frenzy you hav persecuted every reformer that ever tried to benefit the masses. You hung Christ, the son of God, on a cross; you burnt Servetus; you kindled the fires in Smithfield; you banished Roger Williams, and hung John Brown; and last, but not least, you hav swung into eternity five men that you called Anarchists. Why was it done? You say, as a warning to others that might hav their ideas. What fools you are, to be living in this nineteenth century, and think you can hang an idea! How often hav you tried that, and history has told you it was a failure! Men in Palestine thought if they would crucify Christ that they could blot out and destroy his teachings, but it was like throwing oil on the fire to quench it. You were sure when you hung John Brown that you had put out the fire of Abolition, but then you only kindled it, and the blaze that it made took in nearly all the Union. Yes, that hanging made bloody work for years, made many homes desolate. I hope you hav made no mistake this time, but I fear, for the innocent never suffered for naught. If we err, it is better to err on the side of mercy. If these five men that are now lying in their cold and silent graves killed the policemen, then right was done in taking their lives, for the Bible says, "A tooth for a tooth and an eye for an eye." I despise Anarchy as a bad thing, but I despise it no worse than the cause of it. If the cause was removed, Anarchy would die an easy death—die without hanging. But what is the use of punishing effect while the cause remains unmolested? These men are hung, and future generations shall judge of the wrong that has been done—of the mistake that was made. I had a man say to me the other day, "Why, the Methodist ministers even petitioned the governor not to commute their sentence!" But were they afraid that the governor would be more merciful thau they? O wolves in sheep's clothing! is tbat your sympathy for your fellow-men? What a pity there is no hell! Sometimes I think there ought to be a short one, say for a few minutes, so that these hypocrits might receive a small dose. Yours truly, MAGGIE HOPE GRAHAM.

PELLA, IA., Dec. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It is with reluctance that I attempt to address you, knowing full well the marked ability of your many correspondents. But never seeing anything from this priest-ridden community, I thought perhaps it would be well to let the world know that there are a few stanch Liberals in our Calvinistic town, but we lack organization. In our present scattered, go-as-you-please condition we are compelled to battle with the dogmas of superstition at a great disadvantage.

We hav been trying to get some of our many able orators to come and help us to organize. I think we could muster twenty-five as stanch men as could be found, besides many others that are strongly inclined to Liberalism.

If there is any place where superstition reigns supreme it is here. Our town has a population of about twenty-seven hundred; supports fifteen kid-gloved insurance agents, who present the blood of the carpenter as a balm for all the maladies that humanity is heir to both here and hereafter; also, thirteen temples dedicated to some supposed deity, who delights to sniff the blood of bulls and goats, but has finally concluded that the blood of the mythical son of the much-slandered Virgin would atone, and therefore retires, leaving his business exclusivly to the aforesaid agents, who from the rostrums of their respectiv joss-houses breathe forth their infernal anathemas upon any who dare oppose or differ with them; teaching, or rather scaring, little children almost to lunacy by their tales of hell and horror, and thus swell their numbers.

I greatly fear that Liberals do not realize the necessity of organization. Our present system of doing business or propagating our system amounts to but little, for the simple reason that we fail to reach the young. They are firmly held in the meshes of the church by their system of Sunday-schools and many other devices of their crafty priests; thus the damnable superstition of the Dark Ages is indelibly written upon their young minds. A certain priest has said, "Giv me a child until it is ten years old, and I will risk all future consequences." They understand this matter, and govern themselvs accordingly.

Unless we arouse from our lethargy, and contribute of our means as well as talent toward organizing our forces, we will find to our disgust that we hav been idly beating the wind. Again, so many tenderfoot Liberals dare not assert their principles for fear of courting the calumny of the priesthood, and thus lose their influence as well as their individuality, and, we might add, their manhood. J. W. FISK.

LEBO, KAN., Dec. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: "N. S." mistakes, or knowingly misrepresents me, in the last TRUTH SEEKER. Perhaps he is a neophyte, or but lately converted from orthodoxy. If so, he is pardonable. He says I "called him a crank, silly, crazy, and held him up to the public gaze as a warning," etc. Whatever I may hav thought of him, I did nothing of the kind. I used the word "crank" but once, and then not referring to him. I told him that since, from his own statement, his case was in some respects a duplicate of one with which I was acquainted that had gone crazy, he should take warning, and go under treatment at once, if not too late. I said, "If he will hug his phantoms he will, in time, serve as a warning, as a stranded ship," etc., and by his last I am convinced he will do both. His declaration, that he "did not wish to be cured," renders a bad prognosis unavoidable. Some time since I heard a poor little preacher who could not understand a logical syllogism when explained, who would not admit the inevitable sequence of his own assumed premises, vehemently declare, "If these positions be erroneous, let me liv and die in error, for I will not giv up my faith." What could be done for him but to let him alone? We can only pity such stupidity. If in error, we rejoice to make the discovery, and thank him who aids us in this. I did not call him silly, but said, and still say, it sounds silly in a man to set up marvelous claims unless he can demonstrate their truth. His spleen seems disturbed, and a spirit of acrimony is displayed that I will not notice. I did not propose to bet, but offered to make him a present of $100 for his trouble in case he or his spirits are able to do as he claims before me, and I shall esteem the price reasonable, but I will waste no more time foolishly, and he must guarantee he is not a humbug by the deposit in bank to my credit of a like sum, if he fails to giv me the evidence desired. Of course I cannot use the distributed major premis and say all, for I hav not seen all, but I say I know many mediums are pitiful frauds, and shall protect myself against their impositions, as I do with all other mountebanks. I am simply Agnostic, but desire to learn, and expect to pay my tuition fee. My teacher must understand his alphabet, however, or make me believe he does, and, if he does not, he shall pay me for the time he caused me to squander by his false claims and pretensions. I mean business, simply business, and shall heed no babbling. I think my offer a fair and gentlemanly one.

He "fears I am so far advanced I can learn nothing more." I am not so far advanced, nor yet so old, that I do not learn daily, and I was hoping to learn somewhat of him, but the prospect looks gloomy at present.

I am unable to giv any reliable statistics as to the relativ number of insane among Spiritualists and Materialists, so I will not dispute his statement that there are less of the former, but I do not believe it, and call for his proofs.

He says, "Spiritualists hav a cheerful doctrin founded on phenomena, while Materialists occupy a melancholy position," etc. I reply, that depends on the status of the person. At the Centennial I saw a boy of perhaps twelve years looking very cheerful and happy with a penny rattle, while he neither heeded nor cared for the mighty Corliss engin which filled many with admiration akin to awe. The rattle was, no doubt, best adapted to his mental status. I am no contemner of things cheerful, but let them ever remain subordinate to the grand truths and principles of the solid material universe, and the sciences relating thereto.

He asks, with an air of innocent triumph that awakens pity, "Can he [I] demonstrate that my statements of September 10th are false?" I am happy in having better business on hand than demonstrating negativs. He made assertions that I did not believe, and I called on him for the proofs, and offered to pay him for them, but he comes at me with a spleeny, pueril effort at wit and sarcasm. He speaks of himself and spirit friends with large assurance, but with little of that modesty characteristic of true ability. He says, "Theology is a perverted child of Spiritualism!" Ha! ha! ha! I am ever so glad he told us that. I never could get its pedigree from good authority before. I always supposed such a monstrosity as theology must hav had a she God for a female and a horned devil for a male progenitor, but this detracts sadly from the supposed notoriety of its parentage. Tell him for me not to weep, for no Materialist wishes to "drive him from his positions." S. F.

KENT, O., Dec. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to say to Mr. Hoffman, of Georgia, and Mr. Vogler, of Home City, that, while they seem to take offense at my article of September 28th, and think me opposed to Freethought, and more especially to free speech, I do say that I am opposed to such freedom of speech as they advocate, and I am glad we hav men of more solid thought to control our country. One of them says if "I knew more about the men who died in Chicago on the 11th of November," etc., I would not talk as I do. While this may be true—and I wish I knew more—I will say I know as much as either of them, who think me so ignorant, as I was in Chicago during the strike and the Haymarket trouble, and tried to learn all I could as to the true inwardness of the question then being agitated; also, I hav read pro and con since that time.

Mr. Hoffman says the right of free speech has no limit; if you put bounds to it, it is no longer free. I will leave this question for the calm consideration of more solid Freethinkers, and only suggest that there must be a limit to everything to make it useful. Fire and water, two of our most useful elements when our servants, are the most destructiv when our masters.

As for capital punishment, I said nothing in my article referred to indicativ of my personal views on the subject. As long as capital punishment is the law of a state, criminals must be punished by that law, and anything I might say against the law could not change it. I am opposed to such law.

He also infers that I think all will be well in the sweet by and bye. Not so, brother, for I know nothing of such a time, and a wrong once done can never be undone. But haste often makes waste. I am no more in love with religious superstitions than you, but we hav many great and good men who believe and love their old Bible fables, and we are bound to respect them with their belief, or we cannot ask the same of them.

I am sorry to hear Friend Hoffman talk as he does of our policemen, as we put them into office to protect our lives and our property, and should stand by them when they need help. I am sorry to see them in the control of the church, as they should enforce justice only. If you condemn our policemen, who keep peace, what do you think of men who advocate no law to make peace? What freedom would there be for an unprotected female, were there no law or officers to protect her?

To Mr. Vogler I will say that I am a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and like it very much, although its Editors and I do not agree on all questions, and am also a reader of several other periodicals and an occasional copy of Lucifer, and in them I find many good and valuable thoughts; also many that I cannot accept.

He also says, "Mr. Swan, come out here on these cheap lands," etc. Why, bless your ignorance, I lived seven years in Kansas, from 1873 all through the grasshopper years, and think it a beautiful country, and that it has some as good people as liv. I am sorry you hav a railroad so near you, for were it not so, you could draw the products of your farm hundreds of miles to market, buy coal and team it home free of cost, and I advise that you do so now and not pay the monopolies one cent. While you in the West are crying, "High rates on transportation!" to the East, our Eastern farmers are growling because the rates are so low. They can't compete with you, and their farms hav depreciated forty per cent in value. If it were in my power to please you both, I would do it. On the whole, gentlemen, I think you are throwing stones at the horse you would catch in the pasture, for I cannot see how you are going to revolutionize our country for the benefit of the poor man by the course you are pursuing. The majority must rule, and the majority of our American citizens feel proud to think they liv in America.

No one is more willing to tolerate free speech than I, until it is carried so far as to jeopardize the welfare of our country and individual rights. When a man says, Hats off, to those who claimed to be Anarchists and hurrahed for Anarchy on the gallows, and then says he is not an Anarchist, I think he would best either chew his gum or take it from his mouth. I hav just read the editorial on the trial of John Most, and I heartily approve of what is said, so you see I am not entirely dumb to the opinion of others. I will gladly giv countenance to every sentiment that will giv freedom to our people, and especially to the poor man, but cannot condemn the best government on earth because I see some laws I do not like. It is utterly impossible for any country to make laws to please everyone, and especially those who wish no law.

Our government givs freedom to the foreigners; givs them land, a home, and a chance to help make our laws. Why growl because everything is not to your liking? I am for the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and will do all I can by peaceable means to get them. I think we are gaining ground. Our churches are becoming more Liberal, and free discussion is the spirit of the day. Let Freethinkers discuss, while the churches pray.

Yours for the best mutual interests of mankind,

A. D. SWAN.

DES MOINES, IA., Dec. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The people of Des Moines hav again received the benefit of a series of able lectures on Liberalism, this time at the instauce of Dr. J. L. York, whose name has become a household word by reason of his vigorous efforts here. But to-day he started for the West, his next point being that of Denver, Col. We miss him already. We pass the entrance of the hall, we climb the stony steps perchance, and see the vacant rostrum. It is a sad sight.

I would that every man and woman, endowed with reason and intelligence enough to grasp the scientific truths that he advances, would, candidly and honestly, listen to the doctor's lecture on "Evolution or Creation—Which?" and, were it possible for such men and women to lay aside their prejudice and receive the profound reasonings of which his mind is a fountain, people would withdraw support from church and creed, and, instead of having the idle tales of ignorant prattlers preached in aimless dashes from their pulpits, we would replace the undeserving structure by education and reform.

As one of our Des Moines Liberals, I must say that I am proud, very proud, of the able lectures that hav been given us by Dr. York. He is what would seem to some of our Christian friends, perhaps, a little too radical or outspoken. But the spirit of earnest desire to please his hearers which in every instance characterizes his efforts givs the candid thinker no room for any shock at the boldness of his expression. They simply ask themselvs whether or not the old man has told the truth. Consequently, the audience giv expression to their degree of satisfaction by frequent applause and continued attentivness. At each of his lectures here he held the audience with increased interest and enthusiasm for over two hours. But occasionally he was interrupted by the Christian "flip-floppers," who naturally would fill up quicker than the rest, and prance out of the hall. However, we got along just as well without them. One old woman told me that the reason she left the hall on Sunday evening was that she didn't like to attend such places on Sunday, but that if it had been any other day, she would attend. I informed her that the doctor would giv another lecture on Monday evening. He did, but the old lady didn't come. She went to the bull-fight.

The quaint delivery, the clear, deep voice and ringing tone, the earnestness of his efforts, the pleasing address, the refined but blunt expression, the logical arrangement of his thoughts, the powerful magnetism, his art of mimicry, and his desire to do good, are only a few of the extraordinary qualifications that are brought together to form the noted personage that we are proud to own as "the Ingersoll of the West."

The weather was very cold and disagreeable, but the fact that we had larger audiences than we usually see at our Liberal meetings here goes to prove that the good seed scattered in Des Moines by our noble friend and co-worker, Charles B. Reynolds, is bearing us a rich harvest. It is hardly time yet to reap the harvest of Dr. York. But the fact that steps were taken at his lectures to organize an Independent or Liberal Sunday-school and Childrens' Progressiv Lyceum bespeak for us a good result from the efforts of the doctor.

I earnestly hope that the appointments which hav been filled by Dr. York, and those which are yet to come, may prove as beneficial to humanity as hav his efforts here. He has inspired us with a new hope. He has bettered the channel of our thinking. He has transplanted the thinking minds of our city to a new sphere. And, above all, he has given us the cause for a resolution to strive to do good in every way possible. Indeed, I never before so truly realized the benefits of mental freedom, and the pure happiness that comes from a knowledge of the truth, as eloquently explained by Dr. York.

I hope that everywhere he may go he may open the eyes of the people, and awaken their sleeping talent which now is smothering within the walls of ignorance and superstition.

The doctor and his better half were entertained at the pleasant home of D. H. Cross and wife, and every effort upon their part, as well as our other Liberal friends of Des Moines, has been extended to make it a pleasant sojourn for them here. We can but hope, therefore, that he has left our city with as good an impression of us as we hav formed of him. And I voice the sentiments of the greater portion of his large audiences here when I say that he has given our cause a mighty push onward. And our best wishes follow him to the end of all his efforts. WARNER LOVELL.

P.S.—In reply to the many pleasant responses I hav received from Liberals all over the country, as a result of a former letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I would say, in addition to the personal attention I hav devoted to each one of these encouraging epistles, that I am very thankful to find so many warm friends in a field wherein I am a comparativ stranger. And I am glad that I can come out upon as pure a platform and put my name under as pure a motto as THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope that it may be the means of informing my acquaintances that I am decidedly a Liberal, the opinions formed from reading some of my previous writings notwithstanding. Liberals, I am always pleased to hear from you, and shall giv your communications due attention. W. L.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Our Pet.

I know a pretty pussy
And she is very wise.
Her name is Mistress Zaidee
And she has yellow eyes.

Her fur is soft and silky,
The prettiest silver-gray;
There's not a white hair in it,
She's perfect in her way.

She is so shy and cunning
And hides away so well,
That she wears a pretty collar
With a little silver bill.

She'll hide behind the table,
She'll sit up in a chair,
But when you turn to catch her
She is no longer there.

When it is her bed-time
She's quiet as a mouse,
And hides in some dark corner
While you search the whole house.

She'll not move a muscle,
Though you call her by the hour,
But a tinkle soon betrays her
And she's quickly in your power.

Then she lays her pretty ears back
And shakes her dainty head;
Scolding and sometimes scratching
As you take her off to bed.

She is so cross and funny,
I'm sure that you would smile,
But she's the nicest pussy
You will find for many a mile.

The Snow Angel.

The sleigh-bells danced that winter night;
Old Brattleboro rang with glee;
The windows overflowed with light;
Joy ruled each hearth and Christmas tree;
But to one the bells and mirth were naught;
His soul with deeper joy was fraught.
He waited till the guests were gone;
He waited to dream his dream alone;
And the night wore on.

Alone he stands in the silent night;
He piles the snow in the village square;
With spade for a chisel, a statue white
From the crystal quarry rises fair.
No light, save the stars, to guide his hand,
But the image obeys his soul's command.
The sky is draped in a fleecy lawn,
The stars grow pale in the early dawn,
But the lad toils on.

And lo! in the morn the people came
To gaze at the wondrous vision there;
And they called it "The Angel," divining its name,
For it came in silence and unaware.
It seemed no moral hand had wrought
The uplifted face of prayerful thought:
But its features wasted beneath the sun:
Its life went out ere the day was done;
And the lad dreamed on.

And his dream was this: In the years to be
I will carve the angel in lasting stone;
In another land, beyond the sea,
I will toil in darkness, will dream alone;
While others sleep I will find a way
Up through the night to the light of day.
There's nothing desired beneath star or sun
Which patient genius has not won.
And the boy toiled on.

The years go by. He has wrought by might;
He has gained renown in the land of art:
But the thought inspired that Christmas night
Still kept its place in the sculptor's heart;
And the dream of the boy, that melted away
In the light of the sun that winter day,
Is embodied at last in enduring stone,
Snow angel in marble—his purpose won;
As the man toils on.

Prize Essay.

WHY I AM A LIBERAL.

I. I am a Liberal because, as I understand it, Liberalism may be called the religion of Nature. It teaches obedience to natural law, and maintains that each individual must suffer the consequences of his or her own actions, and that the penalty for each and every violation of the laws of Nature must be paid not by an innocent being, but by the violators of the law themselvs.

II. That form of religion known as Christianity claims to be a divine revelation, but furnishes no proof to support the claim, and the pages of history inform us that it has always been a cruel persecutor of those who dissented from its views. Catholics and Protestants hav frequently persecuted each other with extreme cruelty, and some Protestant sects hav tortured and put to death members of other Protestant sects for upholding opposing creeds. Liberalism has never persecuted anyone for being against its views, but allows the utmost freedom of thought and expression of opinion on all subjects whatever.

III. Liberalism knows nothing of supernaturalism, because the sublimest truths and grandest discoveries hav been found by scientific men within the domain of the natural. Nature forms the hills and the valleys, the lakes and the rivers, the seas and the oceans; and, in fact, everything in the boundless universe, from the unseen atom to the ponderous globe revolving in space, is alike subject to natural law.

IV. It was not by means of a supernatural revelation that Copernicus discovered his system of astronomy; it was not a heavenly messenger that informed Bruno of a plurality of worlds, and Galileo obtained no divine aid in the invention of his telescope, with which he viewed the starry heavens; but it was believers of a professed divine revelation who tortured and put to death in the most horrible manner those noble men for teaching the great truths of nature, the results of their own discoveries and investigations.

The Story of a Handkerchief.

It was on a cold winter eve the night before Christmas when along through the rushing streets of one of our great lake cities a tall young man overloaded with packages was running to catch the street-car, which already was in motion, to get home. Home! He had no home, as he was a foreigner, but his boarding-house, where he had been living for nearly two years.

Christmas eve! Whoever has been alone in a foreign country, without friends or relativs, can imagin the feeling of our hero who will play the main part in this story. But he was going to hav Christmas, too, and so he bought some oranges and other little things for a few little friends he had and a book for the lady of the house he was boarding with. There was still something, perhaps a stranger could not hav made out, he was carefully holding when sitting in the car. It was all wrapped up in paper, and seemed to be breakable, as he handled it very carefully.

It was no work of art; it was only a picture of an Indian camp, made by himself out of scrap-pictures, moss, etc., but it was made out of friendship, for two little girls nine and ten years of age. After he arrived at the house, he put his things up and then sat down near the warm grate and recalled his past. He thought of a little house far in the east, in Europe, on the barren coast of the wild sea, where he was born. He thought of the time when he was a boy and going to school, and at Christmas getting presents from his parents and friends. He then thought of the incident that had occurred and the time he became an Infidel, and the day he left his home and country to hav peace and to worship his own religion, the Religion of Science and Truth; of the time when his mother bade him good-bye, and the time he landed on foreign soil without having a person he knew in the other country. He did not pray to God to giv him luck, nor did he ask Jesus to help him along; no, he simply trusted himself and depended his future on his hands and brain. All this he realized, and then a tear touched the paper he was writing on—a letter to his mother. He had no Christmas. Nobody would giv him something, as he expected, and so he went up to his room and went to bed to forget for a night that perhaps nevermore should he see his dear old mother's face again on a Christmas day.

It was noon the next day when he came home to dinner after having done some shopping, and when the dear little girls I spoke of before went to his chair and handed him a little package, containing a common little handkerchief. It is not the value of an article that is given; it is the way it is presented. And so this little handkerchief, worth only a few cents or a dime, made him more happy than any valuable piece of jewelry or a check on a bank could hav done. A tear again was in his eye, but this time a tear of joy. Yes, he had friends, too, and if he even had no place he could really call his home, he knew now that he would always find somebody that would care a little for him, and when Christmas comes again he perhaps will hav somebody again that will make him a present and make him forget that there is no place like home—especially on Christmas eve. The handkerchief he did not use, but he took a piece of silk paper and wrapped it up and laid it away for another time, to show perhaps to a friend who feels downhearted and illustrate how little things can make a person happy.

But, you children who may read this, you may take the lesson out of it that you should each exert all the favor you can, that you may never forget how happy you are in your youth, and how thankful you ought to be to your parents for all the good things they are giving you, and if you meet a person you think is in need of something, if only a kind word or smile, or if a poor tramp comes to your back-door and asks you for a cup of coffee or bread, oh, don't send him away. Ninety-nine may be guilty of not being willing to work, and just that one you send away perhaps would hav done any kind of work before going out to beg. Be kind to everyone, and don't let one feel that you are better off than he is.

UNCLE LOUIS.

A Brave Marquis.

From an old history of Delaware we gather the story of a young French nobleman, which may interest our readers:

Among the French aristocrats who escaped the guillotin, in the days when it was a crime to hav been born with a title, was the Marquise de Sourcy, who fled to England, and thence to this country, with her son, a boy of fourteen. Her husband having been executed, this boy, Pierre, inherited the title; estates there were none.

His mother landed penniless in Wilmington, Del., and found refuge in a little cabin on Sixth street. The influential people of the town called on Madam de Sourcy, and offered her aid. Many houses were opened to her, but Pierre refused all help.

"We are poor, but not beggars," he said proudly. "I hav hands. I will support my mother."

He had no profession, trade, or capital. In the garden attached to their cottage grew a gourd vine. He cut the smaller gourds, and made of them boxes, which he stained and decorated with black figures, drawn en silhouet. These boxes sold rapidly at high prices. He then invented an ice-boat, which drew large crowds to the banks of Christiana creek, when it was frozen over.

There the young marquis was waiting with toy boats which he had made for sale. When pring came, he had several small bateaux ready to dispose of.

In the garden, he raised poultry and vegetables enough to supply his mother's table.

Two years passed. Pierre had wider ambitions. He built, after many failures, a boat so large that in it he was able to cross the Delaware, and to bring from New Jersey sand, which he sold for building purposes. He had from this a steady income, and began to look with contempt on his toy boxes and boats.

But one day the poor little marquis, weighted with his cargo of sand, was overtaken by a storm on the Delaware, his boat was capsized, and he was drowned within sight of his home. His mother sank under her trouble, and died the next day.

They were buried together in the old Swedes' churchyard; and the grave is still shown to strangers of the little nobleman who played his part in the world, in the midst of cruel misery and pain, more bravely, perhaps, than any of his ancestors.—Our Own Paper.

Nursery Rhyme Interpreted.

Here is a nursery rhyme I should like to draw attention to—one in common use in Cornwall—which is certainly of great antiquity, and has even the reputation of being of Druidical origin. It runs as follows:

Ena, mena, mona, mite,
Pasca, laura, bona, bite,
Eggs, butter, cheese, bread,
Stick, stock, stone, dead.

The first two lines are said to be a phonetic representation of the incantations performed by the Druids before the immolation of their victims; the third has reference to the fattening process to which the victims were subjected in anticipation of their immolation, and the fourth of course shows the ordinary mode of immolation to hav been either by beating them to death with sticks or stoning them with stones.—Notes and Queries.

A GOOD mother undertook a little religious instruction among her children on Sunday, and began to read the parable of the sower. A little six-year-old girl promptly interrupted with: "That's a chestnut, mamma! That's a chestnut! I've heard it in Sunday-school lots of times."—Taunton Gazette.

WHEN one thinks of the real agony one has gone through in consequence of false teaching, it makes human nature angry with the teachers who hav added to the bitterness of life.—General Gordon.

Correspondence.

DENVER, COL., Dec. 17, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Received the $1 yesterday for essay, "Why I am a Liberal." No, I hav never received Mr. Cozine's prize-money. He probably thought he did not get his money's worth, and perhaps he didn't.

Very truly, LAURA STEWART.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Dec. 15, 1887.

MISS WIXON, Dear Madam: I received your letter and inclosed postal-note this morning, from which I learn that my essay on "Why I Am a Liberal" has taken the first prize. Accept my thanks for your compliment, and the assurance that I will strive to mend the fault you hav observed. The Corner will probably hear from me in January. Closing, I remain, Yours truly, GEO. H. SEIBEL.

SCANDIA, KAN., Dec. 13, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I go to school every day. I went the first three months of our school, and got a prize. The prize was a box of writing-paper, with a flower on the top of the paper. I wish some of the members of the Children's Corner would write to me. I am eleven years old. I hav two sisters and one brother. I wrote to Aunt Elmina some time ago, but hav not seen it in the Investigator yet. Please excuse bad writing. From your friend.

LULIE DE TAYLOR.

OMAHA, NEB., Dec. 11, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It is quite a long time since I wrote to the Children's Corner. I go to school every day. I am in the sixth grade. My teacher's name is Miss Fannie Maxwell; she is very kind. The Salvation Army has been arrested once. A lady friend of ours went down to their hall one night with a Methodist lady, and when they asked her whether or not she believed in God, after some little parley she said, "Prove to me that I hav a soul, and I will join." But they could not, so she is a Liberal yet.

Papa is a true Liberal. There is a Presbyterian church next door to us. Sometimes I go there with a little girl, a friend, and it makes me go to sleep. Rev. Harsha is the minister. I am learning the song, "There's One More River to Cross," and a piece, "The Children's Hour."

I am twelve years old, and would like to hav some correspondents about my own age. As my letter is getting almost too long—

Yours with love, MAGGIE GRIFFITH.

Wednesday, Dec. 14, 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long time; and I hav often thought of writing to the Children's Corner, but as yet never hav. But I hav heard "it is better late than never," so I thought I would defer writing no longer.

I am going to school now. My two sisters go also. We hav as teacher a kind and considerate lady, Miss Stella Jackson by name. I disobey but one school law, and that is the repeating of the Lord's Prayer. Each scholar is expected to stand, look sanctimonious, and repeat it. But as for myself, I must say I can scarcely endure to hear it every morning during an entire term of school, much less repeat it. We are also expected to sing gospel hymns. Some of the hymns are, I think, worth singing, and convey to one much that is very instructiv and pleasant to think of. When these are sung, I generally join in the singing of them.

The church-going people of our vicinity are too poor to build a church in which to worship, so our school-house is used for a church; and, from the appearance of the several scholars' desks and books on Monday morning, one has a right to conclude that all do not go for the express purpose of worship. All this causes the scholars to grow very much disgusted at times.

My brother, my sisters, and myself can always find a more profitable way in which to spend our time than in going to a country church, where there is not even good singing to listen to.

I will close, as I fear I am writing too long a letter to see it in print.

With best wishes to the Children's Corner, I remain, Your friend,

MAUDE MONTAGUE MORRISON.

has put this burden on your young life simply that you may suffer and be strong. I would help you gladly, but I do not wish to defeat the plans of your almighty friend?" You can reason one way, but you would act the other.

I agree with you that work is good, that struggle is essential; that men are made manly by contending with each other and with the forces of nature; but there is a point beyond which struggle does not make character; there is a point at which struggle becomes failure.

Can you conceive of an "almighty friend" deforming his children because he loves them? Did he allow the innocent to languish in dungeons because he was their friend? Did he allow the noble to perish upon the scaffold, the great and the self-denying to be burnt at the stake, because he had the power to save? Was he restrained by love? Did this "almighty friend" allow millions of his children to be enslaved to the end that "the splendor of virtue might hav a dark background?" You insist that "suffering patiently borne is a means of the greatest elevation of character and in the end of the highest enjoyment." Do you not then see that your "almighty friend" has been unjust to the happy—that he is cruel to those whom we call the fortunate—that he is indifferent to the men who do not suffer—that he leaves all the happy and prosperous and joyous without character, and that in the end, according to your doctrin, they are the losers?

But, after all, there is no need of arguing this question further. There is one fact that destroys forever your theory—and that is the fact that millions upon millions die in infancy. Where do they get "elevation of character?" What opportunity is given to them to "suffer and be strong?" Let us admit that we do not know. Let us say that the mysteries of life, of good and evil, of joy and pain, hav never been explained. Is character of no importance in heaven? How is it possible for angels, living in "a child's picture," to "suffer and be strong?" Do you not see that, according to your philosophy, only the damned can grow great—only the lost can become sublime?

You do not seem to understand what I say with regard to what I call the higher philosophy. When that philosophy is accepted, of course there will be good in the world, there will be evil, there will still be right and wrong. What is good? That which tends to the happiness of sentient beings. What is evil? That which tends to the misery, or tends to lessen the happiness, of sentient beings. What is right? The best thing to be done under the circumstances—that is to say, the thing that will increase or preserve the happiness of man. What is wrong? That which tends to the misery of man.

What you call liberty, choice, morality, responsibility, hav nothing whatever to do with this. There is no difference between necessity and liberty. He who is free, acts from choice. What is the foundation of his choice? What we really mean by liberty is freedom from personal dictation—we do not wish to be controled by the will of others. To us the nature of things does not seem to be a master—Nature has no will.

Society has the right to protect itself by imprisoning those who prey upon its interests; but it has no right to punish. It may hav the right to destroy the life of one dangerous to the community; but what has freedom to do with this? Do you kill the poisonous serpent because he knew better than to bite? Do you chain a wild beast because he is morally responsible? Do you not think that the criminal deserves the pity of the virtuous?

I was looking forward to the time when the individual might feel justified—when the convict who had worn the garment of disgrace might know and feel that he had acted as he must.

There is an old Hindoo prayer to which I call your attention: "Hav mercy, God, upon the vicious; thou hast already had mercy upon the just by making them just."

Is it not possible that we may find that everything has been necessarily produced? This, of course, would end in the justification of men. Is not that a a desirable thing? Is it not possible that intelligence may at last raise the human race to that sublime and philosophic hight?

You insist, however, that this is Calvinism. I take it for granted that you understand Calvinism—but let me tell you what it is. Calvinism asserts that man does as he must, and that, notwithstanding this fact, he is responsible for what he does—that is to say, for what he is compelled to do—that is to say, for what God does with him; and that, for doing that which he must, an infinit God, who compelled him to do it, is justified in punishing the man in eternal fire; this, not because the man ought to be damned, but simply for the glory of God.

Starting from the same declaration, that man does as he must, I reach the conclusion that we shall finally perceive in this fact justification for every individual. And yet you see no difference between my doctrin and Calvinism. You insist that damnation and justification are substantially the same; and yet the difference is as great as human language can express. You call the justification of all the world "the gospel of despair," and the damnation of nearly all the human race the "consolation of religion."

After all, my dear friend, do you not see that when you come to speak of that which is really good, you are compelled to describe your ideal human being? It is the human in Christ, and only the human, that you, by any possibility, can understand. You speak of one who was born among the poor, who went about doing good, who sympathized with those who suffered. You hav described, not only one, but many millions of the human race. Millions of others hav carried light to those sitting in darkness; millions and millions hav taken children in their arms; millions hav wept that those they loved might smile. No language can express the goodness, the heroism, the patience, and self-denial of the many millions, dead and living, who hav preserved in the family of man the jewels of the heart. You hav clad one being in all the virtues of the race, in all the attributes of gentleness, patience, goodness, and love, and yet that being, according to the New Testament, had to his character another side. True, he said, "Come unto me and I will giv you rest;" but what did he say to those who failed to come? You pour out your whole heart in thankfulness to this one man who suffered for the right, while I thank not only this one, but all the rest. My heart goes out to all the great, the self-denying, and the good—to the founders of nations, singers of songs, builders of homes; to the inventors, to the artists who hav filled the world with beauty, to the composers of music, to the soldiers of the right, to the makers of mirth, to honest men, and to all the loving mothers of the race.

Compare, for one moment, all that the savior did, all the pain and suffering that he relieved; compare all this with the discovery of anesthetics. Compare your prophets with the inventors, your apostles with the Keplers, the Humboldts, and the Darwins.

I belong to the great church that holds the world within its starlit aisles; that claims the great and good of every race and clime; that finds with joy the grain of gold in every creed, and floods with light and love the germs of good in every soul.

Most men are provincial, narrow, one-sided, only partially devoloped. In a new country we often see a little patch of land, a clearing in which the pioneer has built his cabin. This little clearing is just large enough to support a family, and the remainder of the farm is still forest, in which snakes crawl and wild beasts occasionally crouch. It is thus with the brain of the average man. There is a little clearing, a little patch, just large enough to practice medicin with, or sell goods, or practice law, or preach with, or to do some kind of business, sufficient to obtain bread and food and shelter for a family, while all the rest of the brain is covered with primeval forest, in which lie coiled the serpents of superstition and from which spring the wild beasts of orthodox religion.

Neither in the interest of truth, nor for the benefit of man, is it necessary to assert what we do not know. No cause is great enough to demand a sacrifice of candor. The mysteries of life and death, of good and evil, hav never yet been solved.

I combat those only who, knowing nothing of the future, prophesy an eternity of pain—those only who sow the seeds of fear in the hearts of men—those only who poison all the springs of life, and seat a skeleton at every feast.

Let us banish the shriveled hags of superstition; let us welcome the beautiful daughters of truth and joy.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

LIBERAL, Mo.—All Liberals are natural kickers, and more or less cranks—i.e., advanced thinkers. Their independence of character makes them prompt to resist anything like dictation, and to regard with contempt any theory that does not commend itself to their reason, or that cannot pass the ordeal of rigid investigation. Each and all who invested in Liberal had their own peculiar notions of just what a Liberal town should be, and how to make it so. Each and all wanted their own way, and were more or less impatient at the mere suggestion of any other. No wonder, then, that Liberal has passed through many serious dissensions and sad tribulations! It was very necessary that the various specimens of ore thus promiscuously thrown together should be tested. This has been done, and all are rejoicing to discover the pure metal far exceeds the dross, although for a time each to the other seemed a mass of rough, jagged edges, that was sure to cut and lacerate all who did not handle them most cautiously. Having now passed through the crusher, the genuin metal greatly preponderates, and there is a glad admission of the many excellent qualities of each other.

Liberal is now on the direct road to progress and permanent prosperity. Very handsome stone buildings are being erected in the place of the frame shanties first put up. A general spirit of enterprise prevails that only needs centering in the right channel to insure most rapid growth and brilliant future. There are now two main lines of railroad running through the town, and in a few months there will be a third, making Liberal a railroad center.

Liberal is not the place for a poor man. There is at present no industrial enterprise, no manufactories, nothing to giv employment to the laboring classes. Liberal is just the most desirable of places for people with a few thousand dollars to go make a home, and invest their money, and inevitably grow wealthy with the progress of the place. The best business men of the town are now fully aroused to the need of establishing manufactories. A stock company will shortly be formed that cannot fail to wonderfully enhance the value of every acre of land for miles around Liberal in every direction, and giv constant employment to hundreds of operativs—women as well as men. Everything is favorable for the enterprise. All the residents of Liberal will be enabled to participate, and success is assured, because the spirit of true Liberalism is now prevalent. All realize that mutual concessions, mutual forbearance, and mutual kindness will insure mutual prosperity.

I enjoyed a delightsome visit. How could it be otherwise with such a host of congenial spirits—real, genuin Liberals? I enjoyed the hospitality of the genial, jolly Charles Webb, and his good wife, who are devoted to Liberal and Liberalism. The Women's Freethought Educational Union gave a supper and reception at the Universal Mental Liberty Hall in honor of my advent, on Saturday evening, Dec. 10th. The newly organized brass band discoursed cheering melodies. Prof. M. D. Leahy made a most earnest and eloquent address. Several of the university scholars gave admirable recitations, and all enjoyed a glorious, good time. The financial proceeds were devoted to the university. I hope every local Secular Union will speedily organize a kindred society of its own ladies, and help on the noble work of affording to the children of Liberals—members of their local Union, who cannot afford the expense of sending their children to college—the advantages of a course at the Freethought University, thus helping members of their own home society, as well as the university. For full particulars address Mrs. L. H. Greeley, corresponding secretary Women's Freethought Educational Union, Liberal, Mo.

I delivered two lectures at the Universal Mental Liberty Hall on December 11th and 12th. The American Idea—and a very excellent Idea it is, and one to be cordially welcomed by every Liberal interested in the Freethought University—said of my lectures: "Mr. Reynolds is such a representativ of the great cause of Liberalism as must necessarily call forth the support and admiration of every earnest Liberal, and command the respect of every fair-minded Christian. His lecture on 'Life's Duties,' delivered Sunday night, was a treasury of the richest food for thought, and cannot fail to make better everyone who hears it. It teaches a high, pure, practical Liberalism that must commend itself to Christian and Infidel alike. His lecture, 'Why I Left the Pulpit,' is touching and instructiv, and bespeaks the genuinness of the man. His visit here is an occurrence long to be remembered by every citizen of Liberal."

I am preparing an article on the Freethought University, and hope to find time to forward it next week.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

W. F. JAMIESON has just closed a very successful course of lectures in Alamosa, Col., five nights and Sunday afternoon, to increasing audiences. The Alamosa people gave him a cordial welcome. He is engaged to giv a series of six lectures in Salida, Col., Jan. 20th, 21st, 22nd, 23d, and 24th, and will lecture in towns adjacent to Salida, and throughout Colorado, during the months of Febuary and March. Address him at Monte Vista, Col.

E. A. STEVENS writes: "If there is any one person to whom the Chicago Freethinkers feel indebted more than another—for years of patient, arduous unpaid toil and talent freely contributed—that person is Mrs. M. A. Freeman. And among its brilliant host of lecturers, few can fill a house like our eloquent vice-president, and none is so general a favorit. As Mrs. Freeman is going to make the Liberal lecture-field her future life-work, and is to start about February 1st through Iowa, having secured engagements at the following places: Fayette county, Shenandoah, Charles City, Perry, Leon, Ottumwa, Rockport, Mo.; Helena, Neb., those who wish to hear this brilliant lady lecture should address her immediately—all those on or near these places especially."

The Privileged Choir.

From the Chicago Tribune.

"And now," said the parson, at the close of his sermon, "I will ask all those in the congregation who are endeavoring to lead a better life, or who desire or expect ever to do so, to remain a few moments after the benediction has been pronounced. Members of the choir," added the good man, looking benignantly in the direction of the organ as he spoke, "are also cordially invited to remain."

How the Clergyman Became Tired.

From Truth.

Tammas walked home with the minister after service last Sunday, and the latter complained of exhaustion.

"Tired out, eh?" said Tammas.

"Yes," sighed the reverend, "completely done up, mentally and physically. I actually strained my back getting up this morning's sermon."

"Oh," said Tammas, musingly, "you must be very near the bottom of the barrel."

Mormon Property Seized.

From the Sequatchee Sun, Jasper, Tenn.

United States Marshal Dyer, as receiver of church property, seized all personal property in the temple block and tithing-office. This property is claimed by Angus Cannon, president. This estate was turned over to him before the passage of the law.—Salt Lake City Dispatch.

We are not a Mormon, nor a friend to the Mormons, yet we are in favor of strictly carrying out the Constitution of the United States, having served in the army nearly three years in order to preserve the Constitution in its purity. We can remember the time when a Methodist circuit rider was not looked upon with any more favor than the Mormons are now. Meeting-houses were closed against them, and they held their meetings in private dwellings or in the open air. It has not been many years since the Pilgrim fathers landed on this continent exiles on account of religious persecution. They had not been on the continent long before they began to persecute those who differed with them religiously; they even went so far as to hang the heretics. We are opposed to persecutions of any kind on account of political or religious opinions. The act of Congress authorizing the confiscation and seizure of Mormon property is an outrage upon our constitutional liberties that will hav a bad effect, and will react upon the people in the near future in such a manner as will shatter the foundations of our social system. It is no argument to say that the Mormons hav violated the proprieties of social life by having a plurality of wives. According to their law they had no illegitimate children, or women ostracized on account of lost virtue. How is it in our monogamic society? Look around and you can see upon every hand the work of the seducers in our fallen women and illegitimate children. Canting hypocrits cry out against the Mormons, and turn around and destroy the happiness of their next-door neighbor's daughter. And, according to numbers, preachers seduce more women than any other class. You can scarcely pick up a paper that has not a scandal in which a preacher is mixed up with some other man's wife or daughter. And, while his crime is condoned, the poor woman is kicked out of decent society, and pushed from pillar to post until she ends her days by suicide or in the poor-house, and is buried in the potter's field. The scoundrelly preacher still holds his place as pastor of the fold, and is permitted to enter society as if no innocent girl or wife had been duped by his villainy. Seeing that we practice that which we persecute the Mormons for, and leave our victims to battle through life against the sneers and persecutions of those who are more fortunate, we think it would be better to attend to our own business, and let the Mormons do the same, lest a reaction should set in that would knock the props from under our own rotten and corrupt institutions.

Consistency is said to be a great jewel. Are we consistent in persecuting the Mormons for what is practiced and perpetrated under our own noses? Sweep before your own door, and let him that is without sin throw rocks at the Mormon church. Wipe out the filthy, vulgar passages in the Bible from which the Mormons as well as yourselvs claim to found your several doctrins, and giv the rising generation a decent book to guide their course through life, before you cry out against those who are guilty of no worse crimes than you practice yourself, and are taught in your Bible.

Religion in the Schools.

From the Evening Post of November 24th.

SIR: Under the head of "Religious Opinion," in your last Saturday's paper, is an article from the Observer (Presbyterian), from which I extract the following: "The Roman Catholic authorities are now fighting the [public] schools with a vigor and ingenuity worthy of the darkest ages. They seek to break up our [school] system, by asking for a portion of the public money to use in educating children in their own way."

Who is responsible for this? I answer, the very church, and those allied to it by a common, Protestant, orthodox faith, which is represented by the Observer itself.

Anyone familiar with the history of the question of the Bible in the public schools knows that it has been an agitated one for half a century; and why? Because the Protestant church (being in the majority) persisted in inculcating the Protestant version of the Christian religion in the minds of the pupils of the public schools, against which the Roman Catholic church with equal persistence has "protested," as they had a right to, and as the Protestant church would, of course, hav done had the Roman church (if it had been in the majority) persisted in inculcating its version of the Christian religion. The consequence of this persistence of the Protestants is that the Roman Catholics hav "struck!" They hav tried in vain to hav the "bone of contention" (the Protestant Bible) taken from the public schools, and to hav secular instruction only permitted. Failing in this, they now ask, as a matter of right, that as the state contributes to the support of schools where the Protestant religion is inculcated, it should also contribute to the support of schools where the Roman Catholic religion is taught.

If our school system is destroyed, if the principle of secular education is abandoned, if these nurseries of citizenship are broken up, the Protestant church must be held answerable for the calamity which will ensue.

While I thus speak of the Protestant church as a whole, I must make exceptions in favor of the liberal-minded members of that church whose zeal for their religion has been tempered with justice—who, while tenaciously adhering to what they believe to be true in their religious teachings, deny, from principle, the right of any church to intrude itself into any of the departments of the state. If the advice of such Christians of the Protestant church as the Rev. Drs. Shipman of the Episcopal, Crosby of the Presbyterian, King of the Methodist, Tiffany of the Baptist church, had been taken, no Protestant, or Roman Catholic, or any other religious book would be allowed in our public schools, and consequently the present attempt to "break up our school system" would be without its inciting cause.

There has been a change of sentiment and a rapid growth in favor of the views here expressed. Dr. J. G. Holland was willing to "confess to a change of conviction on the matter of the compulsory reading of the Bible in the public schools. It is to the Catholic, Jew, and Atheist, a grievance, a hardship, an oppression." The Independent recently said: "If the religious views of some form of paganism were to be taught by the state, and believers in the religion of the Bible were to be taxed, these believers would complain bitterly and justly. The principle, however, is the same, no matter what religious views are incorporated into a system of popular education at the public expense." The rector of Christ church in this city has said that "Protestants are wrong in claiming a right to hav the Bible read [in the public schools]," and relegates religious education "where it properly belongs, to the family and the Church." A writer in a daily paper recently said: "Our public schools were founded for the purpose of making intelligent citizens, and not to talk about the saving of souls."

But what does the law say on this subject? I quote therefrom: "No school shall be entitled to receive any portion of the school money in which the tenets of any Christian or other religious sect shall be taught, inculcated, or practiced."

Ought not that to be sufficient either to stop appropriations for the schools or take the Bible from them? If so, I ask, which shall it be? H. M. T.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

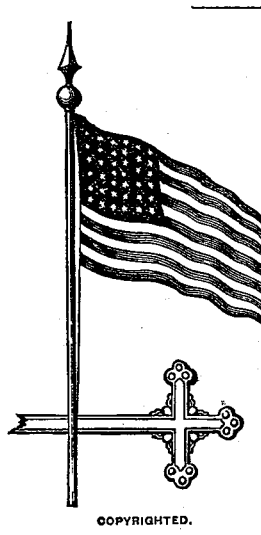
REASON IS THE LAMP OF THE MIND.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.



THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

BIBLE MYTHS,

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. BIBLE MYTHS shows this.

News of the Week.

ALARM has prevailed in maritim circles for some days over the loss of a huge lumber raft in that part of the Atlantic forming the ocean way of most European steamship lines, where it would be extremely likely to cause many collisions and wrecks.

EX-SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY MANNING died on the 24th.

THE government is moving toward a strengthening of our coast defenses.

EUROPEAN scientists hav discovered the bacillus of cancer, and are experimenting with it.

AMONG the immense number of Christmas presents the pope has received from the faithful are 50,000 bottles of champagne.

ON the 21st, an accidental discharge of 14,000 gallons of naphtha into a sewer of Rochester, N. Y., and its explosion, caused the loss of several lives.

THE advocates and the enemies of easy divorce continue to agitate the question and struggle for the support of laws favoring their respectiv sides here and in England.

THE authorities in Ireland continue to make arrests of whoever wants Home Rule, of whoever wants land reform, and, in short, of whoever wants anything that they don't wish him to hav.

ABOUT 40,000 employees of the Reading, Pa., railroad struck on the 24th.

THE Socialists in the German parliament sternly oppose the war measures and ask for international peace and movements toward a universal brotherhood of man.

AN attempt to make a little honest retrenchment in the expenses of the Boston customhouse is meeting with furious indignation from the circles benefiting by the maladministration.

LATE discoveries expose the deepest corruption in the London public boards. Unsafe buildings are passed by inspectors through bribery, and blackmail is levied wherever practicable.

A VERY extensiv movement to organize the working-women of this city is in progress. The revelations made of the long hours, meager wages, and sufferings of sewing women are shocking.

IT is reported, perhaps with questionable accuracy, that the Knights of Labor hav diminished from 723,000 in October of last year, 500,000 last July, and 300,000 last October, to 200,000 to-day.

THE Federation of Labor at its recent convention favored the making of eight hours a day's work, and recommends that each trade work for reductions of hours until the eight-hour day is reached.

FROM reports of the workings of what is called the "green goods swindle," by which city sharpers advertise and sell to countrymen pretended counterfeit money, we obtain the sad information that among the would-be purchasers of bad notes the most prominent class is that of deacons of country churches.

DR. GATLING has invented another gun, which he calls the "Police gun," and which is designed for use in riots. It is brass, weighs 78 pounds, is mounted on a tripod with a universal joint, works very much like the Gatling gun, and will deliver one thousand shots a minute in any direction—sideways, up, or down.

FROM the reports of John L. Sullivan's triumphal progress through England and Scotland, setting forth the flattering attentions, private interviews, and elegantly inscribed and costly presents tendered him by the prince of Wales and other dignitaries, may be obtained edifying ideas of the pursuits to which those ornaments of the English nation devote their time.

AN ISRAELITISH EXPRESS TRAIN.

And they laded their asses with the corn, and departed thence.—Gen. xlii, 26.

Odds and Ends.

AN oculist doesn't want an eye for an eye, and a dentist doesn't want a tooth for a tooth. They want dollars.

PROUD father: "I believe, my dear, that that baby knows as much as I do." Mother (gazing at the infant): "Yes, poor little fellow."

JORKINS: "That's a good move of Comstock's to put an end to nudity in the park." Barker: "How so?" Jorkins: "He's arrested the bear."

BOSTON mamma: "You mustn't speak of your legs, Flossie, when you hav company. It isn't polite." Flossie: "What should I say, mamma—drumsticks?"

LONG-HAIRED man (to bartender): "Can I leave a few tracts in here, my friend?" Bartender: "Yes, you can leave a few tracks in here, and I want the toes to point toward the door."

BROWN: "What makes you look so sleepy all the time, Robinson? You ought to get to bed earlier." Robinson (yawning): "I know I ought, but to tell the truth, Brown, I'm courting a widow."

OLD CHRISTMAS (to children blowing horns): "You young imps! Why do you disturb a holyday this way?" Chorus of small boys: "Yah, yah, old fossil! We spell it holiday now."

A DRUGGIST, who thought that a drachm
Was equal in weight to a lachmb,
When charged by the boss
For causing a loss,
Replied, "I don't care a dachmn."

YOUNG Mr. Sissy (on board of the Fleetwing): "Yesh, Miss Maude, thish is a (hic) centerboard yacht. Didn't you (hic) know that?" Miss Maude: "No, I was under the impression that it is a sideboard yacht."

YOUNG man (to jeweler): "You can only allow me five dollars for the ring?" Jeweler: "That's all." Young man: "But you charged me fifteen for it a month ago." Jeweler: "Exactly." Young man (sadly): "Well, giv me the five dollars. I s'pose I ought to be thankful that I got the ring back at all."

A MINISTER of Farmington, Me., after preaching a sermon of great length, died from exhaustion. This should be a warning to ministers who are in the habit of preaching long sermons. Usually the congregation suffer the most, but there are times when the minister takes a dose of his own medicin.

HUSBAND (to wife): "Do you believe in the theory that the greatness of a father often proves a stumbling-block to the advancement of his son in life?" Wife: "I certainly do. Thank heaven, John, our boy will never be handicapped in that way. But what are you looking for, my dear?" Husband: "My hat."

ENGLISH eulogists of American deceased come high, but it seems that we must hav them. The terms of an eminent divine, recently in this country, are said to be as follows: Simple exposition of deceased's career, with an appropriate moral deduced therefrom, £150; laudatory sermon, exhorting the hearers to follow in the footsteps of deceased, accompanied by tears, £200; all-wool-and-yard-wide praise, with complete dissolution of speaker in grief for the departed, with tearing of hair, rending of garments, and other accessories, as desired, £300-500.—Life.

"SPEAKING of mushrooms and toadstools, gentlemen," chimed in Dumley, "a friend of mine not long ago gathered a quantity of what he supposed were mushrooms and took 'em home. His wife cooked 'em, and the whole family ate heartily of 'em." "And did they all die?" inquired the crowd, very much shocked. "No, they happened to be mushrooms, you see," replied Dumley, with a far-away look in his eyes, "but it was a narrow escape."

THE occasional contributor dropped into the sanctum wearily. Seated at the desk was a beetle-browed tramp printer. "Are you the mule editor?" softly inquired the visiting contributor. "Nay," answered the apparition, poising a proof-slip in his delicately discolored digits; "I am the calf editor. Do you wish to be edited?"

"CAN'T you say something pleasant to me?" said a husband to his wife as he was about to start for his office. They had had a little quarrel, and he was willing to "make it up." "Ah, John," responded the penitent lady, throwing her arms around his neck, "forgiv my foolishness. We were both in the wrong. And don't forget the baby's shoes, dear, and the ton of coal, and we are out of potatoes; and John, love, you must leave me some money for the gas man."

"LAST Sabbath, the members of the Bible class,' says a Montana paper, "made a very neat and appropriate present to their pastor, Elder Sniff, of a handsome slungshot, extra weight, covered with elegant stamped leather, to be used as a paper weight in his study. The good man was quite overcome by the unexpectedness of the gift, as well as the new evidence of the esteem in which he is held by the class. He suppressed his emotion with difficulty as he thanked them for the gift and complimented them on their choice, assuring them that it should grace his study as long as he should remain in the ministry. After the close of the formal exercises, he facetiously remarked, as he slipped the slungshot up his sleeve and started home, that he would certainly hav no trouble in putting heads on the different parts of his sermons now."

"NATURALLY I hav had some queer experiences since I hav been preaching out in Wyoming," said a minister to a lady friend whom he happened to meet on the train. "I suppose so—the people must be so strange out there." "Yes, very. I remember when I first went there the mayor of the city came to me and said: 'Elder, goin' to start a church?' 'I hope to lay the foundations of one here,' I replied. 'Correct,' he continued; 'layin' for members, I reckon?' 'Well, of course, I want as many members as possible,' I replied. 'I'll tell you what I'll do, parson,' went on the mayor; 'I'll go out here on Grand Central avenue and run you a foot-race, and if you beat I'll join your church; if I beat, you pay me $10.'" "Why, the very idea—how absurd!" exclaimed the lady. "Yes," replied the minister, as he moved his grip back and propped his knees up against the seat in front, "it was ridiculous under the circumstances—he was six feet four, mostly legs; but I'll tell you what it is, if he'd been just an ordinary man, I'm a sinner if I wouldn't hav taken $10 out of the foreign missionary fund and gone out and tried him a whirl just for luck!"

Gems of Thought.

WHEN told that twice two make four, that two halves are equal to a whole, that a part is less than the whole, we are compelled to believe it, because it is sustained by evidence and our own experience, and we could not doubt it if we tried. But to believe without evidence, to accept without investigation, to admit apparent impossibilities without a vestige of proof, is not a virtue; it is not conduciv to morality. Strange and unnatural things should not be believed until unmistakable evidence is forthcoming.—D. M. Bennett.

THOUGH it is not a direct article of the Christian system, that this world is the whole of the habitable creation, yet it is so worked up therewith from what is called the Mosaic account of the creation, the story of Eve and the apple, and the counterpart of that story, the death of the son of God, that to believe otherwise—that is, to believe that God created a plurality of worlds, at least as numerous as what we call stars—renders the Christian system of faith at once little and ridiculous, and scatters it in the mind like feathers in the air. The two beliefs cannot be held together in the same mind; and he who thinks that he believes both, has thought but little of either.—Paine's Age of Reason.

FOSTER not the hostilities, the sectarianisms, of the world, its mythical and legendary supernaturalisms, but rather its far simpler and grander agreements, its universal moral instincts, its brotherly sympathies. Teach lessons of universal application, universally appreciated, universally needed. Teach the one and only universal religion of doing good, of being just. Why teach children theories of creation rejected by men of science, and doctrins outgrown by enlightened clergymen? [Why could not the author (who is evidently a very clever fellow) hav contented himself with writing "men," leaving out the "clergy?"] An honest man is a higher title than clergy-man, and it still holds good that an ounce of common sense is worth a pound of clergy.—Hylax.] Why feed the curiosity, the truth-hunger, of the child with fabulous world-histories, with acknowledged ethical and historical falsities, which the more able and thoughtful must afterward unlearn with bitter pain, and with deep indignation at the fraud practiced on them during the trustful years of childhood? Why imperil morality by intimately, if not inseparably, associating it with fragil untruths, and with delusiv doctrins emphatically opposed to common sense and justice?—Religion in Schools.

YE good distressed, ye noble few,
Who here unbending stand beneath life's pressure,
Yet bear up a while and what your bounded view,
Which only saw a little part, deemed evil,
Is no more. The storms of wintry time
Will quickly pass and one unbounded spring
Encircle all.—Thomson.

THIS is the aim of the new faith—to promote the welfare and to aid the progress of the race; to inculcate purity and honesty of life; to diffuse everywhere the spirit of charity and love; to stimulate, in every way, by music, sculpture, painting, literature, and poetry, the growing culture of the race; to place before man constantly higher models of excellence; and to cheer and comfort drooping, saddened hearts. For the time when these blessings shall be widely diffused must all disciples of the new faith toil. The time has come to emerge from politic concealment and to declare our views. Already the air is full of the tremor of a hastening change. The mists are lifting. The ugly forms of once potent superstitions are growing fainter and fainter and are fading steadily from view. The promis of a better day is dawning on the race. We may not see its glory, but we can help its advance.—Stoddard's New Faith.

TRULY the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun; but if a man liv many years and rejoice in them all; yet let him remember the days of darkness; for they shall be many. All that cometh is vanity.—Ecclesiastes xi, 7, 8.

THE old universe is made of pretty strong material. For ages men hav prophesied that it would quickly go to pieces; but it keeps on all the same. Every now and then, something happens which seems utterly disastrous to its existence; but it still endures, and it will probably continue to do so till our little fears hav subsided.—Christian Register.

NEXT to the originator of a good sentence is the first quoter of it. Many will read the book before one thinks of quoting a passage. As soon as he has done this, that line will be quoted east and west. Then, there are great ways of borrowing. Genius borrows nobly. When Shakspere is charged with debts to his authors, Landor replies: "Yet he was more original than his originals. He breathed upon dead bodies and brought them into life."

AH! thought, I say, is always thought. No great man livs in vain. The history of the world is but the biography of great men.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.
